While the Fugees didn't exactly fold after that, group activity was suspended while its individual members, starting with Jean, launched solo careers. His solo début, in 1997, was with The Carnival (full name Wyclef Jean Presents the Carnival Featuring the Refugee All-Stars), on which the guests included the other Fugees, Jean's back-up singing siblings the I Threes, the Neville Brothers and Celia Cruz. The album yielded two hit singles and itself went triple platinum.

One of the hit singles from the album was 'We Trying to Stay Alive', a riposte to the insufferable Bee Gees; the other, issued in 1998, was 'Gone Till November', on which Jean sings the line 'Gotta do some knockin' on heaven's door like Bob Dylan'; the album version doesn't mention Dylan. But in late 1997, for the promo video for the single, Jean is shown walking around inside Los Angeles International Airport and then sitting down in a row of seats and singing the 'Dylan' line, finding that Dylan himself is in the seat alongside him. It's a neat if brief moment, and an unusual one in Bob's career.

After various collaborations, including as a producer, with everyone from Michael Jackson to Sinéad O'Connor, Jean made a second, less well-received solo album in 2000, The Ecleftic: 2 Sides II a Book (on which the guests included Youssou N'Dour and Kenny Rogers, and the material pulled in Pink Floyd's 'Wish You Were Here': all in all an eclefticism too far, many felt), which was followed in 2002 by Masquerade, on which he did sing 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', giving it a pleasant reggae treatment.

The Wyclef Jean Foundation uses some of this unusual hip-hop star's money to help children living in poverty and crime-ridden conditions in the US and Haiti.

[Wyclef Jean: Carnival, Ruffhouse/Sony 67974, US, 1997; The Ecleftic: 2 Sides II a Book, Sony 62180, US, 2000; Masquerade, Sony, nia, US, 2002; 'Gone Till November', Columbia 665323 2, US, 1998. Main sources: www.askmen.com/men/entertainment_100/124c_wyclef_jean.html, http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wyclef_Jean, www.amazon.com &, as so often, Glen Dundas, Tangled, Thunder Bay, Ontario: SMA Services, 2004.]

Jefferson, Blind Lemon [1894 - 1929] A great blues singer, also a guitarist and composer, born on October 26, 1894 (given until recently as September 26, 1893) in Wortham, Texas, about 60 miles south of Dallas. Hugely influential because he shaped the Texas blues and put it on record, though his recording career was, typically, very short (1926–29). He was the main blues influence on LEADBELLY and, through Leadbelly, an important tutor to many, many others. It is said that BLIND WILLIE McTELL was encouraged to take up the 12-string guitar thanks to a personal encounter with Jefferson (though Jefferson was a 6-string guitarist). His records were also a significant influence on hillbillies, who heard them on the radio. This is clear in the marvellous work of Roscoe Holcomb in the 1950s–60s.

There is only one extant known photograph of Lemon. He sits against a photo-studio backdrop, besuited, with his guitar across his lap. He's a young man and looks a Bunterish outsider, a goody-goody deacon, plump and polished-skinned, his hair too neat. He has the thinnest possible pencil moustache, though this utterly fails to lend him a dandyish air. His spotted silk tie has been drawn onto the picture afterwards. Contradicting the sharp creases of the suit trousers, the guitar strap around his neck is of crude white string. Most oddly, he is wearing glasses—and written across the foot of the picture in a large, confident, regular hand is the comically formal message 'Cordially Yours Blind Lemon Jefferson'.

More reliably, Jefferson wrote the line 'I'm standin' here wonderin' will a matchbox hold my clothes', which crops up 25 years after his death in CARL PERKINS' 'Matchbox' and, around the same time as Dylan's first album was released, in SAM COOKE's 'Somebody Have Mercy'. (It's odd that Cooke should be wondering will a matchbox hold his clothes, because earlier in the same lyric he's standing at the bus-station with a suitcase in his hand.)

Jefferson first recorded the song that Dylan includes on his début album, 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', as 'See That My Grave's Kept Clean' in Chicago in about October 1927; this was never available on vinyl until 1968. Jefferson's re-recording, as 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', again cut in Chicago but in about February 1928, was the one Dylan knew: it had been included on the seminal HARRY SMITH compilation AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC in 1952, which was crucial to Bob Dylan from very early in his career, as to everyone in the folk revival movement of the late 1950s to early 1960s.

Dylan records 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean' for that first album on November 22, 1961; he is then taped singing it at the home of Eve & Mac Mackenzie in New York in September 1962, and performing it live at the Gaslight the following month—and then revisits it, trying out a proto-Nashville Skyline voice, during the Basement Tapes sessions years later.

He also alludes to it elsewhere. In the opening line of 'Call Letter Blues' (recorded at the Blood on the Tracks sessions but left off the album and issued, in the end, on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in the 1990s) when Dylan sings that he is 'hearin' them church bells tone', one of the things we might recognise him as hearing is the church bell tone that Blind Lemon imitates on the guitar in his performance of 'Grave'. And though there are horses galloping all over balladry and the blues, white horses are rare in the latter—but having whinnied their way into the Jefferson song, they play a cameo role in Dylan's 'Absolutely Sweet Marie' and his terrific (unreleased) later song 'Yonder Comes Sin'.

After Harry Smith's anthology, the most significant compilation was a crucial LP issue of previously hard-to-obtain pre-war blues material, The Country Blues, 1959, which included Blind Lemon Jefferson's 'Match Box Blues', recorded in Chicago in about March 1927. Jefferson re-recorded it twice, a month later, but the original recording is best: it was made for OKeh and exists in pretty good quality; the re-recordings were for Paramount, a label synonymous with cheap equipment, and hence with atrocious sound quality. Unfortunately almost all Jefferson's sides were on Paramount. Dylan played around with a version of 'Matchbox' during his studio session with GEORGE HARRISON in New York in May 1970.

Dylan's extraordinary regenerative use of the blues—and especially of pre-war blues lyric poetry—is a huge subject and Jefferson's presence is widespread within it; but Dylan's usage isn't always resourceful, and the presence of Jefferson's 'Lonesome House Blues' is a case in point. You might say that the weakest lines in that bluesy Blonde on Blonde song 'Temporary Like Achilles' are in the bridge section between the second and third verses, where he sings 'But is your heart made out of stone, or is it lime / Or is it just solid rock?' The unrock-like limpness of that repetition, that tautology, long seemed puzzlingly poor. It's just as poor but no longer a puzzle, when we learn that Dylan has extrapolated it from Blind Lemon's song, in which we get the more economical 'If your heart ain't rock, sugar it must be marble stone.'

Blind Lemon Jefferson is reputed to have frozen to death in the streets in a snowstorm in Chicago in December 1929, but by his producer J. Mayo Williams' account, he collapsed in his car and died after his chauffeur abandoned him. No death certificate has ever been found.

[Blind Lemon Jefferson: 'See That My Grave's Kept Clean', Chicago, c.Oct 1927, Blind Lemon Jefferson Volume 2, Roots RL-306, Vienna, 1968; 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', Chicago, c.Feb 1928, American Folk Music (3 double-LPs), Folkways FP 251-253, NY, 1952, CD-reissued Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997 (the Jefferson track CD-reissued earlier on King of the Country Blues, Yazoo CD-1069, US, c.1990); 'Lonesome House Blues', Chicago, c.Oct 1927; 'Match Box Blues', Chicago, c.Mar 1927, The Country Blues, RBF RF-1, NY, 1959.

Bob Dylan: 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean', NY, 22 Nov 1961, Bob Dylan; Mackenzies, NY, Sep 1962 (unreleased); Gaslight, NY, Mar 1962 (unreleased); West Saugherties, NY, Oct–Nov 1967 (unreleased).

Carl Perkins: 'Matchbox', Memphis, 30 Jan 1957; Sun 261, Memphis, 1957. (An earlier cut, 'Matchbox', Memphis, 4 Apr 1956, remained unissued until the box set Carl Perkins: The Sun Years, Charley Records, London, c.1980.) Sam Cooke: 'Somebody Have Mercy', Hollywood, 15 Feb 1962, RCA Victor (and RCA 1310, London), 1962.

Source for birthdate: his WWI draft registration card, online at www.ancestry.com, as reported to pre-war blues e-mail discussion group pre-war-blues@yahoogroups.com, 5 Dec 2005.]

Jesus v. Springsteen On the 1986 tours with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, beginning in Australia and Japan in February and March, Dylan would nightly regale his audiences with garrulous, slightly mad raps before a number of songs. Disappointingly, these were always roughly the same (i.e. descending to showbiz routine, rather than the spontaneous one-off communications of earlier eras—or at least of those when he spoke at all).

The most effective was the rap that introduced 'In the Garden', from the Saved album: a song about Christ. The rap always begins with a short list of other people's heroes, and those on the list varied nightly—except that they always seemed to include BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN. The list was particularly nifty in Tokyo on March 10, at his last concert in the Far East. Dylan says:

'This song here's about my hero. Everybody's got a hero. Where I come from heroes are . . . John Wayne, Boris Karloff, Henry Winkler, Michael Jackson, Bruce Springsteen, Ronald Reagan, Richard Nixon. Anyway, I don't care nothing about any of those people. I have my own hero.'

(For a variant see 'In the Garden'.)

'Jim Jones' [1992] The melody of 'Jim Jones', on Dylan's solo acoustic album of 1992, Good as I Been to You, might in a general way seem echoed by that of 'If You See Her Say Hello', from Blood on the Tracks, though it is said to be that of the song 'Irish Molly-O'. It was Mick Slocum, then of the group the Bushwackers, who set the old convict song to the melody Dylan used, and first released it on the Bushwackers' album The Shearer's Dream in 1974. His new melody was copyrighted in Australia in 1977, but apparently not in Washington, D.C.; Dylan's version is copyrighted to his own Special Rider Music company as 'arranged by Bob Dylan.'

Regardless of its provenance, though, the more interesting point is how intensely well Dylan performs 'Jim Jones', despite—not because of—the broke-down engine of his voice. The way he sings the phrase 'New South Wales' is as disarmingly particular, as yearningly expressive of the romance of a place-name as he has ever been (when he's been paying attention). He sings 'New South Wales' more under-statedly but as beautifully as in 'Boots of Spanish Leather' he sings 'Barcelona'—and anyone who knows the studio version of the latter, recorded in August 1963 and issued on The Times They Are a-Changin', will know that this is high praise indeed. His purpose this time, however, is not to stress romance, but to turn that level of poignancy to different effect.

In singing so savouringly of 'New South Wales' Dylan manages to bring out something of the extremity of aloneness of those sentenced to deportation: and something of the bitter irony of naming a place so far away after somewhere on the home side of the sea. As Gail Smith writes: 'In 1788 the first convicts arrived on the "fatal shore". Another world away, it might have been the moon—but as Robert Hughes so aptly observed, you could see the moon; you could not see Botany Bay. "It was 12,000 miles away, a desolate wilderness whose limits nobody knew, perched on the edge of a hypothetical map."'

In evoking such desolation by vocal caress as well as by stark and wayward strain, Dylan fully inhabits the song's world of a savage penal code in the old land, and of exile across a huge sea to further chains and cruelty, scrubland and thwarted desire.

Dylan's first live performance of 'Jim Jones' was in Dublin on February 5, 1993, after which he performed it nightly through his run of London Hammersmith concerts and the European dates that followed.

[Bob Dylan: 'Jim Jones', Malibu, Jul–Aug 1992; 'Boots of Spanish Leather', NY, Aug 1963. The Bushwackers, 'Jim Jones', The Shearer's Dream, Larrikin, nia, Australia, 1974, reissued Larrikin LRF 019, 1980. Gail Smith, 'Bob Dylan on Botany Bay', Who Threw the Glass? (Dylan fanzine) no.1, Sydney, fall 1993; her quotation is from Robert Hughes, The Art of Australia, Sydney: Penguin, 1966. Bushwackers LP & Slocum copyright data from A.J. Iriarte, e-mailed comments to this writer, 2000, based on Mick Slocum interview by J. Lattanzio & S. Wynands, The Telegraph no.47, UK, winter 1993, pp.44–46.]

John, Elton [1947 -] Reginald Kenneth Dwight, aka Elton John, was born on March 25, 1947, in Pinner, Middlesex, England. A pop singer and pianist who has outsold Dylan innumerable times over, he plays piano on '2 x 2', one of the less than memorable songs on Dylan's 1990 album Under the Red Sky. This track was recorded in LA in February or March 1990.

John Wesley Harding* [album, 1968] The eighth album, not counting greatest-hits compilations. This quiet masterpiece, which manages to sound both authoritative and tentative (a mix that gave it a highly contemporary feel), is neither a rock nor a folk album—and certainly isn't folk-rock. It isn't categorisable at all. The back-up musicians are pared down to three: bass, drums and, on two tracks only, pedal steel. Plus Dylan on guitar, harmonica and piano. Economy, in fact, is the key to this huge change of direction. There could be no greater contrast between consecutive albums than that between Blonde on Blonde's richness and the taut asceticism of John Wesley Harding. This album is no cheap thrill. It is, though, a most serious, darkly visionary exploration of the myths and extinct strengths of America; its Calvinist spirit gives it an eerie power in mixing the severely biblical with a surreal 19th century, American-pioneer ethos. Dylan comes across like a man who has arisen from armageddon unscathed but sobered, to walk across an allegorical American landscape of small, poor communities working a dusty, fierce terrain. The masterpieces within the masterpiece are 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine', 'All Along the Watchtower' and 'I Pity the Poor Immigrant'. Then there are the last two tracks of the album: the à la JERRY LEE LEWIS 'Down Along the Cove' and the brilliant country-pastiche song 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight'. With these, Dylan was serving notice of the next sharp shift in direction that was to come from him. John Wesley Harding was to be Dylan's last masterpiece of the 1960s—and in spirit it was most markedly not a part of the 1960s world at all.

It is the most underrated of Dylan's great albums: a record that everyone puts in the pantheon but few embrace. Yet how especially pleasurable it is to revisit now that so many years have passed since it was new: to bathe in the relief of remembering that Dylan is not just the flailing old bruiser of the Never-Ending Tour, whose patchy virtues must be snatched from rough, loud, swirling chaos and carelessness, his intermittent inspiration lobbing out of the aural fog as he stumbles down his road. It's salutary to be pulled away from picking through concert bootlegs for these rare and shaky treats and re-directed towards the Bob Dylan who gave us John Wesley Harding, throughout which he insists upon the virtues of calm and silence, of less-is-more, of exquisite precision and particularity, carved out with blade-sharp, unwavering certainty. Here, there is no floundering search for some intangible juiced-up mystic rock'n'roll moment: there is instead the artist standing naked, with a very particular vision in his sights, and illuminating it with the intuitive alertness of his genius.

[Recorded Nashville, TN, 17 Oct, 6 & 29 Nov 1967; released as stereo LP, Columbia CS 9604 & mono LP Columbia CL 2804; in the UK CBS SBPG 63252 (stereo) & BPG 63252 (mono). This was the last Dylan LP to be offered in a separate mono mix. Theoretically the US release-date was 27 Dec 1967; in fact it was released Jan 1968, and the UK release-date was 23 Feb 1968.]

'John Wesley Harding' [song] See heroes, special cowboy fondness for.

Johnnie & Jack Johnnie Robert Wright was born on May 13, 1914 in Mount Juliet, Tennessee; Jack Anglin was born exactly two years later in Franklin, Tennessee; both were within 20 miles of Nashville. The two men met in 1936 and became brothers-in-law a year later, when Jack married Johnnie's sister Louise.

A youthful Jack Anglin and his older brothers Van Buren ('Red') and Jim had met the Delmore Brothers, been influenced immediately and had formed the Anglin Brothers in 1933. (Red sang, Jim wrote songs, sang and played string bass and Jack wrote songs, sang and played guitar.) After years of playing on radio, they recorded in 1937 and 1938 but disbanded in 1940 when Red was drafted, and subsequently injured in France. Jim wrote a number of songs which he sold to ROY ACUFF (which is why Acuff is often given the composer credit for them) before going off to war in the Pacific. Jack teamed up with Johnnie, then in a part-time outfit of no special merit. Together they became the Tennessee Hillbillies, the Tennessee Mountain Boys and eventually Johnnie & Jack. Hence two of the lesser country acts of the 1930s ended up as one of the better country duos of the 1940s and 50s.

Johnnie & Jack were distinctive for blending traditional country instrumentation and vocal harmonies (often bringing in a third voice, Eddie Hill) with a Latin beat. Late in their career, therefore, they were more open than most country acts to the black rhythms of rock'n'roll, though it wasn't always a comfortable or persuasive integration.

After early studio attempts for Apollo in New York and King in Cincinnati, they signed to RCA Victor in 1949 and had a big hit two years later with the song 'Poison Love' (which becomes one of the songs on the DOUG SAHM album Doug Sahm and Friends: a track Bob Dylan plays guitar on).

This was the first of a run of country hits on the label, many of them written by Jack's brother Jim. Johnnie, meanwhile, had married country star Kitty Wells, who also enjoyed country hits from the early 1950s onwards. In 1961 Johnnie & Jack moved to Decca, where they met with far less success, scraping into the country charts only once (with 'Slow Poison') and attempting things like a revival of the EVERLY BROTHERS' 1957 hit 'Bye Bye, Love' in 1963, the year their act came to an end.

In the world away of 1976, one of the joyous moments onstage at THE BAND's farewell concert at the Winterland in San Francisco (filmed and recorded as The Last Waltz) comes when BOBBY CHARLES performs the Wright, Anglin & Anglin song 'Down South in New Orleans.'

Among the items in Johnnie & Jack's repertoire penned with Jim Anglin were the timorously delivered yet in its lyrics severely fire-and-brimstone gospel 'This World Can't Stand Long', which they recorded for King back in 1947, a train song, 'Humming Bird', recorded for RCA in 1951, and 'Searching for a Soldier's Grave', which they never got around to recording under their own name. The Bailes Brothers recorded it for Columbia in 1945, but then Kitty Wells recorded it accompanied by an unbilled Johnnie & Jack in 1952, though it was released only as an LP track in 1955; the Louvin Brothers revived it in 1962. Sweetly redolent of what sounds misleadingly like an innocent age, none features a Latin beat. All three songs were introduced into Dylan's concert repertoire during the Never-Ending Tour.

'This World Can't Stand Long' was first performed in Delaware on November 20, 1999, Dylan's last concert of the year. It was the fourth item in a show that had opened with THE STANLEY BROTHERS' similarly gospel-country song 'I Am the Man, Thomas'. When Dylan returned to touring in 2000, starting in Anaheim, California, on March 10, 'This World Can't Stand Long' was back in there, receiving 15 performances in the course of the year. In amongst these, on June 15 in Portland, Oregon, Dylan introduced 'Searching for a Soldier's Grave' in the same slot in the set-list. This latter song was given a further 51 performances before the end of 2000 and 39 more in 2001. 'This World Can't Stand Long' was again played 15 times in 2001, while 'Humming Bird' suddenly opened Dylan's concert in Langesund, Norway, that June 28, the first of what turned out to be 13 renditions by year's end. In 2002 there were ten more 'Humming Bird's, 20 further 'Searching for a Soldier's Grave's and 7 'This World Can't Stand Long's. All three songs then vanished from Dylan's repertoire.

A far more dramatic Dylan connection centres on the duo's 1961 Decca record 'Uncle John's Bongos' (on which they're billed as Johnny & Jack). Dylan's "Love and Theft" track 'Tweedle Dum & Tweedle Dee' steals this dreadful record's music so completely that the backing on the one might almost be sampled from the other. And yet Dylan makes into a decent record, with a lyric rich in sly delights, what was gruesomely clunky, unmusical and vacuous: audio proof, in fact, of how much better Johnnie & Jack were when they stuck to country music and didn't try to be hep rock'n' rollers.

It has been suggested (by OLIVER TRAGER) that their 'fluid mélange' of bluegrass, religious music and even R&B 'stretched the boundaries' of the country sound of the day, and that their penchant for the Latin beat 'brought a new rhythmic consciousness to country music'; but, Latin beat aside perhaps, all this could be said about almost any country group in the 1940s, when Western Swing and bluegrass were driving the genre forward, and when religious music was, as ever, a normal part of the repertoire pushed out by country radio all the time. Johnnie & Jack were not exceptional pioneers; they were resourceful participants.

Red Anglin died in 1975, Jim in 1987. Johnnie Wright is still alive; Jack Anglin met his death in tragi-comic circumstances: he was killed in a car crash on his way to a memorial service for Patsy Cline, on March 8, 1963.

[Johnny (sic) & Jack: 'This World Can't Stand Long', Cincinnati, 8 Aug 1947, King 674, 1947. Johnnie & Jack: 'Humming Bird': Atlanta, GA, 6 May 1951, RCA 20-4251 (78rpm) & RCA 47-4251 (45rpm); 'Uncle John's Bongos', nia, Decca 31289, NY, 1961, CD-reissued on MCA Rockabillies, Vol. 3, Big Tone BT 5707, London, 1993; 'Bye Bye, Love', Decca 31472, NY, 1963. Kitty Wells: 'Searching for a Soldier's Grave', Nashville, 3 May 1952, Country Hit Parade, Decca DL. 8293 (LP) & Decca ED. 2361 (45rpm EP). Oliver Trager, Keys to the Rain: The Definitive Bob Dylan Encyclopedia, New York: Billboard Books, 2004, p.264.]

Johnson, Blind Willie [1897 - 1945] Willie Johnson was born on a farm in the tiny community of Independence, Texas (halfway between Austin and Houston), on January 22, 1897. He is said to have been blinded by his stepmother at the age of seven, but grew up to become one of the finest bottleneck guitarists ever recorded, and therefore an influence on everyone from those who knew him to Duane Allman, Jimmy Page, Ry Cooder, ERIC CLAPTON and all the usual suspects. He was also a singer of thrilling, controlled power and great dignity. Indeed he could produce two distinctly different singing voices (as mentioned in the entry Simon, Paul, as it happens).

Johnson recorded 30 sides between 1927 and 1930, some with his first wife, Willie B. Harris, and then never recorded again, though his first release, 'If I Had My Way I'd Tear the Building Down', coupled with 'Mother's [a mis-transcription of 'Motherless'] Children Have a Hard Time', sold 15,000 copies, and he continued to travel, preach and sing all the way 'from Maine to the Mobile Bay', to quote his old friend BLIND WILLIE McTELL, and he was a regular broadcaster on KTEM in Temple and in church services broadcast on KPLC in Lake Charles.

By the early 1960s he had become one of the best-known pre-war gospel bluesmen, because he had made an appearance on both the crucial vinyl compilations of the 1950s. First, HARRY SMITH's AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC reissued Johnson's 'John the Revelator' in 1952; then SAM CHARTERS' 1959 LP The Country Blues included his 'You're Gonna Need Somebody on Your Bond'. Both tracks had been recorded in Atlanta in 1930.

Johnson's 'Jesus Make Up My Dying Bed', cut in Dallas three years earlier, duly became 'In My Time of Dyin'' on Dylan's début album. 'Jesus Make Up My Dying Bed'—often spelt as 'Dying-Bed': a compound noun like 'praying-ground' and 'cooling-board'—was an old spiritual that had been recorded by a large number of jubilee and gospel groups, sermons-with-singing preachers and many individual singers, among them CHARLEY PATTON, a figure as early and as eminent as Blind Willie Johnson, though not so early onto disc with this particular song. (His 'Jesus Is a Dying-Bed Maker' was cut in 1929.) At the Gaslight Café in Greenwich Village in October 1962, Dylan performed 'Motherless Children'.

In late 1980, approaching Christian songs from a changed perspective, Dylan brought MARIA MULDAUR on stage at one of his San Francisco concerts, to sing 'It's Nobody's Fault But Mine'; in 1992, in a studio in Chicago, Dylan recorded it himself (a recording that remains unreleased and uncirculated). Twelve years later, at the Bonnaroo 2004 Music Festival in Manchester, Tennessee, he gave a worthy performance of 'If I Had My Way I Would Tear the Building Down' (aka 'Samson and Delilah').

Johnson remains a mysterious figure, though his second wife Angeline was interviewed by Sam Charters at her shack in Beaumont, Texas, in 1955 (from which Charters concluded mistakenly that she had been the singer who had accompanied him on some of his sides). The interview was issued on a Folkways album, Blind Willie Johnson: His Story, in 1963 (and is transcribed in the notes to the 1993 CD set The Complete Blind Willie Johnson). His last known address was in Beaumont, Texas, where he ran a House of Prayer. He died in Beaumont of malarial fever, exacerbated by syphilis, on September 18, 1945.

In 1977 Johnson's 'Dark Was the Night (Cold Was the Ground)', a compelling synthesis of guitar-work plus wordless humming and moaning cut at his début session in early December 50 years earlier, was included in the 'Sounds of Earth' compilation sent into space aboard Voyager One.

[Blind Willie Johnson: 'John the Revelator' & 'You're Gonna Need Somebody on Your Bond', Atlanta, 20 Apr 1930; 'It's Nobody's Fault But Mine', 'Mother's Children Have a Hard Time', 'If I Had My Way I'd Tear the Building Down' & 'Dark Was the Night (Cold Was the Ground)', Dallas, 3 Dec 1927; all tracks CD-reissued The Complete Blind Willie Johnson, Columbia Legacy Roots N' Blues Series 472190 2, NY, 1993. Blind Willie Johnson: His Story, Folkways FG3585, NY, 1963. Charley Patton: 'Jesus Is a Dying-Bed Maker', Grafton, WI, c.Oct 1929. Bob Dylan: 'Motherless Children', NY, Oct 1962, unissued; 'It's Nobody's Fault But Mine', Chicago, Apr 1992, unissued; 'If I Had My Way I'd Tear the Building Down', Manchester, TN, 6 Nov 2004. Maria Muldaur with Dylan & band: 'It's Nobody's Fault But Mine', live, San Francisco, 19 Nov 1980. Thanks to Michael Corcoran for new information researched & published in 'The Soul of Blind Willie Johnson: Retracing the life of the Texas music icon', Austin American-Statesman, Austin, TX, nia, & e-mail to this writer, 7 Aug 2003.]

Johnson, Lonnie [1889 - 1970] Alonzo Johnson was born in New Orleans, probably on February 8, 1889, and grew up to be one of the most important of all blues guitarists. He had a formidable technique and influenced everyone, from ROBERT JOHNSON (no relation) to JIMI HENDRIX.

He is one of the artists whose pre-war work was heard early in the revival period because he was represented (by his 1928 recording of 'Careless Love') on Sam Charters' highly influential 1959 Country Blues LP, though he was a city-dwelling, sophisticated man and artist who also swapped solos with Louis Armstrong on the latter's crucial 1927 jazz recordings, featured on Duke Ellington's early classic 'The Mooche' and made classic duet recordings with white jazz guitarist Eddie Lang. He was also well travelled: he had visited London, for instance, as early as 1917.

He enjoyed an unexpected hit at the age of almost 60 with his 1947 recording of 'Tomorrow Night', written by Sam Coslow and Will Grosz in 1939 and recorded that year by sickly outfits like Horace Heidt & His Orchestra (vocal by the Heidt-Lights). The song began its real life as a black-market ballad hit when Johnson released it in 1948. He sold a million, and it kept him going for years.

ELVIS PRESLEY was 13 years old at the time. It's been suggested that he would have been reminded of 'Tomorrow Night' by LaVern Baker, who put it on the B-side of her 1954 hit 'Tweedle-Dee' (which we know Elvis covered in live performance, as soon as it was a hit: a performance live at the Louisiana Hayride in Shreveport in 1955 is available on the misleadingly titled Elvis: The First Live Recordings). But in fact Elvis' 'Tomorrow Night', backed only by Scotty Moore's guitar, was cut at Sun on September 10, 1954, before LaVern Baker's was recorded, let alone issued. Elvis' version is in any case markedly similar to Lonnie Johnson's in sound, feel and delivery.

It remained unissued till 1965, when it was doctored—a bridge cut out, many things overdubbed—and put out on a ragbag album called Elvis for Everyone. In 1985 the proper version was issued on the Reconsider Baby album, and reappeared on the Elvis 1950s box set, issued the same year Bob Dylan issued his own version—which showed very little Lonnie Johnson influence—on Good as I Been to You.

When Dylan performed this live in his exemplary concerts of early 1993, he varied his acoustic guitar intro enormously from one night to another; at least once he was using the guitar intro from another Lonnie Johnson ballad track, 'No Love for Sale', recorded by Johnson as late as 1960—the very period in which Dylan was able to catch Johnson in and around Greenwich Village.

This was when Dylan had encountered Johnson first: for Johnson was one of those treasures of the pre-war world who was still around in the 1960s, when Dylan arrived in New York—and for VICTORIA SPIVEY's label the two men even appeared on the same album, Three Kings & the Queen (recorded in early 1962 and released in late 1964). Dylan had watched Lonnie Johnson's fingers at work on the guitar—Johnson had introduced and/or popularised a number of techniques as a younger man, and still knew his way around the strings in a super-professional, individual way, and Dylan was acutely aware of his value as a guitar mentor. In Chronicles Volume One, in 2004, Dylan gives what appears to be a deliberately mystifying account—an account that purports to be a detailed explanation but in fact explains nothing that any other musician has been able to claim to understand—of significant things Johnson taught him in person: indeed a whole new style of playing, apparently, 'something more active with more definition of presence', that Dylan says rescued him when he felt marooned by an inability to relate to his own repertoire in the second half of the 1980s:

> 'I didn't invent this style. It had been shown to me in the early '60s by Lonnie Johnson. . . . [He] took me aside one night and showed me a style of playing based on an odd- instead of an even-number system. . . . He said, "This might help you," and I had the idea that he was showing me something secretive, though it didn't make sense to me at the time. . . . It's a highly controlled system of playing and relates to the notes of a scale, how they combine numerically, how they form melodies out of triplets and are axiomatic to the rhythm and the chord changes. . . . now all of a sudden it came back to me, and I realized that this way of playing would revitalize my world.'

Johnson's last recordings, singing and playing guitar alone, were made for Folkways in New York City in 1967 and yielded two albums: Tears Don't Fall No More and Mr. Trouble. Lonnie Johnson died from his injuries on June 16, 1970, after being hit by a car in Toronto. He was 81 years old.

[Lonnie Johnson: 'Careless Love', NY, 16 Nov 1928, The Country Blues, RBF RF-1, NY, 1959; 'Tomorrow Night', Cincinnati, 10 Dec 1947, LP-issued Lonesome Road, King LP 520, Cincinnati, 1956, CD-reissued Lonnie Johnson 1946–1963: Tomorrow Night, Blues Encore CD 52016, Italy, 1991 (Johnson re-recorded the song a few months later, Detroit, 1948, for the Paradise label, issued with a cut by George Dawson's Chocolateers on the B-side, Paradise 110, Detroit, nia; this excursion to Paradise seems odd, because it came in the midst of the many sessions Johnson did for King 1947 to 1952); 'No Love for Sale' & 'I Don't Hurt Anymore', Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 8 Mar 1960, Blues By Lonnie Johnson, Bluesville LP 1007 & Original Blues Classics OBC 502, nia; CD-reissued Original Blues Classics OBCCD 502, nia (the same Johnson session included 'I Don't Hurt Anymore', which Dylan recorded on the Basement Tapes in Woodstock, NY, Jun 1967); Tears Don't Fall No More, NY, 1967, Folkways LP 3577, NY, nia & Mr. Trouble, NY, 1967, Folkways LP 3578, NY, nia. Louis Armstrong (with Lonnie Johnson): 'Savoy Blues', I'm Not Rough' and 'Hotter Than That', The Hot Fives & Hot Sevens, Vol. II, Columbia CK44422, NY, c.1953. Bob Dylan: 'Tomorrow Night', London, 8 & 12 Feb 1993. (The latter is the better performance.)]

Johnson, Robert [1911 - 1938] Robert Leroy Johnson was born in Hazelhurst, Mississippi, on May 8, 1911, the son of a labourer and a partner who had been abandoned by her first husband, but with whom she left Robert when he was very young. Moving in with a Robinsonville, MS, sharecropper in 1916, she resumed responsibility for young Robert in 1918. He grew up playing harmonica before taking up the guitar around 1929–not, in other words, fired by any precociously youthful fervour. He was fortunate enough to have, in the Robinsonville of 1930, that giant of the blues SON HOUSE as an exemplar (along with Son's fellow musician Willie Brown), from whom he picked up some repertoire and some aspects of style. He has become, posthumously, the single most widely revered figure in the entire history of the blues. Only two photographs of him are known to exist, and he was dead within months of turning 27.

Between the playing Son House heard as from a tyro in 1930 to the dazzling mastery with which he astonished the older man a year later, Johnson travelled and studied with an Alabama guitarist, Ike Zinnerman. He travelled again throughout the Delta in 1932–33, picking up further repertoire, via Johnny Temple, from SKIP JAMES, and by 1934 was including Helena, Arkansas, in his orbit of places to land up, play and find domestic obligement in.

In October 1936 he went to see the great white talent scout H.C. Speir in his shop in Jackson, MS, auditioned for him and as a result recorded 16 titles over three days that November for ARC (the American Recording Corporation) in San Antonio, Texas. From these sessions came Johnson's only successful record, 'Kind-Hearted Woman Blues' coupled with 'Terraplane Blues', a celebration of the Hudson automobile company's unusually light, and therefore speedy, stylish car, introduced in 1932, not without a drawing of erotic metaphors about oil, spark plugs and a rival driver.

This success was never repeated, and after a long trip north with Johnny Shines and his fugitive cousin Calvin, taking in St. Louis, Chicago, New York and Windsor, Ontario, Robert Johnson returned to Texas for a fourth and fifth ARC session, this time in Dallas, at which he recorded 13 more songs over two days in July 1937. Of these, few were issued and none was a commercial success. He left the studios, travelled, womanised and performed, and outside Greenwood, Mississippi, in circumstances that remain of alluring mystery, he died in great pain, officially of syphilis but probably after being poisoned, on August 16, 1938.

It was outside Greenwood, just 25 years later, that the young Bob Dylan was singing to black farm-workers—and singing 'Only a Pawn in Their Game', a brave song about politics and the manipulation of race relations but also memorialising another slain young black man, MEDGAR EVERS. His killer too came from Greenwood.

As blues researchers Stephen Calt and Gayle Dean Wardlow have emphasised, Robert Johnson's reputation is almost wholly retrospective: 'Between January and October of 1937 Johnson's commercial sponsors issued nine of his records, averaging one new release every month. Its [sic] first offering, "Terraplane Blues" and "Kind-Hearted Woman", proved to be his most successful work and probably served as the justification of his return session in Dallas seven months after the first. . . . The session produced no commercially successful sides, and when his ARC contract expired in June of 1938, he was not returned to the studio. At the age of 26, Johnson was a record industry has-been.'

You could add that even in retrospect, Johnson has only become a giant of 20th century music among white aficionados. The overwhelming majority of African-American music enthusiasts in the United States today who are familiar with the names MUDDY WATERS and B.B. King have still never heard of Robert Johnson. Veteran blues field-recordist Peter B. Lowry, whose 1970s work contributed greatly to our knowledge of the Piedmont Blues and of figures within it like Buddy Moss and BLIND WILLIE McTELL, puts it most strongly: 'Writing a history of the blues by focusing on Robert Johnson,' he argues, 'is like writing a history of the automobile and focusing on the Edsel. Both failures in their intended marketplace.'

Nevertheless, Robert Johnson is not to be knocked off the pedestal on which an appreciation of his incomparable improvisational strengths as a wordsmith and as a guitarist of near-incomprehensible dexterity have placed him. His sound is fluid, sexy, volatile; his songs, which are mostly conjured up from other people's material (but then, the blues was a communal process), run a dazzling gamut from lone despair to delirious flirtation and intimate communion, and his voice is agile, elastic, light-stepping and yet heartfelt, in touch with both the ancient field holler and trembling, youthful heat.

If his work represents the glorious triumph of lasting artistic value over short-term commercial worth, it also illustrates the impact of vinyl reissues in the blues revival years. Collectors could pass around old 78s, and reel-to-reel tape copies, but in Robert Johnson's case it was the compilation and issue by JOHN HAMMOND (who had sat up and taken notice of Johnson's first 78, back in 1936) on a Columbia LP, Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers, in 1961, which rocketed Johnson up there among the stars.

This would soon enough bring Johnson into the orb of the young Brits who were re-fashioning the blues and re-exporting it to the States—an LP by JOHN MAYALL & the Bluesbreakers featuring ERIC CLAPTON included Johnson's 'Ramblin' on My Mind' in 1966, the same year Cream's début LP Fresh Cream included his 'From Four Until Late'. But before that, Johnson's recordings established themselves at the heart of the Greenwich Village repertoire. Hammond gave Dylan an advance copy of Johnson's album in late summer 1961, and he reacted with a strength of feeling and wonderment only equalled by his earlier response to hearing WOODY GUTHRIE. Dylan writes in Chronicles Volume One: 'I'd never heard of Robert Johnson, never heard the name, never seen it on any of the compilation blues records [emphasis added]. . . . I immediately differentiated between him and anyone else I had ever heard. The songs weren't customary blues pieces. They were perfected pieces. . . . utterly fluid. . . . They jumped all over the place in range and subject matter, short punchy verses that resulted in some panoramic story. . . . Johnson's voice and guitar were ringing the room and I was mixed up in it.'

Dylan describes the discussion he has with DAVE VAN RONK, in which Van Ronk very reasonably hears what Johnson has taken from elsewhere—from Skip James and Leroy Carr and so on (elsewhere in the book Dylan himself says how much Robert learnt from LONNIE JOHNSON)—and Dylan just as reasonably hears the man's originality, and explains it by offering the parallel with Guthrie, conceding that he had taken a lot from THE CARTER FAMILY but so put his own spin on it that he became a great original. You could say the same about Dylan, of course, in time. You can say it of any great artist. Originality comes from what you do with what's there, not by devising some ungrounded novelty: that kind of 'originality' never lasts or adds to the great chain that stretches link by link from the art of the deep past to the combustible present.

Dylan spends several more pages describing Johnson's 'elemental' strengths and the effect of this 'fearsome apparition' who 'had come into the room'—and most especially he is interested in describing how the 'highly sophisticated business' of Johnson's song structures, his freedom and his 'startling economy of lines'—and he concludes that if he hadn't heard the Hammond compilation when he did, 'there probably would have been hundreds of lines of mine that would have been shut down—that I wouldn't have felt free enough or upraised enough to write.'

In smaller, more specific ways, we can look back and hear Robert Johnson's work beating like a heart inside Dylan's own songs—so that it's entirely appropriate that the cover of that crucial Johnson LP is shown within the cover photograph on Dylan's first electric album, the one with the equally apt title, Bringing It All Back Home. By this time he had long since passed an early phase of including Johnson songs in his own folkie repertoire—as at the Gaslight in October 1962 when he performs 'Kind Hearted Woman Blues' that he segues into '32-20 Blues' (unfortunately a track omitted from the Live at the Gaslight album) and as when that same year he recorded a version of 'Milk Cow Blues' (also unreleased) that used part of Kokomo Arnold's lyric, part of PRESLEY's, part of LEADBELLY's 'Good Morning Blues' and part of Robert Johnson's 'Milkcow's Calf Blues', shuffling these elements around in the course of two takes.

On the great Highway 61 Revisited blues 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', Dylan's last verse begins with 'Wintertime is coming'; on Johnson's 'Come on in My Kitchen', his last verse begins 'Wintertime's coming'; it isn't far from the opening line of Johnson's 'Honeymoon Blues'—'Betty Mae, Betty Mae, you shall be my wife someday'—to Dylan's opening line on that Desire outtake: 'Rita May, Rita May, you got your body in the way.' Nor is it far from Johnson's 'Little Queen of Spades' line 'Everybody says she got a mojo' (not original to Johnson, but there all the same) to Dylan's 'New Pony' line, 'Everybody says you're using voodoo'. And on Dylan's Slow Train Coming outtake 'Trouble in Mind', a 1979 neo-blues with a classic blues title, he may have taken his 'Miss So-and-so' directly from Robert Johnson's 'Ramblin' on My Mind'. Even the 'all-night girls' of 'Visions of Johanna' echo the 'Saturday-night women' of Johnson's 'Stop Breaking Down Blues'. Then there's Robert Johnson's 'I Believe I'll Dust My Broom'

(1936), in which 'I don't want no woman wants any downtown man she meet / She's a no-good donay, they shouldn't allow her on the street.' This couplet—retained word for word by Elmore James in his 1950s hit versions of 'Dust My Broom'—is interesting for being, as it were, at once Johnsonian and Dylanesque. It begins with a back-echo of that line in Dylan's 'Need a Woman' about wanting a woman '. . . who don't make herself up to make every man her friend' (Johnson's doubling of 'want' replaced neatly by Dylan's doubling of 'make'), and ends with the comic 'they shouldn't allow her on the street': which, both as idea and cadence, Dylan might easily have used verbatim. You can hear him muttering that one very well, italicising 'street' as he goes.

When Dylan published his own selected Writings and Drawings in 1972, no wonder it was dedicated in part 'To the magnificent Woodie [sic] Guthrie and Robert Johnson who sparked it off'. In 1978, a year during which Dylan draws especially deeply and recurrently from the waters of the blues, as evidenced by that year's world tour—on which within 114 concerts he gave a total of 109 performances of six different blues songs by people from Tampa Red to Willie Dixon, as well as a remarkable re-write of his own 'Going Going Gone', riddled with Johnson's words: cascading Johnson's lines out to 69 different audiences.

That year's album, Street Legal, too, which is at least as soaked in the blues as any work of his before or since, is one within which Dylan seems to cut a wrist to mingle his own work-blood with that of Robert Johnson—though in every case, as usual, Johnson's is not the only presence on this busy street. How inward Dylan is with this predecessor's work: again and again he tends to put the direct blues phrases into his non-blues songs. A line from 'Changing of the Guards' that arguably sums up that song, 'my last deal gone down', is an elision from Johnson's title 'Last Fair Deal Gone Down'. In 'Where Are You Tonight (Journey Through Dark Heat)', 'horseplay and disease are killing me by degrees'; in Johnson's 'Preachin' Blues' it is the blues itself which is 'a low-down achin' heart disease / Like consumption, killing me by degrees', though this is but a variation on a widely mobilised pair of lines, on any of which Bob Dylan's might be drawing. The same Dylan song gives us 'he should have stayed where his money was green', a phrase he might be picking up from, or have been reminded of its existence by, Johnson's 'Little Queen of Spades', whose eighth line runs 'Let's put we/us heads together, ooh fair brown then we can make our money green'.

Another line in Dylan's 'journey through dark heat' is this: 'I bit into the root of forbidden fruit with the juice running down my leg.' Though this numinous evocation of sinful sex is built up from a common-stock base, it makes compelling sense that Dylan should be quoting here from Johnson's 'Traveling Riverside Blues'. Elsewhere we can find, as in Joe Williams' 'I Want It Awful Bad', 'You squeezed my lemon, caused my juice to run', or as in Charlie Pickett's 'Let Me Squeeze Your Lemon', 'Now let me squeeze your lemon baby until my love comes down' (repeated without significant variation by Bo Chatman's 'Let Me Roll Your Lemon' and Sonny Boy Williamson I's 'Until My Love Comes Down') but Robert Johnson's lyric, offering this—'Now you can squeeze my lemon till the juice run down my leg' is the only one that, like Dylan, specifies the leg.

Another non-blues song on Street Legal is 'Is Your Love in Vain?', a title that enfolds within it Johnson's title 'Love in Vain'. But Dylan also seems to have one ear on Sonny Boy Williamson in 1978. Dylan's title might carry its echo of Robert Johnson both directly and by relay from WILLIAMSON II's 'All My Love in Vain' (not the same song), which was cut at the same splendid session as the Williamson song Bob Dylan performed with THE PLUGZ on US TV in 1984, 'Don't Start Me (to) Talkin''. It could be from either, and so could the echo in that other Street Legal title, 'Baby, Stop Crying'. Of course Dylan could have arrived at this without any back-echoes, as it were: it's no big deal as a phrase or as a notion. On the other hand you can't but notice that Robert Johnson's 'Stop Breakin' Down Blues' is a song with several Dylan connections, and that one is its baby-stop-crying imprecation, repeated many times: 'Stop breakin' down, please, stop breakin' down'. Sonny Boy Williamson's 'Stop Crying', recorded several times, presses the same plea: 'baby please, please stop crying'.

A very different Dylan creation that certainly hides a Robert Johnson line within it, and just where you wouldn't expect one, is in his 1963 'Last Thoughts on Woody Guthrie'. It's a poem almost as far from the blues as you can get; but when you've been listening to a lot of Robert Johnson, and then you hear Dylan reach for the conclusion of this lengthy poem with the simple and anonymous yet insistent, didactic line 'And though it's only my opinion, I may be right or wrong', you're bound to hear behind it Johnson's 'Baby it's your opinion, oh I may be right or wrong' and 'It's your opinion, friend-girl, I may be right or wrong', which come from the two recordings of Johnson's 'When You Got a Good Friend', one of which was on that seminal 1961 LP, issued 16 months before Dylan's performance of his poem at New York Town Hall in April 1963.

As the 1960s and 1970s progressed, and Robert Johnson's posthumous reputation grew, he also became an industry—though one that was slow to start. Columbia's Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers, Volume 2 was issued only in 1970; and as late as 1969, when Paul Oliver first published his pioneering book The Story of the Blues, it was still thought that no photo of Johnson existed. The excellent one we know today—no mere snapshot but a studio portrait—was 'discovered' but sat on by putative biographer Mack McCormick in 1971, and then in 1973 it was acquired and sat on instead, as was the other extant shot found later, by researcher Stephen C. LaVere, who duly acquired the copyrights not only on these two photographs but also on Robert Johnson's songs—and by 1991 was already hundreds of thousands of dollars the richer as a result: not least because Columbia Records decided that to pay LaVere was cheaper than contesting the case through the courts. The full scandal of this was examined in Robert Gordon's excellent piece 'The Devil's Work: The Plundering of Robert Johnson' in LA Weekly in July 1991.

Quite apart from the illegitimacy of LaVere's claim on Johnson's copyright, granted the communal nature of such songs in general, and the many clear specific debts owed by Johnson's songs to specific songs associated with other people—on which subjects see ridin' the blinds without Robert Johnson (and the interesting Yazoo album The Roots of Robert Johnson, which compiles related recordings by others that predate his)—the LaVere coup seemed laughably unjustifiable on every level from legal nicety to natural justice. It's also a measure of the scale of the Robert Johnson industry that all this happened, and that a number of legal actions and counter-actions have taken place more recently so that the current situation—Johnson's septuagenarian son Claud established as rightful heir, LaVere out of the picture—may not be the end of the story.

The artistic battle has surely been permanently won. The digitally re-mastered 2-CD set Robert Johnson: The Complete Recordings was issued in 1990. In May 1993, at Bob Dylan's solo acoustic sessions for his World Gone Wrong album, one of the songs he recorded but didn't release was, 30 years on from the Gaslight performance, Robert Johnson's '32–20 Blues'.

[Robert Johnson: 'Kind Hearted Woman Blues' (2 takes), 'I Believe I'll Dust My Broom', 'Sweet Home Chicago' (2 takes), 'Ramblin' on My Mind' (3 takes), 'When You Got a Good Friend', 'Come on in My Kitchen' (2 takes), 'Terraplane Blues', 'Phonograph Blues' (2 takes), San Antonio, TX, 23 Nov 1936; '32-20 Blues' (2 takes), San Antonio, 26 Nov 1936; 'They're Red Hot', 'Dead Shrimp Blues', 'Cross Road Blues' (2 takes), 'Walkin' Blues', 'Last Fair Deal Gone Down' (2 takes), 'Preachin' Blues' (2 takes), 'If I Had Possession Over Judgment Day', San Antonio, 27 Nov 1936; 'Stones in My Passway', 'I'm a Steady Rollin' Man', 'From Four Till Late', Dallas, TX, 19 Jun 1937; 'Hell Hound on My Trail', 'Little Queen of Spades' (2 takes), 'Malted Milk', 'Drunken Hearted Man' (2 takes), 'Me and the Devil Blues' (2 takes), 'Stop Breakin' Down Blues' (2 takes), 'Traveling Riverside Blues', 'Honeymoon Blues', 'Love in Vain' (2 takes), 'Milkcow's Calf Blues' (2 takes), Dallas, 20 Jun 1937. Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers, Columbia CL-1654, NY, 1961; Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers, Volume 2, Columbia C-30034, NY, 1970; Robert Johnson: The Complete Recordings, Columbia/Legacy Roots N' Blues 46222, US, 1990.

Various Artists: The Roots of Robert Johnson, Yazoo L1073, US, 1986, CD-reissued Yazoo CD1073, 1991. Kokomo Arnold: 'Milk Cow Blues', Chicago, 10 Sep 1934; Peetie Wheatstraw and Kokomo Arnold, Blues Classics BC-4, Berkeley, CA, 1960. Leadbelly: 'Good Morning Blues', NY, 15 Jun 1940, or NY, summer 1943.

Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.281–288; Writings and Drawings, New York: Knopf, 1972. Stephen Calt & Gayle Dean Wardlow, 'Robert Johnson', 78 Quarterly vol.1 no.4, Key West, FL, 1989. Peter B. Lowry, Australia, phone interview by this writer, 14 Sep 2004. Robert Gordon: 'The Devil's Work: The Plundering of Robert Johnson' (with research assistance by Tara McAdams), LA Weekly, 5–11 Jul 1991.]

Johnston, Bob [1932 -]. Donald William Johnston was born in Hillsboro, Texas (about 50 miles south of Dallas-Fort Worth), on May 14, 1932, into a family of songwriting women. His grandmother co-wrote 'When Irish Eyes Are Smiling', his mother wrote for singing-cowboy star Gene Autry and in the 1950s she and Bob co-wrote material for rockabilly artist Mac Curtis. Johnston tried to make it as a singer too, putting out a début single, 'Born to Love One Woman', as by Don Johnston, in late 1956—a bog-standard rockabilly record but with a clever way of making one verse's end slide along to become the start of the next—and he followed it up with the rather less appealing 'Whistle Bait', issued on two different labels in 1957, and finally, in 1958, 'I'm Hypnotized' (as by Don Johnson); but he quit after feeling humiliated on a Los Angeles package-tour date 'sandwiched between Tommy Sands and RICKY NELSON . . . with all the little girls hollering "We want Ricky! We want Ricky!" . . . It was embarrassing. I looked like shit 'cause I didn't have any money, and he looked like four million dollars. I thought, "This isn't a good way to earn a living."'

He turned back to writing and took up producing and arranging. With Joy Byers, his future wife, he co-wrote (uncredited for contractual reasons) the great Timi Yuro's 'What's a Matter Baby?', surely one of the best, most shudderingly ferocious pop records ever made, and, rather harder to feel proud about, a slew of songs for 1960s ELVIS PRESLEY movies. Then, at this point working in New York, he happened to produce a comeback hit for Patti Page, which gained him access to bigger, newer stars. He was working under JOHN HAMMOND ('my mentor all the way down the line') and told Hammond that above all else, he wanted to produce Bob Dylan.

How that turned into reality, starting with Highway 61 Revisited, he doesn't know, beyond hearing rumours that Dylan and ALBERT GROSSMAN were tired of using TOM WILSON. Dylan reportedly didn't know how the change was effected either: he's supposed to have said 'I don't know. One night

Wilson was there and the next night Johnston was there.' In fact, Wilson produced the first two sessions, the June 15 & 16, 1965 sessions; Johnston produced the three later sessions, on July 29 & 30 and August 2. It was Wilson, therefore, who produced 'Like a Rolling Stone' but Johnson who produced all the rest.

Wilson might have gone because he questioned Dylan's decision to turn up the organ in the mix on 'Like a Rolling Stone', though as AL KOOPER testifies, he had been 'gracious' enough to let Kooper play it in the first place. But with Johnston there was no questioning. His policy, at least with Dylan, was always that not dictating from behind the desk could yield richer rewards, via happenstance. 'I never cared what he did and I never cared what he did in the studio. I was trying to get down anything he was doing next, so we could have a record of it. . . . I told everybody . . . "Just keep playing: don't stop—we can always overdub somebody else but you can't make him go back and do that song again." . . . I thought Dylan's music was so important, what he was doing and what he was putting down. It was joyous to me. . . . Whenever he'd ask me, "What do you think?" I'd say, "What possible difference could it make, what I think?"'

When Johnston did make a suggestion—that Dylan should try recording down in Nashville, Tennessee, some time—'They got no clocks down there, and they've got a really great bunch of musicians: everybody really cares', Dylan was noncommittal but Grossman and company president Bill Gallagher pulled him aside and said if he ever mentioned Nashville to Dylan again, he'd be fired. In due course, Dylan decided to try it: which is why half of that ultra-modern city album Blonde on Blonde comes from the deeply conservative heart of the country music industry.

Johnston went on to produce John Wesley Harding, Nashville Skyline, Self Portrait and New Morning (plus the sessions from which Columbia constructed the Dylan album). Compared to this towering list of credits, it is bathetic to add that his own songs have been recorded by Bill Haley, JOAN BAEZ, Ricky Nelson and Aretha Franklin, or that he also produced FLATT & SCRUGGS' Nashville Airplane, SIMON & Garfunkel's Bookends and JOHNNY CASH's Live at San Quentin.

[Don Johnston: 'Born to Love One Woman' c/w 'How Many', Mercury 70991X45, US, 1956; 'Whistle Bait' c/w 'The Whisperer', Algonquin AR-717, NY, 1957 & Chic 1014, Thomasville, GA, 1957. Don Johnson: 'I'm Hypnotized' c/w 'Luigi', Dot 45-15812, US, 1958. Timi Yuro: 'What's a Matter Baby', Liberty, US, 1962.

Bob Johnston quotes and much background detail from the interview by Richard Younger, On the Tracks no.20, Grand Junction, CO, nia. (Richard Younger is the author of Get a Shot of Rhythm & Blues: The Arthur Alexander Story, Tuscaloosa, AL: University of Alabama Press, 2000.)]

'Jokerman' [song, 1983] 'Jokerman' is the magnum opus of the Infidels album: a song you can inhabit, as you can so much of Bob Dylan's earlier work. It isn't a sermon or a pop song but a real creation, a work you can wander inside, explore, breathe in, pass through, wrap around you. It looks different in different lights. It's always shifting, but this is because it's alive, not because it's nebulous (though it may be that too). Its complexity isn't off-putting, nor distancing. On the contrary, Dylan sings you through the complexity with almost as much generosity of expression, almost as much bestowing of concentrated warmth, as he gives out on, say, 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands', a nebulous and complicated song from another lifetime.

It is as much the warmth as the substance of 'Jokerman' that makes it such a welcome item in Dylan's corpus. The two qualities cohere in Dylan's openness towards the listener in confessing his fondness for the song itself, and in his palpable desire to communicate it (a desire often absent in 1980s Dylan).

You wouldn't necessarily use the word 'substance' of 'Jokerman' when you first hear the recording. On the contrary you might find it a curiously skeletal thing, as if it were the piece of paper with the dots on from which you might construct and colour in a Bob Dylan Song By Numbers. This effect is owing partly to the sparsity of its sound (an attractive sparsity, but an undeniable one) and partly to the way in which the song's title and the words of its chorus seem like pale, thin shadows of that great prototypical Dylan song, 'Mr. Tambourine Man': 'Jokerman dance to the nightingale tune, / Bird fly high by the light of the moon, / Oh— Jokerman.' Not only does this remind us of 'Mr. Tambourine Man', but it reads more like somebody's notes, a hasty summary of a lyric heard fleetingly, than like a finished lyric. Strip it down by only two or three more words (the definite articles) and it could be one of HARRY SMITH's celebrated summaries—'JOKERMAN DANCE TO NIGHTINGALE TUNE. BIRD FLY HIGH BY LIGHT OF MOON. OH OH JOKERMAN'—directly comparable, for instance, to his summary of the song 'Present Joys': 'PRAISE LORD OF HEAVEN AND EARTH PRESENTS JOYS PASSING FAST. HEAVEN AT LAST.'

The chorus of 'Jokerman' may be skeletal and derivative, fleshed out only by Dylan's extraordinary vocal resourcefulness (naturally he never sings it the same way twice), but the verses are richly textured and freely imaginative—carefully, densely structured yet rhapsodically fluent blocks of writing that glow with inspiration, recognisably of Bob Dylan's making without ever being 'Dylanesque'. There are many lightly thrown out biblical allusions, but the lightness makes clear that these are valued more for their relishable poetics than for any sermonising usefulness. Starry-eyed and laughing with deft, acute touches only Bob Dylan could alchemise, in the writing and performance, 'Jokerman' is essentially a song like no other.

Sometimes Dylan seems to be singing about himself and sometimes about Jesus, but the whole is too fluid to need from the listener any analytic effort at separation. The intertwining of the two is, in any case, part of what the song evokes, one theme of 'Jokerman' being a recurring self-mockery that laughs at the superficial parallels between Dylan, mythic public figure and Artist-Creator, and Christ, mythic public figure and Son of the Creator. The post-Evangelical Period Dylan seems ruefully to acknowledge here that there had been foolish moments when he had taken such parallels solemnly. Yet Dylan also seems sceptical of the idea that Christ's powers are wholly a good thing—and this in turn suggests both another rueful parallel (a real resemblance between two questionable heroes) and one further opportunity to instance the singer's own failings; for to admit to such scepticism is to confess another failure: to confess that even in his much-vaunted embrace of Christ, he is now faltering.

Thus the song begins with a nice mockery of superheroes and the singer's own mythic pretensions, in an opening verse that at once reveals that here is a work of a high order—chiselled, clever, complex, compressed and unapologetically articulate, yet carrying itself lightly, with likeable grace and poise, entirely free of solemnity or the didactic, and delivered with unguarded generosity of spirit: 'Standing on the waters casting your bread / While the eyes of the idol with the iron head are glowing. / Distant ships sailing into the mist / You were born with a snake in both of your fists while a hurricane was blowing.'

There is so much here, and so adroitly put together. The opening line neatly combines Christ's walking on the water, a New Testament story emphasising his Godly power, with the well-known proverb 'Cast your bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days', an Old Testament injunction to humankind from Ecclesiastes and the textual basis for the Jewish Passover ritual, in which people take bags of breadcrumbs and throw them into the river to symbolise the casting out of their sins—hence Dylan's lovely 'breadcrumb sins' in 'Gates of Eden'.

The combining of these two biblical moments in one modest line is one of Dylan's skilful and intelligent achievements, quietly acerbic and inspired, like one of his bumpings-together of two clichés. It makes for a splendid piece of self-mockery, since it evokes so simply yet vividly the picture of the pretender, the 'Jokerman'. Christ is not only Godlike but purposive: He 'went unto them, walking on the sea'; but Dylan refuses 'Walking on the water', despite the tempting alliterative appeal of that phrase for use in a song sewn through with alliteration and internal rhyming. He chooses instead to show himself caught in the comically functionless, dithering position of 'Standing on the waters'. The implication is of 'standing around'; its effect is to stress the physical impossibility of the act. You can almost credit that by a swift and light enough stepping forward, a not staying in one place long enough to put your weight on it, you might briefly walk across water; you cannot but picture that standing still will make you sink. That the self Dylan is addressing here is standing there casting his bread emphasises that his real position, far from being God-like, is that of the humble sinner quite rightly in the act of contrition. The contrast between that hopeless bravado and this humility makes the situation still more comic.

The conjunction of the two biblical allusions in 'Jokerman's' opening line achieves a further compression of meaning, deepening the import of the song. What Dylan bumps together here are two texts that are associated with opposite notions: faith and doubt. Christ's walking on water shows him urging upon his followers one of his favourite messages, namely that anything can be achieved if you have sufficient faith. Peter tries walking on the water immediately after Christ, and fails, we're told, only through lack of wholehearted faith. (This insistence on the power of faith—on its superhuman physical power: power like a mythic hero's—is alluded to again in at least two other lines of 'Jokerman'.) But Dylan bumps his allusion to this into his allusion to a proverb from Ecclesiastes—famously the one book in the Bible which gives space and patience, a sympathetic airing, to Doubt. (See also Ecclesiastes, Dylan's use of.)

It is only after the lovely opening verse that we come to the song's 'skeletal' chorus, and in context it becomes possible to hear the ellipsed simplicity of its words as a balm, a plunge into the unjudgemental natural world after the verse's crowding of ideas and doubt, perfectly matching the way that the musical tension resolves itself as it plunges from the end of the verse into the chorus. Let the mind rest. Let the body and the intuition dance. Give inspiration a chance: 'Jokerman dance to the nightingale tune / Bird fly high by the light of the moon / Oh—–Jokerman.'

This is not Bob Dylan's first use of the nightingale in his compositions, nor the first to encourage a sense of the presence of Keats behind the lines: a sense that Dylan is consciously re-using Keats' association of the nightingale with the muse, the inspirational power of nature and mystery. There is an early draft of 'Visions of Johanna'—a song that details a particular kind of life in the contemporary city and speaks of the haunting visions that float above it—a draft which Dylan records on two occasions ahead of the main Blonde on Blonde sessions (yielding one uneasy, fast version and one sumptuous, slower one), in which Dylan begins the final verse like this: 'The peddler he [now] steps to the road / [Knowing] everything's gone which was owed / He examines the nightingale's code / Still left on [written on] the fishtruck that loads. / My conscience explodes.'

Bill King, in 'The Artist in the Marketplace', hears this song as 'constantly [seeking] to transcend the physical world, to reach the ideal where the visions of Johanna become real. That can never be, and yet life without the quest is worthless: this is the paradox at the heart of "Visions", the same paradox that Keats explored in his "Ode on a Grecian Urn".'

That key Dylan phrase 'the nightingale's code', a lovely and wonderfully short encapsulation of the core idea of how unknowable is the mystery of nature's music, is founded upon a familiarity with another of Keats' four great odes, the 'Ode to a Nightingale': a poem about both poetic inspiration and the fear of its loss. Dylan addresses this theme himself, of course, in 'Mr. Tambourine Man', and it is the correspondences between the Keats poem and 'Mr. Tambourine Man' that are drawn out as far as they will stretch in Nigel Brooks' essay 'The Nightingale's Code: The Influence of John Keats on Bob Dylan', but Brooks also pays some attention to 'Jokerman' in this context. He writes: 'Here is a further song where Dylan is, at least on one level, addressing himself as artist in the guise of the jokerman, the trickster figure, the Fool. . . . responding, in the chorus, to the music of nature as represented by the nightingale. . . . In addition, the nightingale is associated with the moon, just as in Keats' "Ode" where the poet declares of the bird: "Already with thee! tender is the night, / And haply the Queen-Moon is on her throne."'

The moon too is the muse: and always has been. Keats' long work 'Endymion', written shortly before the odes, is based on a legend of the Greek moon goddess; the heroine of Dylan's song 'Isis' is a moon goddess; and the main thrust of ROBERT GRAVES' book The White Goddess, the importance of which as an influence on Bob Dylan has been widely stressed, is that the moon goddess inspires poetry endowed with a magical quality.

While the chorus of 'Jokerman' surrenders to the intuition and the dance, invoking the muse of nightingale and moon, the very term 'Jokerman', which it introduces, perpetuates as well as summarises the song's arguments: it is a name that in itself mocks and deflates the idea of the 'superman'—and indeed, as well as its abundant yet shrewdly deployed scriptural allusions, the song holds within it much contemplation of Carl Jung's ideas about the hero myth, and perhaps hints at the similarity between the Jungian idea of 'the shadow' and the Judeao-Christian idea of 'original sin' (as between 'the dragon' and 'the snake').

The core of both is to define the human being as containing within both the light and the dark: insisting that 'evil' is not 'out there', among 'the others', but is inside us all, and that all progress, individual and societal, must be built upon coming to terms with this literally inescapable, fundamental truth. The other way lies war and bloodshed, Hitler and fatwah, hatred and racism across the globe and a stunting immaturity in the heart. 'Jokerman', like so much of Bob Dylan's pre- and post-evangelical work, is written in acute awareness that we cannot just kill the dragons, and, as with most of the post-evangelical songs, sobered by his knowledge that in the evangelical period he did sometimes give way unwisely to that enemy within in the instant that he preached.

The whole song seems to enact the need to grapple with the many-sided: to express, in poetry rather than argument, the uncomfortable truth that there can be no choosing anything as straightforward as one position or the other. There is no one or the other. The song is fundamentally an expression of both celebration and something more negative: not despair but a rigorous scepticism.

The song flows on, through its dexterous, complex verses and choruses, and we are carried along to the end of verse five, which offers what CHRISTOPHER RICKS calls 'one of the loveliest lines on Infidels': 'Only a matter of time 'til night comes stepping in.' So naturally does this quietly emphatic line announce itself, a line so apparently simple and so loaded, that on first hearing you're almost certain to expect that this is to be one of Dylan's 'final ends': it sounds so apt as last line of a last verse.

The finishing end proves not quite at hand. Not only does 'Jokerman' move on through another chorus and on into what really is the song's last verse, its sixth, but Dylan begins this with a line that manages to make that previous 'last line of a last verse' seem no finished thing at all: makes it seem instead to have been only the first half of a rumination about omens in the sky, the second half of which now comes through to us: 'It's a shadowy world, skies are slippery gray.'

Dylan isn't afraid here to open with the most basic of generalisations, one that summarises with the utmost simplicity the song's core argument—and indeed what might be allowed as the core conclusion of human experience, the core truth about human nature, its inherent goodness and badness: the core truth as expressed in the Bible (sin and potential transcendence) and by psychoanalysis (the shadow and the transcendent self) and at the same time expressive of the modern sensibility, the Dylanesque insistence, that unfixity is everywhere, that 'there are no truths outside the gates of Eden'.

Context is all, though. If we encountered 'Eh up, it's a shadowy world' in a song by the Housemartins, or 'It a shadowy world, mon' in a rap from Benjamin Zephaniah, we wouldn't seize on it as a numinous summary of the human predicament. That it can register in this way in 'Jokerman' is because of what has gone before and what comes after.

The before is five verses of a sustained work exploring these themes in poetry of focussed imagination. The after is the remainder of the line itself—and this gives us a phrase as quietly distinctive as the earlier one is quietly anonymous: 'skies are slippery gray'. That 'slippery' is itself slippery, almost by onomatopoeic enactment: the perfect word to fix the particular look of a certain sort of grey sky, and to summarise the imperfect, ungraspable unfixity we live under.

At the end, this last verse prefigures the chorus—more precisely the end of the verse prefigures the end of the chorus—in reiterating that rueful self-addressed remonstrance 'Oh Jokerman . . . / Oh Jokerman . . .', and these lines end with something close to an explicit lamenting that the singer, most certainly the Jokerman of the title now, knows that wholehearted commitment to Godliness is what Christ requires of each of us (is all Christ requires of each of us) yet cannot let go and give it. Rather he must respond in keeping with his troublesome vision of all-prevalent unfixity—in which even Christ is perceived ambiguously. 'Oh Jokerman, you know what he wants, / Oh Jokerman, you don't show any response.'

That is, he must respond with what seems no response at all, though the use of the word 'show' there itself refuses any such neat simplicity. The whole weight of the song, as well as the remonstrative 'Oh Jokerman' in the line itself, presses us to feel here that while Jokerman doesn't 'show' any response, the turmoil within is strong and inescapable. The importation of part of the chorus, that 'Oh Jokerman . . . / Oh Jokerman . . .', into the verse, is also a technical indication that we are reaching the end of the song. It's exactly what Dylan does at the end of that neglected 1978 song 'No Time to Think', in which the title-phrase occurs only in the chorus—until we reach the last verse, when the bulk of it takes over as the repeated opening phrase: 'No time to . . . / No time to . . . / No time to . . . / No time to . . .'

In both songs, repeating a key phrase from the chorus in a verse has the same function: it signals that the end is imminent. It does this by way of suggesting that a summing-up is being offered—and a summing-up is of course the beginning of the end.

'Jokerman' does indeed then end, with one last chorus: one last dropping of the argument in favour of the dance. Yet this cannot be fully entered into either: the finishing end is one last stepping-back, one last compunction to qualify (one foot drawing back while the other advances), in the renewed self-deprecation of that very last 'Oh——Jokerman!'

Nor is the invocation of the dance free of the process of argument: it is after all an assertion of the idea of renewal, of the concept of submission to the muse. And it insists, as the verses do, on the impossibility of unconditional surrender to any fixed position. AIDAN DAY writes: 'It's a dance invested with paradox in that it is both a dance of death and a dance of life: a dance simultaneously of matter and spirit.' He also describes it as 'at once a dance of death and a flight of the soul by a light that governs both creativity and waste.' Day points out how trenchantly T.S. ELIOT analyses such dance within the poem 'Burnt Norton', and quotes this Eliot passage: 'Neither flesh nor fleshless; / Neither from nor towards; at the still point, there the dance is, / But neither arrest nor movement. And do not call it fixity . . .'

Clearly this is argument as well as poetry. 'And do not call it fixity . . .' brings us full circle back to the central argument of the verses of 'Jokerman': that there can be no fixity. 'Neither flesh nor fleshless . . .': we're back in the unfixed terrain between the flesh and the spirit, between death and re-birth, between the Trickster and the transcendent self, and in the unfixed terrain which is unfixed because nothing, not even the figure of Christ, can be singularly anything.

Nor, in the end, can the song settle for, in Aidan Day's words, 'containment within [even] a dualistic frame of reference . . . even the usableness of the opposition between time and non-time, life and death, is called into question. . . . Generating questions which it does not resolve, the lyric itself is presented to its audience in the form of a question or riddle. In its refusal to close lies its strength, its commitment to confront and challenge. And in that refusal it epitomizes the most distinctive perspective of Dylan's lyrical career: a continually renewed scepticism regarding the possibility of attaining absolutely final positions and a protest at the paralysing intolerance of such as settle for closed and fixed points of view. The work neither simply despairs nor simply celebrates. Recognising a "hateful siege / Of contraries" it simultaneously exults in that siege.'

It is Day's final point here that most needs stressing: that there is throughout the song not only an acceptance of unresolvability—not only some kind of resolute commitment to the notion that no position can command one's resolute commitment—but exultation too.

Part of this exultant spirit, the celebratory, dancing beneficence that pours off the recording even more vividly and recurrently than off the page, seems surely to flow from the sense Dylan has, as it goes along, of what the song is achieving by its sheer concentratedness of application, its sheer wholeness and openness of engagement, its unguarded addressing of big themes resourcefully, maturely and anew. As with 'Mr. Tambourine Man' there is a self-reflexive motor here. The song seems to celebrate inspiration by the sheer display of it. It enjoys itself. It is a pleasurable irony that, as with 'Mr. Tambourine Man', a song that is partly about standing in need of the muse succeeds in possessing it.

At the same time, another part of what 'Jokerman' enjoys about itself is a quite different quality from its handling of large themes. For all the attention given to these themes, the song tends to be at its best when dealing not with the cataclysmic and the Significant but with the quiet and the everyday: the human in the tangible world.

Not that the one order of things doesn't invade the other. Many of the best lines in the song are, you might say, about the weather. Now that weather may be intended as more symbolic than real—it might be brought into play merely to augur this or that—yet somehow in 'Jokerman' real weather seeps in through the constructs of symbolism. Something happens which is in interesting opposition to what the critic John Carey claims when writing about Charles Dickens' use of the weather in his novels: namely that 'In Elizabethan drama the turmoil in the elements which accompanies human misdeeds like the murder of Duncan relates to a system of belief binding man to his universe. By the nineteenth century this kind of sympathetic weather has dwindled to a poetic convenience.'

In 'Jokerman' what lingers, rather, is a sense of how interested in real weather the song is: and how interested in the human compunction to observe it and read auguries into it. Spread through the song is a series of notes about the weather in which Dylan is as focussed upon the detail of reality, as intent upon accurate observation of the actual, as upon its correlative symbolic value. This comes through, as implied earlier, in the 'slippery' of 'skies are slippery gray'; in the 'smoke', which is another specifying of a kind of grey, in 'In the smoke of the twilight . . .'; and in the way that these skies are continually looked up at. The song is pervaded by awareness that its events take place out in the elements all the time. Through the mist. Under slippery grey skies. In the smoke of the twilight. The sun sets in the sky. Night comes stepping in. And we remain, even then, out under those skies: 'half-asleep 'neath the stars', and 'by the light of the moon'.

Even the obvious symbolic 'meaning' of the near-detail-free line 'So swiftly the sun sets in the sky' incorporates our mutual recognition (Dylan's and the listener's) that the analogy between the brevity of the day and of human life is not only enriched by being a part of the shared experience of all of humankind but by its being continually renewed with the days themselves.

The rhythm of ever-affecting poignancy is necessarily that of the ever-setting and returning sun itself. The recognition of the analogy, and of its poignancy, is itself part of the quiet, everyday reality of human life: you cannot pass a certain age without your every experience of an actual sunset incorporating, somewhere between the eye and the brain and the heart, its symbolic import also. What Dylan's line communicates, then, is as much humanity and reality as theory and debate. And what clinches this is that its rhythms are entirely devoted to expressing not force of argument but feeling: they give voice to exactly the simple human poignancy of observing the sun set and being touched anew by regret at life's brevity. The line's rhythms enact this brevity and regret. 'So swiftly the sun sets in the sky' is the briefest opening line of any verse in 'Jokerman': nine syllables, delivered as two simple, falling phrases—the one following and repeating the path of the other, but yet more briefly, in a perfectly distilled replication of our experience—with the soft alliteration of its repeated 's' sounds acting as a sighing and a slippage.

Dylan's alertness in these matters has him switching at once from feelings and rhythms of quiet acceptance at the sun's setting to stubbornly resistant corollaries. The sun sets, but 'You rise up and say goodbye to no one'. Against this, however, the elements must inevitably prevail. It's 'Only a matter of time 'til night comes steppin' in': another line in which the symbolic import is founded upon the common human feeling which enriches it, and which is disarmingly expressed. The song also has an eye on the weather and the elements when we arrive at one of the most attractive moments in all of 'Jokerman', the affectionately rendered and lovely scene in which the 'you' of the song is found 'Resting in the fields, far from the turbulent space, / Half asleep 'neath the stars with a small dog licking your face.'

These lines have replaced those of the early-draft version, in which the 'you' of the song is instead 'So drunk, standing in the middle of the street, / Directing traffic with a small dog at your feet.' The re-write is for the better, but what is best is that Dylan makes such a change at all. He's often berated for withholding good work and offering less good, and for re-writing material that could profitably be left untouched. Here is a re-write that improves on every level a couplet that was 'good enough', and so providing an example of Dylan having sufficient incentive to say that 'good enough' wasn't good enough. (That early draft is in circulation among collectors in the form of an outtake from the Infidels sessions, and though the singing is yet more lithe on the earlier version, the later re-writes in the lyric are generally improvements.)

Both versions carry Dylan's consciousness that chaos is everywhere, that each of us comes close to barking. It's a compassionate song and a very open one, with Dylan not just mocking himself for the preaching phase but, far more courageously, examining how the things inside which drive us can drive us to the wrong places. This is strong, complex, intelligent writing—in some ways quite beyond what he could have handled in the 1960s. It comes from the Dylan who is unafraid to stand inside the chaos of passion and vulnerability, unafraid of risk and contradiction, prepared to acknowledge the fragility of each individual's hold on sanity and strength. It is, despite the difficult themes and the scriptural foundations, a fluid and imaginative, humane work.

Both studio performances (though more especially the unreleased take) are bathed with the radiance of the song's quintessential warmth, its generosity of heart and spontaneity of spirit. Dylan's voice is marvellously expressive and celebratory as he winds his ever-alert and flexible way through verses as richly baroque as any of his earlier work and a chorus as airy and light-footed as Fred Astaire.

'Jokerman' is always compelling, however its author treats it. Its melody, the long lines of writing, the bounty of its variety, its space—it's always attractive. After spacey studio performances, on which foreboding bass-riffs brood behind vocals of shimmering reverie, there is the glorious amphetamine anarchy of the version performed with THE PLUGZ (aka the Cruzados) on TV in March 1984. In concert in Europe that summer, the song glowers along very differently again, rising above the corporeal and musical torpor of guitarist MICK TAYLOR, impelled by a churning, magnificent grandeur.

Even in Japan a decade later, when Dylan is taking the song fast again and it would demand much energy and precision to deliver the full lines and stay on top of them, and Dylan, regrettably, can't be bothered, choosing instead to dispense with the first 50 per cent of the long fourth lines of the verses (reducing that of the opening verse to 'Born with a snake in your fists, hurricane blowing', for example)—even then, with him slurring the lines and hitting only their endings, the song still enriches every concert. Even though the same laziness has him prune it down from six verses to four (not always the same four) in every concert performance, 'Jokerman' is always welcome, always alive and benign, always rich and complex, always habitable, always ready to open up its labyrinthine possibilities.

[Bob Dylan: 'Jokerman', NY, 13 or 14 Apr 1983, unreleased; 'Jokerman', ditto but new vocal overdubbed Jun-Jul 1983, Infidels, 1983; 'Jokerman' with the Plugz/Cruzados, 'The David Letterman Show', NBC-TV, NY, 22 Mar 1984; 'Visions of Johanna', LA, 30 Nov 1965 (the fast one), issued the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, Columbia Legacy 520358 2, US, 2005 and NY, 21 Jan 1966 (the slow), still unreleased. These early versions were long known as 'Seems Like a Freeze-Out' or 'Freeze-Out'.

Harry Smith, notes re Alabama Sacred Harp Singers: 'Present Joys', Atlanta, 16 Apr 1928 (mis-ascribed to Birmingham, AL, by Smith), issued on American Folk Music, Folkways FP251–253, NY, 1952, CD-reissued as Anthology of American Folk Music, Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997. Bill King, 'The Artist in the Marketplace', doctoral thesis, University of North Carolina, 1975; quoted from Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life And Music of Bob Dylan, New York: Beech Tree Books / William Morrow, 1986.

John Keats: 'Ode on a Grecian Urn' and 'Ode to a Nightingale' written 1818–19 and published in Lamia and Other Poems, 1820. The other two 'great odes' are 'To Psyche' and 'To Autumn', same details. John Keats: 'Endymion', 1818. Nigel Brooks, 'The Nightingale's Code: The Influence of John Keats on Bob Dylan', 1993, in Richard David Wissolik & Scott McGrath, eds., Bob Dylan's Words: A Critical Dictionary and Commentary, Greensburg, PA: Eadmer Press, 1994. Robert Graves, The White Goddess: A Historical Grammar of Poetic Myth, 1948 (revised 1952), London: Faber, 1952 (3rd edn.). Christopher Ricks, 'Clichés That Come to Pass', in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.

Aidan Day quoted 1st from his essay 'Bob Dylan: Escaping on the Run', The Wanted Man Study Series no.3, Bury, Lancashire, UK, 1984, & 2nd from Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, Oxford: Blackwell, 1989. T.S. Eliot: 'Burnt Norton', 1935, collected in The Four Quartets, 1943. (The 'hateful siege / Of contraries' is Milton, Paradise Lost, Book 9.) John Carey, The Violent Effigy: A Study of Dickens' Imagination, London: Faber, 1979.]

'Jokerman' [video, 1984] For the US fanzine On The Tracks, LARRY SLOMAN told Mitch Blank about the making of the exceptional promo video for 'Jokerman', the best track on the 1983 album Infidels, which was co-produced by Sloman, author of On the Road with Bob Dylan, and George Lois, a hot Manhattan adman who had met Dylan during the fund-raising concerts for RUBIN 'HURRICANE' CARTER in the mid-1970s:

> 'I played the song for George Lois. He and I sat down and George says, "Oh yeah, but Michelangelo this and that . . ." and he starts doing storyboards and stuff. . . . We were set to shoot, and I got a call the night before that Bob wants to have dinner with me in Chinatown. . . . I walk into this restaurant . . . Bob is wearing a green parka with the hood up and I think it's summer time. Bob is saying, "Do you think I should do this? What do you think of this video?" I'm saying, "It's great!" So the next day we shoot him . . . this guy is one of the greatest poets that we have working in contemporary music, so we were going to take his words and put them in your face. The second thing was we would use great artworks to illuminate his art. And third, we would shoot Bob and make him look as heroic as these artworks . . . and the whole time Bob was lip-synching the chorus, "Jokerman dance to the nightingale tune . . ." For the whole shoot he kept his eyes closed. After every take George would plead with him, "Bob, please open your eyes." Bob would say, "I'm trying." Finally, on the last take, and to me this is the ultimate Dylan video, we got him to open his eyes and he looks cagily at the camera. We had captured that Dylan mystique, I think. So Columbia flips out, they think it's the greatest video ever done, and it's about to go on the air and Bob wants to kill it. Well . . . not kill it, he likes everything except what was shot of him. He wants to go to Malibu and to take an 8mm handheld thing and do some shots of him on the beach instead. George says, "Fuck him, I know better, I don't want him to do that." Columbia, who had paid for the video, said they agreed with Lois. So we finished the video over Bob's objections.'

In the end, the works of art paraded in front of the viewer's eyes along with Dylan's lyric, were these:

'Self Portrait as the Redeemer' (Durer, 1500)
Sumerian idol (2700 BC)
'The Slave Ship' (Turner, 1840)
Minoan snake goddess (1500 BC)
Bob Dylan poster (Glaser, 1966)
'Moses' (Michelangelo indeed, 1514)
'Man in Bondage', from The Book of Urizen (Blake, 1795)
'Dead Christ' (Mantegna, 1490)
The Delphi Charioteer (Greece, 5th Century BC)
'Weeping Woman' (Picasso, 1937)
'Woman and Man' (Lindner, 1971)
'The Musicians' Hell' (Bosch, 1510)
Jewish illuminated manuscript (Germany, 1300)
Island Man of New Guinea (Kirk, 1970)
'The Battle of San Romano' (Uccello 1435–50)
'David' (Michelangelo again, 1504)
'Cow's Skull—Red White and Blue' (O'Keefe, 1931)
'Chief Joseph of the Nez Perce' (Curtis, 1903)
'The Third of May 1808' (Goya, 1814)
The armour of Henry VIII (1520)
'Muhammed Ali as St. Sebastian' (Lois, 1969)
Colossal Head (from the Palazzo Orsini, Bomarzo, Italy)
'Slain Heroes at Arlington' (Lois, 1969)
The Joker (DC Comics)
'The Scream' (Munch, 1893) and Goddess of Earth and Procreation (Aztec, 1400).

['Jokerman' video, filmed Mar 1984, released by Columbia, NY, with single, Apr 1984. Larry Sloman interview On the Tracks no.2, Grand Junction, CO, fall/winter 1993, pp.30–35; list of artworks taken from 'Some Bob Dylan Lists' in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: Futura Paperbacks edn., p. 264.]

Jones, Curtis [1906 - 1971] Curtis Jones was born in Naples, Texas, on August 18, 1906. Learning guitar and living in Dallas as a teenager, he became a blues pianist long resident in Chicago, where he moved in 1936, and he recorded prolifically in the years 1937–41. Jones was, in his low-key way 'the bluesman's blues singer', in Paul Oliver's phrase, and his piano-work was equally unassuming yet accomplished.

His 'Lonesome Bedroom Blues', a pre-war classic composed after his wife left him, and which Dylan performed live in Japan in 1978—indeed it was the opening number on the opening night of the entire 1978 World Tour—was recorded at Curtis Jones' début session in September 1937. 'Highway 51 Blues', which Dylan included on his first album, was cut at Jones' fourth session, in 1938. It often surprises blues aficionados to learn that he was also the composer of Sonny Boy Williamson I's pre-war hit 'Decoration Day Blues', later revived by HOWLIN' WOLF and MUDDY WATERS. (Indeed Jones' very first recorded track was his own version of the song, though this remained unissued, as did another attempt, made at his third session.) Other material he cut showed an unusual variety of song title, including such items as 'Schoolmate Blues', 'Down in the Slums', 'Mistakes in Life', 'Reefer Hound Blues', 'War Broke Out in Hell' and 'Glamour and Glory Blues'. Other songs he wrote included 'Bull and Cow Blues', 'Morocco Blues', 'Skid Row' and 'Suicide Blues'.

His first post-war recording—and as it turned out, his only one of the 1950s—came from two brief sessions in 1953, but then, 'discovered' in a fleabag Chicago hotel room in 1958 by three blues enthusiasts, he cut an album in New York City in 1960, performed at universities and clubs in Chicago in 1961–62 (including the Gate of Horn, a seminal place in ROGER McGUINN's folk music education) and cut another album in 1962, Lonesome Bedroom Blues.

Re-recordings of both the title track and 'Highway 51' (and of 'Stackolee') are on this album, but this was made after Bob Dylan recorded 'Highway 51'; nor could Dylan have picked up the song from Jones' 1960 LP because 'Highway 51' wasn't included on that album. Nor had there been any vinyl reissue of the original pre-war track before Dylan recorded the song in November 1961. How Dylan came by Curtis Jones's 'Highway 51 Blues', used on his first album, is thus a puzzle usefully illustrative of how variegated sources of such material could be. The likelihood is, in this case, that he had access either to Jones' pre-war recording on 78rpm or to somebody's private tape of that record (reel-to-reel tape recordings of old records circulated widely among folk and blues enthusiasts and musicians around Greenwich Village and so on—but also in enclaves of folk revivalist activity like Dinkytown in Minneapolis).

Jones emigrated to Europe in 1962, recorded with Alexis Korner in London in 1963, and subsequently spent some time in Morocco. His last recordings were again in London, for Blue Horizon in 1968. The last track he ever cut was 'Born in Naples Texas'. He died in Munich, then in West Germany, on September 11, 1971 and was buried in a pauper's grave.

[Curtis Jones: 'Lonesome Bedroom Blues', Chicago, 28 Sep 1937; 'Highway 51 Blues', Chicago, 25 Jan 1938; Cool Playing Blues, Chicago, 19 May & 10 Aug 1953,

Parrot 782, Chicago, 1953 (unissed tracks from 2nd session incl. on a Various Artists compilation, Chicago Blues After Midnight, Delta Swing LP 379, Chicago, c.1955); Trouble Blues, NY, 9 Nov 1960, Bluesville 1022, NY, 1961; Lonesome Bedroom Blues, Chicago, 12 & 27 Jan 1962, Delmark LP 605, Chicago, 1965. Bob Dylan: 'Lonesome Bedroom Blues', Tokyo, Feb 20, 21, 23 & 25, 1978.]

Jones, Evan [1927 -] See Madhouse on Castle Street, The.

Jones, Mickey [1941 -] Michael Jones was born in Houston, Texas, on June 10, 1941, but grew up in Dallas, learning to play drums early in life and dropping out of high school to play on tour with Trini Lopez, whom he followed Los Angeles, where Lopez had a regular gig at PJ's nightclub. When Lopez was signed to Reprise, they wanted an album Live at PJ's, and this, released in 1963, launched Lopez's career. From it came his big hit single of 'If I Had a Hammer', which he had learnt from a PETER, PAUL & MARY records. Hence even Mickey Jones' first recording success had a tenuous Dylan connection—and yes, that finger-snappy, thin, echoey drum sound on Lopez's irksomely chirpy 'If I Had a Hammer' is Mr. Jones.

From Lopez he went to work for smoothed-out-rock'n'roll hit-maker Johnny Rivers (an act Bob Dylan seems to have been inordinately fond of, and whose 1968 version of 'Positively 4th Street' Dylan says he liked better than his own, even calling it his favourite cover version). Mickey Jones stayed with Johnny Rivers for three years, playing on seven of his albums and including in his touring a March 1966 trip to Vietnam with Ann-Margret.

Before that trip, Dylan caught Johnny Rivers at the Whiskey-A-Go-Go in LA, called Jones over to his table, told him he loved his playing and offered him a job. The job began straight after the Vietnam trip: it was playing live on the Hawaii-Australia-Europe tour of 1966 with Dylan and THE HAWKS, after LEVON HELM had earlier dropped out and been replaced by SANDY KONIKOFF, who had played the February–March 1966 US dates. Mickey Jones made his début with the group on April 9 in Honolulu. He rode it out right through till after the London Royal Albert Hall concert of May 27–and he was up for the further North American dates he'd been led to expect, including New York's Shea Stadium, till Dylan had his motorcycle crash and cancelled everything. Except, apparently, Jones' pay-checks. 'I had a two-year deal, and Bob never tried to renege,' said Jones. 'He's a man of his word.'

Opinions vary as to the quality of Jones' contribution. Barney Hoskyns writes scathingly about him, as musician and personality, in his biography of THE BAND, Across the Great Divide (1993), calling him 'the overweight Texan' with a 'penchant for collecting Nazi regalia', whose 'sensibility was as different from that of the Hawks as his ham-fisted drumming technique was from the rangy, loose-limbed style of Levon Helm.' And he quotes D.A. PENNEBAKER as saying: 'The Hawks' hearts were down in the swamps of Lousiana. . . . Mickey's wasn't, I'll tell you that. He'd gotten out of Texas as fast as he could, and he wanted the bright lights.'

It's true that Levon Helm's playing was more subtle and flexible, but for many, Mickey Jones' drumming was perfect for the radical, incendiary electric music that Dylan and the Hawks were hurling out at their audiences. The uncompromising defiance of his snare-drum attacks, like volleys of machine-gun fire, cranking up the pitch of excitement unfurled by this most glorious music, propelled the sound and the spirit of the whole fiery ship on through hostile oceans. It was the surely the best rock drumming since its obvious precursor, D.J. Fontana's thrilling, galvanising rat-a-tat-a-tat-a-tat on ELVIS PRESLEY's 'Hound Dog' ten years earlier.

Even the 'overweight' jibe seems slightly unfair. Alongside the Bob Dylan of 1966 nearly everyone else in North America looked overweight. None of which lessens the pleasing witticism of the editing on a fleeting moment of the concert footage of 'Ballad of a Thin Man' put together by Pennebaker as a promo for Eat the Document (back when he thought Dylan would co-operate with his version of that project). Before the extraordinary riches of extant 1966 concert film were glimpsed more generously in SCORSESE's No Direction Home in 2005, bootleg copies of this would-be promo film, centred upon a Scandinavian concert's 'Ballad of a Thin Man', offered the only complete song-performance to be seen—and there's a neat moment within it where Dylan sings that chorus line 'You know something is happening but you don't know what it is, do you, Mr. Jones?' and as he completes the question, the film cuts to Mickey Jones, pudgy and blonde, in the dark behind his drumkit.

It isn't a fair connection, and isn't meant to be—plenty of people were in the dark at the time, while Mickey Jones understood the thrust of the music and helped make it—but it was a gem of editing (and it was surely HOWARD ALK who devised it).

After the tour, Jones' moment of glory, his contribution to history, was over. It was straight downhill into Kenny Rogers & the First Edition after that, and 'I Just Dropped in to See What Condition My Condition Was In'. When Kenny Rogers went solo in 1976, to become rich as Croesus in the multi-platinum late-1970s country superstar stakes, Mickey Jones concentrated on acting, encouraged by a small part alongside Rogers (and with music supplied by the First Edition) in the TV film The Dream Makers in 1975. As he grew larger, hairier and more piggy-eyed he became increasingly suited to rôles as the menacing biker, the creepy backwoodsman, 'man at pizza joint' and 'burly miner'. He enjoyed a starring rôle as the Ice Man in Misfits of Science (supported by Courteney Cox), played the character Peter Bilker in the TV series 'Home Improvement' throughout the 1990s, and according to Edna Gundersen in USA Today, 'he became a household face as the burly biker in a long-running Breath Savers commercial.'

In 2002 he released the video/DVD Bob Dylan—World Tour 1966: The Home Movies—Through the Camera of Dylan's Drummer Mickey Jones. Its anecdotes, told by Jones with some verve, are inevitably interesting, though as one punter-review on Amazon noted, the overall package was 'heavily criticised by fans, who felt that a DVD with the words "World Tour 1966" in the title should contain at least some concert footage. (It does, but without sound.) . . . It is a collection of primitive silent home movie clips, some of which actually include Bob Dylan in the frame.'

[Barney Hoskyns, Across the Great Divide: The Band and America, London: Viking / Penguin, 1993 & New York: Hyperion, 1993; 2nd edn., London: Vintage/Ebury, 2003. Edna Gundersen, USA Today, 16–18 Oct 1998; this is also the source of the Jones quote re his salary from Dylan. DVD review by 'Docendo Discimus', seen online 4 Feb 2006 at www.amazon.com.]

Jones, Norah [1979 -] Geetali Norah Jones Shankar, a daughter of the distinguished Indian musician Ravi Shankar and of music enthusiast Sue Jones, was born in New York City on March 30, 1979 but, brought up by her mother, moved to Dallas, Texas, at the age of four. She attended a performing arts high school and studied jazz piano at the University of North Texas, by which time she had changed her name to Norah Jones (at age 16), had already won various contests and awards and was clearly headed for professional success as a musician and singer-songwriter.

Her first album, Come Away with Me, begun at ALBERT GROSSMAN's studio in Bearsville, NY, in May 2001 and completed under Arif Mardin in New York City, was released in 2002, sold 20 million copies world-wide and won almost everything at the 2003 Grammies.

It duly became the most over-played album in music history, so that whatever the merits and dollar-power of her follow-up album, the less jazz-tinged and more countrified Feels Like Home, Norah Jones went straight from sounding like the most exciting new wave in years to being elevator music you couldn't get away from, and of course spawning bevies of other 'new' young female singers with vaguely soft-jazz albums madly over-hyped to an increasingly indifferent public.

At a private concert for the employees of Amazon .com in Seattle on May 16, 2005, she and Bob Dylan both performed short sets. In the course of Dylan's, the two of them duetted on a version of 'I Shall Be Released' (first recorded by Dylan 12 years before Norah Jones was born). So far, no bootleg recording of this duet has circulated.

[Norah Jones: Come Away with Me, Bearsville, NY & NY, 2001, Blue Note, US, 2002; Feels Like Home, nia, Blue Note, US, 2004.]

Judas!* [fanzine] See Muir, Andrew.

'Judas!' [shout] The most dramatic moment of Dylan's spectacularly confrontational 1966 tour—aside from the high drama of the brave, numinous music itself—took place in Manchester on May 17, where, at the Free Trade Hall, a voice from the crowd called out 'Judas!' and Bob Dylan responded, 'I don't believe you. You're a liar!'

This exchange was a curious re-enactment, though in circumstances less lethal, of that between the British Public Executioner and the Gunpowder Plot conspirator Sir Everard Digby 360 years earlier. As John Aubrey's 17th century Brief Lives reports it, 'When [Digby's] heart was pluct out by the Executioner (who . . . cryed, "Here is the heart of a Traytor!"), it is credibly reported, he replied, "Thou liest!"'

In the more modern case, it is almost as surreal, and certainly Dylanesque, that the identity of the man who shouted 'the world's most famous heckle' should be mired in dispute, and largely between two equally plausible contenders, both now dead.

For several decades, no-one claimed to know who had created this powerful moment (and it was sometimes rumoured that Dylan's manager ALBERT GROSSMAN had paid someone to do it). Then, in 1998, as English radio front-man and Dylan fan Andy Kershaw wrote later about the process of fulfilling a desire he'd nursed for 20 years to make a radio documentary about the night in question: 'With fellow Dylanologist, Dr C.P. LEE—who had been at the Manchester show as a 15-year-old schoolboy—we assembled in the spooky, derelict Free Trade Hall about 20 veterans of that infamous night. Among them was a chap called Keith Butler, who'd come all the way from Canada, claiming to be the celebrated heckler.'

News that the heckler had finally been unveiled duly roared around the world of Dylan-watchers (to use a polite term). But after the Kershaw & Lee documentary was broadcast, in January 1999, 'something strange happened. . . . I received an e-mail from a guy in Cumbria, John Cordwell, who'd heard the programme. The tone of his message was . . . plaintive and plausible: "What puzzles me is why someone should falsely claim that it was they who produced the notorious 'one-worder'. How do I know the claim is false? Simple; I was the one who stood up on the second balcony of the Free Trade Hall all those years ago and felt betrayed enough to give voice to my feelings."' When Kershaw met this second claimant, he was 'a small, wiry 55-year-old with white hair and a short beard, wearing a denim jacket and round spectacles. He looked every inch the liberal child of the 1960s who might now be lecturing at a Manchester teacher training college. Which is exactly what he did.'

John Cordwell told Kershaw: 'I think most of all I was angry that Dylan . . . not that he'd played electric, but that he'd played electric with a really poor sound system. It was not like it is on the record. It was a wall of mush.' Which is true.

C.P. Lee has always accepted that Keith Butler, the first claimant, believed that he had been the shouter, but he too finds Cordwell the firmer candidate. Butler, born on December 10, 1945 in Tamworth, in the English Midlands, had been a student at Keele University at the time of Dylan's concerts, had later emigrated to Canada and by the time he was 'found' he was a 53-year-old living in Toronto, working in a bank and feeling that his life was falling apart. C.P. Lee says: 'I met him . . . when we recorded the BBC documentary about the gig and he was likeable, open and honest and was believable.'

But Lee adds this: 'When Keith rose from his Canadian exile claiming to be the "Judas" shouter he certainly appeared to fit the profile—and without a doubt he's the earnest young man in Eat the Document who goes on about "Pop groups produce better rubbish than that!" I think when he read about it all those years later, in the middle of the night in Toronto, suffering from an asthma attack, a chord rang deep inside him and he recognised himself. I think there's no doubt that he booed and there's no doubt that he shouted and walked out. However: Keith was a man in crisis. I suspect that he really believed he was the shouter, but as to whether he actually was or not. . . . [When] John Cordwell stepped forward after Andy Kershaw's documentary had been broadcast . . . Andy and I met up with him and he was equally as convincing and convinced. If pushed to make a decision I would fall on the side of John. He had two people prepared to be witness; Keith had one, who was prepared to say that he remembered Keith shouting "something".'

Lee concludes: 'The consternation caused by another claimant . . . never diminished Keith's assertion and, as both contenders have now sadly passed on all we can say for certain is they were both there, they both heckled Dylan and both saw the errors of their ways eventually and became firm fans.'

Andy Kershaw says the timing of the shout of 'Judas!' couldn't have been better. 'What it unleashed from Dylan was something so subversive, so angry and contemptuous, that what followed was punk rock, 10 years before Johnny Rotten. Rather better played.' C.P. Lee says: 'I was aware even then that I would never see anything like it again.' And as Keith Butler said, 'What made it different was that Dylan shouted back and that the concert was recorded and the bootleg went around the world.'

The 'Judas!' shout dramatised Dylan's centrality to music when music itself was at the core of everything. It was an incomparable moment in music history.

John Cordwell (born 1944) died in England on July 11, 2001, from severe allergic shock, possibly in reaction to being stung by the bees he had started to keep. Keith Butler died of cancer in Toronto on October 25, 2002.

[Sir Everard Digby, 16 May 1578–30 Jan 1606. Keith Butler, 1946–2002. John Cordwell, 1944–11 Jul 2001. Andy Kershaw: 'Bob Dylan: How I found the man who shouted "Judas"', Independent, UK, 23 Sep 2005; last Kershaw quote, Butler quote & last C.P. Lee quote all from piece by Andy Gill, Independent, 23 Jan 1999. First C.P. Lee quote, e-mail 28 Oct 2002 to the rec.music.dylan discussion group, seen online 14 Oct 2005 at www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/who.html. Longer C.P. Lee quote e-mail to this writer, 10 Jan 2006. Thanks also to Craig Jamieson and to Jane Butler for Keith Butler date & place of birth, e-mail to this writer 9 Jan 2006.]

'Jumpin' Judy' Dylan's inwardness with the world of the blues is modestly revealed in his enrolment of 'Jumpin' Judy' into 1965's 'I Wanna Be Your Lover' (released on Biograph 20 years later). She is not, contrary to most people's assumption, one of those 'made-up' quirky names, so many of which throng the populous world of mid-1960s Dylan songs.

Jumpin' Judy was one of the heroines of the Southern convict farms, where, among the savagery of the régime, was the allowing in of 'wives' at weekends. She was celebrated in many a blues song, as in this common-stock stanza: 'It's Jumpin' Jumpin' Judy / She was a mighty fine girl / Oh well she brought that jumpin' / Baby to the whole round world.'

There is a commercial recording, by Wiley and Wiley [Arnold and Irene], titled 'Jumpin' Judy Blues' from 1931; Allen Prothro's performance of 'Jumpin' Judy' was field-recorded by John and ALAN LOMAX for the Library of Congress at the Nashville State Penitentiary in 1933; an unidentified group of convicts was field-recorded singing the same song at the Shelby County Workhouse, Memphis, a couple of days earlier; and Kelly Pace's 'Jumpin' Judy' was field-recorded by John Lomax at Cumins State Farm, Gould, Arkansas in 1934. Another version, by prisoners known as Tangle Eye, Fuzzy Red, Hard Hair & group were field-recorded singing it on Parchman Farm, probably in 1947. A version by RICHARD FARIÑA and ERIC VON SCHMIDT (with lead vocal by von Schmidt) was recorded in London in 1963.

The verse quoted above can be found incorporated into other songs too: for instance, as Dylan would have been aware, into LEADBELLY's 1940 version of 'Midnight Special'.

This mythic heroine is 'immortalized in song for her innovations', as Alan Lomax puts it. Or as Dylan puts it in 'I Wanna Be Your Lover', 'Jumpin' Judy can't go no higher'. This line, so casual and unemphasised, thus manages a three-layer play on 'higher', acknowledging Jumpin' Judy as a figure who has achieved immortality in blues folklore, like Stagolee or John Henry, as well as punning on being stoned and alluding to literal jumping.

[Bob Dylan: 'I Wanna Be Your Lover', NY, 5 Oct 1965, Biograph, 1985. Wiley & Wiley [Arnold & Irene]: 'Jumpin' Judy Blues', NY, 23 Jul 1931. Allen Prothro: 'Jumpin' Judy', Nashville State Penitentiary, c.15 Aug 1933, Afro-American Spirituals Worksongs & Ballads, Archive of Folk Song LP AFS L3, Washington, D.C., 1956, CD-reissued Rounder CD1510, Cambridge, MA, 1998. Kelly Pace: 'Jumpin' Judy', Gould, AR, c.5 Oct 1934, also vinyl-issued AFS L3 (detailed above) & extracted on The Ballad Hunter: John A. Lomax Lectures on American Folk Music, Parts III and IV, Archive of Folk Song LP AFS L50, Washington, D.C., c.mid-1950s. Tangle Eye, Fuzzy Red, Hard Hair & group: 'Jumpin' Judy', Parchman Farm, MS, prob. 1947; Negro Prison Songs from the Mississippi Penitentiary, Tradition TLP 1020, Salem, MA, c.1959, CD-reissued as Prison Songs V. 1: Murderous Home, Rounder ROUN1714, Cambridge, MA, 1997. Dick Fariña & Eric von Schmidt: 'Jumping Judy', London, Jan/Feb 1963, Dick Farina & Eric von Schmidt, Folklore F-LEUT-7, US, 1964. Leadbelly: 'Midnight Special', NY, 15 Jun 1940, CD-reissued Leadbelly: Midnight Special, The Blues Collection (magazine + CD) BLU NC 030, Editions Atlas, Paris, 1993 (Orbis, London, 1994).]

Junior Parker [1932 - 1971] Herman Parker was born on the wrong side of the river in West Memphis, Arkansas, on March 27, 1932. He was the harmonica player, bandleader and rather smoothie vocalist who wrote and first recorded 'Mystery Train', making it elegant, cool and not especially striking. ELVIS PRESLEY then made it into a far more numinous, restless and primeval creature, one of his most influential early sides and thereby one of the founding classics of rock'n'roll.

By then Parker had played behind SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON II, whose musicianship influenced him; in HOWLIN' WOLF's early band, alongside Ike Turner; and in B.B. King & the Beale Street Boys, alongside Bobby Bland and Roscoe Gordon. In 1951 he had formed the Blue Flames (a name stolen in England a decade afterwards by Georgie Fame), and later Blues Consolidated, which toured widely in the late 1950s and early 1960s. He had first recorded for Modern, then been pinched by rival Memphis label Sun and in 1954 switched to the Texas-based Duke records, enjoying a number of R&B hits before moving on again to Minit, Mercury, United Artists and Capitol. He continued working and recording throughout the 1960s, an underrated figure, though not when resorting to covering THE BEATLES' 'Lady Madonna' with the Jimmy McGriff Orchestra; but a late studio work was the all-blues, harmonica-driven 1970 album You Don't Have to Be Black to Love the Blues (alluding playfully to a high-profile ad campaign of the day with the slogan 'You don't have to be Jewish to love Levy's [rye bread]'). The album was reissued posthumously in Britain as Blues Shadows Falling, and then in the US as the CD Way Back Home: The Groove Merchant Years in 2000. But Parker has not sold well since the 1950s, so that all his releases are swiftly deleted.

Dylan told CAMERON CROWE, for the Biograph notes in 1985 that as far as his harmonica playing went, '. . . well, I'd always liked WAYNE RANEY and JIMMY REED, SONNY TERRY . . . Li'l Junior Parker . . .'

On Knocked Out Loaded in 1986, Dylan released a rewritten version of Parker's 'I Wanna Ramble' (one of Parker's earliest Duke sides), re-titling it 'You Wanna Ramble'. It's the album's first track, and in the middle Dylan slips in his own addition, 'What happens tomorrow / Is on your head, not mine' . . . except that it isn't his own addition, it's taken almost exactly from that Dylan film favourite The Big Country, in which Burl Ives warns: 'What happens here tomorrow is on your head not mine'.

Parker died at the age of 39 while undergoing surgery for a brain tumour in Blue Island, Illinois, on November 18, 1971.

[Junior Parker: 'Mystery Train', Memphis, c.Oct 1953, Sun 192, Memphis, TN, 1954. 'I Wanna Ramble', Houston, TX, 10 Jun 1954, Duke 137, Houston, 1954; You Don't Have to Be Black to Love the Blues, Groove Merchant, US, 1970; Way Back Home: The Groove Merchant Years, VSOP CD 2901, 2000. Elvis Presley: 'Mystery Train', Memphis, 11 Jul 1955, Sun 223, Memphis, 1955. The Big Country, dir. William Wyler, written James R. Webb, starring Gregory Peck, Jean Simmons, Charlton Heston, Carroll Baker, Burl Ives & Charles Bickford; UA/Anthony/Worldwide, US, 1958. Sources include Tom Fisher, entry in The Routledge Blues Encyclopedia, New York: Routledge, 2005 & Tony Russell, The Blues from Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Aurum Press, 1997.]

Kafka, Franz [1883 - 1924] 'Kafka' means 'jackdaw' in Czech. Franz Kafka was born in Prague, July 3, 1883, into a middle class German-speaking Jewish family. He also learned Czech as a child, and some French. (He was keen on Napoleon and Flaubert.) He graduated in law at the University of Prague in 1906 and while holding down a day-job, began to write. He caught tuberculosis in 1917, and also suffered from insomnia, constipation, migraine, boils and (perhaps no wonder) clinical depression. He was painfully diffident—except, oddly, when insisting on promoting Yiddish theatrical productions against the advice of friends and family—and felt enormous self-loathing, even while others found him likeable and highly intelligent, with a quirky sense of humour and boyish good looks. In 1923 he moved to Berlin to concentrate on his writing, but his TB grew worse, and after returning to Prague he entered a sanatorium at Kierling, near Vienna, and died there—in part from voluntary starvation—on June 3, 1924.

K

Kafka published only a few short stories during his lifetime, and attracted little attention until after his death. Famously he instructed his friend and literary executor Max Brod to destroy his manuscripts when he died, but Brod could not, instead ensuring that the work saw proper publication. Critical attention and acclaim soon followed, and he became acknowledged as one of the great modernist writers of the 20th century, crucially for his depiction of contemporary individual powerlessness in the face of omnipotent, bizarrely irrational, unfathomable bureaucracy. He is, thereby, one of the founding figures of modern consciousness—the father, if you will, of alienation.

Hence the ready and widespread use, not least among people who have never read his work, of the term 'Kafkaesque', to describe any personal experience of protracted struggle against obdurate authority, and by extension any sensation of being caught up in rules, regulations or institutional customs you don't understand or don't agree with. Kafka himself is generally envisaged as the haplessly lonely writer enveloped in anguished alienation. This rather detracts from his superb craftsmanship, and fails to pay attention to his subversive good humour and energy.

Dylan's mid-1960s work is inevitably informed by Kafka's work, and without naming him, Dylan brings intimations of his vision into 'Desolation Row'. The eighth verse indicts the education system, depicting it as organised to enforce and perpetuate ignorance, a nightmarish machinery for bringing into line the potential enemies of the state—which is to say, of the status quo—the independent thinkers: 'Now at midnight all the agents / And the superhuman crew / Come out an' round up everyone / That knows more than they do.' That 'crew' suggests, along with the opening phrase 'At midnight . . .', the whole sinister morass of collective vandalism, political purges and press gangs. Those lines insist, equally acutely, on an overriding presence of violence; it is conjured up in the first two lines of that verse, so that we are primed for the imminent appearance of the 'heart-attack machine' that will be 'strapped across his shoulders', and for the near impossibility of escape. Dylan urges upon us anew a sense of the powerlessness of the individual, who is 'brought down from the castles / By insurance men who go / Check to see that nobody is escaping / To Desolation Row.'

The allusion to Kafka's visions, clinched by that 'castles', and perhaps by that 'insurance men' too, makes this pessimism clear. The Castle, 1926, like The Trial, 1925, is one of Kafka's (posthumous) novels, and it was at the Workers Accident Insurance Institute that Kafka worked, and which formed for him a model 'kingdom of the absurd', in Alan Bennett's phrase. (Bennett, in an excellent and modest essay, makes the same allusion as Dylan—assumes, like Dylan, that the very word 'castle', in a certain context, connotes Kafka's work: 'His work has been garrisoned by armies of critics, with some fifteen thousand books about him at the last count. As there is a Fortress Freud so there is a Fortress Kafka, Kafka his own castle.') Kafka's other important work is the short story 'Metamorphosis', in which the narrator wakes up to find himself not merely in Desolation Row but in 'Kafkaesque' extremis: trapped inside a new body, that of a gigantic beetle. 'Right now I don't feel too good' indeed.

In 'Desolation Row', Dylan leaves us with the insistence that all any individual can do is hold to some integrity of personal perspective. And that, in the end, deepened by its emanations of Kafka, is exactly what 'Desolation Row' itself offers.

[Some biographical detail taken from www.nationmaster.com/encyclopedia/Franz-Kafka, online 8 Jun 2005. Alan Bennett: 'Kafka in Las Vegas', London Review of Books no.14/87, London, 23 Jul 1987, collected in Bennett: Writing Home, 1994.]

Kalb, Danny [1942 -] Danny Kalb was born on September 19, 1942 in Mount Vernon, New York. He grew up listening to folk music and learning to play guitar, then caught rock'n'roll shows in Manhattan and joined a high school rockabilly band that rejoiced in the name the Gay Notes. By 16 he had discovered Greenwich Village, where he met and was bowled over by the playing and singing of DAVE VAN RONK, who became at once a crucial influence.

He started as a history student at the University of Wisconsin in fall 1960, which had its own coffeehouse scene, and when Dylan lingered there in Madison, Wisconsin, on his way between Minneapolis and New York City, the two met and formed what Kalb claims has been 'a lifelong friendship'. Certainly the two hung around together a bit when they were both very young, not only in Madison but in Greenwich Village too, to which Kalb was still making forays.

Kalb says that it was from him that Dylan learned the song 'Poor Lazarus', while admitting that he himself had taken it from Dave Van Ronk. And at the Riverside Church Folk Music Hootenanny, uptown in New York City on July 29, 1961, Dylan performed that song (after playing 'Handsome Molly' and 'Naomi Wise, aka 'Omie Wise')—and then played harmonica behind Kalb's guitar and vocals on the traditional song 'Mean Old Southern Railroad'. (After which Dylan sang 'Acne' with RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT and spent the evening with SUZE ROTOLO for the first time.)

Kalb moved to New York City in 1962 and soon after joined two revival jug bands, Van Ronk's short-lived Ragtime Jug Stompers and then the True Endeavor Jug Band with Artie Traum and Van Ronk's one-time roommate SAMUEL B. CHARTERS, the pioneering blues field-recorder and researcher whose 1959 book The Country Blues had inspired the blues revival. The True Endeavor Jug Band made one album, The Art of the Jug Band, in 1963. Kalb and Charters also functioned as a piano and guitar duo, the New Strangers (an LP came out of this too), while Kalb also worked with Barry Kornfeld and Artie Rose in a trio called the, er, Folk Stringers. (Another group, another LP.)

He was one of the featured artists on the specially recorded Various Artists album The Blues Project, on which Dylan played piano on a GEOFF MULDAUR track. Kalb had a track on each side of the LP, with renditions of 'I'm Troubled' and his own song 'Hello Baby Blues'. The other featured artists were DAVE RAY, ERIC VON SCHMIDT, Dave Van Ronk, Ian Buchanan and MARK SPOELSTRA.

This album sold well and gave Kalb the name for his group of a year later, formed from the ashes of the Danny Kalb Quartette (in which, influenced by Tim Hardin, Kalb 'went electric') plus AL KOOPER and Tommy Flanders. The Blues Project issued two albums, the second of which, 1966's Projections, influenced the folk-rock and blues-rock of the period. In 1967 Kooper and Steve Katz left to form Blood, Sweat and Tears. Kalb kept on going, and in 1973 the Blues Project held a first series of summer reunion concerts.

After years on the West Coast, Danny Kalb returned to live in New York City in 1990. He is said to have been an influence on BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN; Al Kooper says he's 'the equivalent of a JOHN LEE HOOKER'. He released a new solo album, Livin' With the Blues, in 1995, his first for 20 years. (One of its tracks was a revival of BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 'Statesboro Blues'—the very McTell track Kalb's old partner Samuel Charters issued on the LP released alongside his book The Country Blues 36 years earlier: the track that first brought McTell's name to the attention of Greenwich Village and of Bob Dylan). Livin' With the Blues proved Kalb to be, as ever, a mediocre singer but a very fine guitarist.

[Danny Kalb: 'I'm Troubled' & 'Hello Baby Blues', NY, early 1964, The Blues Project, Elektra EKL 264, NY, Jun 1964; Livin' With the Blues, nia, Legend CD R LR 103, France, 1995. The Blues Project: Projections, Verve/Folkways FTS-3008, NY, 1966. Samuel B. Charters, The Country Blues, New York: Reinhart, 1959. The True Endeavor Jug Band: The Art of the Jug Band, Prestige/Folklore 14022, US, 1963. The New Strangers: Meet the New Strangers, Prestige/Folklore 14027, US, 1964. The Folk Stringers: The Folk Stringers, Prestige PR 7371, US, 1964. Blind Willie McTell: 'Statesboro Blues', Atlanta, 17 Oct 1928; The Country Blues, RBF Records RBF 1, NY, 1959. (Al Kooper quote from sleevenotes to Soul of a Man: Al Kooper Live, nia, Music Masters Jazz 65113, US, 1995, on which Kalb also appears.)]

Kangas, Ric [1939 -] Richard Kangas was born in Hibbing, Minnesota, on October 20, 1939. (As he grew up he was known as Dick but today gives his name as Ric.) His mother was a housewife, his father a miner in the Hull Rust iron-ore mines who had previously been a copper and silver miner (and in his youth a lumberjack in the Northern Minnesota Woods).

Two years ahead of Bob Zimmerman at Hibbing High School, Ric left in summer 1957, before the two had ever knowingly met. Bob would come to put as his 'Ambition' in the 1959 school yearbook 'To join LITTLE RICHARD'. Kangas wrote the parallel 'to be another ELVIS'. Like Bob, he too belaboured the gorgeous auditorium of Hibbing High School with early rock'n'roll at a school concert, singing and playing the brand-new 'All Shook Up' with a borrowed guitar and amp.

Ric and Bob met around town in Hibbing sometime in 1958. 'I hear you're a songwriter. So am I,' Bob said. Ric says the two played together at town hall talent contents and house parties, and auditioned (without success) for the Hibbing Winter Frolic, a big annual pageant, fair and festive event in the town that drew people in from all over the Great North Woods.

Their most significant musical collusion occurred in May 1959. Kangas had bought a reel-to-reel tape recorder, and the two of them got together in his bedroom, set it up and recorded four songs. (Detailed in earliest extant recordings, Dylan's.)

Back then, beyond their musical bond was the fact that Kangas had a 1953 Ford (after 'totaling' his 1950 Oldsmobile). It's easy to see why the younger boy would want them to hang out together—and Kangas says they'd cruise around on summer nights drinking gin and orange juice, picking up girls and driving out to necking spots like Snowball Lake; it's not so clear why Kangas wanted to have Bob in tow. Ric was driving a truck for Kelly Furniture from 1957 till 1960 (a truck that was parked in a warehouse across the alley from the Zimmerman home); for most of that time Bob was still at school. At any rate, Bob would get Ric to drive him around, and one day their destination was local radio station WMFG. It was the start of their destinies dividing. Dylan played some material to DJ Ron Marinelli and was given some airtime on the strength of it; Kangas' tapes were rejected.

They drifted apart when Dylan went off to the University of Minnesota and Ric Kangas got a steady girlfriend out in Eveleth, another taconite mining town some 20 miles away. He'd traded in his Ford for a Harley Davison too, and wouldn't let anyone else drive that. He says Dylan would sit on the gleaming bike in the Kangas driveway, pretending to be Marlon Brando in The Wild One.

Dylan went off to New York City; Kangas got a gig as lead singer for a group from Superior, Wisconsin, the Sonics. This didn't last, and he was drafted into the US Army, serving from January 18, 1962 till December 17, 1963, stationed in Fort Carson, Colorado. He moved to Tennessee around 1966. The last time Kangas and Dylan met was in 1974, backstage at Dylan's concert at the Memphis Mid-South Coliseum when Bob introduced him to the members of THE BAND.

About a year later, Kangas moved again, this time to Southern California. He's since moved around within the Golden State but lives there still. He's been a Hollywood extra, a stuntman, a magician, a photographer, a portrait sketcher and a wildlife painter. He never quite gives up—even after writing, he says, 900 songs without ever releasing an album. Dryly he calls himself 'Hibbing's other songwriter.'

In the late 1990s, Kangas was living in Acton, just south of Lancaster, when he mentioned his 1959 Dylan tape to a banking acquaintance who happened to know JEFF ROSEN, who runs Dylan's office and archive. Rosen phoned, got to hear the tape and eventually brought a film crew out to film a four-hour interview with Ric. About seven years later Rosen called again to say that he and the tape were going to feature in the MARTIN SCORSESE movie, and that one of the songs would be on the soundtrack CD set too.

Kangas told the Minnesota newspaper the Ventura County Star that he was paid 'a guitar, a small royalty cut from the CD and some up-front cash'. He 'declined to discuss monetary specifics.' On October 1, 2005, soon after the movie opened, he offered the original reel of tape for auction on eBay (item #7550832002) with an ill-advised reserve price of $1.5 millon. The auction ended October 11 with no bids.

Quoting Ric's schooldays ambition 'to be another Elvis', the Star reporter notes that in a way he's made it: these days Ric Kangas is an active performing member of the Professional Elvis Impersonators Association.

Kangas remembers another declaration from Hibbing days too: 'Bob always used to tell us, "When I make it, I'll send for you. We'll all walk down Hollywood Boulevard and we'll be stars."' Kangas, deadpan, adds: 'I'm still waiting for that call.'

[Sources include Dave Engel's Dylan in Minnesota: Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues, Amherst, WI: Amherst Press, 1997; Brett Johnson's profiles, Ventura County Star, MN, Sep 2005; & Ric Kangas, e-mails to this writer 31 Oct & 1 Nov 2005.]

Karlin, Danny [1953 -] Daniel Karlin was born in London on December 4, 1953. He is a Cambridge (UK)-educated literary critic and editor specialising in 19th century British poetry but with a particular interest in American literature and popular music. He held a Junior Research Fellowship at Merton College, Oxford, and is a Founding Fellow of the English Association. He joined the faculty of University College London in 1980 and left in 2004 to become a Professor of English in the College of Arts and Sciences at Boston University. He also accepts agreeable bookings such as chairing a session at a BROWNING Society conference in Vallombrosa, Italy, 2005. His first book was The Courtship of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett (1985); his others include Proust's English (2005), to be followed by a book on the figure of the singer in English poetry. He is not the Daniel Karlin who made the documentary film And if one spoke about love, a graphic film about wheelchair sex.

His essay 'Bob Dylan's Names' is included in the collection Do You Mr. Jones?: Bob Dylan Among the Poets and Professors edited by Neil Corcoran and published in 2002, and at a Shakespeare & Co. Literary Festival in Paris in summer 2004 he delivered a paper on Bob Dylan and ALLEN GINSBERG which he hopes to publish. But notably, back in 1987, the rigorous London Review of Books published Karlin's 'It ain't him, babe', a review of ROBERT SHELTON's biography No Direction Home that included this fine rant:

> 'I have to confess to an unreasoning impatience with those who profess not to respect or understand Dylan's work. In 1600 the same people were going around saying that the drama was not a serious medium, that the theatre was frequented by riffraff and that guys like Shakespeare stole their plots and were only in it for the money. . . . I know I ought to explain, patiently, that Dylan is the practitioner of an original art . . . that his skills of composition and expression are indivisible, and provide him with a resource of extraordinary range, power and intensity; that he uses this resource to sing about things that matter . . . that, like all great artists, he tells some of the truth.'

[Daniel Karlin: 'Bob Dylan's Names', Do You Mr. Jones?: Bob Dylan Among the Poets and Professors, ed. Neil Corcoran, London, Chatto & Windus 2002, pp.27–49; 'It ain't him, babe', LRB, London, 5 Feb 1987.]

'Keats v. Dylan' As late as 1992 'radical' English playwright David Hare imagined he was summing up the battle-lines between civilised culture and its enemy, a cheap and destructive pop culture, in the phrase 'Keats versus Dylan'. Never mind that Bob Dylan had spent the previous three decades with his face set firmly against the vulgar and the cheap, or indeed that JOHN KEATS had been a cockney upstart himself.

Hare's comically inaccurate personifying of the divide caught on like a pop craze itself. Within minutes, that doyenne of the literary clerisy, A.S. BYATT, could go on BBC Television's all-purpose arts programme, 'The Late Show' (BBC-2-TV, London, February 25, 1992) and pronounce that the qualitative difference between Keats and Dylan is that with Keats, she could take you through one of his poems and reveal many layers . . . She couldn't take you through a Dylan lyric because she wouldn't know where to begin. What's disgraceful is not the preference for Keats nor the ignorance about Dylan but the malappropriate self-confidence that has her thinking it reasonable to hand down these uninformed but lofty judgements. As if, indeed, her very unfamiliarity with Dylan's work affirms the loftiness that justifies dismissing that work. Anyone not under the moonie spell of this clerisy might feel that if they were as uninformed about Keats as A.S. Byatt (or David Hare) was about Dylan, they wouldn't rush onto TV to discuss his work.

Keenan, Larry [1943 -] Larry Keenan was born in San Francisco on November 20, 1943 and grew up photographing the last of that city's BEATS scene and then its hippie inheritors. A professional photographer since 1970, he has become eminent in his field with works in many major galleries. Some of his documentation of the Beats is in the permanent collection of the Archives of American Artists in the Smithsonian in Washington, D.C., and in 1999 FERLINGHETTI's City Lights Books published his Postcards from the Underground. Since 1985 he has experimented with creating images using computers.

When Keenan was 22, ALLEN GINSBERG introduced him to Dylan at the party after Dylan's high-profile electric Berkeley concert of December 4, 1965 (at which, without permission, he managed to take a couple of photos). He did get permission for a session with Dylan to get potential Blonde on Blonde pictures the next day, which was supposed to be a 'last day of the Beats' gathering at the City Lights bookstore at North Beach, San Francisco. Dylan and entourage, plus Keenan, were hiding from fans in the basement, and when people tried to break the door down they climbed out of a window and ran along the alley just outside, where Keenan then took what proved to be the classic shots of Dylan in his polkadot shirt with Michael McClure, Ginsberg and ROBBIE ROBERTSON. Keenan's friend Dale Smith was also there taking shots in the alley, one of which—a close-up of McClure, Dylan and Ginsberg—is used full-page in the Biograph box set (p.13).

In the end none of Larry's pictures were used on Blonde on Blonde, but they were used in Biograph (1985) and the Bootleg Series Vol. 4: Bob Dylan Live 1966 (1998): including one of the shots he wasn't supposed to take at the Berkeley concert. Larry Keenan was still a college student, and still living at home, when these photos were taken. He had to mow the lawn before he could borrow the car to drive to his rendezvous with Dylan and do the shoot.

Kegan, Larry [1942 - 2001] In the sleevenotes to the Street Legal album of 1978, Larry Kegan gets an affectionate if opaque namecheck: 'Champion of all Causes—Larry Kegan'. In fact Dylan's friendship with Kegan—born in St. Paul on April 16, 1942—stretched all the way back to August 1954, when they met at a Jewish summer camp, the co-educational Camp Herzl, near Webster, Wisconsin. As DAVE ENGEL documents in Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota: 'With other Jewish boys and girls, mostly from Duluth and the Twin Cities' they go swimming and rowing, play tennis, listen to ghost stories, play jokes on counsellors and cook outdoors. They 'must speak Hebrew in the dining hall, call buildings by Hebrew names and dress in white for the Sabbath. The campers play at Zionism. It's Arab versus Jew, just like cowboys and Indians. . . . Some see Bobby sitting on the bathroom roof with those guys, LOUIS KEMP, Steve Friedman, Stevie Goldberg, Larry Keegan [sic].' (Dylan biographer CLINTON HEYLIN also misspells him as 'Keegan'.)

As HOWARD SOUNES tells it in Down the Highway: 'Bob was playing piano when twelve-year-old Larry Kegan walked into the lodge. "How do you know this song?" asked Kegan, recognizing a bluesy tune from the radio. "Well, late at night up north where I live you get this [radio] station," said Bob. "Well, I've been listenin' to the same stuff."' Kegan did indeed know 'the same stuff', and he and Bob started performing together at the camp, which they continued to attend for two weeks each August up until 1958.

Sounes reports that Kegan grew up in St. Paul, 'was an accomplished singer' and 'had a high school doo-wop group, including three African-American boys whom he introduced to Bob. . . .

This was something new.' As with HOWARD RUTMAN, also from St. Paul, Kegan's friendship with Dylan gave him somewhere to stay on visits to the city. They'd turn up at parties, sing and play rock'n' roll piano and make themselves unpopular. According to Paul Spindle's profile of Kegan's fellow University of Minnesotan Gene, aka Geno, LaFond (with whom he wrote songs and performed—they called themselves the Mere Mortals), when Larry was in hospital after the accident that made him a paraplegic at age 15, Bob 'would come in and wheel Larry into the day room on a gurney, where they would sing together. . . . the nurses, doctors and patients had no idea what was going on.'

The accident has variously been described as a diving accident, a motorbike crash and an auto accident, and has been said to have happened at age 15, age 16 and age 17. Certainly it was an auto accident a decade later that made Kegan a quadriplegic and put him in the wheelchair in which he spent the rest of his life. 'If he could have stood up he would have been tall,' wrote Billy Golfus, director & writer of When Billy Broke His Head, a 1995 TV film about the disabled in which Larry Kegan featured, adding: 'and he wasn't any wider than a beer truck.' Kegan disliked the weight he put on in the last years of his life.

Kegan gained a masters degree in Speech Communication; managed a Florida orange grove and citrus farm for a while; pioneered (with a Dr. Ted Cole) a programme for 'attitude reassessment about disability and sexuality' that has long since become a student requirement at the University of Minnesota's Medical School; and ran a resort for disabled Vietnam veterans in Mexico, where he lived for some time, originally 'because it was cheap'. He is reputed to have been the 'model' for the character of Charlie, played by William Defoe, in Oliver Stone's film Born on the Fourth of July.

Larry Kegan returned to Minnesota in the mid-1970s. He never mentioned his friendship with Dylan to outsiders, except when singing with the Mere Mortals, when he might say 'Here's a song by a friend of mine', yet from the mid-1970s onwards he would spend sustained periods on tour with Dylan, every touring year when his health permitted. The first time Gene LaFond went along was the Rolling Thunder Revue in 1975: 'Sometimes I would fly out and meet up with them, hang for a few days and then fly home. Larry would go for weeks sometimes and different people would meet up with him and help him.' He would phone Dylan up and say 'Where are you? We're coming out!'

Billy Golfus describes how they 'would load up Larry's handicapped equipped van and catch up with the tour and hang out as long as they could. Sometimes they'd stay for weeks as Bob's personal guests. Bob put the word out to the crew that these were his friends and they were to be treated right and "make sure they don't get in the way or arrested." The routine was that at the end of the show, during Dylan's encore, they would get in Larry's van and get in line behind Bob's tour bus and roll into the night to the next gig. As they moved through the night, Bob and Larry would talk on the CB until Larry would drift off to sleep in the back of the van.'

Memorably, Kegan was brought on stage at two consecutive concerts in 1981: at Merrillville, Indiana, on October 19, and at Boston two nights later (not, as per Sounes, 'the next night'). These appearances marked Kegan's début professional performances with Dylan, almost three decades on from their first get-togethers. At Merrillville, Kegan came on at the end of the encore, and Dylan introduced him: 'You wanna, you wanna hear something really strange? I got a friend of mine who's gonna sing a song now. Gonna bring him on stage. I wonder if he's gonna sing? This is a friend of mine named Larry!' What was 'really strange' was that as Larry sang CHUCK BERRY's 'No Money Down' as the concert's final number, Dylan picked up a tenor sax at the same time (another first) and made honking noises in appropriate places. At Boston, Kegan came on before the encore and played harmonica on the concert's 23rd song, 'When You Gonna Wake Up?', and then again the evening ended with 'No Money Down', with Dylan honking away on the sax for the second and (so far) last time. This was all caught on (unissued) filmed by HOWARD ALK.

In the course of these various tours—and as a friend Kegan came to Europe with Dylan at least four times too—he met and befriended other stellar artists, including NEIL YOUNG, who invited the Mere Mortals to play at two of his annual Bridge Benefit concerts. Reportedly Kegan and LaFond were flown in 'like the stars that they were. Picked up at the airport in a long black Cadillac, the two were treated just like the "rest of the hotshots."' (So that's what some of the money goes on: limos for the stars . . .) As Paul Spindle noted, 'The Bridge School being for disabled kids, well; it just seem[ed] natural to have a performer in a wheelchair at this event.' In 1991, they preceded JOHN LEE HOOKER in the line-up. Another time, on stage at a Hannukah Festival in San Francisco, Larry seemed to stop singing in mid-song. 'The plug had falled out of the hole in his throat; his jaw was moving but nothing was coming out. Geno reached over and jammed it back in. Kegan didn't miss a beat.'

In summer 1992, when Dylan did a run of five nights at the Orpheum Theater in Minneapolis, the Mere Mortals were asked to perform a support set on September 2, the fourth night. Soul Asylum, the official support act, an up and coming local-heroes punk band, were not happy to have to start the show with only a 15-minute set. Then, for the same amount of time, on came the Mere Mortals—on this occasion Kegan, LaFond, Sid Gasner and George Palmer, augmented on their last two numbers by Dylan's long-serving bass player TONY GARNIER.

In 1999, Kegan sang at Minnesota Governor Jesse Ventura's inauguration bash. But by now his health was draining away. He needed frequent dialysis treatment and more. Billy Golfus also reports that by this point Kegan 'had embraced Orthodox Judaism and become a Lubavi(t)cher. . . . I couldn't make that scene. Larry was a praying Jew; I'm a lox and brisket Jew.' Above Kegan's bed there were two photos of him with Dylan and their friend LOUIS KEMP: one of them at age 13 and another at age 50. There was also a photo of Kegan with MUDDY WATERS. 'It's like the old joke,' says Golfus, 'where the Pope comes out with Kegan at St. Peter's Square, huge crowds cheering. Somebody pulls your coat and asks, "Who's the guy with Larry Kegan?"'

As with the earlier accidents that had so marked his life, reports of his death vary: he 'died of a heart attack while driving his van' (the 'Bob Dylan Who's Who' web page), or he 'quietly died in bed in Minnesota'. The latter is the more likely; either way, he died of heart failure, and on September 11, 2001. His was not the only music-biz death that day. David Skepner, 63-year-old longtime manager of Loretta Lynn, also suffered a fatal heart attack; Carolyn Mayer Beug, a 48-year-old filmmaker who had made videos for DWIGHT YOAKAM, was a passenger on American Airlines flight 11 and died when the plane crashed into the World Trade Center. On that particular day, few people paid attention to Larry Kegan's passing.

[Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs-Mesabi, 1997, pp.135–36. Clinton Heylin, e.g. Behind the Shades, p.32 & A Life in Stolen Moments, p.234. Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, Ch.1.

Paul Spindle, 'Gene LaFond—A Musician for the Ages', All About Surf, Jul 2005, online 16 Sep 2005 at www.allaboutsurf.com/0507/articles/lafond/index.php. When Billy Broke His Head . . . and Other Tales of Wonder, dir. Billy Golfus, ITVS, US, 1995. Billy Golfus: 'Life and Death of a Mere Mortal', seen online 16 Nov 2005 at www.mouthmag.com/issues/69/no69pg28.htm. Born on the Fourth of July, dir. Oliver Stone, Ixtlan, US, 1989. 'Bob Dylan Who's Who' webpage www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/k/keeganlarry.html (sic).]

Kelly, Roy [1949 -] Roy Kelly, British poet, librarian and Dylan commentator, was born in Walsall, England, on March 5, 1949. He first encountered Dylan as a name mentioned by PETER, PAUL & MARY on a TV appearance on 'Sunday Night at the London Palladium', probably in 1964. This was followed by a chance acquisition of two copies of the short-lived magazine Hootenanny, edited by ROBERT SHELTON, in which Dylan wrote a column 'whose style I loved'. By this time Kelly 'co-owned but did not possess (Bart Simpson style) a copy of The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan.'

Though Kelly has never written a book on Dylan he has certainly written enough on the subject to fill one. He was a subscriber right from the beginning of the life of the great UK fanzine The Telegraph, a regular letter writer within it from early on and his first piece, a review of Infidels, was published in it in the summer of 1984. Editor JOHN BAULDIE asked him to write more and he did. His review 'Find Out What It Means to Me: Fans, Collectors and Biograph', from Telegraph no.23, was republished in the collection All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook in 1987.

His Dylan assessments grew and shifted from reviews to lengthy meditations on themes such as Dylan, change and the embedded 1960s consciousness within long-term fans. His best pieces include 'Big Apple Bobbing', an account of a 1989 trip to NYC to see a run of three Dylan concerts at the Beacon Theatre, and the excellent 'A Bunch of Basement Noise in G', published in 1992: an extended musing on the then recently revealed much-expanded Basement Tapes material, some years before GREIL MARCUS colonized this terrain. His last Telegraph essay was a 14,000-word fictional feature about Dylan fandom and 1966 and all that, 'Now and Again: The Ballad of a Then Man'. This piece, which could have appeared in no other publication, emerged in 1996 in the last issue before John Bauldie's death and thus became 'an involuntary memorial to him'. (A posthumous final issue of the magazine was edited by JOHN LINDLEY.) It was a great and affecting, sad and funny piece.

Afterwards Roy opted for a period of silence, followed by Dylan commentary for On The Tracks and then for the British Dylan quarterly THE BRIDGE, for which he still writes—and still writes, in particular, about the strange pain of being a Dylan fan, and being a Dylan fan of a certain age now: about the complex turmoil of reacting to Dylan. This is territory he has colonized, though unambitiously, and with a modesty that is part of what's involved in the reacting. As another fine writer who has never written a Dylan book, ROBERT FORRYAN, puts it in another fanzine: 'Roy Kelly is the best Dylan writer who has never produced a book on Dylan.'

Roy Kelly's other work includes stories and plays broadcast on BBC radio, and a book of poems, Drugstore Fiction, 1987.

[Roy Kelly: review of Infidels, Telegraph no.15, Bury, UK, summer 1984; 'Fans, Collectors and Biograph', Telegraph no.23, 1986, republished in shorter form in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, UK, 1987 & 1988; 'Big Apple Bobbing', Telegraph no.34, Romford, UK, Winter 1989; 'A Bunch of Basement Noise in G', Telegraph no.43, Autumn 1992; 'Now and Again: The Ballad of a Then Man', Telegraph no.55, summer 1996; and Drugstore Fiction (poetry), Calstock, UK, Peterloo Poets, 1987. Robert Forryan, in his

'Roy Kelly's Blues—Part Two', republished Freewheelin'-Quarterly, Huntingdon, UK, vol.21, Oct 2001, pp.17–21.]

Kelly, Terry [1958 -] Terence Kelly was born in Jarrow, Tyne & Wear, in the north-east of England, on March 9, 1958. He first developed a serious interest in Dylan's work as a teenager in 1972, after borrowing copies of Bringing It All Back Home and Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits. His first piece of published Dylan commentary was a review of Shot of Love in a Northumberland weekly local newspaper, the News Post-Leader, in 1981. He began writing for the UK Dylan fanzine THE BRIDGE from its launch issue in 1998 and has written recurrently for it since, writing features, book and record reviews and conducting interviews as well as looking after its interests more generally—not least in arranging some of the interviews it runs (including with CHRISTOPHER RICKS, NEIL CORCORAN, CAROLYN HESTER and TOBY THOMPSON), securing pieces by others through his own contacts and suggesting other ideas.

His own contributions include 'Thin Wild Mercury Sounds on Tyneside: Bob Dylan in Newcastle 1965 & 1966'; 'Sixty Ways of Looking at Bob Dylan'; 'Bob Dylan's Songs of Innocence and Experience'—a long, brave early plunge into print with an assessment of "Love and Theft"; 'A Long-Forgotten Truth: An Exploration of Planet Waves'; and 'A Million Shards of Meaning: The 1984 Letterman Show Revisited'.

Terry Kelly continues to work as a journalist in the north-east of England, mainly for the South Shields Gazette.

[Terry Kelly: 'Thin Wild Mercury Sounds on Tyneside: Bob Dylan in Newcastle 1965 & 1966', The Bridge no.1, Gateshead, UK, summer 1998; 'Sixty Ways of Looking at Bob Dylan', The Bridge no.10, summer 2001; 'Bob Dylan's Songs of Innocence and Experience', The Bridge no.11, autumn 2001; 'A Long-Forgotten Truth: An Exploration of Planet Waves', The Bridge no.12, summer 2002; 'A Million Shards of Meaning: The 1984 Letterman Show Revisited', The Bridge no.18, spring 2004.]

kelp In 'Sara', on Desire, when Dylan sings that the beach was deserted 'except for some kelp' he is cheating in the same way as George Eliot in Middlemarch, 1871 (Chapter 42): 'But there were none to stare at him except the long-weaned calves, and none to show dislike of his appearance except the little water-rats which rustled away at his approach.' Each attempts to modify an absence of people by dragging in wantonly upgraded lower life forms—rather lower in Dylan's case than in Eliot's.

Keltner, Jim [1942 -] James Keltner was born in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on April 27, 1942 and began his drumming career in the 1960s. He became one of the most sought-after of session players, and has worked live and in the studio with an absurdly all-star list of artists, from Barbra Streisand to JOHN LENNON, B.B. King to JONI MITCHELL, ERIC CLAPTON to Martha Reeves, Charlie Watts to Rickie Lee Jones and DAVID CROSBY to the Bee Gees. He can add Manhattan Transfer, ARLO GUTHRIE, Pink Floyd, BRIAN WILSON, Freddie Hubbard, Randy Newman, JOHN LEE HOOKER, Jackson Browne, WILLIE NELSON, the Indigo Girls, ELVIS COSTELLO, Joe Cocker and a good few more. He can also add the TRAVELING WILBURYS and, more important, Bob Dylan.

Perhaps he first played with Dylan in the studio, in March 1971, pulled in by LEON RUSSELL, who produced the session. As Keltner recalls it, 'We did "Watching the River Flow" and "When I Paint My Masterpiece" on that same day. And then I didn't see him again until we did "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" in Los Angeles. That was a monumental session for me because it was such a touching song. It was the first time I actually cried when I was playing. When I hear that on the radio now, it's very special to me. . . . because it's a frozen moment in my life that will always be there.'

Two possible demurrals here. First, it wasn't literally true that Keltner hadn't seen Dylan again till 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', because Keltner played behind Eric Clapton at the Concert for Bangla Desh, four months after the 'Watching the River Flow' studio session. Far more importantly, the drummer on that March 1971 session is more usually said to have been CHUCK BLACKWELL; Blackwell certainly thinks so.

Either way, Jim Keltner certainly appeared on 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', and therefore on the album Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid (1973); the next Dylan album he played on was Saved (1980), but this began a run of three 1980s albums on which Dylan used this highly reliable drummer, the others being Shot of Love (1981) and Empire Burlesque (1985). But by this time Keltner had also toured behind Dylan too, and played on the 1979 'Saturday Night Live' and the 1980 Grammy Awards TV shows. The live concerts began for Keltner with the first gospel tour, from November 1 to December 9, 1979, and continued with the 1980 tours (January 11 to February 9, April 17 to May 21 and November 9 to December 4). He remained for the 1981 tours too (June 10 to July 25, mostly in Europe, and then October 16 to November 21 in North America), though on the latter he found that Dylan was adding a second drummer.

After these tours and the 1980s albums, Keltner's next Dylan assignment was in the studio in May 1988 to play on the album The Traveling Wilburys Volume 1. Next came the 'Late Night with David Letterman' TV show on January 18, 1992, with a bemused Bob Dylan singing 'Like a Rolling Stone', backed by a calm, solid Keltner plus a horder of others comically hyped up to the point of rabidity. That October 16, Keltner was the drummer in the house band at the so-called 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration, playing behind most of that night's performers—including Dylan. Less than two years later, in Japan, Keltner was Dylan's drummer alongside the Tokyo New Philharmonic Orchestra at the self-proclaimed 'Great Music Experience' at the Todaiji Temple in Nara, as Dylan sang 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', 'I Shall Be Released', 'Ring Them Bells' and an ensemble reprise of 'I Shall Be Released' three nights running (May 20–22, 1994).

In 1997 Keltner was called down to Miami to play drums on seven of the 11 tracks on Time Out of Mind (he's absent on 'Dirt Road Blues', 'Cold Irons Bound', 'Make You Feel My Love' and 'Highlands')—and then after another gap of years, he found himself called up again, more surprisingly, to become one of the Never-Ending Tour musicians. Twenty-one years after his previous concert-tour job with Dylan, he came back to replace GEORGE RECELI. He 'shadowed' Receli, who was having a problem with an arm, on the Milan concert of April 20, 2002, took over for the first ten numbers of the following night's concert in Zurich and then replaced Receli altogether as from Innsbruck on April 23, through to the last nights of that tour leg, in London on May 11 & 12. In Brussels, on April 28, in Cardiff on May 6 and on the last night in London, he got to play 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' again.

[Jim Keltner quoted from interview by Don Zulaica, seen online 6 Jan 2006 on the Drummerworld website at www.drummerworld.com/drummers/Jim_Keltner.html.]

Kemp, Louis [1941? -] Louis Kemp has been an almost life-long friend of Bob Dylan's, since first meeting him at a Jewish co-educational summer camp, Camp Herzl, which they both attended annually in the mid-1950s.

Louis inherited the long-established family business of A. Kemp Fisheries Inc., based at 4832 West Superior Street, Duluth, which had been founded in 1930 by Aron and Abe Kemp, who started taking Lake Superior fish to the Chicago markets. It's a company whose relationship with Swedish and Finnish fishermen goes back a long way. There's a statue to the memory of these men on the shore at Green Point, just north of Thunder Bay, erected in 1990 on the 100th anniversary of their trading. 'The Finns of Green Point would sell their fish to Kemp Fisheries located in Duluth,' noted Mike Roinila in a 1997 article, 'and over the years a trusting and lasting association was formed between the fishermen and the American seller. . . . [And] when an unexpected thaw one winter left the fishermen with no way to keep their harvest frozen, Kemp Fisheries rented out the Port Arthur arena to freeze the fish and preserve them for market.'

Today's marine traffic is mostly boats used by the owners of the shoreline cottages—Green Point's last commercial fisherman retired in 1990—but A. Kemp Fisheries survived. Louis Kemp took over in 1967, expanded into Alaska and re-named it Louis Kemp Fisheries in 1986, and has since seen it taken over and moved. It was taken over first by Tyson Seafood (1992) and then by Bumble Bee (1999). Bumble Bee is a subsidiary of International Home Foods, which was itself taken over in 2000 by ConAgra Foods, which moved production from Duluth to Motley, Minnesota. Its official address is now in Downer's Grove, Illinois. They mostly turn North Pacific white fish pulp into imitation shellfish (surimi), and Louis Kemp has become a registered trade mark; you can buy Louis Kemp® Crab Delights® in Chunk Style, Flake Style, Leg Style or Easy Shreds; Lobster Delights® Salad Style, and Scallop Delights® Bay Style. Mmm.

Kemp was among the entourage on Dylan and THE BAND's 1974 'comeback' tour, and with Barry Imhoff was tour manager on the Rolling Thunder Revues—on which, SAM SHEPARD noted, he showed 'a remarkable gift for being able to speak words without moving his mouth,' and also 'managed to buy a 1934 Packard coupé'. At The Band's so-called 'Farewell Concert' dinner in San Francisco on November 25, 1976, Kemp Fisheries supplied the smoked salmon. It was even through his fisheries that he became a friend of Marlon Brando's, and duly brought Brando and Dylan together for a very different kind of meal. As his own account of 2005 explains it:

> 'I got to know Marlon about thirty years ago through a mutual friend. His son, Christian, came to work for me in fisheries I owned in Alaska and Minnesota. . . . One of my visits to Los Angeles coincided with Passover. I was not yet Orthodox and made plans to attend a seder at a local synagogue with my sister. Marlon called me that very day and invited me out to dinner. I graciously declined, explaining that it was Passover and I was going to a seder. Marlon became audibly excited over the phone and said, "Passover—I've always wanted to attend a seder. Can I come with?" He had made me an offer I couldn't refuse. . . . A short time later, Marlon called me back and asked if he could bring a friend. I said, yes, by all means. . . . I called the shul again. They were a little less patient this time and begrudgingly told me that they could squeeze one more person in, but this was absolutely the last one as they were now officially sold out.
>
> 'Still later that day, I received a phone call from a childhood friend of mine who had become a well-known singer/songwriter. . . . he asked if he and his wife could go along. The shul was unhappy . . . but somehow I softened the heart of the receptionist and she agreed to let my people go—to the seder.
>
> 'I will never forget the sight of our table in the synagogue, Marlon Brando was to my left and > sitting next to him was his guest. This was during the height of Marlon's involvement with Native American causes and he had brought with him noted Indian activist Dennis Banks of Wounded Knee fame. Banks was dressed in full Indian regalia: buckskin tassles on his clothes and long braids hanging down from a headband, which sported a feather. My childhood friend Bob Dylan sat to my right, joined by his wife, my sister Sharon, and other friends. . . . After about forty-five minutes, the rabbi figured out that ours was not your average seder table. "Mr. Brando, would you please do us the honor of reading the next passage from the hagaddah," he said. Marlon said, "It would be my pleasure."

>
> 'He smiled broadly, stood up and delivered the passage from the hagaddah as if he were reading Shakespeare on Broadway. Mouths fell open and eyes focused on the speaker with an intensity any rabbi would covet. When he was done I think people actually paused, wondering if they should applaud.
>
> 'Somewhat later the rabbi approached another member of our table. "Mr. Dylan, would you do us the honor of singing us a song?" The rabbi pulled out an acoustic guitar. . . . Much to my surprise Bob said yes and performed an impromptu rendition of "Blowin' in the Wind" to the stunned shul of about 300 seder guests. . . . Needless to say, everyone was both shocked and thrilled by this unusual Hollywood-style Passover miracle.'

But Louis Kemp seems always to have remained important at least in part because of his pre-showbiz credentials with Dylan. ROBERT SHELTON reported that it was with Kemp, in September 1974, that Dylan 'revisited Highway 61, touring the North Country . . . [and] showing his oldest children where he'd grown up'.

[Mike Roinila: 'Finnish Fishermen of Lake Superior', The Finnish American Reporter, Jan 1997, seen online 12 May 2005 at http://sfhs.eget.net/P_articles/Pelo112.html. Sam Shepard, Rolling Thunder Logbook, London: Penguin edn., p.8. Louis Kemp memoir extracted from www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/who.html. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn. p.446.]

Kemper, David [1947/48 -] David Law Kemper was born in Chicago in 1947–48 but attended high school in Ogden, Utah, where in his senior year he was drumming in contest-winning local band the Groobies; when he was 17, his father's job transferred the family to Sedalia, Missouri, but David was allowed to stay behind to remain in the band. He had already been drumming for a decade by this time, and never had any other ambition. When he managed to avoid the draft in 1966 by faking insanity, he said he realised his good luck. 'It all lay before me, no more detours.' A friend encouraged him to move to LA and start session playing, which he did that same year, getting into it by helping the friend build a studio in which he then watched others, including JIM KELTNER, at work. He made a slow start but once he got going, Kemper was working non-stop, and in the 1970s played on a huge number of albums including for Joan Armatrading, GEOFF MULDAUR, Dion, Glen Campbell and Manhattan Transfer and touring with many others.

He'd first seen THE GRATEFUL DEAD in 1968, but thought that compared to people like Miles Davis, 'they lumbered along. They weren't agile. . . . [They] were like a big clunky old machine. Boy, they got the ball rolling, though, and it was just like a locomotive.' Decades later, he joined the JERRY GARCIA Band, playing with them from 1983 to 1993, and not only on drums but percussion, tambourine, congas and even slide guitar and vocals. He's on Garcia's 1988 solo album Almost Acoustic too, and in the 1980s–90s also played sessions for T-BONE BURNETT, John Hiatt and even David Cassidy. After being abruptly fired from the Garcia Band (for reasons he was never given and never understood) he plunged back into session-work, including for PHIL SPECTOR. And despite the avowal of single-mindedness ('no detours'), he also developed his hobby of painting into something closer to a professional activity, with work on display at Ghengis Cohen in LA and a 1996 one-man show in Germany.

1996 was also the year he joined Bob Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band, replacing WINSTON WATSON and playing his first concert at San Luis Obispo, California, that October 17. He remained the band's drummer—a still-slight, balding, intense-looking figure, often in dark glasses—all the way through till the last date of 2001, on November 24 in Boston. That's a total of 569 concerts, making him one of the longest-serving of Dylan's musicians, behind only TONY GARNIER, BUCKY BAXTER and JOHN JACKSON. David Kemper also plays on both Time Out of Mind and "Love and Theft".

Since leaving the band, he has returned to session-work, and in 2005 worked on the soundtrack for the JOHNNY CASH biopic Walk the Line.

[Quotes from the engaging article by Barry Smolin, 'Drumming at the Edge of Jerry: an Interview with David Kemper', Dupree's Diamond News no.36, US, 1997 (interview done in 1996 just before Kemper joined Dylan's band), seen online 13 Dec 2005 at www.well.com/user/shmo/kemper.html (in which he talks fondly & interestingly about Jerry Garcia's warmth & intelligence).]

Kerouac, Jack [1922 - 1969] Jean-Louis Lebris de Kerouac was born in Lowell, Massachusetts, on March 12, 1922 to French-Canadian parents. He became the quintessential BEAT figure yet a highly individual and influential voice. He is primarily a novelist, albeit with a prose style that can rightly be called prose poetry, as his masterpiece On the Road, 1957, shows.

Dylan paid his work close, continuing attention. Kerouac's poetry book, Mexico City Blues, 1959, as ALLEN GINSBERG told WES STACE, was a specific influence on Dylan: 'He read that in '58–9. . . . Somebody gave it him and . . . as he said . . . it [was] the first book of poetry which talked the American language to him . . .' Dylan uses this title in 'Something's Burning, Baby' on the 1985 album Empire Burlesque ('I got the Mexico City blues . . .').

While the impact of Kerouac's work has been, like Dylan's, unquantifiably wide, Dylan makes specific use of Kerouac's titles, commonly recycling them into his own. Thus On the Road—'On the Road Again'; The Subterraneans, 1958–'Subterranean Homesick Blues'; Visions of Gerard, 1963–'Visions of Johanna'; Desolation Angels, 1965–'Desolation Row'.

In the case of this last work, the borrowing happened fast and ran deeper. In 'Desolation Row' Dylan recycles a phrase direct from the Kerouac book: 'in the perfect image of a priest'; the book also yields the phrase 'housing project hill', which Dylan throws into the same album's 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues'. Kerouac's book was first published in March 1965; the songs were recorded that August.

Kerouac died of alcohol and despair at St. Petersburg, Florida, on October 21, 1969. He was 47.

[Ginsberg interviewed by Stace, Cambridge, UK, 27 Apr 1985, from 'Interviews and a Poem: Allen Ginsberg, Poet', in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, ed. Michael Gray & John Bauldie, 1987.]

Kershaw, Doug [1936 -] Douglas James Kershaw was born in Tiel Ridge, Louisiana, on January 24, 1936, the seventh child in a family of nine, whose mother played guitar and whose father was an alligator hunter who committed suicide when Doug was seven years old. The three youngest boys first formed a band as children in 1948; two of the three (Rusty and Doug) stuck with it and had a top 5 country hit in 1955 with their first single, 'So Lovely, Baby' on ROY ACUFF's Hickory label. But if the Kershaws' ambition was indicated by their childhood band's original name, the Continental Playboys, it proved to be with the more geographically limited name 'Lousiana Man' that they first went even bigger than continental. A huge hit in 1961, it was eventually covered by around 800 other artists, and in 1969 it became the first song broadcast back to earth from the moon by the Apollo 12 astronauts.

1969 had already been, by then, the year Doug Kershaw was 'rediscovered' with a 'JOHNNY CASH TV Show' appearance in June, and he ended it as opening act for ERIC CLAPTON's Derek & the Dominos band at the Fillmore East. (Rusty and Doug had split up professionally in 1964.) More pertinently for us, a month before Kershaw's Cash TV appearance he had played a May 3, 1969 Self Portrait session for Bob Dylan in Nashville, where he played violin on 'Take a Message to Mary'—and then came his gorgeously gear-grinding, down-home fiddle solo which dominates Dylan's 'Blue Moon'.

By early August he had been interviewed and splashed large across Rolling Stone magazine, in which he made interesting comments about perceived differences between Dylan's old hip milieu and his current country explorations, assuming it to be all of a piece with a Dylan rejection of foul-mouthed 'underground' language. Kershaw, clearly a man who, in the spotlight for the first time in years, was determined to seize his moment and speak on behalf of the by-passed, conservative world, said:

> 'You wonder why Dylan's down here? You saw his little boy, didn't you?—Well then I think that you should know why he's here. He's grown up. Just what is this big difference between here and San Francisco? Do you really think the people are that different between here and there? You think people aren't poor here? You think people don't go out on their wives here?'

A revered musician who claimed to play 28 different instruments, Kershaw himself spent the 1970s and early 1980s in a doldrums of career failure, drug and alcohol abuse, except for a brief shake-up in 1975 when he re-married and in 1981 when he returned to the country top 40 with 'Hello Woman'. After 1984 he re-emerged as a musician with a career, made a hit duet with Hank Williams Jr. ('Cajun Baby', 1988) and in 1998 released his first French-language material since the early 1950s. In 2001 he made a new solo album, Still Cajun After All These Years.

[Rusty & Doug: Rusty & Doug Sing Louisiana Man and Other Favorites, Hickory LPM-103, 1961 includes 'So Lovely, Baby', their 1958 hit 'Hello Sheriff' & 'Louisiana Man'; the 2-CD set Louisiana Men contains their complete Hickory sessions. Patrick Thomas: 'Doug Kershaw' (interview), Rolling Stone no.39, San Francisco, 9 Aug 1969.]

Kibbutz Ein Dor, Dylan visit to See Yellin, Bob.

Kimball, Stuart [1956 -] Stuart Morse Kimball was born in Massachusetts on December 21, 1956, and grew up in Hopkinton, New Hampshire, before basing himself in Boston in the early 1980s, when he played guitar in a band called Face to Face. He had been playing self-taught guitar from the age of ten. Apart from playing with Carly Simon he has spent most of the last quarter-century as a Boston local hero, a 'comrade in arms' of that other local hero, Peter Wolf, whose solo albums Long Line and Sleepless he has worked on.

He played on two Dylan sessions for Empire Burlesque in 1985 (on February 21 & 23), and therefore gets a credit on the album cut of 'When the Night

Comes Falling from the Sky', and then re-appeared almost 20 years later, with dark glasses, pork pie hat and a stolid, weary, middle-aged look, as the replacement for the great FREDDY KOELLA in the Never-Ending Tour band of 2004, playing his first concert in Gilford, New Hampshire, on June 4.

As of early 2006 he remains in the band, a competent team player who has never contributed the slightest musical personality of his own to the rest.

[Quote & background data from 'Kimball's career is a-changin'' by Steve Morse, Boston Globe, 6 Aug 2004.]

King, Carole [1942 -] Carol(e) Klein was born in Brooklyn on February 9, 1942 and swiftly became a gifted child pianist. As a teenager she was already a keen songwriter, recording demos, backup singing, arranging sessions, and recording some early unsuccessful singles while attending Queens College.

Neil Sedaka wrote 'Oh Carol' for Carole King but she opted instead for lyricist GERRY GOFFIN, and for a few golden years as from 1959, when they were married and dreaming up songs together, they were the prolific writers of major pop hits, working out of the famous Brill Building at 1819 Broadway, New York, for Nevins-Kirchner-Colgem from 1960 onwards. It was far less Goffin's inconsequential words than Carole King's strong, confident, catchy melody lines that made memorable and even exciting records that would otherwise have been workaday milk-white pop.

Not all their hits were for white artists—the first to serve notice that here was a composer of distinctive zing and a youthful, humane optimism, regardless of subject matter, was the Shirelles' tremendous 'Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?', with its inexorable lyric thrust propelled along by thin, remorseless voices and shuddering strings. Goffin & King also turned their African-American babysitter, Little Eva, into a pop star with 'The Locomotion' and its equally cheery follow-up, 'Keep Your Hands Off My Baby' (which had nothing to do with the babysitting) and wrote the Cookies' hit 'Chains', later covered by THE BEATLES, the Chiffons' 'One Fine Day' (later accidentally plagiarised by GEORGE HARRISON) and the Drifters' 'Up on the Roof'.

But Goffin & King also gave big stars like BOBBY VEE their biggest hits, Vee's 'Take Good Care of My Baby', a no.1, epitomising the unstoppable hit quality of their output. When these records were new, and you first heard them on the radio, it was obvious in a moment that they were bound to be big hits. When Carole King was allowed to record one of these teeny-bop songs herself, 'It Might As Well Rain Until September', it was clear that this too would be a transatlantic hit: and it was. The hits continued even after the impact of the Beatles, the 'British invasion', mid-1960s Bob Dylan and the liberating explosion into more complex songs. The plaintive 'Goin' Back' was a hit for Dusty Springfield in 1966 and covered by THE BYRDS. (It was later revived to good effect by King herself and later still to bad effect by Queen.) Even in the summer of love, there were plenty of clients for songwriters, and it was Goffin & King who wrote the Monkees' 1967 smash 'Pleasant Valley Sunday'. Aretha Franklin's '(You Make Me Feel Like) A Natural Woman' was theirs too, though a third credit went to producer JERRY WEXLER. (And of course there had always been a middle of the road market: the unspeakably awful Steve Lawrence and Edie Gormé topped the charts in 1963 with another Goffin-King song, 'Go Away Little Girl'—a title Bob Dylan would mirror some decades later with his own less successful 'Go Away Little Boy'.)

Just as Goffin and King did not write together exclusively while married, so too their professional collaboration didn't quite end with their 1968 divorce—they co-wrote Blood, Sweat & Tears' 'Hi-De-Ho'—but it was King who emerged the more strongly, both as a songwriter and a performer, moving to LA, adapting to the changed music world of the late 1960s and of the hip singer-songwriter, and enjoying slow-burning but spectacular solo success with her album Tapestry, which was released in 1971 after a lack of success first with Danny Kortchmar and her second husband Charles Larkey in their trio The City and with a first solo album, Writer, in 1970.

Tapestry was effectively an album of reinterpretations of her own work, including a couple of Goffin-King hits, on which King signalled that she could ease up on the bouncy-bounciness and allow her pop compositions to breathe more maturely in the freer air of a new age. Her own songs here included 'I Feel the Earth Move' (which duly became a no.1 single), 'So Far Away' (a no.3) and 'You've Got a Friend' (a huge hit by James Taylor) as well as 'It's Too Late' (another no.1, co-written with Toni Stern) and versions of the Goffin-King hits by Aretha Franklin and the Shirelles. Aided by a posse of top musicians, including JONI MITCHELL on backing vocals and James Taylor on guitar, vocals and, er, grandfalloon, King herself not only sang in her newly mournful, clear-eyed, frail but resonant voice but also played synthesiser, guitar, piano and other keyboards and contributed background vocals. She seemed to have been around forever, yet she was still in her 20s.

Tapestry was an album you couldn't get away from, not only in 1971, but on for several years afterwards as it continued to colonise the charts and sell more and more millions of copies. Further albums followed, including Thoroughbred (1975), featuring DAVID CROSBY and Graham Nash as well as James Taylor, and Simple Things (1977), after which she made a third unhappy marriage, again to a songwriting partner, Rick Evers, who died of a heroin overdose a year later. Becoming more and more of an environmental activist, she released the album Speeding Time in 1983 and dropped out to live and campaign in Idaho, but returned to recording in 1989 with the album City Streets, followed in 1993 by Color of Your Dreams (with two songs co-written by Slash).

The year before that she had made a first professional connection with Bob Dylan, when she could be seen at the piano, still looking youthful in well-cut dark jacket and blue jeans, jumping up and down on the pedals, waving a mane of golden hair and smiling in unrestrained delight, the most prominent musician in the swollen, surreal band ranged behind Dylan on his wary performance of 'Like a Rolling Stone' at the 'Late Night With David Letterman 10th Anniversary Show', recorded that January 18 and televised February 6. Three years later, on March 30, 1995, she popped up at one of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour concerts in Brixton, London, sharing backing vocals on 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35' with Chrissie Hynde and ELVIS COSTELLO; and then on March 11, at the Dublin concert, she came on stage after the first nine songs and played piano on the remaining eight (for the last three of which VAN MORRISON was sharing vocals, as was Costello on the last two). So it was that in the unexpected setting of a vile stadium in Dublin, Carole King, now a woman of 53 and only Bob's junior by nine months, joined that far greater singer-songwriter than herself to play on 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'In the Garden', 'Ballad of a Thin Man', 'Like a Rolling Stone', 'The Times They Are a-Changin', 'Real, Real Gone', 'I Shall Be Released' and another 'Rainy Day Women'.

In 2003 Carole King, an active Democrat, picked the wrong man yet again, actively campaigning for John Kerry in the Democratic primaries. On July 29, 2004, she spoke and sang at the Democratic National Convention. Two hours later, Kerry made his acceptance speech as Presidential nominee and marched off down the long road to oblivion.

Carole, however, has marched off to Stars Hollow, Connecticut, fictional hometown of the TV show 'Gilmore Girls', in which she appears now and then as Sophie Bloom, the sharp-tongued owner of Sophie's Music Shop.

[Carole King: 'It Might as Well Rain Until September', Companion 2000, US (London-American HLU 9591, UK), 1962; Writer, Ode SP 77006, US, 1970; Tapestry, LA, Jan 1971, Ode SP 77009, 1971; Thoroughbred, Ode SP 77034, 1975; Simple Things, Capitol SMAS 11667, US, 1977; Speeding Time, Atlantic ATL 80118, US, 1983; City Streets, Capitol CAP 90885, 1989; Color of Your Dreams, Priority/Scarface SCA 57197, US, 1993. The City: Now That Everything's Been Said, Ode Z 12-44012, US, 1969. 'Gilmore Girls', Warner Bros, US; King débuted in Season 2, episode 20 ('Help Wanted', 2002). Sources include http://carole-king.biography.ms/ & the Ode discography at www.bsnpubs.com/aandm/ode.html, both seen online 5 Feb 2006.]

King, Clydie [1943 -] Clydie May Crittendon (daughter of a Curtis Crittendon and a Lula Mae King) was born in Dallas, Texas, on August 21, 1943. She is generally thought a backing singer, but in fact has made many records of her own, some of them a surprisingly long time ago. She made her first, 'A Casual Look' c/w 'Oh Me', in the mid-1950s in Memphis, for the Bihari Brothers' label RPM, billed as by Little Clydie King & the Teens. Soon afterwards, credited as Clydie King, she made two singles on Speciality: 'Our Romance' c/w 'Written on the Wall' (1956–57) and 'I'm Invited to Your Party' c/w 'Young Fool in Love' (1957). She made two further singles for Philips in the early 1960s (as Clydie King & the Sweet Things) plus one as by Mel Carter & Clydie King; three more in 1965 for Imperial, a 1968 duet with Jimmy Holiday and four more 1968–69 solo singles, all on Minit. In 1972 or 1976 came a shoddily packaged solo album on Lizard, Direct Me. One more single, a version of Sly & the Family Stone's 'Dance to the Music', credited to Clydie King & Brown Sugar, came out on Chelsea Records in 1973, as did the album Brown Sugar Featuring Clydie King (with a heavy reliance on songs penned by Donna Weiss). As one of the vocal group the Blackberries she also made a mysteriously never-released album for Motown at the end of the 60s, followed by several Blackberries singles in 1973 and 1974.

Her prodigious back-up singing career included being a one-time member of RAY CHARLES' Raelettes, singing on many of PHIL SPECTOR's girl-group records of the very early 1960s, being among Joe Cocker's Mad Dogs & Englishmen, singing on JESSE ED DAVIS' second solo album, on Steppenwolf's hit 'Born to be Wild', on the 1973 SONNY TERRY & BROWNIE McGHEE album Sonny & Brownie, tracks by Lynyrd Skynyrd and Tim Rose and, while romantically linked to MICK JAGGER, on THE ROLLING STONES' album Exile on Main Street. In 1972, backed by a 31-piece Quincy Jones orchestra, Clydie followed the double-act of CAROLE KING & James Taylor and preceded Barbra Streisand at a lavish, star-packed 'Four for McGovern' fundraiser at the LA Forum, the nature of which is indicated by the fact that Warren Beattie and Goldie Hawn acted as ushers. Four years later King worked with Streisand again, as one of the Oreos in her movie with KRIS KRISTOFFERSON, A Star Is Born. In 1977 she sang behind another diva, BETTE MIDLER, on her Broken Blossom album.

Clydie King first joined the Dylan world in 1970, when at a session of overdubbing held in LA under producer BOB JOHNSTON's supervision, Clydie King and fellow Blackberries Venetta Fields and Genger Blake Schackne (plus Johnston himself) sang backup vocals on a session with various musicians. Dylan himself wasn't there. It isn't known what tracks were worked on but the date (overnight on March 26) falls in the middle of sessions for New Morning. It was another decade before Clydie King and Dylan actually worked together. A committed Christian, she seems to have arrived in the picture in February 1980, and is thought to have become a valued singer, a moral support and a girlfriend, first working on most of the Saved sessions at Muscle Shoals in Sheffield, Alabama, and then joining the backing singers on the second 1980 gospel tour, starting in Toronto that April 17 and finishing in Dayton, Ohio, on May 21. In general, she sang a solo number, 'Calvary', in the middle of alternate shows. (The backing singers also began most concerts with several jointly sung gospel numbers before Bob Dylan came on stage, so that King was in the group singing five songs, sometimes as many as seven, most evenings.)

In October 1980, she was among those in the studio with Dylan in Santa Monica for a long session, at which 13 tracks were cut, though only six have circulated, among them a fascinating 'Caribbean Wind' and that great unreleased number 'Yonder Comes Sin'. On the semi-gospel fall tour (the 'Musical Retrospective Tour') that followed, from November 9 in San Francisco to December 4 in Portland, Oregon, Clydie was there again. A few of these concerts also began with several songs from the backing singers, King included, but this time she and Dylan also sang vocal duets on two numbers—'Abraham Martin and John' (with Dylan on piano) and 'Rise Again'. From November 19, both were being performed in the same concert. King was thus afforded a rare prominence on this tour, and the mutual respect and affection between her and Dylan was obvious.

From late March to early May of 1981 Clydie King pitched into almost all of the sessions for Shot of Love, though one of the few she missed was the last one, on May 15 in LA, at which 'Heart of Mine' was recorded.

The 1981 tour—sometimes called the 'Shot of Love Tour'—comprised four warm-up shows in the US in June, a leg in Europe in June–July and another in North America in October–November. Concerts during the first two legs were structured much like the previous one, starting with four songs by the backing singers plus TERRY YOUNG on piano; Dylan and the band would then perform ten to 12 numbers, followed by one song from a backing singer (with the band) and then came a further ten to 14 songs by Bob Dylan and the band and an encore of one or two more songs with the band and one or two more by Dylan alone. The fall concerts omitted the backing-singer section at the start, and ended with the encores reversed so that Dylan's solo songs came before one or two final numbers with the group. Within all this, Clydie King took no solo slots on the US warm-up dates, but duetted with Dylan on 'Abraham Martin and John' or 'Rise Again' each night, and, on the last concert (Columbia, Maryland, June 14), on 'Dead Man, Dead Man' also.

For some reason, King missed the first European concert, in Toulouse, France, on June 21, but she was there for the rest, and on her first night, in Colombe on June 23, she and Dylan débuted their duet of the old EVERLY BROTHERS song 'Let It Be Me', sung now as if a devotional song addressed to God, yet not without a frisson of something between the two singers. This proved a one-off, and on subsequent nights in London it was back to 'Abraham, Martin and John', then the Jim Webb song 'Let's Begin', then no duet at all, then 'Let's Begin', 'Abraham' and 'Let's Begin'. In Birmingham there was no duet either night, and after that it settled down to a routine nightly 'Let's Begin', all the way through from Stockholm on July 8 to Avignon on the 25th. On the fall tour of North America, though the backing singers didn't start the show they did perform one number in the middle each night; Clydie and Bob started the tour by continuing to sing 'Let's Begin' but soon introduced the old Tommy Edwards hit 'It's All in the Game' (débuted in Merrillville, Indiana, October 19, 1981), in turn replacing this with 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight' in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, on October 25, throwing in an extra 'Let's Begin' at the concert after that and then reintroducing 'Let It Be Me' in Toronto on October 29, retaining it in Montreal and then, dropping both this and the 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight' duet, returned to 'It's All in the Game' in Kitchener, Ontario, on Hallowe'en. After that it was mostly back to 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight', though there was no duet in Atlanta on November 15.

There was no 1982 tour, but at Dylan's Rundown Studios in Santa Monica, on June 1 that year, Dylan and Clydie King recorded a series of duets together, with Dylan on organ, guitar and bass and Jimmie Haskell on piano. None has circulated, though four songs are known to be extant: 'Standing in the Light', three takes of 'Average People', 'In the Heat of the Night' and 'Dream a Little Dream of Me'. Some years later Dylan said in an interview: 'I've also got a record with just me and Clydie King singing together and it's great, but it doesn't fall into any category that the record company knows how to deal with.' The nearest they came to any such Dylan-King release was with the studio version of their duet on 'Let It Be Me', recorded at a Shot of Love session on May 1, 1981, which was released, though in Europe only and billed as solely by Bob Dylan, on the B-side of 'Heart of Mine', in September 1981.

Clydie King reappeared on the promo video for the Infidels single 'Sweetheart Like You' and contributed to the album sessions of April 27 & 29 and May 2, 1983, this last yielding the 'Death Is Not the End' released on the 1988 album Down in the Groove. Her last day of action in Dylan's professional life seems to have been at Dylan's home studio in the garage at the Malibu house in March 1984, when she sometimes joined Bob and THE PLUGZ at their rehearsal sessions for the 'Late Night with David Letterman' TV show that month, though she didn't take part in the show itself.

HOWARD ALK filmed King, Dylan and the band both backstage and on stage on the fall 1981 tour, and also took copious pictures of Clydie and Bob together in 1980–81, several of which are published in the large-format booklet with the 5-LP box set Biograph in 1985, one of which, reproduced full page, has a quiet air of intimacy about it, at least on Ms. King's part. HOWARD SOUNES' Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, published in 2001, claimed that at some point Bob Dylan even bought her a house. Perhaps she's still in that house today.

[Clydie King: 'Our Romance' c/w 'Writing on the Wall', Specialty 605, (78 rpm), US, 1956–7, reissued on the 5-CD box set The Specialty Story, Specialty 4412, US, 1994; 'I'm Invited to Your Party' c/w 'Young Fool in Love', Specialty 642, US, 1957; Direct Me, Lizard Ampex A-20104, US, 1972/76. Clydie King & Brown Sugar, 'Dance to the Music', Chelsea 0239, US, 1973. Brown Sugar Featuring Clydie King, Chelsea BCL1-0368, US, 1973. Little Clydie King & the Teens: 'A Casual Look' c/w 'Oh Me', RPM RPM 462, mid-1950s, reissued on Modern Vocal Groups Volume 4, Ace, CDCHD 764, UK, nia.]

King of Sweden, the See Carl XVI Gustav of Sweden.

Kirkland, Sally [1944 -] Sally Kirkland was born in New York City on Hallowe'en, 1944. The daughter of a Vogue fashion editor, she became an actor via off-Broadway (1962), the WARHOL Factory and Lee Strasberg's Actors' Studio. She has subsequently appeared in an astonishing number of bad movies and failed to land significant rôles in many successful ones, including The Sting, The Way We Were and A Star Is Born. Her finest hour is generally agreed to have been playing an unsuccessful Czech actor in the 1987 film Anna. She is reputed to have had an affair with Bob Dylan in 1976 and returned within his orb some years later. In 1990 she played the man-eating other woman in the promo video for 'Unbelievable', a hopeless piece of rockist sludge plucked from the obscurity of the album Under the Red Sky and issued as a single. Almost any other track would have fared better. The video was filmed in the Mojave Desert on June 24, 1990; co-stars were Rob Bogue and MOLLY RINGWALD. Bob played a guitar-doodling chauffeur. At one point he chauffeurs a pig with a ring in its nose; the two act equally well.

Undeterred, Sally Kirkland remains an ordained minister in the Church of the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness. That'll be in California.

kisses and silver In 'With God on Our Side', on the Times They Are a-Changin' album of 1964, Dylan sings: 'I've been thinkin' about this / That Jesus Christ / Was betrayed by a kiss.' In 'No Time to Think', on 1978's Street Legal, he sings of being 'Betrayed by a kiss on a cool night of bliss'. On 'What Was It You Wanted', on Oh Mercy, 1989, he sings: 'What was it you wanted / When you were kissin' my cheek?'.

The biblical texts behind these references to the betrayal of Christ by his disciple Judas Escariot include Matthew 17: 22: 'And while they abode in Galilee, Jesus said unto them, The Son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men'; Matthew 26: 20–21: 'Now when the even was come, he sat down with the twelve. And as they did eat, he said, Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me'; and Matthew 26: 45–49: 'Then cometh he to his disciples, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. Rise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me. And while he yet spake, lo, Judas, one of the twelve, came, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and elders of the people. Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he: hold him fast. And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, master; and kissed him.' There are equivalent passages in Mark 14:18 and 14:41–45, Luke 22:14 & 21–22 and 22:47–48, John 13:1–2 & 21 and (without mention of the betrayal being 'by a kiss') John 18:3–9.

An earlier line in 'No Time to Think'—'One secret for pieces of change'—resonates with the same theme, and so does the more specific 'thirty pieces of silver' in Dylan's 1986 song 'Maybe Someday', on Knocked Out Loaded. The biblical text here is Matthew 26:14–16: '. . . Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief priests, And said unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? And they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. And from that time he sought opportunity to betray him.' Equivalent texts, without specifying the amount of money, are in Mark 14:10–11 and Luke 22:3–6.

These 'thirty pieces of silver' are paid many centuries on from the 'twenty pieces of silver' for which Joseph was sold into Egypt by his brothers (Genesis 37:28), which suggests a remarkably low level of inflation. (More remarkably, the lords of the Philistines each paid Delilah 'eleven hundred pieces of silver' to betray Samson: to 'Entice him, and see wherein his great strength lieth, and by what means we may prevail against him' (Judges 16:5).

Knocked Out Loaded* [1986] An album title suggesting that its contents were thrown together when Dylan was drunk bodes ill by its very defensiveness. Nevertheless after the overblown robotic coldness of Empire Burlesque this third-rate assemblage of studio scrapings, taken from various sessions 1984–86, has a warmth and human frailty that at least lets you in. Tired R&B ('You Wanna Ramble') and rockism ('Got My Mind Made Up'); immaculately sung but shifty pop ('Under Your Spell'); a cover of KRIS KRISTOFFERSON's wretched 'They Killed Him'; and Dylan's fine 'Maybe Someday' so badly produced that it is incomprehensible and could be sung by one of the Chipmunks. There's a tender rendition, well-produced and refreshingly arranged, of the gospel standard 'Precious Memories', a robust cut of the good minor Dylan song 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore' (with mad drumming), and, hidden among the dross, 'Brownsville Girl', co-written with SAM SHEPARD: a wonderful and innovative major work, intelligent and subtle, from a Bob Dylan out from behind his 1980s wall of self-contempt and wholly in command of his incomparable vocal resources.

[Recorded NY, Jul 1984, LA, Dec 1984, London, 19–22 Nov 1985, LA, Jan–Feb 1985, Topanga, CA, Apr–May 1986 and Van Nuys, CA, May 1986; released as Columbia OC 40439 (LP), 14 Jul or 8 Aug 1986.]

Knopfler, Mark [1949 -] Mark Knopfler was born in Glasgow, Scotland, on August 12, 1949 but from age seven lived in Newcastle-upon-Tyne in north-east England, learnt guitar and at 16 appeared on local TV in a harmony duo with a Sue Hercombe. After a year studying journalism in Harlow, Essex, and a junior reporter's job on the Yorkshire Evening Post, he took a BA in English Literature at Leeds University. It was an odd, and endearing, route to superstardom, which Knopfler duly achieved as the leader of what became, in the early 1980s, the world's most successful, though far from its most interesting, band. Knopfler had got there via the Duolian String Pickers, a record made in somebody's home studio in Pudsey, West Yorkshire ('Summer's Coming My Way'), a move to London after graduation in 1973, to join the unpleasantly named group Brewer's Droop, whose drummer PICK WITHERS would join him again in Dire Straits, and a lecturer's job for two years at Loughton College, Essex, where he stayed for two years, supplementing his income by giving guitar lessons at a local school.

On another planet some light-years away, Bob Dylan first heard Mark Knopfler when assistant and engineer Arthur Rosato played him the Dire Straits single, 'Sultans of Swing'. Of course he liked it: it was a clear homage to himself, though only a krafty cheese slice boiled down from the St. Agur of Blonde on Blonde, the album Knopfler somewhere remembers as having listened to over 'a million cups of coffee' back in the 1960s. Decades later, Dylan would throw back a mischievous imitation at Knopfler, on the bridge section of 'Most of the Time', on the 1989 album Oh Mercy (the section where Dylan sings 'Most of the time / She ain't even in my mind, / I wouldn't know her if I saw her / She's that far behind'), on which not the lyric but the melodic line, sound and vocal delivery all seem to echo trademark 'Sultans of Swing' era Straitsery.

On March 29, 1979, Dylan caught the last of Dire Straits' Roxy shows in LA, approached Knopfler afterwards and asked him to play on the sessions for his new album. Later, Knopfler was disconcerted to find, as he said to his manager, that 'all these songs are about God.' The album was Slow Train Coming. They 'prepped it' in California, with co-producer JERRY WEXLER, and with Knopfler. 'Bob and I ran down a lot of those songs beforehand', Knopfler said, 'and they might be in a very different form when he's just hittin' the piano, and maybe I'd make suggestions about the tempo or whatever. Or I'd say, "What about a twelve-string?"'

On April 30, 1979, they started recording at Muscle Shoals, in Sheffield, Alabama, with Dylan and Knopfler, his Dire Straits drummer Pick Withers, co-producer BARRY BECKETT on piano and organ, and bass player TIM DRUMMOND. The whole album was completed by the end of May 4, apart from some overdubs added from then until May 11. It was released that August 18. Knopler's one incontestably decent contribution was his guitar solo on 'Precious Angel', on which Dylan goads him, provokes him into playing with real bite.

Dylan and Knopfler got together again, with various other musicians, playing on what has become referred to as 'the Knopfler Hotel Room session' at the Sunset Marquis hotel in LA in fall 1980, when Dire Straits were back at the Roxy soon after the release of their album Making Movies. Present were Dylan, Knopfler, Tim Drummond, two members of BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN's E Street Band, Dire Straits manager Ed Bicknell, two unidentified young women and music journalist Mike Oldfield. (The occasion is described in Oldfield's 1984 biography Dire Straits.) Bicknell, no Dylan enthusiast, described an early version of 'Caribbean Wind' heard on this occasion as 'one of the most beautiful songs I ever heard'. It was a solo guitar-and-vocals performance by Dylan, and proved the only sustained performance of anything in the course of the usual jamming process of trying 12 bars of this, switching to something else, finding you don't know it and trying another doomed fragment of something else again. Other songs tried included BUDDY HOLLY items like 'That'll Be the Day'. Unfortunately, Bicknell believes, no-one there taped any of this material.

Knopfler had no involvement in the rest of Dylan's gospel period work, but re-surfaced with him in 1983 to co-produce and play on the Infidels album, the sessions for which were, even by the usual standards, logged unreliably, resulting in much dispute among the Dylan discographers trying to catalogue all these things later—but essentially the sessions began on April 11, 1983 and ran through (though not daily) till May 5, and were followed by some overdubbing of Dylan vocals June to July. Dylan took the tapes away and had them remixed in Knopfler's absence, and the resulting finished album was, when Knopfler heard it, shockingly less than it might have been, in his opinion—and certainly it was a remix that tends towards the lumpen and lacklustre. On the released version of 'License to Kill', for example, the riff in between the chorus lines is played only on the bass; on the unreleased mix in circulation just ahead of the album's issue, the same riff is carried by a light, almost whimsical guitar, which lends it extra colour and, paradoxically, strength, and a welcome counter-pointing optimism to the doomy prognostications of the lyric. Even 'Sweetheart Like You' sounds less stodgy and laboured on the early-circulated outtake than on the version Dylan chose for release. On 'Jokerman', it is noticeable that the outtake version, while offering lyrics Dylan was right to revise, offers a vocal performance and a music track more alive and lithe and open, and with a fuller exploration of melodic line.

The more unfortunate Infidels misjudgements, though, exactly as in the case of Shot of Love before it, concerned which songs were included on, and which excluded from, the album rather than as between Knopfler and Dylan mixes. For Knopfler can be heard too on all those terrific rejected recordings like 'Julius and Ethel', 'Someone's Got a Hold of My Heart', 'Lord Protect My Child', 'Foot of Pride', 'Tell Me' and, most especially, 'Blind Willie McTell' (of which there remains, unreleased but circulated, a more interesting take than that eventually released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, a take on which again Knopfler proves able to rise to an exceptional occasion). He can also be heard, therefore, on the far from terrific Infidels outtake 'Death Is Not the End', released out of desperation to help Dylan fill up Down in the Groove in 1988.

Next, nearly two years later, came a couple of sessions just as Dylan was finishing off Empire Burlesque, when on February 24 and March 4, 1985, Knopfler and his keyboards player ALAN CLARK played on unknown, uncirculated material along with Ted Perlman on guitar and SLY & ROBBIE as rhythm section. The following year, Mark and Bob bumped into each other again, this time in Australia in February 1986, and for the first time Knopfler came on stage during a Dylan concert, playing guitar behind him on the encore songs 'Blowin' in the Wind', 'Uranium Rock' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' alongside TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS. Nine nights later, in Melbourne on February 19, Dylan reciprocated at a Dire Straits concert in Melbourne, singing 'All Along the Watchtower', 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat', 'License to Kill' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' backed by the whole group. And so far, that occasion, now 20 years ago, is the last time, at least professionally, that Dylan and Knopfler met.

Back in the spring of 1984, when aficionados learnt more or less simultaneously of Dylan's exciting live appearance on US TV with the splendidly punky outfit THE PLUGZ and of the fact that his new album, Infidels, had been made with such major assistance from the ploddingly unpunky Dire Strait, Mark Knopfler, a widespread reaction was to feel 'Oh kno, knot Knopfler!'—but it worked out OK in the end.

All the same, he was a significant absentee from the '30th Anniversary Concert Celebration' and (albeit like many a significant figure) he goes unmentioned in Dylan's memoir Chronicles Volume One.

[Knopler background from www.mark-knopfler-news.co.uk/biogs/mark.html, quotes from www.answers.com/topic/slow-train-coming, seen online 12 May 2005. Ed Bicknell, conversations with this writer c.Apr 1981 & 31 Aug 1995.]

Koella, Freddy [1958 -] Frederic Koella was born on October 16, 1958 in Mulhouse, France, where he grew up. He first started listening to Bob Dylan when in his 20s. He was a crucial guitarist on three albums by the Cajun singer-songwriter Zachary Richard—Snake Bite Love (1992), Cap Enragé (1996) and Couer Fidèle (1999), the first of these recorded in New Orleans and the others in Paris. In 1996 he had two tracks ('Back to New Orleans' and 'A Man's Gotta Do') on the Various Artists album Everybody Slides, Vol. 2.

Playing both guitar and violin, he has also toured with Doctor John and Willy DeVille, in whose band he played from 1990 to 2002; he has played on numerous albums (including DeVille's 1996 album Loup Garou) and produced the Richard Gilly album Le Nouveau Monde (2000), the eponymously titled Kenny Edwards (2002) and Miracle Mule by the Subdudes (2004). Koella also plays featured guitar on Bjorn Schaller's 'Mandarin' on the soundtrack of Eric Byler's 2002 movie Charlotte Sometimes. In 2005 he rejoined Willy DeVille but also produced his own début album, the instrumental Minimal, which, surprisingly, is all acoustic guitar. But more important than any of that, he was, from 2003–4, a member of Bob Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band.

And how. Freddy (as he prefers to spell it) was Dylan's best-ever lead electric guitarist (and just might be the best electric guitarist altogether since the heyday of Hubert Sumlin). ROBBIE ROBERTSON was near sublime—the next best, a very close second—but Freddy was better. And in THE BAND all the other musicians were crucial too, whereas in Dylan's band Freddy had to carry the whole front line.

Of course you could say MIKE BLOOMFIELD was right up there, but he was, though a virtuoso, essentially more limited (Dylan had to tell him, for 'Like a Rolling Stone', to play 'none of that B.B.

King shit'); and G.E. SMITH was terrific, but safe. You never wondered excitedly what he might do next. Whereas Freddy played by living on the edge, like Bob, fusing Django Reinhart and CARL PERKINS and playing as if it were 1957 now. He was the electric lead guitarist Dylan himself would have been, had Dylan ever bothered to master the instrument.

Tragically, Koella's stint with the Never-Ending Tour Band was all too brief. In February 2003, the band was rehearsing in Los Angeles and looking for a guitarist to replace CHARLIE SEXTON. Koella says he 'was lucky enough to get invited to one of the rehearsals, and that's how it started.' He first played with them in Dallas, Texas, on April 18, 2003–it was the opening night of the first US leg of that year's touring—and his last performance was just under a year later, on April 14, 2004 in Atlanta, Georgia. He played a total of 121 Dylan concerts and—like bass player KENNY AARONSON before him—was forced out through illness. He has recovered fully now.

If you can, listen to 'Watching the River Flow' and 'Memphis Blues Again' from the concert in Graz, Austria, on October 26, 2003. There is Freddy Koella's genius.

[Freddy Koella: Minimal, nia, Minimal, US, 2005. Zachary Richard: Snake Bite Love, New Orleans, 1992, A&M 75021 5387 2, 1992; Cap Enragé, Paris, 1995, Initial ADCD 10093, 1996; Couer Fidèle, Paris, 1999, nia, 1999. Willy DeVille: Loup Garou, Discovery 77040, US (East-West 24562, Germany), 1996. Various Artists: Everybody Slides, Vol. 2, Rykodisc, 1996.]

Koerner, Spider John [1938 -] John Koerner was born on August 31, 1938 in Rochester, New York, where he grew up (as it happens, the town the great SON HOUSE was living in when 'rediscovered'). Koerner gained a glider pilot's license at age 15, joined the marines (briefly) and enrolled as an engineering student at the University of Minnesota in 1956. By the time Bob Dylan met him in Dinkytown, he was living in Minneapolis with a young wife, in an apartment stocked with folk music records.

Dylan writes about Koerner the musician in some detail in Chronicles Volume One, and says of the person that he 'was tall and thin with a look of perpetual amusement on his face. We hit it off right away.'

Dylan says he was 'The first guy I met in Minneapolis like me', that they met in the 10 O'Clock Scholar coffee-house, that Koerner was an acoustic guitarist and an exciting singer, that they already knew a few of the same songs and that they sat around together learning more. It was Koerner who first played him the NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS, and many other key records, including a compilation called Foc'sle Songs and Shanties (Dylan slightly mistitles this as Foc'sle Songs and Sea Shanties), and another, an Elektra sampler album, which he says first introduced him to the voices of DAVE VAN RONK and Peggy Seeger, and included ALAN LOMAX (one of those folklorists who always fancied himself a bit of a performer) singing 'Doney Gal'—which, as Dylan mentions, he added to his repertoire. (It's one of the songs on the tape made at Karen Wallace's apartment in St. Paul in May 1960.) And in the interview given to CAMERON CROWE for Biograph in 1985, Dylan specified other songs he'd learned from Koerner: 'He knew more songs than I did. "Whoa Boys Can't Ya Line 'M", "John Hardy", "Golden Vanity", I learned all those from him. We sounded great; not unlike the Delmore Brothers.'

Koerner and Dylan hung around together, going off to see performers who were passing through town and to seek out rumoured rare records. And while each continued to perform by himself, the two of them began to perform together as well—'playing and singing a lot together as a duo', as Dylan reports. They played 'at house parties, in the coffee-houses, street singing', and after Dylan plunged into his WOODY GUTHRIE phase, Dylan and Koerner would play Guthrie together too. Sometimes Dave Glover (aka TONY GLOVER) would play harmonica with them too.

At some point after Dylan left for New York City, Koerner started playing 'professionally' with Tony Glover and DAVE RAY. Koerner, Ray and Glover—that was the name of their outfit—made many albums, starting with Blues, Rags & Hollers, issued first on the small Audiophile label in June 1963 but picked up by Elektra, who signed them, bought the rights, reissued the LP that November (with four tracks missing) and then several further albums.

John Koerner was also one of the artists on the 1964 compilation album The Blues Project, on which Bob Dylan appeared on Side 2, Track 4 of the original LP, billed as Bob Landy, playing a piano duet with ERIC VON SCHMIDT behind GEOFF MULDAUR on the latter's song 'Downtown Blues'. Koerner was featured artist on the previous track, performing BIG BILL BROONZY's 'Southbound Train', and on Side 1 of the album he performs 'My Little Woman'. Soon after this compilation LP was issued, Koerner Ray & Glover were fellow performers at the 1964 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL.

Koerner continued to record after the group split up, and made albums in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, while continuing to perform and write from his Minneapolis base. One of the albums he made in the mid-1960s, with Glover as his harmonica player, received a memorably savage review from Albert McCarthy, the stalwart critic of Jazz Monthly: 'Each country has its own way of finding room for the talentless, in Britain the traditional escape-route for many years being the church or the army. It appears that the outlet in the US . . . is for them to become folk singers. . . . This is, without any doubt, one of the worst records I have had to review for many a long day . . .

a passably competent guitarist, a poor harmonica player and a quite dreadful singer. . . . the butchery of inoffensive blues verses is spread out remarkably evenly throughout . . . this grotesque blues kitsch.'

Koerner ventured into filmmaking in the 1970s, and developed his hobby of building and rebuilding telescopes. He reunited with Ray and Glover in 1996 for One Foot in the Groove, the trio's first recording together in 30 years. Dylan gave it this sound-bite: 'Exactly like you'd think it would be, stunning. Koerner, Ray and Glover haven't lost a step. Every time they play the lights shine.'

In 1998 Koerner had, and fully recovered from, triple by-pass heart surgery. By 2005 he was back playing a long string of summer dates, from June's Minnesota Folk Festival onwards.

[John Koerner: 'My Little Woman' & 'Southbound Train', nia, 1964, The Blues Project, Elektra EKL 264, NY, Jun 1964; Spider Blues, nia, Elektra EKL-290 (mono) / EKS-7290, NY, 1965. Koerner Ray & Glover: Blues Rags and Hollers, Audiophile AP-78, 1963; One Foot in the Groove, Tim/Kerr T/K 96CD137, US, 1996. Albert McCarthy, Jazz Monthly, UK, Jul 1965. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.237–239, 241.]

Köhler, Robert [1953 -] Robert Köhler was born in Vienna, Austria, on July 28, 1953. After leaving school and spending nine months in the army, Köhler started working as an accountant, first for the Phonodisc division of PolyGram and later for General Motors. He dropped out of this to start up his own small computer company in the mid-1990s. He first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1967, and first saw him live in 1981. In 1984 he attended a small Bob Dylan Festival in Michelstetten, a village north of Vienna. The Michelstetten events finished in 1991, and Köhler and two others (Karl Ossberger and Michael Lohse) determined to organise a bigger and better alternative. This became the annual AUSTRIAN BOB DYLAN CONVENTION. As the years went by, Köhler's cohorts dropped out and he took sole responsibility for organising this popular event.

Konikoff, Sandy [1943 -] Sanford Konikoff was born in Buffalo, New York, in 1943, grew up there and in the early 1960s played in local beat groups including the clean-cut, besuited Stan & the Ravens. He was temporarily imported into Canada in RONNIE HAWKINS' Rolls-Royce to play drums while LEVON HELM was otherwise engaged, and there was a period when he'd be playing two sets in a club in Buffalo and then rushing up north to play two more in Canada on the same night. 'I always felt I subbed for Levon,' Konikoff says: 'There was no way I could match him.' The connection eventually secured him a place with the rest of THE HAWKS on the January 21, 1966 Dylan session, cutting that tremendous early Blonde on Blonde outtake 'She's Your Lover Now' (which emerged officially 25 years later on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3).

Then ROBBIE ROBERTSON asked him to do the live 1966 tour with Dylan. 'Ronnie Hawkins said I had to give him two weeks' notice or he'd break my legs,' says Konikoff, 'but Robbie told me he wouldn't really do anything.' So, starting on February 4 in Louisville, Kentucky, and running through till March 26 in Vancouver, Canada, Sandy Konikoff was the drummer out there every night being shouted at and booed on the North American leg of the 1966 world tour.

He says he wasn't much aware of the booing, but he felt swamped by the whole experience. 'I was like the baby of the group. I was in a top 40 band in Michigan and I heard "Subterranean Homesick Blues" on the radio and it just stopped me in my tracks—and a year later I was playing with them! And I was just struggling from the pressure and the mystique and the frustration of it all. I arrived in my mohair suit, you know, pretending I knew what "acid" meant, and so on. Bob was a really great guy but he never hung out with us much, and I lacked the courage to ask questions. And the sets were so short: things were going so fast.' So when the tour moved on to Hawaii, Australia and Europe in April to July, Konikoff stayed behind, replaced by the louder, more volatile MICKEY JONES. 'I'll regret it to my grave that I prematurely left,' says Sandy now.

He stayed in California, though, and plunged into the golden years of semi-communal life among great musicians, bankrolled by record companies hitting undreamt of peaks of power and affluence. In 1967 he was in a group produced by THE BYRDS' Terry Melcher, the Gentle Soul: they got nowhere but they were living high (in every way) in a house on Sunset Boulevard right by the Chateau Marmont.

Konikoff, who was small and slight and at this point looked not unlike the young PAUL SIMON, soon found his feet in a hip milieu, becoming gregarious, eccentric and covering early hints of baldness with a trademark series of groovy hand-sewn skullcaps from the 'Benin of Africa' shop. He started to play on sessions, too, including for DAVID BLUE. He played on a number of tracks on the first Taj Mahal album, and after Levon Helm introduced him to LEON RUSSELL he played with Joe Cocker on his Mad Dogs & Englishmen tour (who didn't?). In New York he played in Grinderswitch with the talented laid-back-soul singer-songwriter Garland Jeffreys, and on other sessions fixed for VAN MORRISON's Astral Weeks producer (Konikoff had played some gigs in the Village with Morrison earlier). At some point he also played on a recording of a SPIDER JOHN KOERNER song in an odd time-signature, 'Magazine Lady', with Ry Cooder on bass and Van Dyke Parks on piano, and on the John Cale album Village Violence.

Konikoff was described cryptically by Elektra producer Jac Holzman as 'Sal Mineo as Gene

Krupa' and as 'Purveyor of the Sphincterphone' (which sounds alarming, but let's not investigate). He was among the musicians at Bruce Botnick's house, along with Duane Allman, Gram Parsons, JIM KELTNER, Carl Radle, Buddy Miles, Uncle Joe Cocker and all, at the sessions for Bonnie & Delaney's Motel Shot album in 1971. (There weren't any drums: only a suitcase for all those drummers to fight over. Konikoff played tambourine, using a technique, he says, taught him by the great Sandra Crouch.)

Around the mid-1970s he moved back to Buffalo, touring with the great harmonica player King Biscuit Boy and others. By 2000 he was to be found in the 'Americana roots music' group LeeRon Zydeco and the Hot Tamales, and he is about to work with the Rockin' Rebels. He's swapped the skull-caps for berets and baseball caps now.

Sandy Konikoff is close to being the forgotten man in the Bob Dylan 1966 story. He shouldn't be.

[Jac Holzman quoted from the online blurb at www.followthemusic.com/whobook.html, seen online 23 Nov 2005, for Jac Holzman & Gavan Daws, Follow the Music: The Life and High Times of Elektra Records in the Great Years of American Pop Culture, US: First Media, 1998. Quotes & main source Sandy Konikoff, phone interview with this writer 7 Feb 2006.]

Kooper, Al [1944 -] The ubiquitous Al Kooper was born Alan Peter Kuperschmidt in Brooklyn, New York, on February 5, 1944; his family moved to Queens, NY, when he was four. At age 14 he was a guitarist with pop group the Royal Teens soon after they'd had a top 10 hit with 'Short Shorts' in 1958. A session guitarist by the age of 19, he dropped out of college to train as a studio engineer and then teamed up with songwriters Irwin Levine and Bob Brass, with whom in 1964 he wrote the Gary Lewis & the Playboys hit 'This Diamond Ring' and Gene Pitney's minor hit 'I Must Be Seeing Things', which became the title track of a Pitney album (and EP) and in French, as 'Mes yeux sont fous', a single by Johnny Hallyday.

After a brief first Manhattan stay on W. 77th Street, Kooper moved into Greenwich Village and involved himself in a wide range of musical activity. At the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL he performed with RICHARD & MIMI FARIÑA (plus BRUCE LANGHORNE) and the same year joined the group the Blues Project with DANNY KALB, Steve Katz, Tommy Flanders, Andy Kulberg and Ray Blumenfeld. Kooper, invited to join the group after playing first as a session-man for them, stayed with the group for its first three albums (two of which were live) and for a performance at the Monterey Pop Festival of 1967, but then quit, moved to the West Coast and formed Blood, Sweat & Tears, largely in order to create a rock band with a horn section. After one interesting album, The Child Is Father to the Man, Kooper left and the group became highly successful plying jazz-rock of the nastiest possible kind.

Kooper then recorded his solo album I Stand Alone and the album Supersession with MIKE BLOOMFIELD and Stephen Stills (both 1968), followed by live work with Bloomfield and the albums The Live Adventures of Al Kooper and Mike Bloomfield and the solo You Never Know Who Your Friends Are (both 1969). In the early 1970s he made several more extravagantly funded solo albums, among them the gate-fold sleeve LP Naked Songs (1972) in which what was naked was Kooper's lack of having anything to say and lack of a voice to say it with. Nonetheless, sheer chutzpah gets him through songs like SAM COOKE's 'Touch the Hem of His Garment' where any comparison of Kooper's voice to Cooke's would be ludicrous. In 1976 came Act Like Nothing's Wrong, co-produced (like Child Is Father to the Man) by THE BAND's producer John Simon, on which Kooper revives 'This Diamond Ring' with a mix of ironic superiority and obvious fondness.

In 1977 he published the first edition of his book Backstage Passes and the following year produced RICKY NELSON's still-unreleased album Back to Vienna. He was a veteran producer by this point, having enjoyed a late-1960s stint as a Columbia Records A&R man, during which he had signed the long-uncommercial British cult band the Zombies, who promptly delivered the significant album Odessey & Oracle and a major hit single, 'Time of the Season'. In 1972, as his time with Columbia ended and he set up, courtesy of MCA, his own Sounds of the South studio in Atlanta, Georgia, he discovered the admirable Florida band Lynyrd Skynyrd (they were playing local bars) and duly produced their first three albums—including, on their début album, their great anthemic 'Free Bird'. He sang back-up vocals and played on this album too (bass and mellotron), and, as on piano on the Tom Rush album Take a Little Walk with Me, he is billed here as Roosevelt Gook. Yes, the ubiquitous Al Kooper, not Bob Dylan, was Roosevelt Gook.

Lynyrd Skynyrd was a long way from the sound of the Zombies, and another demonstration of Kooper's eclectic musical tastes and openness. He went on to produce albums by NILS LOFGREN, the Tubes, Joe Ely and B.B. King. He also wrote the music for the 1969 Jim McBride documentary film My Girlfriend's Wedding, the 1970 Hal Ashby film The Landlord, various TV series and, after a long gap, the Peter Riegert short By Courier (2000) and the same director's movie King of the Corner (2004).

As a session musician Al Kooper has played on records by a vast swathe of big-name artists, including Cream, JIMI HENDRIX (on 'Long Hot Summer Nights') the Who ('Rael'), the ROLLING STONES ('You Can't Always Get What You Want') and GEORGE HARRISON's Somewhere in England album. But his most significant contribution, by quite some way, has been to the work of Bob Dylan. Al Kooper is the hero who on June 16, 1965 in New York City inveigled his way into playing the organ part on 'Like a Rolling Stone', and was lucky enough to have Bob Dylan say 'turn it up!' and thus to help make history. He has told the story of how this happened many times, never more weirdly than as a hologram on the CD Rom Highway 61 Interactive and never more endearingly than as a cool and genial interviewee in the film No Direction Home, released 40 years after the making of that record. He also provides a detailed memoir of the sessions for Highway 61 Revisited and Blonde on Blonde inside the booklet issued with its audio partner, the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack Album (2005).

Al Kooper helped to make history at Newport 1965 too, not because he played with the Fariñas but because he played 'Maggie's Farm', 'Like a Rolling Stone' and 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' with Bob Dylan on that tumultuous, historic electric début—since when his involvement with Dylan's work has been plentiful. He attended and played organ on the later Highway 61 Revisited sessions (July 30 and August 2, 1965 in New York) and then saw action at the first electric concerts Dylan gave—at Forest Hills, New York, that August 28 and the Hollywood Bowl on September 3rd. After that, Dylan's band became the Hawks and Kooper returned to New York.

That November 30, he was back in the studios for the first of the sessions that yielded Blonde on Blonde, and was there again on January 25–26 and 27–28, 1966. When Dylan finished the album in Nashville, in mid-February (between tour dates) and March (between tour dates again), only Al Kooper and ROBBIE ROBERTSON were still with Dylan from the New York sessions (apart from producer BOB JOHNSTON, who was Nashville-based in any case), and Kooper is interesting on the cultural gulf between this long-haired East Coast triumvirate and the country musicians and downtown Nashville. The last session took place in the early hours of March 10th.

Next time Kooper came to a Dylan session, it was in back in New York and in the very different musical universe of the Self Portrait recordings. He and DAVID BROMBERG and others laid down basic tracks for 'Little Sadie', 'In Search of Little Sadie', 'Belle Isle', 'Copper Kettle', 'It Hurts Me Too', 'The Boxer' and 'Woogie Boogie' on March 3, 1970, though all but 'It Hurts Me Too' were overdubbed later without Kooper (and indeed without Dylan). The following days Kooper played again, contributing, altogether, organ, piano and guitar, though again there was much subsequent overdubbing on most tracks. He was also there at the June sessions (on organ) which yielded some of the tracks on the Dylan album and, more importantly, most of New Morning. Indeed Kooper claims to have produced New Morning, though Bob Johnston disagrees. (Al was also present on June 30, again in New York, playing guitar and organ when Dylan attempted at least 15 takes of 'Blowin' in the Wind' with a small group of musicians: takes which have never circulated.)

A long gap in the Kooper-Dylan professional relationship followed. Al next turned up with Bob in 1981, when he replaced WILLIE SMITH as the keyboards player on the third leg of that year's semi-gospel, semi-secular tour, starting on October 16 in Milwaukee and ending on November 21 in Lakeland, Florida: a total of 27 concerts. At one of them—at East Rutherford, New Jersey, that October 27—he had the unusual experience of hearing Bob Dylan introduce his parents, Mr. & Mrs. Kooper Senior (Sam and Natalie), to the audience from the stage of the Meadowlands Arena. The private recording of this surreal moment later circulated among Al's friends on a custom-made LP. According to the description provided by someone selling a copy of this album on eBay decades later, for several years in the late 1970s and early 80s 'Kooper put out an annual Christmas album filled with novelty and strange music and dialogue for his friends only. . . . the third, features a track with Bob Dylan in concert introducing Al's parents . . . from the stage. Here's what the notes say: "In 1981, I toured for three months with BD and my parents came to see us play in New Jersey. I mentioned to Bob that my folks were there before we went onstage, and this is what happened. Thanks Bob." Bob introduces them, goofs around telling the audience they are the parents of a friend, but he's not gonna tell the audience who. Then after a bit, he says "OK, I'll tell you". And introduces Al. No music, but a rare bit of Bob humour. . . . With a great cover and Al's funny liner notes. Very very rare.' This LP did indeed exist: it was titled The Third Annual Kapusta Kristmas Album, billed as by Al Kooper & Friends, privately distributed on Partners in Crime NL-109 that December. (The eBay store of the seller, Nethollywood, has since been closed and the result of the item auction is not known.)

A little over four years later, Kooper was back in the New York studios for a couple of the sessions for the Empire Burlesque album, playing rhythm guitar on a rejected (but circulated) cut of 'Something's Burning, Baby' (February 21, 1985) and two days later again played rhythm guitar on a number of attempts at 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky', one of which became the album track. Kooper is credited with playing on this, but so much was overdubbed later that it's not certain his most minor contribution survives.

Quirkier and more interesting are his participations the following year. On April 28, 1986, in Topanga Park, California, along with other musicians and back-up singers, Al Kooper played keyboards on never-circulated attempts at 'You'll Never Walk Alone', 'Without Love' and a song logged as 'The Beautiful Life'; the following day they re-attempted 'You'll Never Walk Alone' and 'Unchain My Heart' (also uncirculated); and the day after that they laid down further never-heard versions of 'You'll Never Walk Alone', 'Unchain My Heart' and 'Lonely Avenue'. On May 1 they tried 'Without Love' and 'Unchain My Heart' again, and on May 2 yet another 'Unchain My Heart'—but they also managed, across these two sessions, to overdub the backing to 'Brownsville Girl' that we hear on Knocked Out Loaded—a backing they dubbed onto the Dylan vocal he had in turn dubbed onto the original 1984 backing track just one day earlier (at the April 30 session). Again, Kooper played keyboards.

Later that month he was among those overdubbing onto a May 5 take of the KRIS KRISTOFFERSON song 'They Killed Him', a take of JUNIOR PARKER's 'You Wanna Ramble' from the same day and a take of the old gospel favourite 'Precious Memories', and to record from scratch Dylan's own song 'Maybe Someday'. All these were duly released on the Knocked Out Loaded album that June—the same month that Kooper surfaced playing organ on 'Like a Rolling Stone' on stage with Dylan at a Cosa Mesa, California, concert by Dylan and TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS. A month later (on July 21, 1986) the audience at Dylan's East Rutherford, New Jersey, concert had the bonus of Kooper on organ for the last five numbers of the night: 'Like a Rolling Stone', 'In the Garden', 'Blowin' in the Wind', 'Union Sundown' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'; on August 3, at Inglewood, California, Kooper repeated the process, this time squeezed on stage with DAVE STEWART and Annie Lennox, and this time with 'Uranium Rock' instead of 'Union Sundown'. Two nights later Stewart and Lennox were out of the way and Kooper played on the last 11 of the set's 26 songs: 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', 'Gotta Serve Somebody', 'Seeing the Real You at Last', 'Across the Borderline', 'I and I', 'Good Rockin' Mama' (with Dylan also joined on this one song by JOHN LEE HOOKER) and then the same five final songs as at the previous concert.

Another hiatus followed, but Al was back in the studios in Hollywood to lay down overdubs on various tracks for Under the Red Sky in 1990. He overdubbed organ on 'Handy Dandy' (originally recorded on January 6) and keyboards on 'Unbelievable' and 'Under the Red Sky' (both originally cut in LA in February or March), on May 3 and 4.

The two men had an odd semi-conjunction at the so-called 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration in New York on October 16, 1992–because Kooper came on and played organ on 'Like a Rolling Stone' and 'Leopard-Skin Pill Box Hat' . . . not behind Dylan but behind John Cougar Mellencamp. But they were bound to come together again under more normal concert circumstances, and in 1996 they did. On Dylan's first revisit to the city of Liverpool in 30 years—the city that he astonished when, with THE HAWKS in May 1966, he played electric rock infinitely more complex and radical than the city had ever heard from its beat groups when it had supposedly been the centre of the music universe just two or three years earlier—Dylan now came back in the middle of his Never-Ending Tour's latest European leg (which had begun on June 15, 1996 at a festival in Denmark), and played two nights in Liverpool, June 26 & 27: and his band was augmented by Al Kooper on keyboards throughout the first concert and on all but two numbers of the second (Al disappeared for 'To Ramona' and 'It Ain't Me Babe'). Two nights later, at the Prince's Trust concert in London's Hyde Park, Al was there again (alongside RON WOOD too, this time) for the short nine-song Dylan set.

So far, apart from the No Direction Home contributions mentioned above, that's been the last instance of a partnership that began with so triumphant a bang over 40 years ago.

In July 2005, Kooper released his first solo album in almost 25 years, the well-received Black Coffee. He had been playing, meanwhile, with the awkwardly named ReKooperation, from whom there was an eponymously titled album in 1994, and with a bunch of Boston academics (Kooper has honorary degrees and taught at Berklee School of Music in the late 1990s) just as uncomfortably named the Funky Faculty. A second, much-expanded edition of his book, now entitled Backstage Passes and Backstabbing Bastards and dealing with the first 54 years of Al's life, was published in 1998. By 2002, unfortunately, it had been remaindered.

Al Kooper lives in Boston these days, and though he's lost most of his eyesight he's lost none of his acumen, and if anything has gained in self-deprecating grace down the years. Usually. 2001 saw the release of a retrospective 2-CD box set, Rare & Well Done, going all the way back to previously unreleased material from 1964 and his first solo single from 1965, the deeply obscure 'New York's My Home.' It further includes an outtake of 'Went to See the Gypsy' from a New Morning overdubbing session on June 30, 1970. Dylan is absent from the track, which Kooper describes in the accompanying notes as 'a conception I had for Dylan to sing over'. This may or may not be a Dylan claim too far.

[Al Kooper: Naked Songs, Columbia KC 31723, US, 1972, CD-reissued Sony SRCS 6201, Japan, nia; Act Like Nothing's Wrong, Liberty US (United Artists UAG 30020, UK, 1976), CD-reissued One Way CD S21-18565, US, nia; Rare and Well Done, Columbia/Legacy AC2K 62153 US, 2001; Black Coffee, Favored Nations FN25202, US, 2005. Al Kooper & Ben Edmonds, Backstage Passes: Rock'n'Roll Life in the Sixties, Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1977; Al Kooper, Backstage Passes and Backstabbing Bastards, New York: Watson-Guptill Publications, 1998. Al Kooper with Dylan, Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers: 'Like a Rolling Stone', Costa Mesa, CA, 17 Jun 1986. The Blues Project: Live at the Café au Go-Go, NY, 1965, US, 1966; Projections, NY, 1966, Elektra US, 1966; Live at Town Hall, NY, May

1967, Elektra US, 1968. Blood, Sweat & Tears: Child Is Father to the Man, Columbia CS 9619, US, 1968.

The Royal Teens: 'Short Shorts', US, 1958. Gary Lewis & the Playboys: 'This Diamond Ring', US, 1964. Gene Pitney: 'I Must Be Seeing Things', US (& on EP Stateside SE1030, UK), 1964. Johnny Hallyday: 'Mes yeux sont fous', France, 1965. Tom Rush: Take a Little Walk with Me, Elektra EKL-308 & EKS-7308, 1966. Lynyrd Skynyrd: Lynyrd Skynyrd (pronounced "leh-'nérd 'skin-'nérd"), Doraville, GA, 1972, MCA MCL 1798, US, 1973.]

Kramer, Daniel [1932 -] Daniel Kramer was born in Brooklyn, New York, in 1932. He is the veteran New York-based photographer who, having trained in his profession by working as an assistant to Allan and Diane Arbus and to Philipe Halsman, was first given exceptional access to Bob Dylan in 1964 and whose images of Bob Dylan the following year have become iconic. You might say that Kramer's pictures define Bob Dylan 1965 as a look: black and white, extremely cool, in dark clothes and Chelsea boots, utterly differentiated from both the earlier folkie and the wild-haired amphetamine-wired full-colour figure of 1966. His photos include Dylan up a tree, in the street with top hat, in the studios, on stage acoustic and electric, with and without JOAN BAEZ, ironing Baez's hair, playing pool, rehearsing for the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, playing chess with Victor Maymudes, posing with SARA DYLAN—and many, many shots where you say 'Oh that one! Is that Kramer too?!': and it is.

When Kramer ventured into colour with Dylan it was to create the front cover of Bringing It All Back Home, one of the all-time great LP covers, taken at ALBERT GROSSMAN's house in Bearsville in January 1965, with his wife Sally Grossman in the red dress. The front cover of Highway 61 Revisited is Kramer's too (and that's his Nikon SP being dangled by BOB NEUWIRTH, whose legs are behind Dylan's in the shot). Kramer's work has also been used on Biograph and generously within the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, respectively 20 and 40 years on from when the work was done.

Kramer's Bob Dylan, published in 1967, was the first major book of photographs of the artist, and had a well-written, thoughtful text to match. As PAUL WILLIAMS notes, 'Kramer was given the unique opportunity to photograph Bob Dylan in private and in performance . . . August 1964 to August 1965, as Dylan progressed from "It Ain't Me Babe" and being a folk hero to "Mr. Tambourine Man" and "Like a Rolling Stone" . . .' Pictures and words were recurrently revealing but never prurient or obtrusive. Kramer was respectful but clear-sighted.

Kramer's wife Arline Cunningham was active in the 1960s music business, worked with Harold Leventhal when he presented Dylan's Carnegie Hall concert of October 1963, helped work on Kramer's book Bob Dylan and was at the time of its publication Albert Grossman's management office 'executive assistant'. In association with Ms. Cunningham, Daniel Kramer is still at work, and has his own studio.

[Daniel Kramer: Bob Dylan, New York: Citadel, 1967; Pocket Books edn., 1968; large-format republication as Bob Dylan: A Portrait of the Artist's Early Years, with short new introduction by Kramer, New York: Citadel Underground/Carol Publishing, 1991. Paul Williams quoted from back cover, 1991 edn. Information in part via e-mails to this writer from Kramer & Cunningham, 8 & 9 Feb 2006.]

Kristofferson, Kris [1936 -] Kristoffer Kristofferson was born in Brownsville, Texas, on June 22, 1936, went to high school in San Mateo, California, went on to Pomona College (where FRANK ZAPPA used to sneak into composition classes) and then won a Rhodes Scholarship to Merton College, Oxford (UK), where he obtained a master's in English Literature in 1960. He also tried to be one of Larry Parnes' pop stars. Parnes was a British svengali-manager figure who groomed UK pop idols of the late 1950s to early 60s, including Britain's first rock'n'roller, Tommy Steele, Billy Fury, Marty Wilde, Georgie Fame and Duffy Power. Clearly there was a pattern to these surnames, and Kristofferson's pseudonym was Kris Carson, which didn't fit and didn't work. Returning to the States he joined both the US Army and, stationed (like ELVIS) in Germany, a group. From here he began songwriting, mailed songs back to a Nashville contact, and moved there himself in 1965. He was the janitor in the CBS Nashville studios when Dylan was there recording some of Blonde on Blonde in 1966.

Kristofferson was able to give up this day-job as country stars began having hits with his songs, beginning with Dave Dudley's cut of his pro-war 'Viet Nam Blues' in 1966, getting JOHNNY CASH's attention by landing a helicopter on his lawn (he'd been a pilot when in the Army) and then signing as a recording artist himself in 1967. In the latter capacity he was unsuccessful and for most of his career has remained so, though with the occasional blip of good fortune (especially, decades later, when teamed with WILLIE NELSON, Johnny Cash and Waylon Jennings in the WILBURYish country super-group the Highwaymen—not to be confused with the folkie-style vocal harmony group of the 1950s–60s).

However, as a songwriter, Kristofferson was not only successful but influential, as songs like 'Me and Bobby McGee', 'Sunday Morning Coming Down' and 'Help Me Make It Through the Night' let a whisper of hip looseness into the rigid factory of Nashville song production. In 1970, uniquely, he won the year's two most prestigious country music association awards, each with a different song, making him the talk of the town he was now sweeping with a different sort of broom. In 1971 Janis Joplin had a posthumous no.1 hit with 'Me and Bobby McGee', Kristofferson had his first taste of success with his own second album, The Silver Tongued Devil and I, and he launched another lucrative career with his film-acting début in the Dennis Hopper-directed The Last Movie. Various permutations of these three careers have continued ever since, and his films have included Cisco Pike, Blume in Love, Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia, Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore, A Star Is Born (with Barbra Streisand) and the financial mega-disaster Heaven's Gate.

As for connections with Bob Dylan, their first was through film. Kristofferson played convincingly and with charm the rôle of Billy the Kid, opposite James Coburn, in PECKINPAH's Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid, in which Dylan took the minor but beguiling part of Alias, and in which RITA COOLIDGE, then Kristofferson's real-life wife, provided the pallid love interest. Dylan reportedly got the part through Kristofferson's manager, Bert Block, an old associate of ALBERT GROSSMAN (they had co-managed Janis Joplin) who had once been Billie Holiday's manager too.

A decade later, in that desperate mid-1980s patch of his, Dylan was so keen to avoid writing songs that he even included one of Kristofferson's, the abjectly sanctimonious 'They Killed Him', on his 1986 album Knocked Out Loaded: a track recorded at Topanga Park, California, on May 5, 1986, and on which there's a terrific bass guitar part (by Vito San Filippo), some lovely singing and a children's vocal chorus. In 1991 Monument Records issued a 2-CD set, Kris Kristofferson: Singer/Songwriter, with Kristofferson performing his own songs on one CD and other people's records of mostly the same songs on the other. The final track on each was 'They Killed Him', by its composer and by Dylan.

After that, they were reunited for the so-called 30th Anniversary Celebration Concert at Madison Square Garden on October 16, 1992, at which they didn't play together but Kristofferson not only performed—singing 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight' helped by Willie Nelson on guitar and vocals—but also acted as the evening's MC, introducing other acts and mopping up Sinead O'Connor after the crowd booed her arrival on stage.

In June of 1999 Kristofferson underwent heart bypass surgery, since when he has continued, looking more grizzled than anyone but KEITH RICHARDS, to make indifferent movies. He once said, with nice self-deprecation: 'I think between us, Bill Clinton and I have settled any lingering myths about the brilliance of Rhodes scholars.'

[Kris Kristofferson: Kris Kristofferson: Singer/Songwriter, Monument A2K-48621, US, 1991. Quote at movie database http://us.imdb.com/name/nm0001434/bio, online, 6 Dec 2005.]

Krogsgaard, Michael [1953 -] Michael Rindom Krogsgaard was born in Copenhagen, Denmark, on July 18, 1953. He became interested in Dylan's work in 1965, and started collecting tapes and information after meeting JOHN BAULDIE in 1969 or 1970. He contributed to The Telegraph fanzine 'a little, over the years'. Since The Telegraph folded, he has contributed similarly to THE BRIDGE fanzine, and from 1996 to 1999 he wrote a number of pieces on Dylan's live recordings for the fanzine Look Back. His first book, Twenty Years of Recording: The Bob Dylan Reference Book, was self-published in February 1981, though as by the grandly named Scandinavian Institute for Rock Research, and had a print run of 2,000. Its aim was to rectify the fact that all previous discographies of Dylan's work had 'lacked the strict systematic organization that would make them a valuable instrument for collectors.' It aimed to list all the material in circulation among collectors but with the safeguard of including 'nothing we haven't listened to ourselves'. This included tapes of concert performances. It also included official releases, but 'limited to American releases, plus non-American releases containing different or never available material'.

It was a huge and pioneering undertaking and came six years before the similar hard labour of GLEN DUNDAS' first edition of Tangled Up in Tapes. As Michael Krogsgaard recognised from the start, such work is almost immediately out of date, and needs updating. This happens not only because Dylan continues to work and his record company continues to release material, but also because more and more information comes to light unofficially, which contradicts previous 'facts' and adds to the unreleased material in circulation. Some of Dylan's sessions remain far less well-documented than others, and some leak outtakes far less readily than most. Michael Krogsgaard therefore published updated editions of his work as Master of the Tracks in 1988 and as Positively Bob Dylan: A Thirty-Year Discography, Concert & Record Session Guide 1960–1991, in 1991. This last finally gained Krogsgaard a 'proper publisher', and in the USA.

Such was the scrupulous quality of his work and the obvious conscientiousness he brought to the daunting task he had set himself that in 1995 Bob Dylan's office finally granted him access to the files of Dylan's recording sessions—'to all the structured information in connection with the recordings. A great experience!', as he puts it.

He is now working, therefore, on an electronic discography, and on another updated printed version ('more or less in the form of an encyclopedia in several volumes'), and on a more limited but very thorough discographical book, Bob Dylan's Columbia Studio Recordings, which should see publication by the end of 2006.

In his other life Michael Krogsgaard is an orthopaedic surgeon at Copenhagen University Hospital

Bispebjerg and Assistant Professor in orthopaedic surgery at the University of Copenhagen. He has specialized in arthroscopic surgery and sports traumatology, and on bone loss caused by treatment with corticosteroid drugs. In his spare time he takes a special interest in the silversmith Georg Jensen, is chairman of the Georg Jensen Society and in 2004 co-authored the book The Unknown Georg Jensen.

[Michael Krogsgaard: Twenty Years of Recording: The Bob Dylan Reference Book, Copenhagen: SIRR, 1981; Master of the Tracks: The Bob Dylan Reference Book of Recording, ditto, 1988; Positively Bob Dylan: A Thirty-Year Discography, Concert & Record Session Guide 1960–1991, Ann Arbor, MI: Popular Culture Ink, 1991. Michael Krogsgaard & Liv Carøe: The Unknown Georg Jensen, Copenhagen: The Georg Jensen Society, 2004.]

Kunkel, Russ [1948 -] Russell Kunkel was born in Pittsburgh in 1948 but from age 11–12 grew up in Long Beach, California, drummed in various local groups before forming the Things to Come, which became a house band at the Whiskey-A-Go-Go for five months, opening for Cream, Traffic, THE BYRDS and others, and in Kunkel's case also playing on song-publishing demos. Apple Records head Peter Asher (previously in the notoriously wet Brit duo Peter & Gordon) offered Kunkel a gig on James Taylor's début album.

From there, often partnered by bass player Lee Sklar, Kunkel became one of the pre-eminent players in rock session work in the 1970s and 80s. (With guitarist Danny Kortchmar and keyboardist Craig Doerge, Kunkel and Sklar became known as 'the Section' and made three albums as such, in 1972 and 1977.) Kunkel has drummed and/or produced for everyone from Jackson Browne to Barbra Streisand and from TRACY CHAPMAN and JONI MITCHELL to B.B. King, Lyle Lovett, NEIL YOUNG and WARREN ZEVON. Carly Simon once claimed that he was 'every singer's favorite drummer' and that she'd heard he was LEVON HELM's favourite drummer too.

His association with Dylan came early in Kunkel's career. He was brought in to play the all-night session with GEORGE HARRISON and Dylan (plus CHARLIE DANIELS and producer BOB JOHNSTON) on May 1, 1970 in New York: a session at which Bob and George ran through previews of several of the songs about to be recorded for New Morning, including the version of 'If Not for You' issued 21 years later on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, plus much-circulated unreleased minor gems like 'Working on a Guru', lovely Dylan 'country voice' treatments of 'Song to Woody' and 'I Don't Believe You' and much else. This led to further Dylan sessions for Kunkel a month later, which yielded four Dylan sides, 'The Ballad of Ira Hayes' and 'Sara Jane' (June 1) and 'Mr. Bojangles' and 'Mary Ann' (June 2) plus the group version of 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue' issued on Masterpieces. These proved mere warm-ups for New Morning proper, and Kunkel played on the whole album. He played with Dylan one more time, on a Burbank session for the Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid soundtrack in February 1973, this time playing tambourine and bongos.

[Carly Simon quoted on www.drummerworld.com/drummers/Russ_Kunkel.html, seen online 6 Feb 2006.]

Kweskin, Jim [1940 -] James Kweskin was born on July 18, 1940 in New England and attended Boston University, where he was inspired by local folk group the Hoppers, centred upon John 'Fritz' Richmond. After Fritz was drafted Kweskin began to perform himself, cultivating a lightly humourous stage presence and a large moustache. Looking much like Dennis Weaver, in fact, he linked up with GEOFF MULDAUR and in 1963, together with harmonica and banjo player Mel Lyman and a returned Fritz Richmond, he formed the Kweskin Jug Band. A mix of energetic playing, pre-war repertoire and comedy made them an immediately popular live act and earned a Vanguard Records contract. Augmented by Maria D'Amato (who swiftly became MARIA MULDAUR), the Kweskin Jug Band remained Cambridge-based.

Mel Lyman left the group in 1964 and was replaced by ex-Bill Monroe Blue Grass Boy Bill Keith—but Lyman still played on 'solo' Kweskin albums like 1966's Relax Your Mind and his malign influence over Kweskin was ever more ascendant. Soon after the band signed to Reprise and made various national TV appearances, Jim Kweskin disbanded it and moved into Lyman's monomaniacal religious commune 'family' in Boston's scuzzy Fort Hill, where he remained for some years. In 1971 came the album Jim Kweskin's America co-starring Mel Lyman & the Lyman Family, which had been recorded in San Francisco with Lyman on harp and vocals, Kweskin on guitar and vocals and Jim's wife Marilyn Kweskin on further vocals. The tracks were familiar old songs like the MEMPHIS JUG BAND's 'Stealin'', Stephen Foster's 'Old Black Joe' plus 'The Old Rugged Cross' and 'Dark as a Dungeon', but the sleevenotes included a long, myopic declaration by Kweskin about the soul of America, ending with this: 'I am singing America to you and it is Mel Lyman. He is the new soul of the world.'

Lyman eventually disappeared, in still-mysterious circumstances, and Kweskin re-emerged, making further records, forming the 1980s group the U & I Band and remaining in Boston. He was among those who turned up and played at the celebration reunion held in 2000 in the old Club 47 premises soon after ERIC VON SCHMIDT had been given an ASCAP Lifetime Achievement Award for Folk Music.

Dylan first met Jim Kweskin when both appeared at the Indian Neck Folk Festival in Bransford, Connecticut, in May 1961. That September, at Gerde's Folk City, Dylan and Kweskin were performing together when someone taped the two sharing vocals on JESSE FULLER's 'San Francisco Bay Blues' and WOODY GUTHRIE's 'The Great Divide'; and at some point that fall, according to CLINTON HEYLIN, Kweskin and Dylan shared a Gaslight residency. Peter Stampel of the Holy Modal Rounders, interviewed on Bob Fass' radio show on WBAI in New York in about 1970, recalled seeing Kweskin and Dylan together at the Gaslight back then:

> 'He's very easy to play with, Dylan is, and, uh, we did a couple of things. He did a lot of things with Jim Kweskin. . . . somebody must have tapes of him and Kweskin singing together, man. They were doing . . . folk-hippie 1961 tunes like "Long Black Veil" and "San Francisco Bay Blues" when hardly anybody was doing it, and they did like the best of that I've ever heard. . . . I play kazoo. Wow, it was just mind blowing. Dylan would flatpick and Jim would fingerpick, and they'd play like in . . . they'd use capos so that they would both play in different configurations so they wouldn't get on each other. They were so gas . . .'

Gas or not, Dylan and Kweskin don't seem to have played music together again since 1961. Nor has any tape of the two of them ever surfaced, except for those two songs from Gerde's.

[Jim Kweskin & Bob Dylan: 'San Francisco Bay Blues' & 'The Great Divide', Gerde's, NY, Sep 1961. Jim Kweskin: Relax Your Mind, nia, Vanguard VRS-9188/VSD-79188, NY, 1966, CD-reissued Universe CDKWESKRELA, US, 2003; Jump For Joy, nia, Vanguard VRS-9243/VSD-79243, NY, 1967; Whatever Happened to those Good Old Days . . . , nia, Vanguard VSD-779278, NY, 1968; Jim Kweskin's America co-starring Mel Lyman & the Lyman Family, SF, nia, Reprise RS6464, US, 1971. Jim Kweskin Jug Band: Unblushing Brassiness, Vanguard VRS 9139/VSD-2158, NY, 1963; Jug Band Music, Vanguard VRS-9163/VSD-79163, NY, 1965; See Reverse Side for Title, Vanguard VRS-9234/VSD-79234, NY, 1966; Garden of Joy, Reprise R-6266/RS-6266, US, 1967. Stampfel interview as transcribed by Harvey Bojarsky, seen online 2 Oct 2005 at 'Bob Dylan Roots', at www.bobdylanroots.com/stampfel.html#kweskin.]

LaFarge, Pete [1931 - 1965] Oliver Albee LaFarge was born on April 30, 1931, in New York City but, unlike the hero of his most famous song, 'The Ballad of Ira Hayes', he was not, as often stated, of Pima Indian descent. He was part French and part Narragansett Indian, the son of heiress Wanden Mathews LaFarge and Indian activist and author Oliver LaFarge, who won a Pulitzer Prize in 1930 for the novel Laughing Boy, a pioneering positive scrutiny of the Navajo achieved through its portrayal of an Indian youth caught between traditional tribal life and the forces of modern society. MOSES ASCH's sleevenotes to Pete LaFarge's 1963 Folkways album As Long as the Grass Shall Grow claimed that the singer came 'from Fountain Colorado, where he was raised as a cowboy on the Kane Ranch. His second home is in Santa Fe, New Mexico, where his father resides. . . . Peter left school when he was sixteen, to sing and rodeo. . . . [He] was adopted . . . by the Tewa Tribe of the Hopi nation. . . . In 1946 Josh White came through Pete's country, and stopped off to work with him. Much work with Josh, BIG BILL BROONZY and a close friendship with CISCO HOUSTON followed . . .'

L

Some of this can now be amended and augmented. Pete LaFarge moved to Fountain when he was five years old, after his parents divorced. His mother then married rancher Andy Kane in 1940 and he was raised on their ranch. It was here that he started to call himself Pete. His father Oliver duly moved to Santa Fe, and Pete spent time at both parents' homes, though his relationship with his father was apparently strained. Pete was adopted by the Tewa as a gesture of thanks for his father's contribution to native studies and culture in Santa Fe; he never lived on the reservation there. And though he did go off singing and rodeoing after leaving school at 16, he also joined the US Navy at 19, at the start of the Korean War.

For much of his three wartime Navy years he was aboard the aircraft carrier Boxer, which duly sustained a major hit, which, though not wounding him physically, caused LaFarge recurrent psychological torment. After his discharge he studied acting for two years in Chicago and married a young fellow actor, Susan Becker, in 1958. In the late 1950s, after working with touring companies, LaFarge got a part on Broadway and moved back to New York, and, with parts hard to come by, also returned to singing.

A decade older than Bob Dylan, and with his young wife locked away in a mental hospital, LaFarge was already installed on the Greenwich Village scene when Dylan arrived from Minnesota. Mother figure Sidsel Gleason told ANTHONY SCADUTO, Dylan's first real biographer, that when she got worried about Dylan's pot-smoking, she 'asked Peter LaFarge to keep an eye on him, and he did. . . . Pete would walk into a party where Bob was and stand with his arms crossed, not saying a word, just watching.' Eventually Dylan phoned her, saying 'Mom, please get that Indian off my back.' But LaFarge was the last person to play the responsible adult, and in time he and Bob arrived at an equitable relationship. In Chronicles Volume One Dylan recalls that this 'folksinger friend' gave him 'a couple of Colt single-shot repeater pistols . . .'

'The Ballad of Ira Hayes' was the first track on his first album, Ira Hayes and Other Ballads, produced by JOHN HAMMOND and released on Columbia in 1962. After this Columbia dropped him, allegedly because of his drunkenness, and he went to Folkways, releasing Iron Mountain and Other Songs in 1962, As Long as the Grass Shall Grow in 1963, Sings of the Cowboys and Sings Women's Blues in 1964. Lastly in his lifetime case On the Warpath, 1965, which also had 'Ira Hayes' as its opening track and included too the song 'Move Over, Grab a Holt', which namechecks both Dylan and BAEZ: 'With Bobby and Joanie singin' so bright / Who needs a compass with all that light?'

JOHNNY CASH recorded not only 'Ira Hayes' (in 1964) but almost a whole album's worth of LaFarge pro-Indian protest songs (Bitter Tears: Ballads of the American Indian, 1964) including 'Custer', from LaFarge's second LP, which labelled this hero a racist killer, prompting a black-listing of Cash by country radio stations.

LaFarge's father died in early August 1963, and was buried in the Santa Fe National Cemetery. Another son, John Pendaries LaFarge, a child from Oliver's second marriage, still lives in the Santa Fe house their father owned.

LaFarge brought the topic of Native American suffering and oppression into the folk revival world, encouraging those like Buffy Sainte-Marie to sing out and campaign in the years after LaFarge's death. He is the subject of the forthcoming book The Ballad of Peter LaFarge: Native America's Protest Pioneer by Nashville-based writer Sandra Hale Schulman, and of her short documentary film The Ballad of Peter LaFarge. At the time of this writing, Ms. Schulman was also most of the way through putting together a tribute CD, originally planned to include Dylan's 1970 studio recording of 'The Ballad of Ira Hayes' but now possibly to include a newly recorded track by Dylan made specially for this project.

Meanwhile Clint Eastwood is reportedly directing Flags of Our Fathers for fall 2006 release: a film following the story of Ira Hayes and the two other soldiers who also raised the flag at Iwo Jima in 1945 and survived but were then used as pawns in the game of the American government to sell war bonds.

For Dylan, though, 'The Ballad of Ira Hayes' was not a political diatribe but, as usual, a human story and to see brief archive footage in SCORSESE's No Direction Home (2005) of a disturbed LaFarge singing the song as if with wacky throwaway self-consciousness is to recognise how warmly and with what magisterial grace Dylan's 1970 recording restores the song.

In the interview in the Biograph box set of 1985, Dylan said this about his old friend: 'Actually, Peter is one of the unsung heroes of the day. His style was just a little bit too erratic. But it wasn't his fault, he was always hurting and having to overcome it. . . . We were pretty tight for a while. We had the same girlfriend. When I think of a guitar poet or protest singer, I always think of Peter, but he was a love song writer too.'

The shared girlfriend was almost certainly 'Avril the dancer', as JOHN BAULDIE calls her in a brief biographical sketch in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook (1987): 'New York girlfriend: dancer & actress who saw Dylan perform at a Gerde's Folk City Monday night Hootenanny, perhaps as early as mid-February 1961. Dylan lived with Avril on East 4th St. for the last weeks of his first stay in NYC, March–April of that year.' Pete LaFarge wrote a song called 'Avril Blues', released on Iron Mountain and Other Songs, which is laden with references to dancing.

LaFarge and ex-Playboy bunny and singer Inger Neilsen had a daughter, Karen, in August 1965; they were both incapable of looking after her, and when she was two weeks old, Pete's mother took her away. Two months later, on October 27, 1965 (not 1964, as sometimes given), Pete LaForge died of a drugs overdose.

It's impossible to know whether he meant to kill himself. He had long been in bad shape: rodeo riding had given him broken bones and a broken nose, he'd almost lost a leg and wore a leg brace; he'd been diagnosed as schizophrenic, though he was more likely a manic depressive; he was on various unsuitable prescribed medicines, including, thanks to a US navy experiment, cobra venom (to paralyse and thereby calm his nerves . . .), on top of which he was a heavy drinker and recreational drug user. There's also no doubt that he regarded his career as a complete failure and knew that his personal life was in tragic chaos.

It's bandied about on the internet that 'officially' he'd been stated to have died from a stroke, but in fact his death certificate gives under 'cause of death' only 'pending further study'. He was 34 years old. His daughter Karen Wanden was assaulted and sustained severe head injuries in Colorado Springs in summer 2005.

[Pete LaFarge: Ira Hayes and Other Ballads, Columbia CL 1795, US, 1962; Iron Mountain and Other Songs, Folkways FN 2531, 1962; As Long as the Grass Shall Grow, Folkways FN 2532, 1963; Peter LaFarge Sings of the Cowboys, Folkways FA 2533, 1964; Peter LaFarge Sings Women's Blues, Folkways 2534, 1964 & Verve FVS 9004, nia; On the Warpath, Folkways FN 2535, NY, 1965; CD reissues On The Warpath / As Long as the Grass Shall Grow, Bear Family BCD 15626 AH & Sings of the Cowboys / Iron Mountain and Other Songs, BCD 15627 AH, Vollersode, Germany, 1992. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.116–17. Anthony Scaduto, Bob Dylan, An Intimate Biography, London: Abacus revised edn., 1973, p.64. Sandra Hale Schulman, The Ballad of Peter LaFarge: Native America's Protest Pioneer, forthcoming 2007. Rare Breed: The Songs of Peter LaFarge (tribute album), ESP Disk nia, expected release US, 2006. The Ballad of Peter LaFarge (film), dir. Sandra Hale Schulman; Slink Productions/String Theory Media, US, 2005. Sources: comments by 'Mark' at http://maninblack.net/Mhic/folk.htm, seen online 6 Feb 2006 (though these are very unreliable), the compilation of relevant snippets at www.bobdylanroots.com/laf.html (also very unreliable) and, reliably, information from Sandra Hale Schulman at www.peterlafarge.com & e-mails & phone conversation with this writer 7 Feb 2006; discographical information from Stefan Wirz's LaFarge discography, online 4 April 2006 at www.wirz.de/music/lafarge.htm.]

Landau, Jon [1947 -] Jon Landau was born in Brooklyn, New York, on May 14, 1947. In the late 1960s, some years before he became the record producer of that 'new Dylan' BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, Landau was a rock journalist. He wrote for the American magazine Crawdaddy, and in a review of John Wesley Harding in May 1968 he pinned down something crucial about what Dylan was doing and not doing with this album: and his comments, usefully, still give a sense of how it was when Dylan's dramatic chameleon changes were occurring contemporaneously. He wrote:

> 'John Wesley Harding is a profoundly egotistical album. For an album of this kind to be released amidst Sgt. Pepper, Their Satanic Majesties Request, Strange Days and After Bathing at Baxter's, somebody must have had a lot of confidence in what he was doing. . . . Dylan seems to feel no need to respond to the predominate trends in pop music at all. And he is the only major pop artist about whom this can be said. The Dylan of John Wesley Harding is a truly independent artist who doesn't feel responsible to anyone else, whether they be fans or his contemporaries.'

(The florid albums referred to here were by, respectively, THE BEATLES, THE ROLLING STONES, the Doors and Jefferson Airplane.)

By 1973—which is to say the last year existentially of the 1960s—Landau had become a rock critic of powerful position. As Simon Frith noted, reviewing Landau's book It's Too Late to Stop Now (a collection of reviews and essays previously published in journals): 'Landau has genuine claims to importance. He may not be the best (?) rock critic around but he is the most influential . . . on the tastes and attitudes of the average rock writer. Partly this is a result of his position as record editor of Rolling Stone but mostly it's because he has pioneered the approach to music that other rock critics find most suited to their self-conscious seriousness . . . it was Landau who helped to forge this critical consensus . . .'

[Jon Landau: 'John Wesley Harding', Crawdaddy no.15, May 1968, reprinted in Craig MacGregor, Bob Dylan: A Retrospective, 1972; It's Too Late to Stop Now: A Rock and Roll Journal, San Francisco, Straight Arrow, 1972. The Beatles: Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Heart's Club Band, London, 1967, Parlophone PCS 7027 (PMC 7027 mono), London (Capitol SMAS 2653, LA), 1967; the Rolling Stones: Their Satanic Majesties' Request, Decca TXS 103, London (London NPS 2, NY), 1967; the Doors: Strange Days, Elektra 74014, LA (& London), 1967; and Jefferson Airplane: After Bathing at Baxter's, RCA Victor LSP 4545, NY (RCA SF/RD 7926, London), 1968. Simon Frith on Landau in Let It Rock, London, May 1973, now online at www.rocksbackpages.com.]

Langhorne, Bruce [1938 -] Joseph Bruce Langhorne was born in Tallahassee, Florida, on May 11, 1938. Despite the loss of several fingers in a childhood accident, he became the session guitarist of the folk-rock era, after moving to New York City, getting his Greenwich Village start playing behind BROTHER JOHN SELLERS at Gerde's Folk City and so being asked to play with others on the contemporary folk scene. After Dylan's album Bringing It All Back Home, on which Langhorne was prominent, he was called upon to help almost everybody else 'go electric' too, though he continued to support acoustic sessions in his unique way.

Richie Unterberger explains his style and special import concisely:

> 'Langhorne developed a distinctive economic style that acted as the response half of a call-and-response with singer/songwriters' vocals, often using rapid triplets. . . . When folk-rock came in, Langhorne used an acoustic guitar with a pickup, running it through a Fender Twin Reverb amp that he borrowed from guitarist (and fellow multi-instrumentalist) Sandy Bull. Influenced by Roebuck Staples of THE STAPLE SINGERS, he would set up a tremolo effect in time with the song. The result was a sound, both acoustic and electric in color, well-suited to the period in which rock and folk music were combining.'

Thus from the mid-1960s onwards Bruce Langhorne recorded with JOAN BAEZ, RICHARD & MIMI FARIÑA, GORDON LIGHTFOOT, Buffy Sainte-Marie, Tom Rush, Hugh Masekela and others, arranged the 1967 Richie Havens LP Mixed Bag, produced RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT's 1968 album Young Brigham and played live with JUDY COLLINS and many more besides.

Bruce Langhorne's first studio encounter with Dylan's repertoire came in July 1962, when he was brought in to play on the album The Chad Mitchell Trio in Action!, on which the group included an early cover of 'Blowin' in the Wind'. (The LP was later re-titled Blowin' in the Wind—see entry on the song for detail.) But Langhorne first played on a session with Bob Dylan himself in September 1961, before Dylan even had a record deal; both played on CAROLYN HESTER's third album: Langhorne on guitar and Dylan on harmonica.

A year later, on October 26 and November 1 and 14, 1962, Langhorne played behind the still-unsuccessful Dylan on sessions for The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan. These particular sessions were the first on which Dylan was sometimes backed by an assemblage of other musicians—a drummer, pianist, bass guitarist and another guitarist besides Langhorne—and they yielded 'Corrina Corrina' (the album version and the single version), the always-underrated 'Mixed-Up Confusion' (one take on the B-side of the single, another issued later on Masterpieces and, 'speed-corrected', on Biograph) plus the album version of 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right' and the lovely outtake of 'Kingsport Town' eventually issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991. (The liner notes for this track say 'second guitarist unknown'.)

Dylan and Langhorne next met up professionally at the beginning of 1965. The first session day for Bringing It All Back Home, January 13, seems to have been by Dylan alone, but the following afternoon and evening, Langhorne played on various takes of 'Love Minus Zero / No Limit', 'Subterranean Homesick Blues', 'Outlaw Blues', 'She Belongs to Me' and 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream', including, in each case, the take that made it onto the album, plus takes of 'On the Road Again' and 'I'll Keep It With Mine' that didn't. This last was issued on the Biograph box set 20 years later.

Next day, January 15, Langhorne played on 'Maggie's Farm' (which seems to have been achieved in one take, and the first take of the day at that), 'On the Road Again', 'It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)', 'Gates of Eden', 'Mr. Tambourine Man' and 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue', plus the take of 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now' issued as a single in some territories and the take of the same song issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3.

Langhorne was especially thrilled with 'Maggie's Farm' because by default he ended up playing lead guitar instead of just an accompanying rôle:

> 'There was a stellar crop of musicians in the studio that day . . . but somehow no one stepped up > to fill the lead rôle. I sort of filled in the gaps, waiting for someone to take over. The result was a guitar lead part that never got in the way of anything or stepped forward to say "Look at Me!". In retrospect, I feel that it was just what the song needed. Since then, I have always hoped to find myself in a similar circumstance, with a strong, inspired vocal part like Dylan's to follow and a room full of great musicians playing only what the music dictates.'

In addition to which, not only did Bruce Langhorne play on 'Mr. Tambourine Man', but perhaps he was Mr. Tambourine Man. As Dylan says on the Biograph interview: 'Bruce was playing guitar with me on a bunch of the early records. On one session TOM WILSON [the producer] had asked him to play tambourine. And he had this gigantic tambourine. . . . It was as big as a wagon-wheel. He was playing, and this vision of him playing this tambourine just stuck in my mind. . . . I don't know if I've ever told him that.'

This is problematical as an explanation, since the song certainly wasn't written at these sessions but almost a year earlier (Dylan performed it at his Royal Festival Hall concert in London on May 17, 1964), and while Tom Wilson had been Dylan's producer since 1963, Langhorne had not been on any of the 1963–64 sessions. On the other hand, Langhorne's tambourine was enormous, and looked most unusual, like something ancient and tribal imported from the Horn of Africa; he had bought it from IZZY YOUNG's Folklore Center.

In any case, the Bringing It All Back Home sessions also included the outtakes of 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' and 'She Belongs to Me' that saw release 40 years later on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, the booklet for which refers to 'She Belongs to Me' as notable for 'the beautifully liquid guitar of Bruce Langhorn' (slightly reducing the compliment by misspelling his name).

A month after the sessions, Langhorne accompanied Dylan for a rare TV performance, on 'The Les Crane Show' on WABC-TV in New York, on 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' and 'It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)'. This was in February 1965. Dylan moved on to using 'harder' musicians, and though he played tambourine on 'Like a Rolling Stone' Langhorne wasn't used again as a guitarist until his 'beautifully liquid guitar' was called upon for Dylan's still-underrated soundtrack to Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid, recorded and released in 1973, on which he plays with his customary, admirable mix of feeling and restraint on 'Main Title Theme', 'Cantina Theme', 'Billy 1' and 'River Theme', and with the necessary gusto on 'Turkey Chase'.

Langhorne had himself composed and recorded a 'western' film soundtrack just a couple of years earlier—for the 'lost' 1971 Peter Fonda film The Hired Hand: a film often described as a 'masterpiece', and finally re-released in a '30th Anniversary edition'. Langhorne's score too has often been singled out as haunting, and this music was at last issued on CD in 2004, to further highly favourable notice (described in Mojo magazine as 'unbearably lovely' and 'ever-so-gently psychedelicised Americana' in which hillbilly musical figures 'morph into modular rags and echoes of gamelan ring hypnotically').

Since the early 1970s Bruce Langhorne has pursued his career quietly, part-owning a recording studio, working as a film composer again on the Jonathan Demme film Melvin and Howard (1980) and a number of others, writing music for a couple of TV ads and taking an active part recently in the loosely structured band the Venice Beach Marching Society, 'a mobile tribute to New Orleans' with the motto 'We march for fun and other good causes'. He is about to release a new CD of previously unreleased 'very danceable' compositions of his own on which he plays all instruments and handles all vocals, though in fact while continuing to play fiddle and other things (including, naturally, tambourine) he has now stopped playing guitar.

His website divides between profiling his musical activities and Brother Bru-Bru's African Hot Sauce, to the efficacy of which his own indecently youthful appearance is a tribute. Praising hot sauce online, or praising Bob Dylan in the film No Direction Home, Bruce Langhorne may have greying hair but looks by far the younger man. He will be 70 in two years' time.

[Bruce Langhorne: The Hired Hand Score, Blast First Petite, US, 2004. With Bob Dylan: 'Corrina Corrina', NY, 26 Oct c/w 'Mixed-Up Confusion', NY, 14 Nov 1962, Columbia 4-42656, US, 1962; 'The Les Crane Show', WABC-TV, NY, 17 Feb 1965. 'Ramblin' Jack Elliott, Young Brigham, Reprise RS-6284, US, 1968. The Hired Hand, dir. Peter Fonda, Pando/Tartan/Universal, US, 1971. Sources include e-mails to this writer from Bruce Langhorne (incl. 'Maggie's Farm' quote), 27 Sep 2005; Richie Unterberger quote & hot sauce online 21 Sep 2005 at www.brobrubru.com.]

Lanois, Daniel [1951 -] Daniel Lanois is a French Canadian, born in Hull, Québec, on September 19, 1951. Though he is a musician—he plays guitar and dobro, sings and writes songs—and since 1989 has released half a dozen albums of his own (three of them, oddly, in 1996), he is primarily valued as a highly distinctive record producer, though the very ease with which his style can be recognised is a mixed blessing for the artists around whom he wraps his plangent ambience (like, it sometimes seems, a spider's silk around a fly).

He started his career as a producer by setting up his own studio and engineering records for local groups in Hamilton, just 30 miles southwest of Toronto (and 30 miles west of Niagara Falls and New York State). His first relative success was with Canada's new wave synth-pop group Martha and the Muffins. Their 1979 album Metro Music gave the band its one big international hit single, the toweringly vacuous 'Echo Beach', but in 1981, various personnel changes included the arrival of Daniel's bass-playing sister Jocelyne Lanois; thus he produced their albums This Is the Ice Age (1981) and Danseparc (1982), and, after their name change to M + M, the 1984 album Mystery Walk.

By then, however, Lanois had been 'discovered' by Brian Eno, and after they'd worked together (including on Eno's 1982 album Ambient 4/On Land and the following year's Apollo: Atmospheres and Soundtracks) Eno and Lanois co-produced U2's 1984 album The Unforgettable Fire, shooting Lanois into the music-biz hot-producer seat in his early 30s. After various further Eno albums, a couple by Peter Gabriel and U2's insanely mega-selling The Joshua Tree (1987), Lanois then produced ROBBIE ROBERTSON's much-delayed début solo album, Robbie Robertson, in 1988. The year after came the Neville Brothers' Yellow Moon and Bob Dylan's Oh Mercy, the latter's one near-great album of the 1980s, released in the nick of time on September 22, 1989, and recorded in New Orleans that March and April.

Dylan describes in Chronicles Volume One how, after BONO's enthusiastic suggestion of Lanois to Dylan, the two men first met in the humid courtyard of the Marie Antoinette Hotel in New Orleans. Lanois, no doubt painfully aware of how tentative and generally below par Dylan's 1980s albums had been by his own earlier standards, said a brave, direct yet supportive thing to Dylan at this first meeting. He said: 'You can make a great record, you know, if you really want to.' That's what more or less every Dylan aficionado would have wanted to say to him.

Dylan's memoir devotes the fourth of its five sections to the making of this album and the period surrounding it, offering an immense amount of detail. Most unexpectedly, it's a highly specific account of the process the artist goes through—the artist in general and this artist in particular—from not knowing 'what kind of record I had in mind', through the struggles and pitfalls of songwriting, testing out sounds, trying to hang onto fleeting ideas and elusive successes of 'feel', drifting in and out of the resolve to concentrate and care, the push and pull of personalities, including Lanois', the nebulous or not-so nebulous influence of New Orleans itself on the proceedings, the ungraspable things that escape along the way, the compromises that are all too clear but cannot always be subverted or dodged. It's an invaluable, highly absorbing account that takes us all the way through to the completion of what turned out to be Oh Mercy. In the course of its recording, Lanois himself had played electric guitar, 12-string guitar, steel guitar, dobro, harpsichord, omnichord, bass, drums and tom-tom. And he pushed Bob Dylan to be more hands-on himself than he was inclined to be: to play guitars, dobro, piano, harmonium, bass and harmonica.

After Oh Mercy Lanois went back to his work with Peter Gabriel and U2 (he produced Achtung Baby in 1991) and for others, including EMMYLOU HARRIS, whose Wrecking Ball he produced in 1995. And then in 1997, who should call upon Lanois again but the Bob Dylan whose albums of the 1990s so far had been the badly received Under the Red Sky at the beginning of the decade and the two solo acoustic albums of traditional ballads and pre-war blues, 1992's Good as I Been to You and 1993's World Gone Wrong. Dylan had also rejected outright the sessions in Chicago in between these two albums, which had been an attempt to combine the repertoire of these records with a return to the use of other musicians. Since 1993 there had been nothing: just more years of the Never-Ending Tour.

This time it was January instead of the fall. They met up in Miami—another Southern city, another late-in-the-decade attempt at a major album. Lanois played only guitars this time; Dylan played guitars, piano and harmonica. And this time it was almost billed as a co-production: it is 'produced by: Daniel Lanois . . . in association with Jack Frost Productions.' Again, the album was widely hailed as Dylan's best in a long time: for many, it was his best since Oh Mercy, and Lanois was given plenty of the credit.

In retrospect, his contribution had been a mixed blessing. The production, for all Lanois' alchemical skills, sometimes accentuates a sense of cheap fabrication. On 'Love Sick', the opening track, his aural theatricality is unhelpful, for example, when this frail question hobbles into the frame: 'Did I hear someone's distant cry?' The accompaniment here ought to lend a steadying hand, a bit of solid, unobtrusive support, allowing the lyric to pass on quickly. Instead, an immediate musical 'cry'—a dweepling electronic ooh-ooh, ooh-ooh—comes up behind the singer's querulous wobble toward portentousness and kicks away any hope of it not sounding risible. Its less processed prototype may sound fine on steel guitar on Santo & Johnny's 'classic' 1959 instrumental hit 'Sleep Walk' (the supposedly dream-like plangent echo in which this semi-Canadian no.1 hit single was saturated may well be the core inspiration behind the entire Lanois sound) but in its 'Love Sick' context, it's so crass you can hardly believe you're hearing it.

The sound is elsewhere unhelpful too on Time Out of Mind. Some tracks have Dylan so buried in echo that there is no hope of hearing the detailing in his voice that was once so central and diamond-like a part of his genius. 'Dirt Road Blues', which might under normal production circumstances be a heartening, even dexterous little rockabilly number, puts Dylan so far away and so tiny you just despair. It's as if the microphone were an audio telescope and he's using the wrong end of it. The voice on 'Cold Irons Bound' is so badly down in the mix that without clamping headphones to your ears the lyric comes and goes, recurrently offering indecipherable passages, while the contrived voodoo galumph of the music clatters across the foreground like donkeys on a tepid tin roof.

Some of the tracks that aren't so distancing are perversely reductive in a different way, bringing his voice forward with a crude excess of echo, as on 'Million Miles' and ' 'Til I Fell in Love With You', 'recorded in Lanois' proverbial echo-laden cyberbunker', as the novelist David Bowman puts it. A bunker is where you retreat when you're desperate. Was Dylan's voice really so weak, so pitiful a husk of its former self (of any of its former selves) that instead of recording it straightforwardly, up close, alertly, as on the very first albums he ever made, Dylan's implausibly reconstituted voice had to puff forward in a swollen simulated intimacy that robs it of all its truly distinctive power? No. It wasn't.

Despite the ill-judged production of the voice on these musically unattractive tracks, the overall sound of the music on Time Out of Mind, as with Oh Mercy, still offers cohesion. One of its distinctive ingredients is AUGIE MEYERS' Farfisa organ, which David Bowman hears as coming 'from the soundtrack of some 1950s saucers-from-Mars drive-in movie' (he says he means this as a compliment) but which also throws us straight back to the eerie magic of the first Country Joe & the Fish album, the indispensable Electric Music for the Mind and Body, which used exactly the organ sound we confront at once on Time Out of Mind. All these elements are stirred into Daniel Lanois' digital soup, which nourishes everything in an enveloping way: and in doing that it may remind us of nothing so much as the very different music on Blonde on Blonde. As that does, this too sweeps you along all through the album, as if the songs were one; and as that does, it binds together the weaker tracks with the strong.

What of the strongest? 'Standing in the Doorway', 'Trying to Get to Heaven', 'Not Dark Yet' and 'Highlands' are surely great, and Lanois surely helps them to be so. On these four, the vocals are not drenched in echo: not swollen forward artificially as in the Buddy Grecoland of 'Million Miles', nor ill-judged as on 'Dirt Road Blues' (on which the parping organ provides quite the wrong touch, if recreating the Sun Sound was the aim, the result more Joe Meek than Sam Phillips). On the album's Big Four, the voice is beautifully attended to, permitting the listener to attend to it too: in such a way that, whatever has actually been done technically in the studio, it is experienced as if directly, matching absolutely aptly the directness with which Dylan sings.

That was the second and last time Dylan used Lanois: and the argument that while he might have had a place, he certainly wasn't necessary, was made best in 2001, when Dylan produced his own next album, "Love and Theft", and gave himself an impeccable, unobtrusive production just as technically professional as, and less me-me-me than, anything Daniel Lanois can offer.

In 2005 he offered a new solo album of his own, the instrumental Belladonna, on which he returns to the ambient sound-pictures of old, and decides that no vocals shall get in the way, freeing listeners to 'use their imagination and build their own scenario'. If they like that sort of thing.

[Daniel Lanois: Acadie 1989; For the Beauty of Wynona, 1993; Sweet Angel Mine, 1996; Lost in Mississippi, 1996; Sling Blade, 1996; Shine, 2003; Belladonna, 2005.

Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.177. David Bowman, reviewing Time Out of Mind, Salon online magazine, US, 19 Sep 1997 (Bowman's novels include Bunny Modern, 1998.)

Santo & Johnny: 'Sleep Walk', NY, 1959, Canadian-American Records 103, Winnipeg & NY, 1959; CD-reissued The Golden Age of American Rock'n'Roll Volume 5, Ace CDCHD 600, London, 1995. Country Joe & The Fish: Electric Music For The Mind & Body, Berkeley, CA, nia, Vanguard SVRL 19026, NY (Fontana TFL 6081, London), 1967, CD-reissued Vanguard VMD 79244-2, NY, c.1990 (London, c.1994).]

'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' [1963] 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' is an outtake from the sessions for Dylan's third LP, The Times They Are a-Changin' (and recorded in New York City the same day as its title track, October 24, 1963). Two days later Dylan performed it, for the only known time, at his Carnegie Hall concert, which was also recorded by Columbia for a planned but never issued album, Bob Dylan in Concert.

The studio version, long thought to be an outtake from Another Side of Bob Dylan, 1964, remained unreleased not only at the time but for years, though the track could be found on the early bootlegs Seems Like a Freeze-Out, The Villager and A Rare Batch of Little White Wonder Volume 3. It was at last officially released on the Bob Dylan box set Biograph, 1985. The wonderful live recording remains officially unreleased.

'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' is perhaps Dylan's first acid song: his first concentrated attempt, at any rate, to give a hint of the unfiltered world, and a supremely successful creation. STEVEN GOLDBERG refers in an article to Dylan's having 'heard the universal melody'. Nothing could better substantiate the spirit of such a claim than 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune'—one of Dylan's very greatest and most haunting creations.

The tune, in A Major, runs through a simple 14-bar structure which, after its initial chorus statement, is repeated nine times, always with delicate variation. By the device of having one self-renewing tune to serve both chorus and verses, Dylan doubles the sense of unity which covers the whole song, and its images. We find an impression of perfect balance not only between verse and chorus but between the opposites focused by the words: between the night that has gone and the morning announced by its breeze; between the trees and the earth to which their leaves descend; between the ocean and the shore; between the rain that sings and the listening winds.

The melody seems to entwine itself around us, in allegiance to the associations of 'wove', 'strands', 'waves', 'unwound', 'unbound' and 'winding strum' in the lyric. And by its very impingement it urges the felicity of Dylan's analogies between nature's effects and the sounds of musical instruments. As it flows through each line, with a graceful and liquid precision, the melody nurtures and sustains in us an awareness of how involving and creative such analogies are made to be. The tune offers itself as an embodiment of 'the river's mirror'; its water smooth does indeed run like a hymn.

In contrast, the solo guitar accompaniment involves itself less with the verses than with the chorus. Based on the three simple chords of A, D and E, it does offer a strength in its strings. Paradoxically, it achieves this strength through strumming: and this maintains a rhythm that is at once flexible—responsive to Dylan's voice—and insistent—almost marching (as on a pilgrimage)—in its beat. Dylan's voice is as expressive as ever of distilled, unspecified experience and a fine sensibility, totally engaged. Handled by anyone else, it would not be the same song: which also means that the words of the song have a complexity that demands such a voice as Dylan's. Words, music and performance are all central.

Never before or since has Dylan created a pantheistic vision—a vision of the world, that is, in which nature appears not as a manifestation of God but as containing God within its every aspect.

Underlying an exhilaration so intense as to be saddening, there is a profound composure in the face of a world in which all elements of beauty are infused with the light of God. Rejecting, here, the Wordsworthian habit of mixing poetry with explicit philosophising, so that it is explained, in a prose sense, that the divine light shines through everything, Dylan registers the same conviction with true poetic genius, making that dissembled light a felt presence throughout the song.

The words not only work as images but also as symbols: 'Struck by the sounds before the sun / I knew the night had gone.' That night is both real and metaphorical: and so is the morning that follows. Dylan uses the same symbolism in 'When the Ship Comes In', which looks forward to the triumph of righteousness when '. . . the mornin' will be a-breakin''. This in turn relates closely to the chorus of 'I Shall Be Released': 'I see my life come shinin' / From the west unto the east' [where morning breaks] 'Any day now, any day now / I shall be released.'

It is, of course, a conventional metaphor, but its very conventionality prevents it from obtruding as a metaphor. The song would be much less powerful if the symbols were not contained within their corresponding realities—the symbolic within the real night, and so on.

The morning Dylan sings of in 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' is heralded by a breeze: and again, Dylan accommodates the conventional associations of freshness and change. The 'bugle' at once alters the complexion of the line. It places the morning more specifically—because the bugle is not commonly a secular instrument—within a context of salvation.

In the following verse, this religious complexion is supported by the 'organ', with its obvious associations with worship, and later confirmed by the 'trumpet', by 'like a hymn' and 'like a harp'.

The pantheistic idea is also implicit in the rejection of all distinctions. Each part of nature is given equal weight: to no part is any directly qualitative adjective or adjectival phrase ascribed. The nearest Dylan comes to such ascription is with the 'clouds unbound by laws' and the rain that 'asked for no applause'—and these confirm the idea of God as an evenly distributed presence by suggesting a moral gulf between divinity in nature and the reductive inadequacy of man. The perception of this gulf is upheld by the last line of the chorus, which, were the implicit made explicit, would read 'No human voice can hope to hum.' The song also rejects evaluative distinction between the various facets of nature by uniting them all in the central motif of the orchestra: each 'instrument' contributes towards an overall sound; each is concerned with the one divine melody.

This unity is substantiated by a wealth of onomatopoeic words within the song: strum, hum, bugle, drums, crashin', clashed, moaned and smooth. It is further developed, becomes multidimensional, because in response to this enchanted world the singer's senses (and therefore ours also) mix and mingle. An open acceptance of BAUDELAIREan correspondances is involved. There is a huge tracery of this sense-mingling in the song. What constitutes the strength of strings? Their sound? Their physical vibration? Their vertical parallel lines? Their tautness? Their recalling of classical Greece (the lute of Orpheus, the melodious divinity of Pan's music)? The emotion experienced as dawn appears corresponds to the sound of drums: and mingling such as this helps give the verse its haunting pull on the listener—an effect far beyond the simple dynamics of alliteration in that 'breeze like a bugle blew / Against the drums of dawn.'

Part of the sense-mingling achieved by 'the cryin' rain like a trumpet sang' is surrealistic. Fleetingly, we get a visual image of the rain becoming a trumpet. This belies the effect of that 'cryin'' because to transform itself (from silver-grey to gold) into a singing trumpet, the rain must pour out, if not upwards, horizontally, like musical notes on a sheet of manuscript. It is a tribute to Dylan's achievement that we can accept, in passing, this strangeness of effect without finding it a distraction.

Again, the cadence of the melody works perfectly: the notes that carry the words 'rain like a' ascend so that they enact the pressing down of consecutive trumpet stops. Not only that, but the 'a' is held, extended, so that the 'trumpet' emerges on resolving notes; and we accept the image readily because the music that presents it returns us to base. To produce the 'trumpet' image on homecoming notes lends it a certain familiarity. The image remains striking, but not incongruous.

The cadence is equally cooperative in the first line of that same verse, where again it enacts what the words describe: it allows a graceful unwinding of the voice from the cushioning effect of that 'unwound', where the second syllable lingers, in the air, and dissembles into the cascading fall of 'beneath the skies'.

In fact not one phrase in the lyric fails to gain an extra power from the cadence—which shows how delicate and responsive Dylan's variations are within his 'simple' and economical 14-bar melody.

None of these devices, or course, depends for its effectiveness on the kind of identification-parade attempted above. Being poetic devices, they work inwardly and unseen. The song only needs its listener to have an open responsiveness to nuance.

The song is enriched in another small way: it echoes the Elven songs that celebrate Lothlorien in TOLKIEN's Lord of the Rings.

Like Dylan's world in 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' Lothlorien is pastoral. ('Pastoral', of course, is most pointedly applicable to the Dylan song in that conceit which opens the fourth verse. The idea of leaves forsaking the branches—arms—of their first love for the welcoming breast of the earth is a surprising one for Dylan: surprisingly traditional. It seems to have escaped from a poem by, say, Wordsworth, or Thomas Hardy, or even Matthew Arnold.)

Like Dylan's world, too, Lothlorien is a paradise, spiritual because real. Colours and sounds are ennobled and enhanced; and that there is an ethereal quality which caresses everything is no denial of the intense reality. It is an extra quality, endowed by the light—which Dylan manages to suggest in his world also.

That 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' echoes Tolkien is first apparent when Legolas sings 'a song of the maiden Nimrodel, who bore the same name as the stream beside which she lived long ago. . . . In a soft voice hardly to be heard amid the rustle of the leaves above . . . he began: "An Elven-maid there was of old / . . . And fair she was and free; / And in the wind she went as light / As leaf of linden-tree. / Beside the falls of Nimrodel, / By water clear and cool / Her voice as falling silver fell / Into the shining pool." '

You can at once hear Dylan's voice breathing the right kind of delicate life into those lines—and beyond that, it's clear that the whole of the Legolas song fits Dylan's tune. There are (less precise) connections too, between the Dylan song and this: 'I sang of leaves, of leaves of gold, and leaves of gold there grew: / Of wind I sang, a wind there came and in the branches blew. / Beyond the Sun, beyond the Moon, the foam was on the Sea . . .'

(Again, the Dylan tune fits exactly.) That is a part of the song of 'Galadriel, tall and white; a circlet of golden flowers . . . in her hair, and in her hand . . . a harp.' And there we come across a similarity even between Dylan's song and Tolkien's prose. And just as Dylan's vision in 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' corresponds to Frodo's perception of the land of Lorien, both correspond, in turn, to an aspect of what an LSD vision can offer, by transforming an ordinary world into an earthly paradise. Anyone who ever dropped acid will recognize this:

> '. . . Frodo stood awhile still lost in wonder. It seemed to him that he had stepped through a high window that looked on a vanished world. A light was upon it for which his language had no name . . . the shapes seemed at once clear cut, as if they had been first conceived and drawn at the uncovering of his eyes, and ancient as if they had endured for ever. He saw no colour but those he knew, gold and white and blue and green, but they were fresh and poignant, as if he had at that moment first perceived them and made for them names new and wonderful. In winter here no heart could mourn for summer or for spring. No blemish or sickness or deformity could be seen in anything that grew upon the earth. On the land of Lorien there was no stain. He turned and saw that Sam was now standing beside him, looking round with a puzzled expression. . . . "It's sunlight and bright day, right enough," he said. "I thought that Elves were all for moon and stars; but this is more Elvish than anything I ever hear tell of. I feel as if I was inside a song, if you take my meaning." . . . Frodo felt that he was in a timeless land that did not fade or change or fall into forgetfulness . . . he laid his hand upon the tree beside the ladder; never before had he been so suddenly and so keenly aware of the feel and texture of a tree's skin and of the life within it. He felt . . . the delight of the living tree itself. . . . Frodo looked and saw, still at some distance, a hill of many mighty trees, or a city of green towers; which it was he could not tell. Out of it, it seemed to him that the power and light came that held all the land in sway. He longed suddenly to fly like a bird to rest in the green city.'

Frodo, like Dylan, stood unwound beneath the skies and clouds unbound by laws: without confusion, in the discovery of release, attuned to the holy chord.

Yet Dylan's song owes different, less mystical debts too: one for its melody, another for its lyrics. Dylan says in the Biograph box set interview that the melody comes from a (traditional) Scottish ballad: 'I wrote [that] on the West Coast, at JOAN BAEZ's house. She had a place outside Big Sur. I had heard a Scottish ballad on an old 78 record that I was trying to really capture the feeling of, that was haunting me. I couldn't get it out of my head. There were no lyrics or anything, it was just a melody—had bagpipes and a lot of stuff in it. I wanted lyrics that would feel the same way. I don't remember what the original record was, but ['Lay Down Your Weary Tune'] was pretty similar to that—the melody anyway.'

As for the lyrics, it is impossible not to hear Dylan's arresting opening lines when you hear these gospel song lines: 'Lay down thy weary one lay down / Your head upon his breast'—and impossible for the Dylan who wrote the one not to have known the other: for it is (like so many things Dylan used) on the HARRY SMITH anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC—where the lines leap out at you, as presumably they did at Dylan, from the 'lining hymn' at the end of the sermon 'Oh Death, Where Is Thy Sting' by the Rev. J.M. Gates.

In turn these lines come verbatim—except for that odd 'thy'—from the hymn by Havergal and Bonar, 'I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say'. Known throughout the English-speaking world, it is commonly described as 'the English hymn', but its words are by a Scotsman. (The gospel version was recorded by several pre-war outfits, including the Biddleville Quintette and the Norfolk Jubilee Quartette.)

This hymn begins: 'I heard the voice of Jesus say / Come Unto Me and Rest / Lay down thou weary one, lay down / Thy head upon his breast.'

When we look at these four lines together, and then at the four lines of Dylan's chorus, we find much shared vocabulary as well as the close correspondence of Dylan's title line to the third line of the hymn cum gospel song. The Dylan song even alludes to the finding of a different restful breast, as it replaces Christian with pantheist worship.

But long before Dylan's 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune', 'I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say' yielded another spin-off: Memphis blues songster JIM JACKSON's parody 'I Heard the Voice of a Pork Chop'. Jackson's is the (albeit pleasantly) ridiculous spin-off, Dylan's the truly sublime.

[Steven Goldberg: 'Bob Dylan and the Poetry of Salvation', Saturday Review no.53, New York, 30 May 1970; collected in Bob Dylan: A Retrospective, ed. Craig McGregor, 1972 (reissued as Bob Dylan, The Early Years: A Retrospective, 1990). J.R.R. Tolkien, The Lord of the Rings (3 vols.), London: Allen & Unwin, 1954–55.

Rev. J.M. Gates (with three singers): 'Oh Death, Where Is Thy Sting', Camden, NJ, 11 Sep 1926, excerpted on American Folk Music, Folkways FP251-253, NY, 1952; CD-reissued Anthology of American Folk Music (6-CD box set) with copious notes by many hands and a CD-ROM of extras, Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997. 'I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say', words Horatius Bonar (1808–1889), music Frances Ridley Havergal (1836–79), collected in Hymns Ancient & Modern Revised, 1972.

Biddleville Quintette: 'I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say Come Unto Me and Rest', Chicago, Oct 1928 and 'I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say', Long Island City, NY, c.Apr 1929; Norfolk Jubilee Quartette: 'I Heard the Voice of Jesus Say', prob. NY, c.Feb 1929. Jim Jackson: 'I Heard the Voice of a Pork Chop', (2 takes), Memphis, 30 Jan 1928; take 1 on Jim Jackson (EP), RCA Victor RCX 7182, UK, 1966 (an 'early' vinyl release in a series from Victor's vaults devised by British blues baron Mike Vernon), reissued on the 2-CD set Good for What Ails You: Music of the Medicine Shows, 1926–1937, Old Hat OLCD 1005, Raleigh, NC, 2005. This cheerily Dickensian song was covered, some months after the Jim Jackson session, by Blind Bogus Ben Covington: 'I Heard the Voice of a Pork Chop', Chicago, c.Sep 1928.]

Lay, Sam [1935 -] Samuel Lay was born in Birmingham, Alabama, on March 20, 1935 and took up drumming at age 14. He moved to Cleveland, Ohio, and joined his first band in 1956, moved over to the Thunderbirds in 1957, moved to Chicago, played in Little Walter's band in 1959 and the following year joined HOWLIN' WOLF's. At one point he was shot, sustaining a bullet wound that continued to give him problems. He remained with Wolf until 1963, when he and bassist JEROME ARNOLD were lured away by the promise of better pay to become founder members of the PAUL BUTTERFIELD Blues Band. Fond of garish clothes and extraordinary shoes, he wore a towering pompadour above his handsome face, and in the words of Charles Sawyer in a potted online biography of the Butterfield Band, Lay 'played drums with weight-lifter's arms'. When ALBERT GROSSMAN had a physical fight with ALAN LOMAX after Lomax had given the Paul Butterfield Blues Band's own set at the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL some patronising introduction that no-one can quite remember but was along the lines of 'let's see if these white boys can play the blues', Sam Lay pitched in to separate them.

Like Jerome Arnold, he is a member of the group Dylan chose to back him at his début electric gig at the festival that July 25; unlike Arnold, he was also in the studios in New York on the August 2 session for the Highway 61 Revisited album. Many takes of the title track, 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues', 'Queen Jane Approximately' and 'Ballad of a Thin Man' and were attempted that day, including the take of each issued on the album, but what

Sam Lay played on is doubtful; he is uncredited on the album and the official Dylan website listing for the album, and BOBBY GREGG was also in the studio that day and is credited.

Sam Lay was in poor health by this point, despite his robust appearance and his youth (he only turned 30 that year), and had to leave the Paul Butterfield Blues Band before they recorded their second album.

He recovered, however, was the original drummer for the James Cotton Blues Band and in 1969 played on MUDDY WATERS' Fathers and Sons album (along with Butterfield and Bloomfield). Later he formed the Sam Lay Blues Revival Band, and subsequently the Sam Lay Blues Band. He has released albums like Shuffle Master, Sam Lay Live, Stone Blues and Rush Hour Blues, followed by Live on Beale Street in 2000 and I Get Evil in 2003. That year he also appeared as himself in the movie The Howlin' Wolf Story, in which his silent home movies were a highlight, showing Wolf and the great Hubert Sumlin on stage and SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON and Little Walter in the audience.

[Bob Dylan with Sam Lay et al: 'Maggie's Farm', 'Like a Rolling Stone' & 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', Newport, RI, 25 Jul 1965. Charles Sawyer quote from 'Blues With a Feeling: A Biography of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band', 1994, online 2 Jul 2005 at www.people.fas.harvard.edu/~sawyer/bwf.html.]

Leadbelly [1888 - 1949] Huddie Ledbetter was born at Mooringsport, near Shiloh, Louisiana, on January 21, 1888 and learnt to play accordion, piano, harmonica and then guitar. By the age of 15 he was a father of two with a police record after his involvement in a shooting, and was singing in the red-light district of Shreveport. Moving to Dallas, Texas, he met and learnt songs from BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON and moved onto the 12-string guitar, of which he became an almost incomparable master (perhaps only equalled by BLIND WILLIE McTELL) with a distinctively strong rhythmic style.

He spent nearly as much time in prison as busking on the streets, and when the folklorist John A. Lomax and his then-teenage son ALAN LOMAX encountered him in the Louisiana State Penitentiary in Angola in July 1933, he already had two pardons behind him (he had killed a man in Texas in 1917) and was now serving what was supposed to be another 30-year sentence, but after proving an incomparable source of black folksong and 19th century repertoire on the field recordings he made for the Lomaxes for the Library of Congress, they obtained his pardon once again and this time set him to work as their chauffeur and recording assistant. After this, he travelled with them on many field trips but was also presented as a performer to folksong societies and in progressive East Coast establishment society, becoming in the 1940s part of a circle of Left-Wing folk enthusiasts and musicians (as you can tell by the very title 'The Bourgeois Blues') that included WOODY GUTHRIE, SONNY TERRY & BROWNIE McGHEE, Alan Lomax and PETE SEEGER. In Tony Russell's words, 'Leadbelly the performer and the Leadbelly songbook are twin peaks on the map of American music. His enormous repertoire has no parallel in black folksong. He sang everything, ballads and blues-ballads, dance songs and children's rhymes, memories of minstrelsy and freshly made songs about his own rapidly changing circumstances. To his white audiences he seemed a mythic figure, a lone carrier of all-but-lost messages from black worlds of field and prison farm.'

As this implies, little of his repertoire was really the blues, though 'Good Morning Blues' and 'The Bourgeois Blues' are prized items. In the mid-1940s he tried to 'make it' in Hollywood but was unsuccessful and returned to live in New York by 1947, making his one foreign trip in 1949—to Paris—before dying in New York City that December 6, of a form of motor neurone disease termed Lou Gehrig's disease. No sooner was he dead than Pete Seeger's goody-goody group the Weavers had a no.1 hit single with a revoltingly twee version of a song he'd refashioned from a 19th century minstrel number, 'Goodnight Irene'. (The other Weavers were Ronnie Gilbert, Lee Hays and Fred Hellerman; Lee Hays is the one who looked, back then, exactly like the 2005 British Home Secretary, Charles Clarke.)

By the end of the 1950s we were all familiar with Leadbelly songs: the UK's father of skiffle, Lonnie Donegan, signalled his 1956 shift from 'jazz' to 'rock'n'roll' with a hit version of 'Rock Island Line', while between them, skiffle and the folk revival ensured the continued circulation of 'Boll Weevil' (of which Leadbelly's own recording is soaringly the best), 'Midnight Special', 'Pick a Bale O' Cotton', 'Bring Me a Li'l Water Silvy', 'Take a Whiff on Me' (as 'Have a Drink on Me' by Mr. Donegan) and 'Cotton Fields'.

'Midnight Special' was the song on which Dylan had played harmonica behind HARRY BELAFONTE in February 1962, shortly ahead of the release of his own début album; but there is a longer connecting thread between Leadbelly and Dylan's work than that, and beyond the fact of Leadbelly's repertoire having both informed the understanding of, and permeated so thoroughly into, the common currency of the folk revival—such that, for instance, Dylan was performing 'Ain't No More Cane on the Brazos (Go Down Old Hannah)' at the Gaslight Café in October 1962; that when Dylan recorded a version of 'Milk Cow Blues' in 1962, he used part of Kokomo Arnold's lyric, part of ELVIS PRESLEY's, part of ROBERT JOHNSON's 'Milkcow's Calf Blues' and part of Leadbelly's 'Good Morning Blues'; and that he and HAPPY TRAUM were performing 'Keep Your Hands Off Her' in February 1963.

First, it was a set of Leadbelly 78rpm records, given to Dylan as a gift before he left Hibbing, that proved his first revelatory direct initiation into the pre-war black repertoire. He might well have proved the first person Dylan heard who 'talked his way into a song', in ROBERT SHELTON's phrase, as he duly did himself on his first album.

The Leadbelly favourite 'Pig Meat Mama' offers a vivacious demonstration of something we're likely to think still more Dylanesque. That is, given an ostentatious rhyme, he delivers it with a sly knowingness which, far from downplaying it, milks its comic extravagance to the full, by throwing in a pause just long enough to draw attention to itself immediately ahead of the clamorous rhyme. In this song from 1935, Leadbelly gives us '. . . Louisiana / . . . Texacana / . . . a girl named [pause] Silvana!' This is a way of writing and delivering lines that we know well from many Dylan recordings, such as the 'Angelina' rhymes in the 1981 song of that name, the risky comedy of 'subpoena' being the one that pushes this furthest. It's the same glee that tops 'the castle honey' with 'El [pause] Paso honey' in the superb 1966 outtake 'She's Your Lover Now'. (Actually, Silvana might not have struck Leadbelly as an especially attention-grabbing name: he had an adopted sister called Australia.)

Leadbelly's breadth of repertoire is used by Dylan in a quite different way, too. In a speech on stage at the Fox-Warfield Theatre in San Francisco in 1980, Dylan tells the audience this, about Leadbelly switching from prison songs to children's songs—offering it as a parable about his own switch from secular to Christian songs: 'He made lots of records there [in New York]. At first he was just doing prison songs, and stuff like that. . . . He'd been out of prison for some time when he decided to do children's songs. And people said "Oh my! Did Leadbelly change?" . . . But he didn't change. He was the same man.'

[Leadbelly: 'Good Morning Blues', NY, 15 Jun 1940 or summer 1943; 'The Bourgeois Blues', NY, 1 Apr 1939; 'Irene', Angola, LA, 16–20 Jul 1933 & 1 Jul 1934, & Wilton, CT, 20 Jan 1935; 'Rock Island Line', Washington, D.C., 22 Jun 1937, NY, Jan 1942 & (with the Golden Gate Quartet) NY, 15 Jun 1940; 'Boll Weevil', Shreveport, LA, prob. Oct 1934, Wilton, Feb 1935 & NY, 19 Jun 1940; 'The Boll Weevil', NY, 1 Apr 1939; 'Midnight Special', Angola, 1 Jul 1934, Wilton, Feb 1935 & (w Golden Gate Quartet) NY, 15 Jun 1940; 'Pick a Bale a'Cotton', NY, 25 Jan 1935; 'Pick a Bale O' Cotton', Wilton, Mar 1935; 'Pick a Bale of Cotton' (w Golden Gate Quartet), NY, 15 Jun 1940; 'Bring Me a Li'l Water Silvy', Wilton, Mar 1935; 'Bring Me Lil Water Silvy', NY, late 1943; 'Honey Take a Whiff on Me', Angola, 16–20 Jul 1933; 'Take a Whiff on Me', Angola, prob. 1 Jul 1934 & Wilton, 1 Feb 1935; 'Baby Take a Whiff on Me', NY, 25 Jan 1935; 'Go Down, Old Hannah', Wilton, Mar 1935; 'Ain't Goin' Down to the Well No Mo'/'Go Down Old Hannah', NY, 1 Apr 1939; 'Pig Meat Mama', NY, 25 Mar 1935; Negro Folk Songs for Young People, Folkways FC 7533, NY, c.1962; a good general selection of his work is CD-reissued Leadbelly: King of the Twelve-String Guitar, Columbia Roots N' Blues Series 467893 4, NY, 1991.

Dylan on Leadbelly & children's songs, San Francisco, 12 Nov 1980, quoted from 'Bob Dylan's Leadbelly Parable', in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987. Tony Russell, 'Leadbelly', From Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Aurum Press, 1997, p.38. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, p.119.]

Ledbetter, Huddie [1888 - 1949] See Leadbelly.

Lee, Bill [1928 -] William J. E. Lee was born in Atlanta, Georgia, on July 23, 1928, and grew up there. At the city's all-black Morehouse College he attended classes alongside Martin Luther King. He moved to Brooklyn in the late 1950s and though essentially a jazz musician he had become a well-known bass player on the New York folk scene by the beginning of the 1960s, playing behind Bob Gibson at the first NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL in 1959, on ODETTA sessions and many others, and enjoying an especially good working relationship with Columbia producer JOHN HAMMOND. Lee therefore played on the sessions Aretha Franklin recorded for the label before she went to Atlantic and found her own genre; he and guitarist BRUCE LANGHORNE (who often worked together) played on the CAROLYN HESTER sessions in September 1961 on which the young Bob Dylan played harmonica, and by April 1962 Lee was playing on sessions for The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan, including the April 14 session that yielded the 'Ramblin' Gamblin' Willie' released in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3. Dylan writes in Chronicles Volume One of Lee and Langhorne that if you 'had them playing with you, that's pretty much all you would need to do just about anything.'

Lee, like Langhorne, returned for some of the 1965 sessions for Bringing It All Back Home, though since there were two other bass players on the same sessions it's hard to know who played on which tracks from among the successful January 14 recordings of 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', 'Subterranean Homesick Blues', 'Outlaw Blues', 'She Belongs to Me' and 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream'; on 'Maggie's Farm', 'On the Road Again', 'Mr. Tambourine Man' and 'It's All Over Now Baby Blue' the following day; and on that day's cuts of 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', released as a European single and on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3. Bill Lee never played with Dylan live.

It may irk him that he is mostly famous today for being the father of film director Spike Lee (though he is also the father of three other people with film industry careers: Joie Lee, David Lee and Cinqué Lee), and that in about 1995 the New York Post made his own arrest for marijuana possession a cover story because of the Spike Lee connection. On the other hand Bill Lee has been musical director and film score composer for many of son Spike's films: namely, Joe's Bed-Stuy Barbershop: We Cut Heads (1983), She's Gotta Have It (1986), School Daze (1988), Do the Right Thing (1989) and Mo' Better Blues (1990). He also played bass in She's Gotta Have It, conducted the Natural Spiritual Orchestra on Do the Right Thing and was 'technical consultant' on Mo' Better Blues. He also took acting parts in She's Gotta Have It and Mo' Better Blues. His film work for directors other than his own son runs from taking part in 1965's art documentary George Dumpston's Place, filmed by Ed Emshwiller, playing a restaurant owner in Serge Rodnunsky's 1993 film Rage of Revenge and composing the score for Stephen Kijak's 1996 film Never Met Picasso.

[Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.278. New York Post story cited on a 1998 e-mail posting seen online at 'Bob Dylan Who's Who' 2 Jun 2005.]

Lee, C.P. [1950 -] Christopher Paul Lee is a British academic, film buff, musician and critic who has written two books on Dylan—one about the Manchester 1966 concert and one on Dylan's films. The former is the more significant work, and two editions of it have been published.

Lee was born in Manchester, England, on January 19, 1950. He first became interested in Dylan's work in 1964. He wrote an essay on Dylan while still at school in September 1966, and first published work about him in Grass Eye, an 'underground paper', in August 1969. Finding himself with a rekindled interest in Dylan in the mid-1990s he started writing in Isis, joined the FREEWHEELIN' co-operative and has been publishing articles online in recent years.

Once a founder member of Alberto Y Lost Trios Paranoias (the group lasted 1972–82), Lee now teaches cultural studies at the University of Salford, near Manchester. He writes and presents BBC radio documentaries and is published in academic journals and elsewhere on Manchester music, folk music and film history. His book Shake, Rattle and Rain: Popular Music in Manchester, 1955–1995 was published in 2002. He is now especially involved with researching and archiving the history of the Mancunian Film Studios (see www.itsahotun.com). His book on the celluloid Dylan, A Bullet of Light: The Films of Bob Dylan, was published by music-books specialist company Helter Skelter in 2000.

Like the Night: Bob Dylan and the Road to the Manchester Free Trade Hall was published in 1998, and despite its many carelessnesses it is an important work that adds greatly to our knowledge of that unsurpassable concert's context. The revised and updated second edition, Like the Night Revisited, is even better. The book begins with an excellent initiation into Manchester and England circa 1964. Then there's a fine, mordant chapter on how it was back then, on the post-war, post-rationing feel that persisted right into to the Britain of the 1960s, and, tellingly, on the Stalinism of the folk movement, and in particular the rôle of the Communist Party of Great Britain in keeping the post-World War II folk scene purist and traditional. He offers particularly fine material on the state of British folk clubs, the ideologies of different sorts of jazz, and how all this rubbed up against, but still managed to bully, post-adolescent consciousness circa 1966. His pursuit of the mind-set of the old left, including the communists and the folk scene's star practitioners, is excellent. (See also MacColl, Ewan.)

Then there's the main enterprise of the book, the exploration of this pivotal moment in Dylan's career—all this is inevitably fascinating, and handled well, and Lee's research and insistence on connecting detail is admirable. It may be suspect to claim to tell us what Dylan and ALBERT GROSSMAN notice and don't notice as they take their taxi-ride to Didsbury in May 1964, but what they might have noticed is nicely drawn, and so are they. The richly comic way that they're seen as mesmerising exotica by a young Mancunian, Neville, whose task is to look after them at the TV studio: this is beautifully rendered, and with great vividness, from Bob's spidery shyness to Grossman's fleshy coldness to Neville's dilemmas and delight. (C.P. has more than a soft spot for Albert. He speaks ruefully here and there in the book of how we all wished in vain for Dylan's mid-60s cool, but actually C.P. would settle for Grossman's.)

And of course, to go from the specific to the very general, the whole thing is just such a good idea for a Bob Dylan book. We all wish we'd written it.

[C.P. Lee, Like the Night: Bob Dylan and the Road to the Manchester Free Trade Hall, London: Helter Skelter Publishing, 1998; updated edition, Like the Night Revisited, Helter Skelter, 2004. A Bullet of Light: The Films of Bob Dylan, Helter Skelter, 2000. Shake, Rattle and Rain: Popular Music in Manchester, 1955–1995, Aylesbeare, Devon, UK: Harding Simpole, 2002.]

'Legionnaire's Disease' [1981] This little-known Dylan song was copyrighted in 1981, when it was recorded by BILLY CROSS and his band. No Dylan recording has surfaced.

See also blues, external signals of Dylan's interest in.

Lennon, John [1940 - 1980] John Winston Lennon was born in Liverpool on October 9, 1940 and, incredibly, had already formed his first group, the Quarrymen, while still at school in 1955! That's before anyone outside the southern states had ever heard of ELVIS PRESLEY! It emphasises the weird way that though the Beatles came along a full musical generation after rock'n'roll, and even after the pop that replaced it, Lennon, like Dylan, was at least as old as many of those who had shaped the music years before they came into the public eye. Lennon was older than RITCHIE VALENS, who was dead by early 1959; he was older than BOBBY VEE, Brian Hyland, Shelley Fabares and Fabian, Danny of Danny & the Juniors, Frankie Ford and Freddie Cannon, older than Paul Anka, Chubby Checker and Brenda Lee; he was the same age as Cliff Richard and RICKY NELSON.

Lennon's first encounter with Dylan was when all four Beatles met Dylan in New York City in 1964 (see Aronowitz, Al), the same year Lennon saw his father for the first time in close on two decades. As the most acerbic Beatle, John was the one regarded as most similar to Dylan. He was, like Dylan, the one who had ambitions in art forms other than music, and had published two books of surreal prose, albeit of a very English kind, In His Own Write (1964) and A Spaniard in the Works (1965), before Dylan completed, let alone published, Tarantula. Like Dylan, he had a penchant for travelling under pseudonyms, as when he and Yoko booked into hotels as Fred and Ada Gherkin.

Lennon and Dylan were always wary of each other, precisely because of their similar verbal gifts, though in their songwriting Lennon never created lyrics comparable to Dylan's, and indeed the non-Beatles song for which he's most famous, 'Imagine', is of a disingenuous soppiness Dylan has never managed. Nevertheless they were sometimes companions in the other's land in the mid-1960s.

Lennon called on Dylan at the Savoy Hotel in London in 1965 and brought him down to his own house in Weybridge, Surrey—exactly the sort of stuffy stockbroker-belt mansion the earlier mop-top Beatles had laughed at and the later New York City street-wise Lennon would have considered bourgeois death. Dylan told ROBERT SHELTON: 'I dug his situation where he lived. It was a twenty-two-room house. Do you know what I did when I got back from England, man? I bought me a thirty-one room house. . . . And it turned into a nightmare.' And Lennon told Shelton: 'We swapped addresses and said we'd exchange ideas for songs, but it never happened.'

One shared lyric did begin to happen the year after, however, when Lennon and McCARTNEY called on Dylan in his London hotel room in May 1966 (see the entry McCartney, Paul for details). That aside, though, the enthusiasm of the Lennon-Dylan meeting in Surrey never led to anything. 'Maybe that's why we get on well', Lennon told Shelton, 'we're both pretty disorganised blokes.' Events, of course, have proved that Dylan never was one iota as disorganised as he made out.

Dylan and Lennon shared a far-from-sober limo journey during that 1966 Dylan concert tour, and though Dylan and HOWARD ALK let through only a moment of the film footage in Eat the Document, D.A. PENNEBAKER had filmed it at some length, and this footage has circulated. (See the entry Eat the Document for detail.)

Lennon would turn up at Dylan concerts too. He and other Beatles saw Dylan at the Royal Albert Hall in 1965 and 1966 and on August 31, 1969, they were there to see Dylan and THE BAND at the second Isle of Wight Music Festival. Lennon damned with faint praise when asked by the press to defend Dylan's brief performance (an hour was brief granted that the audience, though not of course John Lennon, had been sitting in the mud for three days to await it). Lennon allegedly told the Daily Express: 'He gave a reasonable, albeit slightly flat, performance, but everyone was expecting Godot, a Jesus, to appear.'

Lennon had not been pleased to hear Dylan's song '4th Time Around' at the Royal Albert Hall in 1966, taking it to be a mocking parody of the Beatles' 'Norwegian Wood'; in later years there were a number of times when Lennon felt hostile to some turn Dylan's work was taking, or to some imagined slight. He and McCartney must have seen that on one level the John Wesley Harding album was a cutting reproach to the overblown production values of Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band. It's been suggested that the Beatles' 'Rocky Racoon' was in turn a parody of that Dylan album. In 1970, in his big post-Beatles interview recorded by JANN WENNER for Rolling Stone, Lennon was denigrating everyone (especially GEORGE HARRISON) and sounding less like the 'genius' he claimed to be than just another whingeing Liverpudlian. 1970 was also the year of the Lennon/Plastic Ono Band track 'God', on which he sings 'I don't believe in Zimmerman'. Some posthumously issued material took less innocuous potshots than this. It may be that these emerged in 1990 on the syndicated radio series 'The Lost Lennon Tapes', hosted by a publicist Lennon and Dylan had both used, Elliot 'Chewy' Mintz. And it's said that when Lennon saw Dylan perform 'Gotta Serve Somebody' on 'Saturday Night Live' he was so annoyed that he retorted with 'You Gotta Serve Yourself', which was released posthumously on The John Lennon Anthology in 1998.

Other mentions of Dylan in the work of the Beatles and Lennon include the line 'I feel so suicidal, just like Dylan's Mr. Jones' in 'Yer Blues' (1968) and 'Everybody's talking about John and Yoko, Timmy Leary, Rosemary, Tommy Smothers, Bobby Dylan . . .' in 'Give Peace a Chance'.

Lennon was among those who wrote a letter to the Village Voice in December 1971 protesting on Dylan's behalf about his hounding by A.J. WEBERMAN, who, they wrote, 'is to Dylan as Manson is to The Beatles—and uses what he interprets from Dylan's music to try and kill Dylan . . .'

Nine years later Lennon was the artist killed by the mad fan; he was fatally shot with four bullets at close range from a .38 outside the venerable Dakota Building on West 72nd Street, New York City, his home, on December 8, 1980.

[Dylan quoted by Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Music and Life of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., p.294; Lennon's Daily Express quote Shelton p.409; Village Voice letter excerpt quoted from Shelton p.411. May 1966 Lennon-McCartney-Dylan meeting detailed very journalistically in Mark Shipper, Paperback Writer, London: New English Library/Times Mirror, 1978, Ch.12. Lennon-Dylan limo ride transcript available online at www.recmusicbeatles.com/public/files/bbs/etd.html.]

'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' [1966] The Blonde on Blonde song 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' is neatly revealing about the way that even in his hippest, most radical and risky period, Dylan stood upon the bedrock of the blues. In one way, this song is utterly Dylanesque, and wholly redolent of that WARHOL Factory New York City milieu: so 1960s, so chic and fey, so knowing and druggy and poised, and engaging for its weird mix of energy and high comedy with an elaborate and ostentatious stance of ennui. Yet at the same time it is coach-built very closely upon the chassis of a LIGHTNIN' HOPKINS song from 1949, his 'Automobile (Blues)'.

It is not just a melodic parallel. Hopkins begins: 'I saw you ridin' round, you was ridin' in your brand-new automobile / Yes, I saw you ridin' round, you was ridin' round in your brand-new automobile / Yes, you was sittin' there happy with your handsome driver at the wheel / In your brand-new automobeeeeel'—and as Hopkins sings that extra last line, his voice takes that familiar downward curve, ending on that 'Dylanesque' long, sliding 'beeeel' that is a slippery mixture of a knowing sneer and some malicious envy. Dylan makes sly acknowledgement of his source in the last verse of his own song, with the in-joke admonition that 'you forgot to close the garage door.'

In taking from Lightnin' Hopkins, Dylan was driving down a very old road. Hopkins' label, Gold Star, was typical of the new wave of independent labels being created in the early post-war period, after the ending of the Petrillo ban on recording but with shellac still hard to get hold of. As Paul and Beth Garon write in their excellent biography of MEMPHIS MINNIE, 'When shellac was scarce, record producers like Gold Star's Bill Quinn recycled thousands of old 78s (and no doubt many treasures among them) to provide the raw material for their new releases, giving a bizarre literalism to the notion of one style developing out of another. Many of Lightnin' Hopkins' early records were literally made out of melted down Minnie's and Big Bill's!'

When outtakes of some of the Blonde on Blonde songs were heard for the first time in 2005—they had never circulated before their release on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack—the most interesting was a boyishly playful yet slow and slinky 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat'. It was a far more avowedly straight blues song at this early point, and when it runs on beyond the 'garage door', its last verse implores: 'Well can I be your chauffeur, honey can I be your chauffeur? / You can ride with me, honey I'll be your chauffeur . . .' This is a dazzling touch: not only does it match the 'garage' allusion to Hopkins with an equally deft automobile-centred allusion to Memphis Minnie herself (her 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues' being an instant association for anyone who knows much about the blues) but in conflating these two car songs, he is re-enacting in art the way that Hopkins' and Minnie's work was fused on shellac.

[Lightnin' Hopkins': 'Automobile (Blues)', Houston, TX, 1949, Gold Star 666, Houston, 1949; Early Recordings, Arhoolie 2007, El Cerrito, CA, 1965 (i.e. first vinyl-released the year before Dylan composed 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat'), CD-reissued The Gold Star Sessions Vol. 1, Arhoolie CD 330, El Cerrito, c.1991, & Vol. 2, Arhoolie CD 337, ditto. Hopkins re-recorded the song as 'Automobile Blues', NY, 9 Nov 1960, The Blues of Lightnin' Hopkins, Bluesville 1019, Bergenfield, NJ, c.1960. Paul & Beth Garon, Woman with Guitar: Memphis Minnie's Blues, New York: Da Capo, 1992.]

Lesh, Phil [1940 -] The official GRATEFUL DEAD website describes member Phil Lesh as 'the most creative and inventive bass player in the history of rock and roll—in fact, he is a distinctive bottom-end guitar player. He began his musical career playing classical violin, moved on to trumpet (both classical and then big-band jazz), and then to avant-garde composition, studying with the great Luciano Berio at Mills College. Then he went to see his buddy Jerry's rock band at a pizza joint called Magoo's in 1965 . . . and neither he nor rock have ever been the same.'

Putting it less rhapsodically, Phillip Chapman Lesh was born in Berkeley, California, on March 15, 1940, became a founding member of the Grateful Dead and played bass guitar in the band from its inception. In 2005 he published a memoir of the 1960s and his involvement with the band. For his connections with Bob Dylan, see the entry on the Grateful Dead.

[Phil Lesh, Searching for the Sound: My Life with the Grateful Dead, New York: Little, Brown, 2005.]

'Let's Keep It Between Us' [1980] The little-known Dylan song 'Let's Keep It Between Us'—the lyric of which, in the songbooks, has been subjected to unfortunate text-revisions that make it inferior to the song as performed—is given in those songbooks as belonging among the songs excluded from, or arising in the aftermath of, the 1981 album Shot of Love album, and it is copyrighted 1982. Yet Dylan was performing the song in concert in 1980—and not once but in 19 consecutive concerts!

Most of us would understand such public performance to be an act of publication, and so would a dictionary. The first meaning of 'publication' in Cassell's New English Dictionary is 'the act of making publicly known'. Moreover, in Britain at least, if the song was deemed to be published by these performances, Dylan would have collected monies on them, via the Performing Right Society, as for every other published song performed in a public place. However, Dylan's office recognises a nicety lost on most here, arguing that public performance is not in fact publication, and copyrighting 'Let's Keep It Between Us' only in 1982 when the singer Bonnie Raitt pressed her intention to record the song.

So there sits 'Let's Keep It Between Us', in Lyrics 1962–1985 and Lyrics 1962–2001, alongside 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar', copyrighted 1981 (because it was on the B-side of a Dylan single then), alongside 'Need a Woman', copyrighted 1982 (because that's when Ry Cooder put his inferior version of the song on record), and alongside 'Caribbean Wind', copyrighted 1985 (because only then did Dylan's version emerge, on Biograph, though this song too was performed in concert in 1980). The last consideration in this sequencing of the songs in the songbooks is thus the one anyone outside 'the business' or anyone interested in scholarship might assume would come first: a concern to order the songs to reflect accurately their order of composition.

In the case of trying to establish when 'Let's Keep It Between Us' might have been composed, there is an added puzzle. Even if you didn't know that it had been performed in fall 1980—as one of the secular songs insinuated amongst the evangelical material that had alone comprised the previous tours' uncompromising repertoire—and even if you didn't care to notice the tardy copyright date, it would still be likely to strike you as curious, coming upon it where it is within the songbooks, which is to say smothered by the press of religious songs that surrounds it, when it is itself so obdurately a secular song: a song which, if it is to have any meaning at all outside Bob Dylan's private codification, must surely be about trying to preserve a long-term human relationship in danger of falling apart.

This also makes it a most unusual, and valued, part of Dylan's work, so little of which addresses the realities of maintaining relationships, even though this is, for Dylan's contemporaries, an area of experience likely to be more pressing and central than the relatively easy romantic angst of regretting yet another break-up. Indeed one reason why so many people feel that while Dylan used to reveal the world to them, now he just plays concerts, is precisely because one of his main areas of address is splitting up and moving on, while they themselves are working through the harder, more complex business of sticking together, with or without raising children, at a time when shifting sexual roles continually affect how things are between individuals. They are, thereby, coping with a far more 'contemporary' life than the old one Dylan speaks to with all his stoic leaving-or-left-alone songs cocooned in romantic images of dusty roads and lonesome oceans.

Nevertheless 'Let's Keep It Between Us' touches upon travel, at least as metaphor. In performances, though not in the garbled and nondescript version of the lyric in the songbooks, Dylan avows: 'Let's just move to the back of the back of the bus.' This phrase is a classic Dylanism: it's like 'in the final end', in 'I Pity the Poor Immigrant' (a phrase he re-uses in 'Idiot Wind', having also warped it into the variant 'it's the top of the end' in 'Going Going Gone'). It's creative and interesting because it serves a similar purpose, which is partly to be emphatic but partly to acknowledge an existential or qualitative distinction between the ordinary and the emphasised meaning. 'Let's just move to the back of the back of the bus' stresses a solidarity with the oppressed—stresses that, as with Desolation Row, it is morally cleaner to be there—by drawing on the resonance the phrase 'the back of the bus' must have for anyone who grew up around or before the civil rights struggle in America: before, in fact, the changes triggered by the bravery of Rosa Parks by her refusal to keep on moving to the back of the bus. (THE FREEDOM SINGERS, who appeared with Dylan at the 1963 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, used to feature a song called 'If You Miss Me at the Back of the Bus'.)

In fact Dylan's back-reference in 'Let's Keep It Between Us' to this example of racial inequality represents a return to the subject on his part. He refers to it first in one of the barbed jokes he puts into 'I Shall Be Free', on The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan: '. . . a can a black paint it fell on my head. / I went down to scrub and rub / But I had to sit in the back of the tub.'

Choosing the back of the bus still involves taking a stance. It's where the surreptitious drinkers, the so-what youth sits, on the Greyhounds that cross the country. This contemporary back-of-the-bus milieu is pinned down excellently in Irma Kurtz's 1993 book The Great American Bus Ride.

'Let's Keep It Between Us' has a further black resonance: it is noticeably similar to Jimmy Witherspoon versions (and thence to Otis Spann's version) of 'Nobody's Business', a traditional song that goes back at least to the beginning of the century and has been recorded very many times. As sung by, for instance, MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT, or FRANK STOKES (both of whom made Memphis versions in 1928), you wouldn't see any resemblance at all to the Dylan song—not even in theme, since what is nobody's business but the singer's includes killing his woman, so making it a me-against-everyone song rather than, as 'Let's Keep It Between Us' so eloquently is, an us-against-them song. But as Jimmy Witherspoon and Otis Spann perform it, as 'Ain't Nobody's Business' and ''Tain't Nobody's Biz-ness If I Do', the rich and stately musical progression, the mood and the theme are likely to strike you at once as the inspiration for Dylan's own rich and stately song. Witherspoon-Spann's friendlier version of the lyric says: 'Me and my baby, you know we fuss and fight / Just the next morning, baby we's all right / Now ain't nobody's business, have mercy!, what I do'—from which you might say that Dylan has more or less reversed that 'fuss and fight' to get to end a line of his own with 'fuss', putting it among his 'us' rhymes.

Inasmuch as 'Let's Keep It Between Us' belongs neither with the romance-of-moving-on oeuvre nor with the evangelical one in which it's located in the songbooks, where might it belong? When Dylan performed it in those 1980 concerts, its secular companions ranged from 1962's 'Blowin' in the Wind' to 1978's 'Señor'. No help there. It would have been unusual had Dylan been introducing a song written two or three years beforehand, yet the years immediately preceding 1979's Slow Train Coming do seem the most likely to have yielded such a lyric, while its music is especially lacking in clues, since it too is unusual in Dylan's repertoire for luxuriating in such a rich swathe of sumptuous chords. In fact it's exactly the kind of music most musicians will tell you Bob Dylan cannot write.

[Bob Dylan: 'Let's Keep It Between Us' from San Francisco, 9 Nov through to Portland, Oregon, 4 Dec 1980. Bonnie Raitt: 'Let's Keep It Between Us', nia, The Green Light, Warner Bros. 3630-2, US, 1982. The Freedom Singers: 'If You Miss Me at the Back of the Bus', published in Broadside no.17, NY, 1963. Irma Kurtz, The Great American Bus Ride, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993 (& London: Fourth Estate, 1994).

Jimmy Witherspoon: 'Ain't Nobody's Business', LA, 20 Nov 1947, Supreme 1506 & Swingtime 263, LA, c.1948; Spoon Calls Hootie (Polydor Jazz Masters Vol. 5), Polydor Special 545 105, London, 1966. Jimmy Witherspoon: 'Ain't Nobody's Business', Chicago, 15 Aug 1956, unreleased till Spoon So Easy, Chess MCA CH93003, USA, c.1989. Otis Spann, with the Muddy Waters Band: ''Tain't Nobody's Biz-ness If I Do', Chicago, 30 Aug 1966; The Blues Is Where It's At, Bluesway 6003, NY, 1967. Mississippi John Hurt: 'Nobody's Dirty Business', Memphis, 14 Feb 1928; Mississippi John Hurt Complete 1928 Recordings, Yazoo L-1065, Newton, NJ, 1988, CD-reissued Yazoo CD-1065, NY, nia. Frank Stokes: 'Ain't Nobody's Business If I Do Part 2', Memphis, 30 Aug 1928; Memphis Blues 1928–1930, RCA 2-LP set NL89276, Paris, 1984.]

Levy, Dan [1958 -] Daniel Levy was born in Los Angeles on April 12, 1958, was introduced to Dylan's work at age eight by his guitar teacher and so was playing and singing 'Mr. Tambourine Man' before he ever heard a recording of it. He heard Dylan records for the first time at age nine and was first able to see him live at age 15 on February 14, 1974 (the early show) in Inglewood, California, the penultimate concert of that year's big 'comeback' tour.

Levy became a book editor and management consultant and via his consultancy company produces websites for a number of major musical artists. His first work on Dylan was a short piece in Newsday on the occasion of Dylan's 50th birthday in May 1991, but his main contribution has been the running of the official Dylan website, www.bobdylan.com. After meetings with members of Dylan's management and record label beginning in 1994 he began to work with them to plan the site, which was launched in fall 1997 around the time of the release of the Time Out of Mind album.

In its early days the website was much criticised by fans for its limitations and was in danger of becoming one of those sites people fail to revisit because of how seldom it changed. It still errs in this direction—there's little point having tour setlists posted if the current tour isn't included—but in other ways it has become almost exemplary: simple to use and easy on the eye (there are no unpleasant 'artistic' flash intros), it offers a vast amount of information, a search facility for words within Dylan lyrics—not every Dylan composition is up there but the exceptions are few—and even a changing page of 'Performances' from which you can hear recordings of quirkily selected particular songs from recent concerts, plus in some cases the original, often obscure recordings of songs Dylan has covered by other artists. The site even includes critical essays and has, in SEAN WILENTZ, a 'resident historian'. In several ways, therefore, Dan Levy's website has encouraged a Dylan online presence that has moved away from attitudes he and/or his management long espoused (anti-outside 'products', anti-bootleg recordings, anti-critics, anti-pinning things down). Levy has also made it possible to get a sense from the site that real people, not just a corporate face, are behind it.

Levy, Jacques [1935 - 2004] Jacques Levy was born in New York City on July 29, 1935. After attending City College he gained his PhD in Clinical Pyschology at Michigan State University and practised at the Meninger Foundation Clinic in Topeka, Kansas, where he was drawn into producing amateur dramatics. Returning to New York City in 1965 he concentrated on a theatrical career and that year, Off-Off Broadway, directed SAM SHEPARD's early play Red Cross. He joined the Open Theatre Group and the New Dramatists Committee, and directed at the La MaMa experimental theatre and the Judson Poets Theater. He became the second director of Jean-Claude Van Italie's pioneering 'protest theatre' play Motel (which featured big grotesque puppets, designed by the then-unknown Robert Wilson and prefiguring those in FRANK ZAPPA's 1984 production Thing Fish) and in 1967 directed Van Italie's America Hurrah, an Off-Broadway success that ran to 640 performances in New York and was brought over to London.

There the aging enfant terrible of British theatre criticism, Kenneth Tynan, brought Jacques Levy the bones of an idea for 'an evening of Victorian esoteric pornography', which Levy turned into an amalgam of sketches he commissioned from Shepard, JOHN LENNON and others, including the great Samuel Beckett (whose own Off-Broadway play Happy Days had starred Ruth White, a main puppet's voice in Motel). The result was the tediously controversial O Calcutta!, which opened in 1969 under Levy's direction.

This in turn brought Levy to ROGER McGUINN's attention as he sought a librettist for a project of his, namely to turn Henrik Ibsen's classic play Peer Gynt into a country-rock musical, Gene Tryp. Levy and McGuinn duly wrote songs for this doomed musical, and McGuinn rescued them by their inclusion on subsequent BYRDS albums. One, the ludicrous but appealing 'Chestnut Mare' became one of the group's best-known songs and biggest hits. Levy and McGuinn continued to collaborate on songs for McGuinn's solo albums of the early 1970s, and when Dylan put a harmonica part on one such track in 1972 ('I'm So Restless' on Roger McGuinn), Levy's work as a lyricist came to his attention.

They only met, however, by chance, in the street, in 1974, when Levy seized the chance to introduce himself and, according to his own testimony, spent the evening with Dylan in Levy's La Guardia Place loft. It was another year before they met again, when at some point in the first half of 1975 they bumped into each other on Bleecker Street in the Village. Though Dylan 'had no specific plans at that time to do anything . . . he said something like, "I really like the stuff you do with Roger, how about if you and I do something together?" Which was slightly strange, right? Because he knew I did lyrics and I knew he did lyrics. But I said, "Sure, let's give it a shot."'

Beginning back at Levy's loft that same evening with an unformed piece Dylan played on piano, with lines thrown around between the two of them, they emerged with a major song: 'Isis'. Encouraged, they worked together again for about a week, found too many distractions, went out to Dylan's house at East Hampton, Long Island, and spent a further three weeks writing together. 'The pressure was tremendous,' said Levy.

The result was the great majority of the Desire album. Of its nine songs, seven were Dylan-Levy collaborations: 'Hurricane', 'Isis', 'Mozambique', 'Oh Sister', 'Joey', 'Black Diamond Bay' and 'Romance in Durango'. Only 'One More Cup of Coffee' and 'Sara' were by Dylan alone. Outtakes from the sessions, also co-written with Levy, were 'Rita May', 'Catfish' and 'Money Blues'; and there on the back cover of the original LP is a photo of the bearded Levy, alongside Dylan at the microphone.

Such collaboration was a major surprise: Dylan had never worked like this before. Desire proved a distinctive, significant work in Dylan's canon. It was overshadowed, artistically, by the previous year's Blood on the Tracks, but it was Dylan's fastest-selling album. In turn, Levy's other work has been overshadowed by his contribution to Desire.

After it, Dylan brought him in to 'direct' the Rolling Thunder Revue concerts, asking: 'Can you figure out a way of doing it—a presentation? What would it be like?' So the staging, the idea of the running order to accommodate the different performers, the lighting ('this little jewel box all lit up', as Levy described it afterwards): all this was sorted out by Levy. Crucially, as Dylan required, he staged it so that it didn't look staged.

Roger McGuinn says that on the tour itself, Levy was also 'camp counsellor', arguing naively that 'Because he was a practising psychologist, he knows how to work with people.' (For suggestions of Levy's training coming into the lyrics of 'Romance in Durango', see entry on that song.)

Levy returned to the theatre, directing the musical comedy Doonesbury (which was about as funny as the cartoon strip) in 1983, and writing the lyrics for the stage musical spin-off from the film Fame in 1988. In 1993 he accepted the post of English Professor and Director of Theatre at Colgate University, New York, while continuing to work on theatre projects, including Marat/Sade in 1994, a 1997 revival of William Inge's 1950s drama Bus Stop, and BRECHT on Brecht in 2000.

Jacques Levy died of cancer on September 30, 2004.

[Jacques Levy quotes from John Bauldie, 'Jacques Levy and the Desire Collaboration', Telegraph no.11, UK, Apr 1983, republished in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph, London: W.H. Allen, 1987. (This piece details the process of the collaboration on the songs.) Other sources include theatre review feature on Jean-Claude Van Italie in Gay City News vol.3, no.340, NY, 30 Sep–6 Oct 2004.]

Lewis, Furry [1893 - 1981] See blues, inequality of reward in.

Lewis, Jerry Lee [1935 -] Jerry Lee Lewis, a creator of rock'n'roll, is still alive in 2005, in defiance of medical science. For 50 years he has soaked up drugs and drink—mostly designer-speed, downers and whiskey—while living in perpetual, often violent struggle against his loved ones and the world.

This long strife followed bedazzling early success as a defining hero of rock'n'roll, when he muscled in amongst ELVIS PRESLEY, LITTLE RICHARD and CHUCK BERRY, creating rock'n'roll piano from honky-tonk and hymn, as if doing so were as natural as breathing, and commandeering R&B with a casual authority achieved by no other white performer except Presley. With 'Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin' On', 'Great Balls of Fire' and 'High School Confidential' he made three of rock'n'roll's indispensable classics.

He was born in Ferriday, Louisiana, on September 29, 1935, to Mary Ethel, who spoke in tongues, and Elmo, a labourer. Jerry had two sisters, Frankie Jean and Linda Gail. His elder brother, Elmo Jr., was killed by a drunk driver when they were boys. His father, imprisoned for bootlegging, was brought to the funeral in chains.

Jerry Lee was raised in the Pentecostal church, on family gospel singing and country music by JIMMIE RODGERS, Gene Autry, HANK WILLIAMS and the state's singing governor, Jimmie Davis. He taught himself guitar, drums and fiddle as well as piano, and hung around local club Haney's, where he claimed he heard top black performers from Duke Ellington to MUDDY WATERS.

At 12 he made his first paid appearance, moved onto Radio WNAT in Natchez, Mississippi, and at 13 played clubs there, while his splendidly named cousin Betty Jo Slamper taught him to 'smooch'.

Hired as pianist by a travelling preacher, in 1952 Lewis married the preacher's 16-year-old daughter, Dorothy Barton. Jerry Lee too was 16. The following year he attended the Pentecostal Bible Institute in Waxahatchie, Texas. Expelled for playing gospel music 'like colored people', he told them, rightly, that they 'might as well accept it, 'cause some day that's how it's gonna be.' Back home, he bigamously married pregnant Jane Mitcham, after three days' jail for store-breaking and stealing a gun.

In Shreveport he made two country-music demos, and in Nashville sought work from Slim Whitman. But rock'n'roll was erupting across the South, and like others drawn to Sun Studios, Memphis, by Presley's success, Lewis auditioned there. In December 1956 Sun issued 'Crazy Arms', which sold well despite Ray Price's version having long been on the charts and despite Lewis sounding almost diffident (not something that would recur). The B-side, 'End of the Road', one of Lewis's few compositions, was an authentic dark howl, a perfect expression of its time and place.

At year's end Lewis played on several other artists' rockabilly cuts, among them CARL PERKINS' 'Matchbox' and BILLY LEE RILEY's 'Flyin' Saucers Rock'n'Roll'. Days later, ROY ORBISON asked him to play. Lewis replied: 'I don't do sessions anymore.' Later, pressed by a discographer as to who had played on Jerry Lee's own records, he offered one of the all-time great ripostes to the collector-mentality: 'I played on 'em: what the hell else d'you need to know?'

'Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin' On' was his second single. Widely banned for lewdness, it sold poorly until Lewis shook up Steve Allen's national TV show in July 1957, after which he was a star, undertaking nationwide tours while the record sold over a million. The glorious 'Great Balls of Fire' followed (and riveted Great Britain when Lewis' rendition in the film Disc Jockey Jamboree was shown on TV), then 'Breathless' and the title-song of the film High School Confidential, in which Lewis performed. All stormed the pop, country and R&B charts.

These hits, plus unbeatable versions of 'Mean Woman Blues', Chuck Berry's 'Little Queenie' and many more, shared an immediately identifiable style, an alchemy of the 'Sun sound', fluid vocal brio and a pounding yet lyrical piano. Both hands were crucial in his playing, his striding left-hand the foundation of the rhythm, even with a bass guitarist behind him. Live, and as captured on film, he was an explosive performer in the early years, genuinely close to the edge. And uninhibitedly competitive. Resenting lower billing than Chuck Berry, he once ended his act by setting the piano on fire. As they met in the wings, Lewis challenged Berry: 'Follow that!'

In May 1958 Jerry Lee arrived in Britain. The press discovered that the 13-year-old with him was his wife. Jerry confessed his whole hillbilly history: 'I was a bigamist at 16. . . . My wife Myra and I are very happy.' The nation was not. His tour cancelled, Lewis was deported, ammunition given to America's anti-rock'n'roll campaigners and his career shattered.

Lewis remained at Sun, its heaviest star, making rock'n'roll A-sides and wonderful country B-sides of the immaculate Hank Williams kind, years before country became an established new career for ex-rockers. Lewis would be a main player in opening up this route. (These B-sides are detailed in the entry Williams, Hank.) He regained the UK top 10 once, in 1961, with a superb version of RAY CHARLES' 'What'd I Say', its sumptuous thunder Sun Records' last golden moment. Lewis left the label in 1962.

On record he lost direction for a time, but toured with an arrogance burnished into art, wilfully infuriating audiences of Teds by dwelling on slow country songs while provoking country crowds with unabashed rock'n'roll. In mid-song he would order a musician to 'play it, son!' only to prevent his doing so with a piano solo no-one would interrupt.

Two 1963–64 live recordings show his genius. On a tawdry, humdrum date at the Star Club, Hamburg, playing to what sounds like about 50 people, and using, in the tradition of visiting American stars, an English backing-group met mere minutes before show-time (the Nashville Teens), Lewis gave a marvellously ferocious master-class, and rose to a transcendent 'Your Cheatin' Heart', with exquisite vocal phrasing, and unsurpassable piano, coursing with understatement and grace. And then in contrast, in front of 50,000 seething fellow-peckerwoods in Birmingham, Alabama, he threw down a 'Hi Heel Sneakers' of shuddering, majestic excitement, stealing the song from all previous wearers.

For a while he joined the rock festivals circuit, including, implausibly, the Toronto Peace Festival, but by the 1970s he had cracked the mainstream country market with a succession of hits like 'What's Made Milwaukee Famous (Has Made a Loser Out of Me)' and the impeccably wily 'She Still Comes Around (To Love What's Left of Me)'. A rangey, muttering 'Me and Bobby McGee' in 1971 was made 'to show that damn woman [Janis Joplin] how it should be done.'

Ten years later, his skin waxy and his gait old, he combed his greased hair for the Wembley Country Festival crowd, put on filthy glasses and delivered a consummate 'Over the Rainbow': the mike still placed to show off how stylishly his right hand could steer around it, his vocal control sublime.

He proclaimed himself forever a rock'n'roller, through decades of turmoil, lurid tragedy and farce. Three-year-old son Steve Allen Lewis drowned in their swimming-pool in 1962; drug-ridden Jerry Lee Jr. died at 19 in 1973; Myra divorced him citing mental cruelty and physical abuse; in 1983 fifth wife Shawn Stephens took a fatal overdose ten weeks into their marriage—fatal because he failed to get help—a year after fourth wife Jaren Pate drowned in another swimming-pool. Rolling Stone published 'The Mysterious Death of Mrs. Jerry Lee Lewis', accusing him of murdering one wife and abusing and/or hounding to death several others.

In 1975 his plane was seized with cocaine and 11 kinds of amphetamine on board; in 1976 he was arrested outside the gates of Graceland, drunk in possession of a gun; the IRS seized his property in 1979 and 1983, and he filed for bankruptcy even as Dennis Quaid was making the Hollywood film of his life, Great Balls of Fire!. (A short, tax-avoiding emigration to Eire with sixth wife Kerrie and young son Lee followed in 1992.) Meanwhile there was a collapsed lung, gall-bladder removal, bleeding stomach ulcers and car-crash injuries. In 1984 he was twice brought back to life in an ambulance, and had half his stomach removed in 1985, a year his wife said he also spent shooting up methadone, tranquillisers and speed.

Perhaps no disparagement of the redneck is unfair to Lewis. He embodies pinched obduracy, brooding, malevolent ignorance, violent unreliability and borderline madness. A cousin of disgraced TV evangelist Jimmy Swaggart, he founded his own deranged and volatile religious guilt on the commie-hating protestant fundamentalism that gives the Bible Belt its bad name. He abused women, played with guns and shot at men; he drove the highways of the South blind drunk with his loaded pistol on the dashboard. He claimed plain-speaking as his compensating virtue, but where honesty is wielded with such self-regard, who needs hypocrisy?

Yet in the vivid contrast between the meanness of the man and the grandeur of the artist, the common denominators are his phenomenal energy and admirable, all-conquering self-belief. Jerry Lee Lewis will be remembered for his lifetime of hillbilly delirium, but he will be remembered best for his seizure of the musical moment at the dawn of rock'n'roll, when an incomparable talent was his intoxicant and ours: when he shot up the old order and played out his defiant dramas on the keyboard, in the studio and on the stage.

Dylan benefited as much from this legacy as the rest of us (and perhaps became acquainted with some of Hank Williams' work via Jerry Lee), but part of his debt is also more specifiable. The two songs that relent and relax at the end of the John Wesley Harding album, 'Down Along the Cove' and 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight', would not have been possible without Jerry Lee; nor would that lovely minor song 'Living the Blues', which Dylan released on Self Portrait and performed on the 'JOHNNY CASH TV Show' on May 1, 1969. Not only is its style Jerry Lee Lewis', but its melody is said to be taken straight from a specific Lewis record, 'I'm Feeling Sorry', from 1957 (a Claud Demetrius composition, as was the great 'Mean Woman Blues'). And more modestly, when birds become 'birdies' on 'If Not for You', this jolly word trills through to us from its earlier appearance inside Lewis' 'Livin' Lovin' Wreck'.

There are other small conjunctions too. The 1961 A-side of Lewis' cover of Hank Williams' 'Cold, Cold Heart', a song called 'It Won't Happen with Me' (which name-checks Elvis) features guitarist WAYNE MOSS; five years later he plays on Blonde on Blonde. Bob may have had Jerry Lee's consummate, glowing version of 'What'd I Say' in mind at least as much as the Ray Charles original when performing the song at the rehearsals for Farm Aid in 1986. (Jerry Lee was also one of those who preceded Dylan in recording versions of 'Frankie and Johnny', 'That Lucky Old Sun' and 'Tomorrow Night'.)

Jerry Lee was also perhaps the egotist most prone to put his own name into the lyrics he sang—something Dylan eventually does himself (to more subtle, indeed to more or less opposite effect, since it signals his mooted obliteration) in a live version of that fine 1980s song 'Caribbean Wind', in which he sings of 'Flies on my balcony buzzin' my head / Slayin' Bob Dylan [here] in my bed'. (Jerry Lee was always the Killer, never the slain.)

In the end, though, like so many others before him, Jerry Lee came visiting Bob, recording the Desire outtake song 'Rita May'—which sounds, when you hear Dylan's version, as if it had been written for Lewis, and sounds, when you hear Jerry Lee's, as if he isn't quite so sure.

A story that may or may not be felt to illuminate this emerged in the book by Jimmy Guterman, Rockin' My Life Away: Listening to Jerry Lee Lewis. Producer Bones Howe gave Lewis the song and he recorded it. Afterwards he asked, 'Who wrote that song?' 'Bob Dylan,' Bones Howe replied, smiling. Jerry Lee showed no recognition. 'That boy's good,' Jerry Lee said. 'I'll do anything by him.'

[Jerry Lee Lewis: 'I'm Feeling Sorry', Memphis, 10 Sep 1957, Jerry Lee Lewis—The Great Ball of Fire (EP), Sun EPA 107, 1957 (in UK issued as B-side of 'You Win Again', London American HLS 8559, 1958); 'Livin' Lovin' Wreck', Memphis, 9 Feb 1961 c/w 'What'd I Say', Memphis, 9 Feb 1961, Sun 356, 1961; 'Cold, Cold Heart', Memphis, 9 Feb 1961, c/w 'It Won't Happen with Me', 12 Jun 1961, Sun 364, Memphis (London American HLS 9414, London), 1961; 'Frankie and Johnny', Memphis, Mar 1958, Jerry Lee's Greatest, Sun 1265 (London American HAS 2440), 1961; 'That Lucky Old Sun', Memphis, prob. Dec 1956, Mule 201, nia ; 'Tomorrow Night', Memphis, 1956, Rockin' and Free, Phonogram 6467.029, London, 1974. 'Rita May', nia, Elektra E-46067 LC, NY (c/w a re-make of 'Who Will the Next Fool Be?'), 1979; CD-reissued Rockin' My Life Away, Newsound 2000 NSTD209, 2002.

Bob Dylan: 'Caribbean Wind', live in San Francisco, 12 Nov 1980.

Jimmy Guterman, Rockin' My Life Away: Listening to Jerry Lee Lewis, Nashville: Rutledge Hill Press, 1991.]

Lightfoot, Gordon [1938 -] Gordon Lightfoot, Canadian singer-songwriter, was born November 17, 1938, in Orillia, Ontario. He performed in public from the age of five, making custom records and appearing on radio, including within a barbershop quartet. He wrote his first song in 1956 and dropped out of the no-longer-extant Westlake College of Music in Los Angeles in 1959. He became a choral singer and dancer on CBC's 'Country Hoedown' 1960–62, learnt various instruments and became drawn to folk music by hearing Bob Gibson (an early singing partner of PAUL CLAYTON) and, incredible as it may seem, by hearing the Weavers at Carnegie Hall LP. He and Terry Whelan became the Two Tones, and enjoyed a Canadian hit with 'Remember Me (I'm the One)' in 1962. The following year he hosted some BBC-TV shows called 'Country and Western'. In 1964 he fell under the spell of Bob Dylan, which served to focus his own songwriting. He wrote 'Early Morning Rain' that summer.

On November 10, 1986, Bob Dylan presented Lightfoot with a Juno Lifetime Achievement Award at a ceremony in Toronto, shown live on CBC-TV. Dylan looked fragile but extraordinarily cool and charismatic (not often the case in the mid-1980s) and said this: 'Pleased for me to be here to give this award to Gordon. I've known Gordon for a long time and I know he's been offered this award before but he has never accepted it because he wanted me to come and give it to him. Anyway, he's somebody of rare talent and all that . . .'

Lightfoot suffered from serious illness in 2002 but recovered and resumed concert appearances.

Beware his book of wretched poetry and feel-good homilies, I Wish You Good Spaces, 1977 (a belated artefact of an earlier era, as its title hints), one of a series from Blue Mountain Arts of Boulder, Colorado, also offering the improbable My Life and Love Are One by Vincent van Gogh and We Are All Children Searching for Love by Leonard Nimoy.

See also 'Early Morning Rain'.

Lightnin' Hopkins [1912 - 1982] Samuel Hopkins, a country blues man with an electric guitar, was born in Centreville, Texas, on March 15, 1912 and 'raised in the piney woods of East Texas' (as Chris Strachwitz puts it). Lightnin' Hopkins was a confident writer of autobiographical songs, much influenced by his cousin Texas Alexander, by LONNIE JOHNSON (who frequently accompanied Alexander on record) and by the somewhat oppositely named SLEEPY JOHN ESTES.

Hopkins is, in turn, a weighty influence. His in-your-face 1947 record '(Let Me) Play with Your Poodle'—one of those where the euphemism sounds at least as rude as the sexual term it replaces—is hardly original by most criteria: it's a Tampa Red number from 1942, and just a 'Step It Up & Go' kind of song in any case, but it's innovative because with Hopkins' electric guitar, piano by Thunder Smith and a drummer too, it sounds like rock'n'roll years ahead of its time—which indicates one way in which, though he only lived to be 69, he was one of those important, extraordinary figures who spans so many eras of 20th century popular music. Starting with a head full of 19th century repertoire learnt as a child and as an acquaintance of Texas' great BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, Hopkins ended up singing his distinctive story-songs about the Vietnam War and, with the charming 'Happy Blues for John Glenn', the space race.

As for the impact of his work on Dylan's, not only did his 'Automobile (Blues)' give Dylan the chassis for 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' (see entry on that song), but with 'Brownsville Girl' too, Dylan rides a trail already explored by Hopkins. His 'I Would If I Could', one of the best (which is to say, least self-indulgent) of Lightnin' Hopkins' 1960s sides, is not only a song about going to see a cowboy movie, in this case about Jesse James, but it too has a narrator who drifts between 'real-life' and on-screen events awash with rumour and shooting.

More generally, Hopkins can be said to prefigure Dylan in having sung 'protest' songs like 'Tim Moore's Farm (Tom Moore Blues)', which he recorded in Houston in 1948 and which is part of what Dylan draws on for his own 'Maggie's Farm', and in more characteristically delivering self-composed, often lengthy stories, half sung and half spoken, a fiercely independent artist and, as noted by a folklorist and blues critic who knew him well, Mack McCormick, 'the embodiment of the jazz-and-poetry spirit, representing its ancient form in the single creator whose words and music are one act.' Though Hopkins' work first came to prominence when he was 'discovered' by SAM CHARTERS, who recorded the album Lightnin' Hopkins in January 1959, it was McCormick who contemporaneously re-branded Hopkins as a folk-blues artist and therefore gave his career a new life on the coffee-house circuits from the early 1960s onwards. In 1968 Les Blank made an acclaimed short film, The Blues According to Lightnin' Hopkins, which captures the music and personality of the older man.

Hopkins, who continued to record prolifically, died of cancer in Houston, the town in which he had been poet in residence for most of his adult life, on January 30, 1982.

[Lightnin' Hopkins: 1st sessions & subsequent Aladdin sessions, incl. '(Let Me) Play with Your Poodle', LA, 15 Jul 1947, LP-issued Lightnin' Hopkins and the Blues, Imperial 9211, US, 1950s, CD-reissued The Complete Aladdin Recordings, Aladdin CDP 7968442, Holland, 1991; 'I Would If I Could', Houston, TX, 18 Dec 1967, Lightnin' Hopkins: Texas Blues, Arhoolie CD 302, US, 1989; 'Tim Moore's Farm (Tom Moore Blues)', Houston, 1948; Fast Life Woman, Dart LP 8000, Houston, early 1960s, CD-reissued The Gold Star Sessions Vol. 1, Arhoolie CD 330, US, c.1991; Lightnin' Hopkins, Folkways US, 1959; 'Happy Blues for John Glenn', Houston, Feb 1962, Walkin' This Road By Myself, Bluesville BVLP1057, c.1962. Tampa Red: 'Let Me Play with Your Poodle', Chicago, 6 Feb 1942. The Blues According to Lightnin' Hopkins, dir. Les Blank; Flower Films/Blank, US, 1970.

Chris Strachwitz, notes to Arhoolie CD 302, above (which mention Hopkins' original 'late 1940s' recordings for Gold Star though the album itself contains instead a 1967 re-recording). Mack McCormick quoted from 'Lightnin' Hopkins' in Tony Russell, The Blues from Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Arum Press, 1997, p.64.]

'Like a Rolling Stone' [1965] 'The first time I heard Bob Dylan,' BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN said, inducting Dylan into the ludicrous Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame at the Grand Ballroom of the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City (though the Hall itself is in Cleveland, Ohio), on January 20, 1988, 'I was in the car with my mother listening to WMCA, and on came that snare shot that sounded like somebody had kicked open the door to your mind.'

'Like a Rolling Stone', from the Highway 61 Revisited album, was recorded June 16, 1965 and released on July 20, over a month ahead of the album, split between the two sides of a 45rpm record. It entered the American charts four days later. It was hurriedly re-issued complete on one side because of listener-demand to radio stations that they play it all. Thus this record also kicked open the doors of radio. When FRANK ZAPPA heard it, he said later: 'I wanted to quit the music business, because I felt: "If this wins and it does what it's supposed to do, I don't need to do anything else."'

If the length was subversive of all the rules, and the music announced itself as unique and enormous—it wasn't only the opening drum sound that was thrilling, but the beautifully expressive guitar licks, the interaction, the torrid, clever flow of it all, while the voice was at once so young and so snarling, so energetic and so cynical. And then there were the words. They too were a jolting, glorious assault: a chaotic amalgam of blues vernacular, impressionism, allegory and an intense directness: 'How does it feel?'

The opening verse is straightforward, almost monosyllabic slang: 'Once upon a time you dressed so fine / Threw the bums a dime in your prime, didn' you? / People'd call, say "Beware, doll, you're bound t' fall" / You thought they were all kiddin' you . . .'

The brevity and crispness of the language—city language, straight from the streets—combines with the pile-up effect of all those internal rhymes, fired past the listener as from a repeater-rifle, establishing at once the tone of stinging recrimination.

The tone is modified as the language changes, becoming softer and less monosyllabic as it accommodates a broader theme, a heightened appreciation on the narrator's part of Miss Lonely's fall to 'homelessness': 'You said you'd never compromise / With the mystery tramp, but now you realize / He's not selling any alibis / As you stare into the vacuum of his eyes / And say, do you want to, make a deal? / How does it feel?! Ah! How does it feel?!'

Here the words are longer, those '-ise' sounds slow-fading, the phrasing much less colloquial, the 'meaning', in prose terms, vaguer. This change of language keeps its momentum, and paradoxically, as the language gets vaguer so the meeting of eyes between narrator and Miss Lonely intensifies: they reach the point where understanding is searching and personal, and communication can be achieved at this pitch: 'You never turned around to see the frowns on the jugglers an' the clowns / When they all came down to do tricks for you . . . / You used to ride the chrome horse with your diplomat . . . / You used to be so amused / At Napoleon in rags and the language that he used / Go to him now, he calls you, you can't refuse . . .'

This calculated lack of specificity becomes, in Dylan's hands, a positive entity grown out of and beyond the specific; it unfolds a complex tale that works on many a level, and never quite lets go. 'How does it feel?'—well, liberating. It felt liberating for him too. He said in 1966 that until 'Like a Rolling Stone' he was 'singing words I didn't really want to sing. I don't mean words like "God" and "mother" and "President" and "suicide" and "meat-cleaver". I mean simple little words like "if" and "hope" and "you".'

The single never did top the charts, though: not on either side of the Atlantic. Bob Dylan never has had a no.1 hit single. Like CHUCK BERRY a decade earlier, his influence has always been stratospherically greater than his sales.

'Like a Rolling Stone' was among the songs attempted live at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL the day after it entered the pop charts, using members of the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, including MICHAEL BLOOMFIELD, who had earlier been flown in for the recording session—Dylan choosing, in other words, a blues lead guitarist for this most radical of records, while reputedly instructing him to play 'none of that B.B. King shit'. The other musicians on the studio recording are Dylan himself plus AL KOOPER on organ, BRUCE LANGHORNE on tambourine, PAUL GRIFFIN on piano, Joseph Macho Jr. on bass and BOBBY GREGG on drums. TOM WILSON was the producer.

After Newport, 'Like a Rolling Stone' then became the last song of the night on Dylan's August-onwards 1965 concerts, and for the unsurpassable firestorm concerts of 1966, where it is used as a retaliatory weapon against those in the audience who shout and slow handclap and boo at him. In Manchester that May 17th, the shout of 'JUDAS!' is met first with a spoken retort from Dylan and then by the most sustained howl of articulate vituperation ever hurled at an audience. That opening snare shot comes into its own yet again. The very last performances of the tour, in London on May 26 and 27, may be still more majestically fiery.

GREIL MARCUS' book Like a Rolling Stone: Bob Dylan at the Crossroads, 2005, reports Dylan's producer BOB JOHNSON as saying that after these gruelling, confrontational concerts, 'Like a Rolling Stone' was never the same afterwards (and, Marcus adds, neither was Bob Dylan). But when was Dylan ever the same after anything?

The song, the quintessential rock anthem, inevitably became a warhorse in Dylan's later performance decades, after a diffident rendition at the Isle of Wight Festival with THE BAND in August 1969—where the hoarse way he delivers the shouted last chorus lines as a melodic descent makes it a cry of defeat, like a rattling of chains—and after determinedly high-energy performances (usually as the penultimate song of the night) on the 'come-back' tour of North America in early 1974. It is one of Dylan's most-often performed songs, and usually used just before or during the encore: a certain crowd-pleaser, whatever the standard of performance. Only occasionally has Dylan himself subverted its iconic power and confounded his public's expectations by placing it in a less significant slot—third, for instance, and placed between 'I Believe in You' and 'Man Gave Names to All the Animals' when he re-introduced secular material to his repertoire in the concerts of November–December 1980 on the US West Coast.

Sometimes, too, there has been real re-interpretation. In a run of 1990s renditions, starting with his third and final night in Prague in March 1995, Dylan has sung the song not as vituperation, not a snarl or a sneer 'out there' at someone else, but as a reflective, Hamlet-style soliloquy, in soft tones and contemplative mood, in a spirit of 'This is so, isn't it?' addressed to himself: 'Once upon a time you dressed so fine . . . didn't you?'

There was, though, all along, one way in which this radical anthem was not a creature of snarling newness, but rather was leaning upon old truths and old formulations: those of nursery rhyme and fairytale. Dylan's lyric's much-quoted aphorism, 'When you ain't got nothin' you got nothin' to lose', had been said before, in the same direct way, in a pre-19th century nursery rhyme, in which 'There was an old woman / And nothing she had . . . / She'd nothing to eat / She'd nothing to fear / She'd nothing to lose' (and indeed Dylan repeats 'you got nothin' to lose' after the words 'wiggle wiggle wiggle' in the song of almost that name on his 1990 album of nursery rhyme re-workings, Under the Red Sky). It's also so obvious a thing that we're likely to miss it that 'Like a Rolling Stone' is the only classic rock record whose opening words are those of every classic fairytale: 'Once upon a time . . .'

In April 1998, in South America for concerts in Argentina, Brazil and Chile, Dylan several times found himself on shared bills with THE ROLLING STONES. Thus on four nights in three different cities in two different countries, Dylan appeared to share vocals with MICK JAGGER on renditions of 'Like a Rolling Stone'. The Stones subsequently issued their own studio-recorded version of the song as a single—and it would be hard to explain just how the reputed world's-greatest-rock-band managed to make such a stultifyingly tedious, profoundly unexciting record out of so quintessential a hot rock anthem, and one with which Dylan had changed popular music so radically.

When Dylan receives Lifetime Achievement awards and the like, they are because of that six-minute single from 1965. The insignificant 1997 Time Out of Mind recording 'Cold Irons Bound' won a Grammy because 'Like a Rolling Stone' never did.

(See also 1965–66: Dylan, pop & the UK charts.)

[Springsteen & Zappa quotes from Greil Marcus book extract, The Guardian, London, 13 May 2005; Dylan quote from 1966: 'The Playboy interview: a candid conversation with the iconoclastic idol of the folk-rock set', Playboy, Chicago, Mar 1966; Dylan quote re B.B. King from Mike Bloomfield, article in Hit Parader, Jun 1968, republished (but quoting it as 'stuff'), as 'Impressions of Bob Dylan', On the Tracks no.10, Grand Junction, CO, 1997. Nursery rhyme quoted from Michael Gray: Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, 1999. Dylan's 1990s soliloquy versions of 'Like a Rolling Stone' e.g. Prague, 13 Mar 1995.

Dylan & the Stones live 'Like a Rolling Stone': Buenos Aires, 4 & 5 Apr 1998; Rio de Janeiro, 11 Apr 1998; and Sao Paulo, 13 Apr 1988. The Rolling Stones: 'Like a Rolling Stone' (single): oh, whenever.]

Lindley, John [1952 -] John Francis Lindley was born in Stockport, Cheshire, UK, on February 16, 1952. He is a creative writing tutor, a poet and a veteran poetry performer in pubs, clubs, theatres and literary festivals. Five of his poetry collections have been published, including Stills from November Campaigns (1998) and Scarecrow Crimes (2002). He was winner of a Words of Silk Open Poetry Competition and was Cheshire Poet Laureate for 2004.

Though he has not published a book about Dylan, he has an honourable history of commentating, and enabling commentary by others, on Dylan's work and was the first critic to notice Dylan's sustained but stealthy sewing of Hollywood film dialogue into his lyrics (especially those of the mid-1980s), and to tease out some of the detail in print, in his 1986 article 'Movies Inside His Head: Empire Burlesque and The Maltese Falcon'.

Lindley was a founder member of Wanted Man, in 1981, the organisation that devised and launched the pioneering UK fanzine The Telegraph under the editorship of JOHN BAULDIE, and became a frequent contributor. His work included 'Reels of Rhyme', 1990, an acute essay on the way that in concert Dylan has frequently applied himself to the finding of extra internal rhymes within the lines of his songs (for instance securing the extra half-rhyme of 'do yer' with 'Mister' in 'Ballad of a Thin Man'). In the immediate aftermath of John Bauldie's sudden death, John Lindley agreed to take on the editorship of the issue left half-completed, which it was felt it would be wrong just to abandon, and so oversaw that final Telegraph, no.56, published in late 1996.

Lindley wrote too for that other early UK fan publication, Endless Road (his first published piece was in issue 3, in 1982: it dealt with Dylan's singing voice and was titled 'A Dead Man's Last Pistol Shot: A defence for the dog in the barbed wire'). He has also written on Dylan for Isis and Look Back, and wrote a self-published booklet, '7 Days', about Dylan's 1987 UK concerts.

[John Lindley, Stills from November Campaigns, Salford, UK: Tarantula Publications (no Dylan connection but a poetry press), 1998; Scarecrow Crimes, Gee Cross Hyde, UK: New Hope International, 2002; 'Movies Inside His Head: Empire Burlesque and The Maltese Falcon', Telegraph no.25, UK, autumn/winter 1986; 'Reels of Rhyme', Telegraph no.36, Romford, UK, summer 1990; 'A Dead Man's Last Pistol Shot: A defence for the dog in the barbed wire', Endless Road no.3, Hull, UK, 1982; Telegraph no.56, Congleton, UK, late 1996.]

'lion lies down with the lamb, the' In that remarkable Street Legal song 'No Time to Think', 1978, Dylan offers the lines 'Your conscience betrayed you when some tyrant waylaid you / Where the lion lies down with the lamb. / I'd have paid off the traitor and killed him much later / But that's just the way that I am.'

The lion lies down with the lamb in the Old Testament book of Isaiah—or rather, it doesn't quite: it lies down with the calf and the fatling; it's the wolf who lies down with the lamb (though possibly they're all cheek by jowl). The Christian understanding of this passage is that it envisions Christ's peaceable kingdom-to-come:

'For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counseller [sic], The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace' (Isaiah 9:6); '. . . with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. . . . They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea' (Isaiah 11:1–6 & 9).

Dylan may have this passage in mind again in that moving song of 1983 'Lord Protect My Child' (released only on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 box set in 1991), with its 'Till men lose their chains and righteousness reigns / Lord protect my child.'

The lion lies down with the lamb in WILLIAM BLAKE, when he extemporises on the same biblical passage in the last of the Songs of Innocence, the exquisite 'Night', 1789—in which the rhythms of the rhyming and half-rhyming couplets forming each verse's second half (italicised here) are likely to remind us of those in 'No Time to Think': 'When wolves and tygers howl for prey, / They [i.e. angels] pitying stand and weep; / Seeking to drive their thirst away, / And keep them from the sheep. / But if they rush dreadful, / The angels, most heedful, / Receive each mild spirit, / New worlds to inherit. // And there the lion's ruddy eyes / Shall flow with tears of gold, / And pitying the tender cries, / And walking round the fold, / Saying "Wrath, by his meekness, / And, by his health, sickness / Is driven away / From our immortal day." // "And now beside thee, bleating lamb, / I can lie down and sleep; / Or think on him who bore thy name, / Graze after thee and weep. / For, wash'd in life's river, / My bright mane for ever / Shall shine like the gold / As I guard o'er the fold." '

The same scriptural text is also the basis for one of the best-known paintings in all of Naïve Art, 'The Peaceable Kingdom', by Edward Hicks, who was born nine years before Blake's poem was first published. He Americanises the theme by including, in the background, Penn making his treaty with the Indians in 1681. What is great in Hicks' painting (as in Dylan's song), is the sense of inner warring required to attain, or even believe possible, the promised peaceable kingdom. The anguished eyes of the lion, glaring in mute appeal at the viewer, make the painting, once seen, unforgettable. As James Thomas Flexner comments:

> 'Hicks painted no relaxed allegories in which wild animals find it easy to be tame. He shows, instead, "man's cruel, selfish nature," as symbolized in the carnivores, controlled by will rather than completely routed. The wolf, the leopard, and the lion do not, it is true, hurt the domestic animals, and those helpless creatures are not afraid of them, yet the great beasts, who were once infected with the lust for meat, are afraid of themselves. They stare . . . ahead with strained eyes that reflect inner conflict. The war against savagery has moved back into its primeval seat, the individual mind. It is never altogether won.'

[James Thomas Flexner, 'The Peaceable Kingdom' in Man Through His Art: War and Peace, ed. de Silva & von Simson, East Ardsley, UK: Educational Productions, 1963.]

Lipscomb, Mance [1895 - 1976] In his 1965 book Conversation With the Blues, Paul Oliver makes the point that 'if the blues, like any folk art or indeed almost any art form, is illuminating in terms of a whole group it is still sung and played by individuals . . . the individual tends to become submerged . . . and even when the assessment of the major figures is made, the minor blues singer is forgotten.'

To listen to much of Dylan's work—which at least between his break with 'protest' and his conversion to Christianity in every sense put a consistent emphasis on the importance of the individual rather than the mass—is to feel that Dylan has not forgotten the minor blues singer at all. He has listened to the minor figures wherever the somewhat random process of recording folk artists has allowed. We know it from listening to his work.

(Where Dylan heard what; the influence of 'minor figures' and unknown ones; the communal nature of much blues composition and how this gells with post-structuralist ideas of the unfixed text and the death of the author: all these are big questions, much discussed throughout this book. They are also central preoccupations of MICHAEL GRAY's Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, Chapter 9, 'Even Post-Structuralists Oughta Have the Pre-War Blues'.)

Dylan learnt and assimilated experience from the older songs and the older singers—singers who, in some cases, were 'discovered' or 're-discovered' in the 1960s. MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT is one example, the stylish and dapper Mance Lipscomb another.

Lipscomb was born April 9, 1895, in Navasota, Texas—and eventually died there (on January 30, 1976). He was 'discovered' in July 1960 by Mack McCormick and Chris Strachwitz and recorded—for the first time—a few weeks later in his two-room cabin, by which time he was in his 60s, though still with a strikingly youthful way of moving around in performance. He had almost a thousand songs he could perform.

Dylan met Lipscomb, and we can get an idea of the aura of the man, and thus a hint of the insights he could have given Dylan, from the description of him, and a transcribed conversational fragment, in Paul Oliver's book. He was a 'Texas sharecropper and songster with a reputation that extends widely in Grimes, Washington and Brazos counties. . . . A man of great dignity and natural culture . . . a veritable storehouse of blues, ballads and songs of more than half a century . . .' This is Lipscomb talking (the spelling is as in Oliver's transcript):

> 'I been playin' the git-tar now 'bout forty-nine years, and then I started out by myself, just heard it and learned it. Ear music. . . . My pa was a fiddler; he was an old perfessional fiddler. All my people can play some kind of music. Well, my daddy . . . he played way back in olden days. You know, he played at breakdowns, waltzes, shottishes and all like that and music just come from me. . . . Papa were playing for dances out, for white folks and coloured. He played Missouri Waltz, Casey Jones, just anything you name he played it like I'm playin'. He was just a self player until I was big enough to play behind him, then we played together. . . . "Sugar Babe" was the first piece I learned, when I was a li'l boy about thirteen years old. Reason I know this so good, I got a whippin' about it. Come out of the cotton-patch to get some water and I was up at the house playin' the git-tar and my mother came in; whopped me n'cause I didn't come back—I was playin' the git-tar: "Sugar babe I'm tired of you, / Ain't your honey but the way you do, / Sugar babe, it's all over now . . ."'

In Glen Alyn's I Say Me for a Parable: The Oral Autobiography of Mance Lipscomb, 1993, Lipscomb talks of encountering Dylan (and of RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT first hearing of Lipscomb when Dylan played him a Lipscomb record) but specifies no dates. Lipscomb says Dylan followed him to 'Berkeley University' and then 'from Berkeley to the UCLA. . . . And when I went off a duty he was settin round me, an hear what I was sayin, an pick up a lot of songs. He could imitate. But he wadna playin no gittah. Then. Takin you know, learnin from his head.' On May 18, 1963, Dylan appeared on the same bill as Lipscomb at the first Monterey Folk Festival.

Lipscomb must have been an invaluable contact for Dylan—the one a black Texan with a personal repertoire stretching back to 1908 and incorporating songs a generation or two older than that, the other a white Minnesotan would-be artist of the whole American people born in 1941. Not only could Dylan have gained a knowledge ready to work for him but also, in a specific and personalised testimony, a feeling for the intimacy of connection of words and music in the expression of a spirit and a theme.

Lipscomb's repertoire included 'Jack O'Diamonds Is a Hard Card to Play' (he was field-recorded performing it in his hometown area the first time he ever recorded), which is a title-phrase picked up wholesale and retailed by Bob Dylan inside a piece of his own work that is not a blues. It is, in fact, from one of those poems he calls Some Other Kinds of Songs . . . , published on the back sleeve of the album Another Side of Bob Dylan. This long and generally inferior poem repeats several times, and then ends with, 'jack o' diamonds / is a hard card t' play.'

Other songs Lipscomb recorded include 'Baby Please Don't Go', 'You Gonna Quit Me' (the BLIND BLAKE song on Dylan's Good as I Been to You, retitled 'You Ain't Gonna Quit Me' by Lipscomb), 'Corrina Corrina', 'Mama, Let Me Lay It on You', a song called 'When Death Comes Creeping in Your Room'—a title that strongly suggests it may prefigure Dylan's 'Watcha Gonna Do'—and 'Night Time Is the Right Time'. In the section called 'Playing for the White Folks' in the Glen Alyn book, Lipscomb claims that Dylan took 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' from 'his' 'Mama, Let Me Lay It on You'.

[Mance Lipscomb: 'Jack O' Diamonds Is a Hard Card to Play', Navasota, TX, summer 1960; Mance Lipscomb Texas Sharecropper & Songster, Arhoolie LP 1001, El Cerrito, CA, 1960. 'Night Time Is the Right Time', nia; Mance Lipscomb Vol. 4, Arhoolie LP 1033, El Cerrito, CA, nia.]

Little Richard [1932 -] Richard Penniman, the self-styled King of Rock'n'Roll, was born in Macon, Georgia, on December 5, 1932. Such was his explosive impact in late 1955 that many baby boomers remember better where they were when they first heard Little Richard than when they heard that Kennedy was killed—the assassination of 'melody' being more vividly felt.

To comprehend his impact, picture yourself stuck in the mid-1950s as puberty strikes. Life has been drab. The grown-ups talk about 'before the war' all the time; it has cast a long shadow over your childhood. In Britain, ration-books have only just disappeared. Few people have TV. School is like the army. Everybody's house is cold and you must eat up your liver and rice-pudding. Your parents listen to awful, syrupy music on their radiogram by people like Bing Crosby and FRANK SINATRA, who think they're so smooth and sophisticated and who imagine that these are virtues.

AWOPBOPALOOBOPALOPBAMBOOM!

By the time you're halfway through hearing Little Richard's first hit, 'Tutti Frutti', your mind has been mangled by this mad, wild, delicious gibberish from a human voice like no other, roaring and blathering above a band cranking along like a fire truck running amok in the night. By the time the record finishes, you have glimpsed the possibilities of a whole new universe. All those sophisticats defeated at a stroke. Enter glorious barbarity, chaos and sex.

With only half a dozen others (FATS, Bill Haley, ELVIS, CHUCK, JERRY LEE, BUDDY), Little Richard laid down the blueprint for what the whole of rock'n'roll was going to be like. And among that few, he stood out as the blackest, the hottest, the most exhibitionist, the loudest.

Richard Penniman was one of 12 children. His father made bootleg whiskey and his uncles were preachers. He was raised in the Seventh Day Adventist Church, where he learnt piano and sang in the choir. But he became a hooligan, claimed to have been thrown out of the house at 13, and played medicine shows and a club in Fitzgerald, Georgia, before hitching the country road from Macon through peach-trees and Spanish moss and black-water swamps to the big city, Atlanta, where he signed to RCA Records in 1951. He sounded like blues shouter Roy Brown, and his first record, 'Taxi Blues' c/w 'Every Hour', issued 1952, epitomises the dreary music that jazz people scorn for its crudeness and everyone else dislikes for its jazziness. After six more sides he was dropped from the label.

His optimism undimmed but his style still unformed, he moved across to Houston, to Don Robey's indy label, Peacock. Here, backed by the Tempo Toppers and the Johnny Otis Band, his sides included an unsuccessful first go at his own fine blues composition 'Directly from My Heart to You', and a 'Maybe I'm Right' built upon the delicate, elaborately filigreed vocal style he would reveal again years later on slow gospel numbers but that would sometimes augment his rock sides too, as on the hit 'She's Got It', where that word 'got' is twiddled into ten syllables.

The Peacock deal failed, and at the beginning of the year that was to end in triumph for him, Little Richard went back to Macon and took a day-job washing dishes. He sent a new demo to Art Rupe, a white entrepreneur who'd set up another of the South's indy labels, Specialty Records, in 1945: an outfit that, like Sun in Memphis, would come to concentrate on rock'n'roll, instead of assuming, like the majors, that this would soon pass. Indeed Rupe would become so convinced that Little Richard's raw, driving style defined the future that he would turn down SAM COOKE as too pallid.

Brought to New Orleans and put together with almost the same hot R&B band that backed Fats Domino, Penniman and producer Bumps Blackwell went into J&M Studios on September 14, 1955, and came out with 'Tutti Frutti', its obscene lyric reworked into acceptable nonsense in the studio by local writer Dot La Bostrie. Selling 500,000 despite being covered by Pat Boone, it made no.21 on the US pop chart as well as no.2 on the R&B list.

A cascade of hits, all frantic but tight, established Little Richard as a prime creative force in rock'n'roll. His piano-work, crucial to his sound, was limited to hammered chords and skitterish riffing (he didn't even play it himself on 'Tutti Frutti') but with that megaphone voice and falsetto squeal, the bursting energy and powerhouse band, his records fast became classics: songs every local group in the West had to play every Saturday night long into the future; songs the other rock giants made versions of; songs that also fired the ambition of those whose own music would change the 1960s, the Beatles and Bob Dylan.

'Long Tall Sally', 'Slippin' and Slidin'', 'Rip It Up', 'Ready Teddy' and 'She's Got It' were all 1956. 1957 gave us the title song of the film The Girl Can't Help It, 'Lucille', 'Send Me Some Lovin'', 'Jenny Jenny Jenny', 'Miss Ann' and 'Keep a Knockin''. 1958 produced the last great batch: 'Good Golly Miss Molly', 'True Fine Mama' and a glorious pillage of the music-hall oldie 'Baby Face'.

It's obvious now from the titles alone that something formularised soon set in with these records. Back then it was just how Little Richard was: an unstoppable force. Within the flailing combustion of 'True Fine Mama' we now recognise a conventional 12-bar blues; at the time we heard formless galactic meltdown.

Similarly, it might seem obvious now that Little Richard's presentation was partly that of outrageous queen, and his catchphrase 'Ooh ma soul!' pure camp. But these were clichés from the future. When rock'n'roll and Little Richard were new, his preening and boasting and benign lasciviousness seemed highly individual to him.

Besides, his sexuality was no simple thing. As his innovatively candid autobiography revealed (The Life & Times of Little Richard the Quasar of Rock, as told to Charles White, 1984), he fancied men and women but most of all himself. Here we learnt of Buddy Holly's enormous penis, and of an unforgettable incident backstage with Buddy, Richard and his girlfriend Angel: 'Buddy was having sex with Angel, I was jacking off . . . when they introduced his name on stage. He was trying to rush. . . . He made it too. . . . He came and he went!'

It's impossible to overestimate the beneficial effect back then of such open sexual flexibility: with this characteristic off-the-wall daring, Little Richard made a contribution to sexual politics as well as rock'n'roll.

The combination prefigured the styles of later black heroes with white audiences. JIMI HENDRIX learnt a lot from playing guitar behind Penniman all across the USA. And as Richard noted, 'You saw Prince on stage and you saw Little Richard, right? The little moustache, the moves, the physicality. He's a genius but he learnt it from me. I was wearing purple before he was born. I was wearing make-up before anyone else.'

But touring Australia in 1957, the unbelievable happened. The papers said he'd stood on Sydney Harbour Bridge and thrown his gold and diamond rings into the water, renouncing rock'n'roll and the Devil and going over to God.

For a few years he did. The man who'd once said of gospel music that 'I knew there had to be something louder than that, and I found it was me' now divided his time between Bible-school in Huntsville, Alabama, and the Seventh Day Adventist Church in Times Square, New York. Specialty kept the hits going through to 1959, when the last of a long line was reached with a game 'By the Light of the Silvery Moon', but it was the end of an era.

Elvis was away, Holly was dead, and black and white tastes in music were moving apart again, the one toward a new R&B that would soon turn into soul, the other toward teeny-clean pop. Richard Penniman went back into the studio with God and Quincy Jones on his side. He made religious records, starting with the LP It's Real for Mercury (including a shimmering bravura version of 'Peace in the Valley', which Dylan would perform rather less well in concert in 1989); but he kept the old egomania: he now billed himself 'King of the Gospel Singers'. 1962 saw one supreme meeting of the old and new: a single called 'He Got What He Wanted (But He Lost What He Had)', a sermon but delivered in utterly vintage style: a churning, steaming, bellowing, funny, irreverent tour de force to equal 'Long Tall Sally'.

Soon after, he returned to rock'n'roll, went back briefly to Specialty Records, cut a single called 'Bama Lama Bama Loo' (!), and revisited Britain in 1963 on a package with BO DIDDLEY, THE EVERLY BROTHERS and this new group called THE ROLLING STONES. As the British style writer Nik Cohn testified, 'he cut them all to shreds'. When he stood on top of the piano, took a ring off his finger and threw it into the audience, even those at the back dived forward, hypnotised by this consummate artist and frothing lunatic.

But fashions had moved on and it was to be downhill for two decades of failed comebacks, indifferent re-recordings and embarrassing live theatrics in place of solid rock. The exceptions were fine, lasting versions of 'Lawdy Miss Clawdy' in 1964 and 'Bring It on Home to Me' in 1966, and 1970s covers of THE BEATLES' 'I Saw Her Standing There' and the Stones' 'Brown Sugar' that served to remind us that he had inspired those songs and their writers in the first place. Attempts to update himself brought little success and involved much compromise, and in 1976 he went back to the Lord.

In the 1980s, however, the world and Little Richard were ready for each other again, and in 1985 the unstable rocker without a record deal appeared, briefly but with presence, all smiles and Hollywood good health, in the hit film Down and Out in Beverly Hills, to which he also contributed the awkwardly titled song 'Great Gosh a Mighty'. It says much for his unquenchable charm that at the same time as publishing his upfront autobiography he could remake himself into a thriving Disney favourite, with an album of children's songs and a TV series to match, on which a revisited 'Keep a-Knockin'' incorporated the swapping of knock-knock jokes with his new young audience.

He never resolved his unstable contradictions, even though he regained the showbiz mainstream. After Hollywood and Disney he appeared at rock revival festivals and refused to sing his hits; in 1993 it was announced that the 60-year-old gospeler and rocker had 'become Jewish' and could not fulfil engagements on Fridays. In 1996, still gloriously incongruous, he appeared in 'Baywatch', performing on the boardwalk with grand piano to an adoring audience of the beswimsuited, his eerily plastic-smooth face looking that of a 35-year-old from a different planet.

Like so many others, Bob Dylan gave him a special hero's place in his adolescent heart. In the second extant recording we have of Dylan, made informally in his home in 1958, the first song of the four recorded, and the only one to capture such an early Robert Zimmerman composition, was called 'Hey Little Richard'; the third song was Richard's 'Jenny Jenny'. In the Hibbing High School yearbook for 1959, Dylan wrote against the interrogative word 'Ambition': 'To join Little Richard'.

Eventually, Little Richard joined him, being persuaded, somewhat out of character, to be one of the many back-up singers at Bob's Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame Induction in 1988. When Dylan made his acceptance speech, he was quick to say this: 'I'd like to thank a couple of people who are here tonight who helped me out a great deal coming up. Little Richard, who's sitting over there. I don't think I'd have even started without listening to Little Richard.'

Seven years earlier, Dylan had been recording the Shot of Love album. The title track was co-produced by Chuck Plotkin, Bob Dylan and . . . Bumps Blackwell, the producer and band-leader on 'Tutti Frutti' and the rest.

If the opening words of Dylan's 'It Ain't Me Babe'—'Go 'way from my window / Leave at your own chosen speed'—peculiarly resemble Little Richard's 'Keep a-Knockin'' ('but you can't come in') that's because both are built, in their very different ways, upon phrases or fragments from a host of half-remembered as well as well-remembered songs, from the traditional 'Go Way from My Window', collected by folklorist John Jacob Niles and sung by Dylan on the May 1960 St. Paul, Minnesota, tape, through to a cluster of blues songs that use this formulaic blues pattern: 'Get away from my window, honey babe get away from my door . . . / Say you get away from my window, don't knock at my door . . . / Said get away from my window mama, don't knock at my back door . . . / Get away from my window, stop knockin' on my door . . . / Go away from my window, stop knocking at my door.' Little Richard was the first to appropriate this for rock'n'roll, Bob the first to re-appropriate it for 1960s modernism. Likewise, perhaps, Bob followed Little Richard into nursery rhyme. The ring-game song 'Sally Water', with its 'Shake it to the east, Sally shake it to the west, Sally / Shake it to the very one that you love the best, Sally'—lies very recognisably behind 1955's 'Tutti Frutti'; Dylan's flabby equivalent, on his very interesting nursery-rhyme-based album Under the Red Sky, is 'Wiggle Wiggle', while Sally becomes the 'back-alley Sally' who can 'do the American Jump' on the same album's closing track, 'Cat's in the Well'.

(Under the Red Sky co-producer DON WAS claimed in an interview that 'Wiggle Wiggle' is Dylan writing 'Tutti Frutti'; but the Dylan song is retro, stale, guarded and uninventive where Little Richard's invented something exciting that was radical, fresh and open. 'Wiggle Wiggle' is to 'Tutti Frutti' as Kenny Ball is to Louis Armstrong.)

Few people can shock a whole new world into existence by sheer creative conviction. Little Richard came close. He placed his unique persona at the service of sexual freedom, black pride and anti-stereotyping, way back in the drab Dwight Eisenhower world, before these were even known concepts, and in this way he dragged us forwards into the future. By shaping rock'n'roll, he shaped us all.

[Little Richard: 'Long Tall Sally', New Orleans, 7 Feb 1956, Specialty 572, Hollywood, 1956. The 'go n'way from my window' blues cluster quoted respectively from Papa Charlie Jackson: 'Papa's Lawdy Lawdy Blues', Chicago, c.Aug 1924; Blind Boy Fuller: 'Stealing Bo-Hog', NY, 7 Sep 1937; 'Memphis Jug Blues', Memphis, 24 Feb 1927; Anna Bell: 'Every Woman Blues', Long Island City, NY, c.Sep 1928; and Noah Lewis (with Gus Cannon): 'Going to Germany', Chicago, 1 Oct 1929. Don Was interview: LA, 15 Oct 1990, the Telegraph no.37, Romford, Essex, UK, winter 1990.]

'Little Sadie' See 'In Search of Little Sadie' / 'Little Sadie' and Ashley, Clarence.

Live Aid [1985] An enormous co-ordinated series of pop music events—recordings and concerts—prompted, and in the latter case organised, by BOB GELDOF, in response to the 1984 famine in Ethiopia, which had been brought to the western world's attention by gruelling TV news coverage, primarily by a BBC team fronted by reporter Michael Buerk.

The recording of the US-based charity-fund-raising single 'We Are the World' (written by Michael Jackson and Lionel Richie) took place on January 28 at A&M Studios, Hollywood, under producer Quincy Jones. Dylan is one of many vocalists contributing a line or two individually as well as ensemble singing. A tape with 21 takes circulated, several of which are included in the officially released video The Making of We Are the World, issued February 1986. The single itself (spliced together from four takes) was released March 11, 1985 and included on the album USA for Africa: We Are the World in April. For a detailed account of the recording, at once funny and dispiriting, see JOHN BAULDIE's 'We Are the World' in The Telegraph no.20.

The main US concert took place at the John F. Kennedy Stadium in Philadelphia on July 13, 1985, at which a cavalcade of stars appeared in an international bill topped by Bob Dylan. The concert was televised live, so that untold millions of viewers around the world watched Dylan come on, flanked by (you couldn't say 'supported by') RON WOOD and KEITH RICHARDS, and saw him give one of the most dishevelled, debilitatingly drunken performances of his career.

They had rehearsed together—all playing acoustic guitars—at Wood's New York home the previous day (running through 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', 'Girl of the North Country', 'Trouble' and 'Blowin' in the Wind'). In the event, the songs Dylan offered, apt choices in theory but distressingly mauled in practise, were 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', 'When the Ship Comes In' and 'Blowin' in the Wind'. He then joined the ensemble cast for the final number of the event, 'We Are the World', though it was noticeable that he left the stage early and abruptly, before the song's end.

Dylan further fell from grace on this occasion by delivering a short speech, as follows, after his 'Ballad of Hollis Brown' (and sending Bob Geldof into incandescent rage):

> 'Thank you. I thought that was a fitting song for this important occasion. You know while I'm here, I just hope that some of the money that's raised for the people in Africa, maybe they could just take just a little bit of it, one or two million maybe, and use it to, maybe use it to pay the mortgages on some of the farms, that the farmers here owe to the banks.'

Calling for millions of dollars to be diverted from starving Africans and given to Americans did not go down well—except apparently with WILLIE NELSON, who, watching at home, was inspired to move towards organising Farm Aid. Some good, therefore, came from Dylan's befuddled, breathtakingly insensitive, well-meaning remarks. In his further defence it might be added that there was nothing dishonourable in Dylan's being, as he visibly was, desperately embarrassed by the whole spectacle of these superstars patting themselves on the back while advancing their global profiles in the name of charity—so that one might not wish to rush to judgment on Dylan's failure to 'behave himself'. Perhaps it was also to his credit that he, and he alone, chose 'this important occasion' to mention the rôle of American banks in the rich-poor divide.

Nevertheless, with the sorry sight and sound of Dylan's performance, he finally blew his automatic right to be the headline name at any gathering of international superstars.

(For a fuller discussion of these topics, see Clive Wilshire, 'Charity Is Supposed to Cover Up a Multitude of Sins', reprinted in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, ed. MICHAEL GRAY & John Bauldie, 1987.)

20 years later, when Bob Geldof returned to the African fray and organised Live 8, Dylan was conspicuous by his absence. He had not been invited to appear.

[Various Artists: 'We Are the World', single, Columbia US7-04839, NY; album, Columbia 40 043, NY; both 1985. John Bauldie: 'We Are the World', The Telegraph no.20, Bury, UK, summer 1985.]

Live at the Gaslight 1962 [2005] This CD, originally available only from the Starbucks Corporation's US coffee-shops, but produced by Sony BMG, comes in a digipak with a 12-page booklet with liner notes by SEAN WILENTZ.

The album's ten tracks are 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', 'Rocks and Gravel', 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', 'The Cuckoo Is a Pretty Bird', 'Moonshiner', 'Handsome Molly' (previously released on the Japan-only CD Bob Dylan Live 1961–2000: Thirty-Nine Years of Great Concert Performances in February 2001), 'Cocaine', 'John Brown', 'Barbara Allen' and 'West Texas'.

These give us in better quality ten out of the 17 previously circulating song performances—though Wilentz's booklet states that the 17 come from two separate sets. The seven omitted are: 'No More Auction Block' (already issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 box set), 'Black Cross' (long ago issued on the Great White Wonder bootleg but never issued officially), 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', 'Motherless Children', 'Kind-Hearted Woman Blues' (the ROBERT JOHNSON song) and 'See That My Grave Is Kept Clean'.

It seems a missed opportunity not to include these other Gaslight performances, both for completeness' sake and because some of the omitted tracks are among the best: 'Black Cross' is one of Dylan's finest early works, with an absolute mastery of timing and of assumed accents.

A version of the same CD, but with different artwork, was also available for a limited time in Belgium—in Belgium only—through the weekly magazine Humo, in which two October 2005 editions included exclusive vouchers that, with the addition of 12 Euros, could be exchanged for the album in branches of the Standaard Boekhandel bookstore chain's stores. This digipak version of the CD, in a brown slipcase, reads 'Humo presenteert Bob Dylan Live at the Gaslight 1962'.

[Bob Dylan: Live at the Gaslight 1962, NY, Oct 1962, Columbia/Legacy A 96016, US (COL 82876728622, Belgium), 2005.]

Lofgren, Nils [1951 -] Nils Lofgren was born in Chicago on June 21, 1951 and became a highly distinctive rock singer and electric lead guitarist, whose high, light voice is full of warmth and an expressive generosity and shakes as if with sheer delirious energy—sometimes shown physically on stage when he was young by the back-flips for which he was famous. Now that he's in his 50s these may no longer happen. After first learning to play accordion and then joining NEIL YOUNG's band at 17, playing piano on the album After the Gold Rush and others, he became a member of Crazy Horse just long enough to appear on the band's 1971 album. He then formed his own band, Grin, which made four albums—the first work on which Nils Lofgren's own spirit and songwriting skills were set free. These were virtually indistinguishable from the post-Grin solo albums of the mid-1970s: Nils Lofgren (1975), Cry Tough (1976), I Came to Dance (1977) and Night After Night (1978).

These albums also yielded some hit singles and much radio airplay, and it was a shock to many of those who regarded him as a consequential star in his own right when in 1984 he subsumed himself into the very secondary rôle of playing guitar in BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN's band, which seemed a back-flip of the wrong kind, and surely an unprecedented move for a so big-name an artist.

He did continue to make solo albums, and to tour; he twice became a member of RINGO STARR's All-Starr Band. Lofgren's very confident solo album of 1991, Silver Lining, put some of these people behind him: Springsteen, Ringo Starr, LEVON HELM (who sang on three tracks), Billy Preston and Clarence Clemons among them. But in 1999 he rejoined the newly re-formed E Street Band behind Springsteen once again.

He has only done Bob Dylan the favour of playing on stage with him three times. On October 20, 1996, at the Amphitheater in Mesa, Arizona, Lofgren came on for the last four numbers of Dylan's concert, playing guitar on 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'Alabama Getaway', 'Girl of the North Country' and the unavoidable 'Rainy Day Women #12 & 35'. In 1999 he and STEVIE VAN ZANDT (who also rejoined the Springsteen band that year) appeared on stage together at Dylan's April 25 concert in Zurich, playing on the rather fresher final encore number 'Not Fade Away'.

In New York City on August 12, 2003, Nils Lofgren appeared on Dylan's stage again, this time very early on—after the fourth number—and for the rest of the set not only played guitar and slide guitar but lit up the whole concert. As JOHN BALDWIN summarised a punter's report of proceedings: 'This was a show where the set-list didn't matter, the songs didn't matter. It was all about the performance. Lofgren was beyond phenomenal, but his presence reminded the band what it was all about and most important of all he inspired Dylan to give what was quite possibly his best performance this year.'

Nils Lofgren's 'I Came to Dance' includes the line 'I'm not Bob Dylan but I never miss a beat'.

[Nils Lofgren: 'I Came to Dance', nia, I Came to Dance, US, 1977; Silver Lining, Rykodisc RCD-10170, US, 1991. John Baldwin, Desolation Row Information Service e-mail, 14 Aug 2003.]

Lomax, Alan [1915 - 2002] Alan Lomax was born in Austin, Texas, on January 31, 1915, the son of the indefatigable folklorist John A. Lomax. He was driven all his life by the need to prove himself to his father in the same field—which he more than managed. It is not possible here to list or delineate his unparalleled success as a collector of folksongs and blues in many lands; it must be enough to note that had he not chosen the path he did, our entire understanding of American music would be immeasurably the poorer and our troves of recorded sound vastly less. Everything would have developed differently without him: the Library of Congress would be smaller, its archive of pre-war field-recordings less extensive and less valued; the Folk Revival movement would have supped on a far thinner gruel and the conditions that nurtured Bob Dylan's career so different that Dylan's own creative canon could not have been the same.

Lomax was—to mention merely a couple of ways his work concretely affected Dylan's—a great advocate of WOODY GUTHRIE's importance ('No modern American poet or folk singer has made a more significant contribution to our culture'), and a tireless field-recorder, like his father, of men on prison farms (not least in father and son thus first recording LEADBELLY), so retrieving exactly the kind of magical material HARVEY ABRAMS said that the young Bob Dylan was a purist about ('He had to get the oldest record and, if possible, the Library of Congress record').

Dylan refers to Lomax directly a number of times in Chronicles Volume One, introducing him first as 'the great folk archivist' and a few pages on describing a tangible feature of the Village's musical topography, 'Alan Lomax's loft on 3rd Street. Lomax used to have parties twice a month where he'd bring folksingers to play. . . . You might see Roscoe Holcomb or CLARENCE ASHLEY or Dock Boggs, MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT, Robert Pete Williams or even Don Stover and The Lilly Brothers—sometimes, even real live section gang convicts that Lomax would get out of state penitentiaries on passes and bring to New York to do field hollers in his loft. The invitees to these gatherings would most likely be local doctors, city dignitaries, anthropologists, but there'd always be some regular folk there too. I'd been there once or twice . . .'

On January 20, 1988 Alan Lomax was, bizarrely, in the audience during Dylan's acceptance speech at his induction into the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame; Dylan included Lomax in his thanks, adding: 'I spent many nights at his apartment house listening to and meeting all kinds of folk music people which I never would have come in contact with.'

Dylan was also taped by Lomax at this apartment, in early 1963 (the tape is undated but has to have been made after Dylan returned from England that January and before the assassination of Kennedy on November 22). The result consists of Dylan singing a rather beautiful version of 'Masters of War', Lomax asking him where he wrote it and Dylan going into a somewhat drunken-sounding monologue about having written it in England where people don't like Kennedy and then about General de Gaulle and Russian Premier Khruschev. Altogether the tape last around eight minutes, with the singing running to four and a half.

This item was unlogged by Dylan discographers until very recently. The Alan Lomax Archive keeps adding to its online lists, and this item only appeared in fall 2005, though it had been offered to Dylan's office as an item for inclusion in the No Direction Home movie some time earlier (but not used).

By the time he made this tape, Dylan had also known some of Alan Lomax's own performing of folksong. The album of sea-shanties he was introduced to by SPIDER JOHN KOERNER back in Minneapolis included, he remembers, 'Alan Lomax himself singing the cowboy song "Doney Gal", which I added to my repertoire.' Indeed he did: he was recorded performing it in his sweetest pre-New York voice as early as May 1960 in a St. Paul apartment. Later, at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL of 1965, it was Alan Lomax who introduced the PAUL BUTTERFIELD blues band with some disparaging comment that no-one can quite remember (it is quoted differently in every account), prompting Dylan's manager ALBERT GROSSMAN to wrestle him to the ground. Lomax was 50 years old at the time; he had decades of work still to achieve.

As it happened, by this point Lomax had long since impinged upon Dylan's personal life too: in 1961, Lomax's personal assistant was one Carla Rotolo, and through her, Dylan was introduced to her younger sister, SUZE ROTOLO.

Lomax's biggest book, The Land Where the Blues Began, was published in 1993, when he was 78 years old. He had become an eloquent writer about the geography of the Delta, as well as about its music, and equally good on the work song as the main source of the poetry of the blues. By now he was, too, unafraid to make the broadest kind of statement, as here: 'Singing and making music are a kind of dreaming out loud, pulling the listener into the dream and thus taking care of his deep needs and feelings.'

Alan Lomax was no saint—but since this has not been the place to list his achievements, nor should it be the place to list his faults. He died at age 87, on July 19, 2002.

[Alan Lomax, quote on Guthrie from The Penguin Book of American Folk Songs, Harmondsworth, UK: 1964. Other works include many co-written with his father, plus The Folk Songs of North America, Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1960 and The Land Where the Blues Began, New York: Pantheon, 1993. Lomax taped interview with Dylan listed at www.lomaxarchive.com/guide-audio.jsp, foot of page, seen online 9 Oct 2005; the tape is Alan Lomax Collection aggregate no.AFC 200404, tape no.T1248. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, pp.55, 70 & 239.]

Lone Justice An over-hyped early 1980s pioneering cow-punk group, Lone Justice was fronted by country-rock Tammy'n'Dolly singer and songwriter Maria McKee, who soon went solo and among much else co-wrote a song called 'Nobody's Child' with ROBBIE ROBERTSON on her début solo album. Lone Justice's eponymously titled first album, released in 1985, was produced by Jimmy Iovine and featured 'special guests Annie Lennox and STEVE VAN ZANDT'.

It might have included Bob Dylan too, since he dropped in on one of their New York sessions for the album, probably in November 1984, and played rhythm guitar on their recording of his own obscure Empire Burlesque outtake song 'Go 'Way Little Boy'. This was excluded from their album and issued only as one of the two tracks on the UK B-side of their 12-inch single 'Sweet Sweet Baby (I'm Falling)', a song co-written by McKee, Van Zandt and BENMONT TENCH.

Dylan was rumoured to have played harmonica on 'Go 'Way Little Boy' too. Both the 1999 and the 2003 retrospective collection releases of the track state that the harmonica is by Maria McKee, but these versions are re-mixes, so the truth remains, as so often, unclear. The original mix from the 1985 B-side has not been reissued. It is also rumoured that Lone Justice recorded 'Clean Cut Kid' at the same session, again accompanied by Dylan; if so this remains uncirculated as well as unissued.

Maria McKee was interviewed about the Dylan connection in 1987, and asked how come Dylan had given the group a song. She answered:

'That came about through Carole Childs, who was the woman who originally signed me to Geffen Records. She was very close to Dylan—very, very close—and she brought him to a gig or something. A long time ago. She said, "Why don't you write Maria a song?" He said, "OK." How she talked him into it I don't know but he did it. And—and it was real cool. He came down to the studio when we were recording our first album and taught us the song. And he stayed around. He brought RON WOOD with him and they played on it. . . . And we ended up hanging out 'til like two in the morning in the studio. . . . We ended up working on it a very long time because he didn't like the way that I sang it—until I sang it like him! It got to the point where finally I just did my best Bob Dylan imitation—and he said, "Ah, now you're doin' some real singing!" That's exactly what he said: "Now you're doin' some real singing."'

Lone Justice's second album, Shelter, 1986, was its last, except for Lone Justice in Concert, recorded for and released by the BBC in Britain in 1987.

[Lone Justice: 'Sweet Sweet Baby (I'm Falling)' (re-mix) c/w 'Stay 'Way Little Boy' & 'Pass It On', Geffen TX 6426, UK, 1985; Lone Justice, Geffen/CBS GHS 24060, US, 1985; Shelter, Geffen/WEA GHS 24122-1, 1986; Lone Justice in Concert, BBC CN4885S (LP), UK, 1987, CD-reissued Windsong WIND048, UK, 1993. Remixed 'Go 'Way Little Boy' on The World Is Not My Home, Geffen/BMG GEFD 25304, US, 1999 & 20th Century Masters: The Millennium Collection, Geffen/Universal 860985, US, 2003. Maria McKee quote from interview by Thomas Lasarzik, Munich, 10 Mar 1987, in The Telegraph no. 27, Romford, UK, summer 1987, p.30.]

'Lone Pilgrim' [1993] This is the song of spectral calm with which Dylan closes his solo acoustic album of 1993 (his last such album), World Gone Wrong. He writes in his liner-notes that it 'is from an old DOC WATSON record.' But long before Doc Watson recorded it, 'Lone Pilgrim' was a piece of core repertoire of the always unaccompanied and now legendary Aunt Mollie Jackson. In 1939 a Jackson performance of this song was field-recorded by the omnipresent ALAN LOMAX for the Library of Congress (and issued 22 years later).

Aunt Molly Jackson begins her performance by remarking that the song was always a favourite of her grandfather's as well as of her own. It might be assumed that, as with 'St. James' Hospital', Doc Watson has been fed this repertoire directly by Alan Lomax: except that the sleevenotes to Watson's record say that it was his father's favourite hymn. In any case, the lyric Doc Watson sings, and that Bob Dylan uses word for word, is both more poetic than Aunt Mollie Jackson's and at moments dangerously close to being more 'poetic' instead, and it has four lines that simply aren't there in the version Aunt Mollie Jackson performed for Lomax.

Jackson's version veers between creditable straightforwardness and the dully prosaic; the Watson-Dylan version just manages to avoid the faults of leaning the other way. This is surely a very old song either tampered with, or more likely written by, one of those 19th century men of the church who so much enjoyed re-writing folksongs by a process of empurplement. When this is done to a very good, robust old ballad, as happened to so many of the songs of 19th century Ireland, the new version gets put into print, played in the drawing-room for a few faddish years and soon dropped as dated, mannered and artificial. If we're lucky, the people who can't read go on singing the older, unempurpled version and it survives down the generations, oblivious to drawing-room tastes that come and go. But when a song that isn't so good in the first place gets set upon by a Victorian man of letters or hobbyist-poet of above-average instinct, or originates with such a person, it may be that versions of differing degrees of gentrification can co-exist more equably. 'Lone Pilgrim' is surely such a song, and the gentleman in question may have been a John Ellis, a William Walker or a B.F. White.

White, a 19th century folksong collector, singer and teacher from Georgia still given a composer credit on the Doc Watson and Bob Dylan albums, is first credited with its authorship in the 1911 edition of an anthology he had edited and first published back in 1844; but the song had not been included in the 1844 edition, and first saw publication three years after this, in the second edition of another anthology, Southern Harmony, a collection of hymns edited by White's brother-in-law, William Walker, a popular figure known as Singin' Billy. Southern Harmony sold 600,000 copies in the South between 1835 and the Civil War. 'The Lone Pilgrim' wasn't in that 1835 edition; it makes its first appearance in print in the edition of 1847, with Walker crediting the song to himself. (Watson and Dylan both attribute 'Lone Pilgrim' to B.F. White and J.M. Pace; but Pace's is in fact only an arranger's credit, and B.F. White is claimed to be the sole composer.)

In fact the song's origins are older than this. Gavin Selerie (in 'Tricks and Training: Some Dylan Sources and Analogues Part Two', in a 1995 Telegraph) suggests that aside from 'Jack-a-Roe' and 'Love Henry', 'Lone Pilgrim' is the oldest song on the album. He notes that its tune has been identified as that of the Scottish melody 'The Braes O' Ballquhidder', which may itself duplicate a still older tune, the Gaelic 'Brochun Buirn'. He notes too that folklorist D.K. Wilgus argues that 'Lone Pilgrim' is a variant of 'The White Pilgrim', whose text was written in 1838 by John Ellis, a preacher, after visiting the New Jersey grave of an evangelist, Joseph Thomas, who had been converted to the preaching life by meeting a 'believing Jew' who wandered moneyless, dressed in a long robe and preaching. Thomas began to do the same in 1815, travelling throughout the East and South on foot, dressed in white. Ellis visited his grave when it was 'fresh made' and wrote 'The White Pilgrim' afterwards.

John Ellis' text seems to have been revised by Singin' Billy Walker, making it, argues Selerie, 'more universal in reference and richer in imagery'. Did B.F. White then revise it again? Whoever fashioned which verses, all three of these men were of exactly the kind described earlier: teacherly amateur collectors of a religious bent and with literary aspirations.

The pen that has replaced the pinched and desiccated 'came to the spot' (Aunt Mollie Jackson) with the rich nebulousness of 'came to the place' (Watson-Dylan), has done the song a favour in its very opening line, banishing the inevitability of things earth-bound, and coming out at once in recognition of ethereal, weirder dimensions. It readies us for the delight, in the third line, of 'I heard something say'—not 'someone' but the occult 'something'—and so deepens our own receptivity as listeners to hearing from the realm of the dead: a prevalent possibility in the most moving kinds of folk ballad: in songs like 'Love Henry', in fact.

Similarly, Aunt Mollie Jackson's final line—'Has quietly conducted me home'—has been improved in the Watson-Dylan version by the change to 'kindly assisted me home'. The former makes God sound like a tight-lipped male nurse, escorting you back to the ward whether you like it or not: certainly a process requiring no uplift or desire by the soul concerned. Changed to 'kindly assisted' instead, it evokes the narrator's own ardour and effort, while at the same time, paradoxically, it makes the Master's hand much more akin to the human, with its hint of a journey in which one old soul leans upon the other and they make their slow way together.

The lines immediately before this last are also less effective in the Jackson version. Her 'The same hand that brought me / Through all dangers and fears' is replaced in Watson-Dylan by 'The same hand that led me / Through scenes most severe.' Again 'brought me' is less participatory, more automated, than 'led me'—the one has no resonance of any kind, the other suggests being taken childlike by the hand: it's more humane and gives the imagination something to see; and although both 'dangers and fears' and 'scenes most severe' avoid specifics, the former has a hint of sermonly rhetoric about it that the latter avoids. That word 'scenes', suggesting distance, gives an apt hint of the inviolability the speaker believes that God-given protection affords, while the phrase taken as a whole is simply the less tired of the two options.

One tiny change seems preferable on Aunt Mollie's version. Her pilgrim's body asks that the narrator tell her 'companions' and children not to weep; Dylan sings 'companion', which achieves a jarring dislocation of period, making it sound like a present-day politically correct term like 'significant other' or 'partner'.

Ms. Jackson's version omits a verse that Watson uses, and therefore that Dylan uses too, that is actually a compression of two verses from the song as published in the 1950s in G.P. Jackson's [no relation] Spiritual Folk Songs of Early America. These two are: 'The cause of my master compelled me from home, / I bade my companions farewell; / I blessed my dear children who now for me mourn,— / In far distant regions they dwell. / I wandered an exile and stranger from home / No kindred or relative nigh; / I met the contagion and sank to the tomb, / My soul flew to mansions on high.' [Punctuation as given.]

The compression that drops all but the opening line from the first of these verses and the first line from the second seems entirely meet. It clears away a good deal of the purple in the drawing-room curtains of such songs. The only line that Dylan might have been tempted to retain, had he known of its availability, is that 'I wandered an exile and stranger from home'—a sentiment he so often expresses in his own songs, takes up in songs by others and appreciates for its biblical import.

All three recordings also avoid the glutinous gilding of the religious lily offered by the extra final verse offered in G.P. Jackson's published text: 'And there is a crown that doth glitter and shine, / That I shall for evermore wear; / Then turn to the Savior, his love's all divine, / All you that would dwell with me there.' Again, well worth avoiding. (In any case, how many people's notion of heaven would involve dwelling with Aunt Mollie Jackson, especially with a crown forever on her head?)

That Jackson sings none of these verses gives her version, for all its lyric inferiority to Watson's, a stripped-down quality, a narrative reticence, that matches her unaccompanied, uncompromising and inelegant delivery. As Selerie comments, 'her stark delivery, slow and stretched out, gives us a sense of a fiercely independent and unbroken tradition. Whatever consolation is offered through the words, there remains a fidelity to the tough circumstances of life.'

Bob Dylan's interest is more in the question of fidelity to self. He is uncharacteristically straightforward in writing of the song's appeal: 'what attracts me to the song is how the lunacy of trying to fool the self is set aside at some given point. salvation & the needs of mankind are prominent & hegemony takes a breathing spell. "my soul flew to mansions on high".'

This re-states a core position Dylan has long, probably always, held. He expressed it on an earlier occasion like this: 'if you try to be anyone but yourself, you will fail; if you are not true to your own heart, you will fail,' just as in 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' he sings of 'the madness of becoming what one was never meant to be.' Among other things, the songs on these two albums amount to an investigation on Dylan's part as to how far he can remain true to, as it were, this folksong part of himself.

These rich, difficult 1990s acoustic albums, teeming as they are with the history of North America and her immigrants and exiles, from Europe and from Africa, take their leave too soon. 'Lone Pilgrim' takes its leave too soon, like the person who speaks from the tomb. But it provides yet another fine farewell from Bob Dylan, who is so very good at farewells at the ends of albums, and who has here provided us with so many pathways back into the ever-present past. As the song's conclusion has it, 'The same hand that led me through scenes most severe / Has kindly assisted me home.'

[Aunt Mollie Jackson: 'The Lone Pilgrim', nia, 1939; Aunt Mollie Jackson: Library of Congress Recordings Vol. 7 no. 4, Rounder 1002, Somerville, MA, 1961. B.F. White, The Sacred Harp, 1844; song 1st credited to him in the 1911 edn. William Walker, Southern Harmony and Musical Companion, 1835; 2nd edn., 1847, gave 1st publication to the song; a reprint of the 1854 3rd edn. was published LA c.1966. Gavin Selerie: 'Tricks and Training: Some Dylan Sources and Analogues (Part Two)', Telegraph no.51, UK, spring 1995. Details re the tune via Selerie from G.P. Jackson, ed., Spiritual Folk Songs of Early America, 1953, pp.47–48 & re the texts via Selerie from D.K. Wilgus: ' "The White Pilgrim": Song, Legend, and Fact', Southern Folklore Quarterly Vol.14, no.3 (pp.177–84), Florida, 1950. Buell Kazee recorded a version of 'The White Pilgrim', Kentucky, c.1956; Buell Kazee Sings & Plays, Folkways FS3810, NY, 1958. Bob Dylan, interview by Ron Rosenbaum, Burbank, CA, Nov 1977, 'The Playboy Interview', Playboy, Chicago, Mar 1978.]

Lonely Crowd, The* [1950] The Times' obituary of American sociologist David Riesman (1909–2002) included this: 'Riesman was the author of The Lonely Crowd, a book which wielded a huge influence on an increasingly self-scrutinising American middle class. . . . The Lonely Crowd sold more than a million copies, an astonishing number for a work of sociology at that time. It formed the subject of heated debate at the dinner parties of the 1950s, as well as in school classrooms and lecture theatres. Among other things it is credited with having influenced Bob Dylan to write the lines: "Standing next to me in this lonely crowd / Is a man who swears he's not to blame," in the song "I Shall Be Released".'

[Obituary of David Riesman, unsigned, The Times, London, 30 May 2002. NB: this gives the date of publication as 1951; 1950 is correct. David Riesman, The Lonely Crowd, New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1950.]

'loon, crazy as a . . .' 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream' includes 'Just then this cop comes down the street / Crazy as a loon'. In most places, this 'loon' is assumed to be an abbreviation from 'lunatic', but not in Dylan's home state of Minnesota, where the Common Loon (aka Great Northern Diver), is the state bird. It can be found in many parts of the US, however, and in Europe and Asia. John James Audubon wrote: 'There is an absurd notion, entertained by persons unacquainted with the nature of this bird, that its plaintive cries are a sure indication of violent storms. Sailors, in particular, are ever apt to consider these call-notes as portentous.' This is interesting in light of the suggestion that the iridescent keening sound Dylan makes on harmonica in solo performances on the 1966 UK tour—most noticeably on the officially released 'Mr. Tambourine Man' from Manchester—is strongly reminiscent of the distinctive cry of the loon.

[John James Audubon quoted from Audubon's Birds of America, 1840, 1st Octavo Edition, online 3 Jul 2005 at www.flyingmobiles.com/html/statebirds/common_loon.htm. The resemblance between Dylan's harmonica and the cry of the loon suggested by Ruth Williams, Fellow of Girton College, Cambridge, UK, 30 Jun 2005.]

Lord Buckley [1906 - 1960] Richard Myrle Buckley was born 15 miles west of Yosemite in the miserable mining and lumber town of Tuolumne, California, on April 5, 1906, to English immigrant parents. He was a talented mimic who grew up to pursue an edgy, perilous career as a unique vaudeville, radio and nightclub stand-up act, an iconoclastic hip raconteur. As Klas Gustafson puts it (courtesy of a translation from the Swedish—'under duress'—by IZZY YOUNG), Lord Buckley 'came on as a British aristocrat and sounded like black jazz.'

It was rumoured that, like Henry VIII, he had six wives—and there is a 1956 transcript of him being teased about this by Groucho Marx, who asks: 'Well, are you planning on fighting any more preliminaries or is this current one the main bout?' Much in Buckley's life was a matter of rumour, though, and like the young Bob Dylan who came to admire him (but who never saw him live: he was just too late), he manufactured many of the rumours about himself. He was also a practical joker, and is said to have had himself driven through city streets in a coffin so that he could open the lid and sit up en route, to shock passers-by and publicise his act. It's also said that FRANK SINATRA was a Buckley fan who would come to see him perform—till Buckley and an entourage reciprocated, turning up entirely naked to see Sinatra.

He launched his career in the 1920s, performing with travelling tent shows and marathon dances, and somehow thrived in the Depression of 1930s Chicago, where he owned a club, the Suzie Q, and learnt the jazz patois that he admired, adopted and adapted: it was, he said, 'a magical way of speaking. . . . a language of such power, purity and beauty that I found it irresistible.'

As someone else said, before LENNY BRUCE there was Lord Buckley—and he was, as Dylan said of Lenny, 'always on the outside of whatever side there was'. He was the inventor of the long, improvised hip comic narrative, his speech flowing with jazz rhythms and surreal elaboration, sometimes with scat singing thrown in.

His style continued to develop, hitting its peak in the late 1940s, when he began to be 'a name', enchanting audiences with endlessly inventive spiels based on stories from 'Willie the Shake' (Shakespeare), current events and the Bible, as in his ever-varying tour-de-force routine 'The Nazz' (i.e. the Nazarene). He often shared the stage with black musicians, and had long running battles against police harassment as a result. They often closed him down, and in the end they confiscated his cabaret card, making it illegal for him to work in any club.

Not all his work had been cod-sophisticated satire. 'Black Cross', a Lord Buckley monologue written by Joseph S. Newman, the actor Paul Newman's uncle, was a straightforward reading of Newman's anti-racist poem—and it was with this that Dylan started to prove his own skills as a mimic. He comes to 'Black Cross' very early on, performing it at his first concert—at the Carnegie Chapter Hall in New York City on November 4, 1961; recording it on the December 22, 1961 tape made privately back in Minnesota a month after he'd recorded his début album in New York, and performing the song again in 1962 at the Gaslight—it is, unfortunately, one of the numbers omitted from the official release Live at the Gaslight (2005), though it has circulated.

The Minnesota recording is simply great. He took it from Lord Buckley, but incontestably he made it his own. No-one in the world can deliver a talking song or a half-talking song as Bob Dylan can. It's a facet of his genius that he has remained in full control of, and it's certainly evident when he produces the perfect mimickry of the white voices and the black voice on 'Black Cross'. And what you hear there is not just mastery but Dylan's joy in exercising it: a generous, sharing joy.

Lord Buckley's recording of this piece, made in LA in February 1959, is on his album Way Out Humor, while Buckley's 1959 and early 1960 recordings of the Robert Service poem 'The Shooting of Dan McGrew', which Buckley titles 'The Ballad of Dan McGroo' (both posthumous releases, on Lord Buckley Blowing His Mind (And Yours Too) and Bad-Rapping the Marquis de Sade), have been suggested as influences on Dylan's 'Lily, Rosemary & the Jack of Hearts'. More certainly his posthumous release The Best of Lord Buckley (1963) stands on the mantelpiece on the front cover photograph of Dylan's Bringing It All Back Home. And Dylan once called him, rather grandly, 'the fuel to my success'.

Lord Buckley died in Columbus Hospital, New York, on November 12, 1960, probably from a stroke. He sounded about a hundred years old but he was only 54. His death certificate nonetheless read 'natural causes'. His ashes were scattered in Red Rock Canyon, just west of Las Vegas.

[Lord Buckley: 'Black Cross', LA, 12 Feb 1959, Way Out Humor, World Pacific WP-1279, LA, 1959; 'The Ballad of Dan McGroo', LA, 12 Feb 1959, Lord Buckley Blowing His Mind (And Yours Too), World Pacific WP-1849, LA, 1966; 'The Ballad of Dan McGroo', Oakland, CA, 1960, Bad-Rapping the Marquis de Sade, World Pacific WPS-21889, 1969; The Best of Lord Buckley, Crestview CRU-801 & CRU7-801, US, 1963.

Sources: www.lordbuckley.com, incl. Klas Gustafson, 'The Lord Who Became a Performer's Performer' (translation by Izzy Young); the very good entry on 'Black Cross' in Oliver Trager: Keys to the Rain: The Definitive Bob Dylan Encyclopedia, New York: Billboard, 2004, pp.41–44; the Salon interview (dated 26 Jun 2002, online at www.salon.com/people/feature/2002/06/26/buckley/index.html) by Douglas Cruikshank re Trager's book Dig Infinity!: The Life and Art of Lord Buckley New York: Welcome Rain, 2002; & discographical detail from Michael Gray, Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, London: Cassell Academic, 1999 & Continuum, 2000, p.591.]

"Love and Theft"* [2001] This is Dylan's 30th studio album, not counting compilations, and had the unfortunate release date of September 11, 2001. It was his first new studio album since Time Out of Mind four years earlier. The Dylan world seemed at once to divide into those finding it much less substantial and those taking to it far more wholeheartedly. All agreed that the two albums differ in nearly every respect.

DANIEL LANOIS' fingerprints are nowhere on "Love and Theft"; the musicians used are, for the first time, Dylan's Never-Ending Tour Band of the day, augmented by AUGIE MEYERS and his brother; there are no obviously great songs—no equivalent of 'Not Dark Yet' or 'Highlands'. But on "Love and Theft" a tumult of generously packed minor songs bump up boisterously against each other, like tuba players in a charabanc bouncing off on the excursion of a lifetime, calling to and fro amongst themselves in excited dialogue about everything under the sun. Dylan's voice is almost completely shot here, yet what he does with it is most subtlely nuanced and shrewdly judged. And he is in such a good mood! This is the warmest, most outgoing, most good-humoured Bob Dylan album since Nashville Skyline, if not The Basement Tapes.

On Time Out of Mind he finds himself singing something that may be a brave thing to say but a terrible one to feel: 'My sense of humanity has gone down the drain.' On "Love and Theft" he has recovered it and is looking at that humanity fondly, through Damon Runyon eyes. His multiplicity of characters is created with warmth and wit and a sense of fun, as if Dylan himself has thrown off a great weight of portentousness and remembered a better self, in hock to neither the obligation to be profound nor the sour defensiveness brought on by fame.

On Time Out of Mind the onset of old age is fretted away at, as when on 'Highlands' he looks at these young people in the park and would swap lives 'with any of them / In a minute' if he could —and it's dealt with head on in 'Not Dark Yet'. It isn't everyone who wants a song about there being nothing to look forward to but decay and the diminution of one's powers, of course: but if you do, 'Not Dark Yet' is it. But on "Love and Theft", old age is dealt with very differently: not as a theme, and not simplistically as a problem, but far more creatively, by Dylan's enacting a series of older persona, all with their own takes on life, their own quirks and absurdities and cares. As the songs jostle together, these enactments form an almost phantasmagoric throng, energised by a senior-citizen version of the surreal world Dylan gave us in Tarantula and the 'Clothes Line Saga', Mrs. Henry and the crazy people from 1965.

Old age is created in 3D on "Love and Theft". Here, as old people do, the songs' narrators are always mentioning their relatives: 'my mother', 'my father', 'my uncle', 'my grandmother', 'my cousin', my 'Aunt Sally / But you know she's not really my aunt'. Here 'my brother got killed in the war' and 'My sister she ran off and got married / Never was heard of any more'. Here too, throughout this body of song, Dylan creates, again as old people do, sudden conversational non sequiturs, sometimes of embarrassing directness—never more touchingly than on 'Lonesome Day Blues' when (combining the non sequitur with the citing of your relatives), he sings that he is '. . . forty miles from the mill—I'm droppin' it into overdrive / Settin' my dial on the radio—I wish my mother was still alive.'

As with older people too, you can't always be sure whether they're talking of yesterday or a hundred years ago, or sometime in between, or even further back. Different time-frames slide across in front of each other, frequently in mid-sentence. The album is soaked in hypersensitivity to the atmosphere of period. We know, hearing those lines about being 'forty miles from the mill' and 'droppin' it into overdrive' that we are in some patch of the 20th century, a time relatively recent yet infinitely long gone. It's recent enough that there are automobiles with radios and overdrive, yet it certainly isn't the present: no-one measures where they are by their distance from the mill anymore; the mills have all closed down. This is like driving through Georgia in the 1940s. At other moments, clearly we're in the time of the American Civil War, as when 'They went down the Ohio, the Cumberland, the Tennessee / All the rest of them rebel rivers'—and a fine example, that, of the undimmed expressiveness Dylan can bring to his maimed voice (when he bothers, as he so rarely does now in concert).

At other moments on the album, we are in the present, or comparing the present with the past—as when, for instance, immediately before those Civil War rivers flow, Dylan gives us that contemporary equivalent to the romantic dialogue of Romeo and Juliet, sketching so deftly the gracelessness of today's spotty teenagers' talk, not with scorn but warm understanding and comic relish: 'Romeo, he said to Juliet, "You got a poor complexion. / It doesn't give your appearance a very youthful touch!" / Juliet, she said back to Romeo / "Why don't you just shove off if it bothers you so much?" ' (See also Shakespeare in "Love and Theft".)

Other comic moments on the album are those created by the corny jokes that are yet another imaginative device for inhabiting the older person's world. The songs are dotted with just the kind of creaking joke you groan at and laugh at when your old uncle comes out with it, yet they tend to carry other resonances too as when Dylan fleetingly conjures a whole era from the sheer Groucho Marxism of that joke in 'Po' Boy', 'Poor boy, in the hotel called the Palace of Gloom / Calls down to room service, says, "Send up a room".' A different resonance is called up by the same song's equally creaky joking pun: 'Knockin' on the door, I say, "Who is it and where are you from?" / Man says, "Freddy!" I say, "Freddy who?" He says, "Freddy or not here I come." ' In tandem with its silly joke is the knocking on another door, opening with one of those 'shocks of recognition' onto a particular fragment of the past, one of those old records that helped to midwife the birth of rock'n'roll. On 'The House of Blue Lights', by Ella Mae Morse with Freddie Slack & His Orchestra, which JERRY LEE LEWIS named one of the favourites of his youth and which LITTLE RICHARD mentions in the lyric of 'Good Golly Miss Molly', the male voice pronounces: 'Well what you say, baby? You look ready as Mr. Freddie!'

The fused intimations of mortality and mid-60s Dylan do not take the form of easy self-imitation: rather, the writing on this album—and there is writing in abundance—is always placed in the service of faithful character creation, so that we find in 'Floater (Too Much to Ask)', the song in which we've found those rivers and those adolescents, a line so unDylanesque as to be striking: namely, when the narrator sings that you 'Gotta get up near the teacher if you can / If you wanna learn anything'.

In one key respect, "Love and Theft" does not differ from, but rather goes further than, Time Out of Mind, and that is in its use of verbatim quotation from a multiplicity of sources. Like the traditional women's work of 'heritage' quilting, Dylan here makes a huge aural patchwork bedspread out of rags and snippets torn from other people's work: from other voices. It is a crucial part of the album's multi-layering—a multi-layering of time as well as place. Thus we have not only rock'n'roll, Shakespeare, Mark Twain and Tennessee Williams allusions, plus, as ever with Dylan, lines from old blues records, but a raid on a Civil War general's speech, a piece of dialogue from F. Scott Fitzgerald (from The Great Gatsby), at least 12 phrases lifted from the English translation of the Japanese writer Junichi Saga's book Confessions of a Yakuza and a great deal more besides. (Saga's book is in turn an oral history itself, told to him by the gangster of the title.)

The album title "Love and Theft" is itself thieved (which is why, uniquely in Dylan's canon, it comes with quotation marks around it), from the 1990s academic book by Eric Lott, Love and Theft: Blackface Minstrelsy and the American Working Class—itself a multi-faceted work on a swathe of topics of special interest to Dylan: to the Dylan who speaks, in GREIL MARCUS' phrases, for 'the old, weird America', for 'the invisible republic' but a book that also re-examines the earliest forms of American music, the first major artistic relationship between black and white cultures, and thus the connections between the minstrel show and American literature (as when Lott writes, for example, that 'Without the minstrel show there would have been . . . no Adventures of Huckleberry Finn'). But Lott's title itself, as he said in an interview, is 'a riff on one of Leslie Fiedler's; he wrote a famous book of literary criticism called Love and Death in the American Novel.' (He added, in jest: 'I think I'm going to call my next book Time Out of Mind.')

Dylan himself once said that "Love and Theft" is based on the 12-bar delta blues, and the old blues work much like the album, by assembling common-stock phrases, common-stock verses, and by recombining them, with tweaks and mis-hearings and spontaneous alteration, making something new. There is a specific homage to CHARLEY PATTON on the album, and Patton himself was a master of this process of reconfiguration, using borrowed lines and floating verses—'floaters', in a word—to create something singular and personal. Dylan's sources are in part more self-consciously chosen, and deliberately range wider and deeper through era and location, but only partly. It's in the very nature of those old blues that memory cannot log it all; he surely knows, for instance, that the "Love and Theft" song 'Lonesome Day Blues', the album's most overtly blues-structured song, has a title that was used long ago by BLIND WILLIE McTELL and others; he didn't necessarily recall consciously, though, that his own opening line, 'Well today has been a long old lonesome day' is taken almost verbatim (Dylan's alert use of that opening 'Well' replacing the original's 'Yes') from the very first recording made by Texas Alexander, his 'Long Lonesome Day Blues' of 1927.

Yet if the process can never be wholly conscious, by the nature of the process and of human memory, the conscious part of the work Dylan has constructed takes this archaeology of shard and fragment much further even than did Time Out of Mind; and via the imaginative persona Dylan has chosen to make dominant—via the strategy of his creative enactments of old age—he makes all this scrutiny of memory and rehabilitation of history that much more vividly human, more poignant, more richly layered.

At the same time, as with that worn-out old tobacco-worker narrator in 'Floater', these old geezers Dylan creates so freshly here, with their fitful, sometimes fruit-machining memories, they are today's old people (and thereby the relatives, for better or worse, of today's young people): they are true to the spirit of Bob Dylan's generation of oldies—they haven't renounced rock'n'roll or had the loyalties of the 1950s or 60s removed from their souls, nor lost the acute awareness that we stand hearing all these voices of the fractured past in the dark world of today.

Has there ever been another such album? Absolutely not. It is, deliberately and liberatingly, the album of an old bloke in his garden shed—but it is incontestably Bob Dylan's album. It is Highway 61 Revisited on a bus pass. The turbulent whole is unquestionably a real Dylan album: one of the ten or 12 you'd have to rescue if God were determined to destroy all the rest.

[Recorded NY, 9–25 May 2001, released as Columbia 504364 2 (& as 2-LP vinyl set Columbia 504364 1), US & Europe, 11 Sep 2001.

Ella Mae Morse with Freddie Slack & His Orchestra: 'The House of Blue Lights' c/w 'Hey Mr. Postman', Capitol 251 (78rpm), US, 1946. Blind Willie McTell & 'Ruby Glaze' (as Ruby Glaze—Hot Shot Willie): 'Lonesome Day Blues', Atlanta, 22 Feb 1932. Texas Alexander: 'Long Lonesome Day Blues', NY, 11 Aug 1927.

Eric Lott, Love and Theft: Blackface Minstrelsy and the American Working Class, New York: OUP, 1993, & quoted from interview by David McNair & Jayson Whitehead, Gadfly Online, seen at www.gadflyonline.com/12-10-01/book-ericlott.html, 5 Dec 2005. For good detailed scrutinies of the album, see Andrew Muir, Troubadour: Early and Late Songs of Bob Dylan, Bluntisham, UK: Woodstock Publications, 2003; Stephen Scobie, Alias Bob Dylan Revisited, Calgary, Canada: Red Deer College Press, 2003; and the article '"Love and Theft", or How Dylan's Mind Multipies the Smallest Matter', by Chris Rollaston, The Bridge no.14, Gateshead, UK, winter 2002, pp.34–64.]

'Love Henry' [1993] On World Gone Wrong this ancient song becomes one of the most beautiful recordings Dylan has ever made, and its ancientness does not make it, in Dylan's consciousness, a relic. The sleevenotes to the album are part of his armoury of insistence on the contemporary relevance of such material: the continuing value and pertinence of both the poetry of the old blues world and that of medieval balladry. The title-character in 'Love Henry' is presented immediately in Dylan's sleevenote as 'Henry—modern corporate man . . .' and his adversary as a tough mama: a 'fairy queen exploiter'.

This thrilling CHILD ballad is essentially Child no.68, 'Young Hunting', of which he gives 11 versions, all from Scotland, but which is offered with over 40 variants in Bronson's standard work The Traditional Tunes of the Child Ballads—Vol. II. Dylan sings Bronson Variant 19 almost word for word with the addition of one verse from elsewhere. Bronson comments that this begins as a Scottish ballad, or that if it began in England it has left no trace there (which is odd, granted that one of the variants he includes is set firmly in Yorkshire), and seems to have passed straight from Scotland to the US, 'where it has enjoyed a great vogue in our own century—at least in the Appalachians.' Its early history remains murky, as is its relationship to the ballads 'Lady Isabel' and 'The Elfin Knight'. However, we do know that versions called 'Young Redin' and 'Earl Richard' were in collections published as far back as 1827.

Dylan's treatment is dark, serious and fully committed to the mystery of traditional song, but it doesn't detract from this to enjoy surveying the song's variants, which is an informal process of deconstruction. You see the elements retained and lost along the way, those distorted by design and accident: perhaps misheard and then passed on as in a game of Chinese Whispers. You see how common-stock ingredients drift in and out of the core narrative, and the relishable, comic ways in which the incandescent poetry of some versions collapses into ungainly, fatuous bathos in others.

This is the one Dylan sings so immaculately: 'Get down get down Love Henry she cried / And stay all night with me / I have gold chains and the finest I have / I'll apply them all to thee. / I can't get down an' I shan't get down / Or stay all night with thee / Some pretty little girl in Cornersville / I love far better than thee. / He laid his head on a pillow of down / Kisses she gave him three / With a penny knife that she held in her hand / She murdered mortal he. / Get well, get well Love Henry she cried / Get well get well said she / Oh don't you see my own heart's blood / A-flowing down so free? / She took him by his long yellow hair / And also by his feet / She plunged him into well water where / It runs both cold and deep. / Lie there lie there Love Henry she cried / Till the flesh rots off your bones / Some pretty little girl in Cornersville / Will mourn for your return. / Hush up hush up my parrot she cried / Don't tell no news on me / Oh these costly beads around my neck / I'll apply them all to thee. / Fly down fly down pretty parrot she cried / And light on my right knee / The doors to your cage shall be decked with gold / And hung on a willow tree. / I won't fly down and I can't fly down / And light on your right knee / A girl who would murder her own true love / Would kill a little bird like me.'

There are three moments where Dylan's voice allows a hint of variation from this version. As Dylan sings the second verse, it isn't clear whether he has Love Henry sing 'I won't fly down and I shan't fly down' or 'I won't fly down and I shouldn't fly down'—which would suggest his immediate wavering, preparing the way for his laying his head on her pillow. Then, Dylan sings 'She plunged him into well water where' as if singing 'water wet', which ought to sound unhelpfully obvious, a clumsy tautology; yet it somehow has a rightness that appeals, by elucidating further her heightened instability of mind: she's so intensely aware of the feel and look and sound of everything at this point, that a suggestion of her awareness of the water's wetness is all of a piece with her awareness of its coldness. Thirdly, Dylan sings her plea to the parrot such that you cannot tell for certain whether he sings 'Don't tell no news on me' or whether he makes it the even better 'Don't trill no news on me'.

At any rate, this version is a taut ellipse—taut even though it uses all those echoing repetitions that bounce back and forth within its dialogues: 'Get down, get down. . . . I can't get down and I shan't get down'; 'Fly down, fly down. . . . I won't fly down and I can't fly down'. But in omitting part of the story and simplifying a further part, it gives us a particular take on the motives and characters that fuller versions do not bear out.

These begin with the hero going hunting, and then returning to his lover, usually named as Lady Margaret. When she welcomes him back and invites him to her bed, he tells her he prefers another—the usual phrase here the blunt one that he loves her 'far better than thee'—or even his wife: 'For I have a far better bride than you / To enjoy when I go home.' In any case, this already shifts the moral picture, showing the hero as faithless to the one rather than faithful to the other. And exceptionally tactless too. Then, adding arrogance to his other qualities, he no sooner tells her how much less attractive she is than the third party he's never mentioned before, than he bends down from on high on his horse—a 'milk-white steed' in some variants—and kisses her. (Bob Dylan's brilliant updating of this is his sleevenote description of Love Henry as 'career minded, limousine double parked'.) Enraged, she stabs him, and he realises he is mortally wounded. Filled with remorse, she sobs out her imprecations that he should live. ('Get well, get well, Love Henry, she cried . . .')

At this point two common-stock ingredients drift through the picture like character-actor stalwarts whose faces you recognise from a hundred films but whose names you don't feel a need to know. First, the heroine promises that if he'll just hold on she'll summon a doctor and he will heal the hero. This is exactly the formula met in songs like 'Jack-a-Roe', 'Across the Rocky Mountains' and even 'The Unfortunate Rake', and the same words too, with 'town' rhymed with 'wound': 'For there's a doctor in yonder town / Can cure your mortal wound' or 'You shall have all the doctors in the whole round town / For to heal and cure your wounds'—to which the stabbed lover replies along the lines of 'There hain't a doctor but God alone / Can cure those wounded wounds.' Second, in many versions the dead man is strapped back on his horse and sent riding off again, so that the body will be found elsewhere, though somehow it always end up deep in water. (In rare instances, she sends him off not to place the crime elsewhere but in the forlorn hope that he'll reach the doctor in time.) Within these stanzas it sometimes happens that when he's tied back on his steed and sent off, his murderess makes sure that, like Froggie, he goes 'with a sword and pistol by his side'.

These stalwarts having made their brief appearances, the narrative continues with the disposal of the body, usually down a well. This is often achieved with the help of the heroine's servants. Thus Dylan's version's one touch of bathos—when she picks him up by his hair 'and also by his feet'—has been inherited from older formulations in which there are staff to attend to these matters, so that 'Some took him by the golden hair / Some took him by the feet' (a more seemly phrasing).

Two main alternative resolutions follow this. In one, as with Dylan's, the heroine realises that the crime has been observed by the bird and either attempts to buy its silence or else, soon abandoning this ploy, tries to lure it within killing distance by crude coaxing and lavish promises. The bird is not that bird-brained, and states its suspicions and refusal with varying degrees of bluntness. When, as with the Dylan variant, the song ends there, it leaves the bird's power hovering over the heroine, and this might be thought a refined, unending punishment; but this is a foreshortened ending, omitting a further exchange between woman and bird, in which, just as suddenly as she switched with the hero from loving invitation to murder, so she drops her politesse towards Polly, switching abruptly to shouting straightforwardly at it that 'If I had a bow all in my hand / And an arrow to a string / I'd shoot you through the very heart / Among the leaves so green . . .' This merely brings the bird more plainly to blackmail as it retorts along these lines: 'If you had your bow arrow / Your bow arrow and string / I'd fly away to yonder green / And tell what I have seen.'

This is usually the end of the song, so that it might be said Dylan's variant merely says the same in fewer stanzas. Occasionally, though, this is still not the end, for the heroine then dies too. In Child's variant B8, ungainliness of form and content become one, as we come to the comic awkwardness of the penultimate line: 'With her heart like a stone / She stood there alone / Then she walked to the side of the well / Soon she fainted and fell over sideways / And down she fell, fell, fell.' One or two examples have the heroine so filled with remorse that she commits suicide. Yet this is only one of two main endings. The other may or may not include a bird, but nemesis comes not by feathers but by blood and fire. The body being discovered by the authorities, the murderess then seeks to blame the servants. However, the victim's body remains inactive in their presence, his wounds by now 'As white as a linen clout / But as the traitor she cam near / His wounds they gushéd out!' When they try to burn the servant, the flames don't take. Trial by fire finally proves the guilt of the heroine. Verdict and punishment are one. In Child's first example, which gives us the full tale, the 'wylie' parrot's refusal to 'come doun, come doun' occurs in verse 14. It takes a further ten verses to reach the end of the song.

There is altogether between these variants a great clamouring of elements wanting to be in the song. The Scots version just quoted begins with Young Redin out hunting. When he reaches 'his true-love's' home, with 33 lords accompanying him, the heroine tells him 'Ye're welcome here, my young Redin / For coal and candle licht / And sae are ye, my young Redin / To bide wi' me the nicht.' That is to say, the woman is offering the civilities of shelter and accommodation to the hunting party, and extends her lover the politeness of asking, instead of assuming, if he will spend the night with her. He, with the sensitivity of the boar he's been hunting, accepts the warming and lighting of the guest-rooms but tells her he's no intention of sleeping in her bed because '. . . thrice as fair a ladie as thee / Meets me at Brandie's well.' Having told her that, they go to their separate chambers, and then he comes sneaking along the corridor to her room (again it's stressed here that she is his 'true-love'), finds her crying and lies in her arms. He's stabbed with the penknife; she asks her chamber-maid Meggy (her 'bouer-woman') to take away the body and is told to sort it out herself. The heroine pleads: 'O heal this deed on me, Meggy / O heal this deed on me', and promises her a reward of silken finery. So they put his boots back on and throw him in the deepest part of the river Clyde. The parrot then causes its usual trouble and eventually the fire burns the bouer-woman's hands and then burns '. . . the fause, fause arms, / That young Redin lay in.'

But in time and North America, the elements that introduce themselves include what may be seen as a sort of 'poetic' neatening-up: the heroine offers not hospitality but a bribe to lure the hero to her bed, in exactly similar terms to the bribe she then offers the servants and the third set of bribes she offers to the parrot. Form being inseparable from content, this change in the structural pattern of the song reverses our perception of who is the goodie and who the baddie in the tale. The Dylan version omits the hunting and the servants but retains the parallel bribing of man and bird, so that it loses both the heroine's civility and ill-treatment from the beginning and the bribing of the servant in the middle, and therefore ends up retaining two bribings (making another of the many doublings contained within the song).

Despite the disappearance of the chamber-maid, an echo of the conversation between lady and servant is retained in Dylan's version. The lady's plea to the servant has become a plea to the parrot (a plea not there in 'Young Redin'), changing from 'Oh heal this deed on me' to 'Don't trill no news on me'. As we've seen, Dylan's version also retains the phrases that used to describe the help in moving the hero's body by the now-abolished servants. It retains too a vestige of the dialogue about whether the now-abolished doctors can make him well again when she is immediately sorry for what she's done and begs him to get well, as he responds with 'Oh don't you see my own heart's blood A-flowing down so free' but has dropped the elaboration that only God can save him now.

In all probability, though, in dropping the doctors, the Dylan variant removes an ingredient that was never there in the first place and was introduced in North America only by mistake. Tristram P. Coffin points out that the sending for doctors 'is entirely absent from the Scots tradition that supplied all the texts in Child. It is distinctly possible, therefore, that it is derived from the "send for the king's duckers" episode that does appear in Child. . . . Thus may the searching of the waters for the body—the duckers' function—have been transformed . . .'

Yet mishearing or transforming the by-then-meaningless 'duckers' may not be how the doctors got summoned into the song: as noted, sending for the doctors (with the 'town' / 'wound' pairing) is a common-stock ingredient. At any rate, by the time of Dylan's 'Love Henry', it has been introduced and dropped again. Meanwhile the other sweetheart, who shifts from 'Brandie's well' to 'the girl that I've left on the Arkansas line' to 'a girl in Yorkshire land' to 'in the Eden land' to 'that pretty little girl in Gospel Land' to 'a bonny lass in a merry green land', has become an inhabitant of Cornersville, Tennessee, due south of Nashville and 20 miles north of the Alabama border. This makes perfect sense, granted that the version Dylan sings is, with an extra verse added at the end, the one collected by Byron Arnold in his Folksongs of Alabama, published in 1950, from the singing of one Lena Hill of Lexington, Alabama, five years earlier. Lexington is only just below the Tennessee state line, and the old highway runs north-east from there to Cornersville, less than 40 miles away.

It's curious, then, that while these antiquated 'duckers' are amended, and knights and Lords become nicknamed lads called Henry, and ladies and maidens become girls from Arkansas, and the parrot sits up in anything from a willow to a vine, or becomes a bird in the street outside a bar-room, or doesn't appear in the song at all, through all this the weapon remains unchanged (except for that one Spanish dart), and this in spite of the array of weaponry available in North America. (Whether Dylan is singing the corruption 'penny-knife' is impossible to decide.)

We're left with none of the comic clumsiness of other variants—variants that yield, between them, such mishandlings of the power of words as these: 'She called her housemaids three / Saying Lord Bonnie he has died in my lap; I think it's time he was taken away' (this from 'Lord Bonnie', collected in North Carolina: a version that has no parrot —no bird at all—and specifically has her say to the dead body 'Lie there, lie there, you false-hearted man'); 'I can't shut up and I won't shut up' and 'She picked him up all in her arms / Being very active and strong / And she throwed him into an old dry well / About sixty feet.'

Leaving the depth unspecified is doubly wise. It allows the creation of yet another of the song's neat pairings: the penknife plunges 'deep' into his heart, and the body plunges 'deep' into the water. And it avoids bathos. Once you start specifying how deep the well is, you're asking for risible variation, and this we get. 'About sixty feet' is the depth of the dry well. Most are full of water—in Yorkshire, aptly, the well is 'Where it rained so cold and deep'—and sometimes so deep that it is measured in fathoms, like the ocean: 'Sixteen fathoms deep'; 'Full thirty fathoms deep'; 'Some sixty fathoms deep'; plus the comically cautious 'Just about eighteen feet' and the splendidly incredible 'dew drop well' that is 'About forty-thousand feet deep.'

It may be that this Scottish dialect imprecation is seductively melodious, when sung, but seeing it on the page it's hard to imagine, even when the addressee is the parrot: 'Come doon, come doon, my pretty parrot / An pickle wheat aff my glue' (text V in Child); and the equally Scottish version collected by CARL SANDBURG, 'Little Scotch-ee' (which is also in Bronson), has the unwise addition of chickens: 'Are the chickens a-crowing for the middle of the night / Or are they a-crowing for day?'

While avoiding these dullard sore thumbs, Dylan's version inevitably dispenses too with a few attractive phrases. A usage that ties in with a blues phrase Dylan uses of his own 'Tough Mama'—'meat shakin' on your bones'—gives the apt, murderous toughness of one version of 'Young Hunting' in which 'till the flesh rots off your bones' is replaced by 'till the meat drops off your bones'. Nor is anything wrong with the Dylan version's description of the hero's blood 'A-flowing down so free"—yet the more unusual expressions chosen by others, though a risible list if stacked up alongside each other, offer an affecting poetic appeal considered singly, as in 'For don't you see my own heart's blood / Come twinkling down me knee?' and '. . . don't you see my own heart's blood / Is trinkling to my knees?', while in one version a chic and nifty pun is achieved, as the lady uses her knife, with the simple phrase 'She pierced him heartilee'. All in all, though, the version Dylan uses is as fine and sinuous a recreation of the song as could be wished for: a version full of mystery and poetry, loaded with menace and grace, and retaining vivid vestiges of ancientness—including, if you will, what Bronson calls 'a relic of belief in metempsychosis, the bird being the soul of the dead lover.'

Dylan will have selected his version from among the several or more he must know. One of these is a recording on—you'll never guess—the HARRY SMITH anthology. It is in fact the opening track of the entire 84-track set, Dick Justice's 1929 recording 'Henry Lee': a version with a different melody, a plodding, dull strum for its guitar accompaniment and a voice of now-touching naivété. The song is summarised in Smith's unmistakeable, endearing style as 'SCORNING OFFER OF COSTLY TRAPPINGS, BIRD REFUSES AID TO KNIGHT THROWN IN WELL BY LADY'. This is an unusual twist on the customary narrative and suggests a reading that is eccentric even by Harry Smith's standards. Why would he think it is the dead 'Lovin' Henry Lee' who requests the bird's help (or then threatens to shoot it from a hundred feet down in the well), especially since the bird's response is the standard one, that 'A girl would murder her own true love / Would kill a little bird like me'? Despite the yokel charm of the vocal, and touches such as 'the girl I have in that merry green land', this is in essence an urban version, bringing into the action 'you ladies in the town' and with phrasing delightfully more redolent of the cruel .44 than the ladylike weapon cited: 'With the little penknife held in her hand / She plugged him through and through.'

Other recordings include Peggy Seeger's 'Henry Lee' (probably learnt from the Dick Justice version); John Jacob Niles' 'Lady Margot and Love Henry'; 'Lowe Bonnie' by JIMMIE TARLTON (its text and melody the final, 43rd version in Bronson, which starts with 'a hunting young man' who is offered 'white chocolate tea' but declines, saying endearingly, and rather like the White Rabbit, 'But I haven't got a moment to spare'; this version includes doctors but avoids parrots: a very different lyric from Dylan's) and even a 'Henry Lee' by P.J. Harvey, Nick Cave & the Bad Seeds. June Tabor's and Hedy West's versions (both the untitled Bronson Variant 22) treat the song as a maypole-tripping throwaway to be pranced through unthinkingly, instead of treating it with respect and allowing its mystical depths to work on them. Dylan will have heard more than one of these, but implies in his sleevenotes that he takes his version from performances or a recording he remembers by TOM PALEY.

Paley in turn took it from the Byron Arnold book of Alabama folk songs, and Arnold field-recorded it from a woman in a tiny Alabama town in 1945 who says that she arrived at her version 'when a girl'. What a brilliant poetic instinct she had, this unschooled girl. As noted, there are many looser versions of less power and resonance, and many with no special faults but no distinction either. While paying tribute to the middle-aged Bob Dylan for picking out a version of the ballad that compresses it into so rich and taut a form, let's also admire the intelligence of judgement and the poetic maturity of Lena Hill of Lexington, Alabama.

Dylan all along recognised the power of traditional song itself. He has said so many times, reasserting warmly (in the Biograph interview) the thrall in which he stands to traditional music: 'The thing about rock'n'roll is that for me anyway it wasn't enough. . . . I knew that when I got into folk music it was more of a serious type of thing. The songs are filled with more despair, more sadness, more triumph, more faith in the supernatural, much deeper feelings . . .' You could hardly look for a more exact summary of his approach to, and his valuing of, a song like his chosen version of 'Love Henry'. It explains the seriousness he brings to it.

He begins with a guitar part that doesn't announce at once whether this is going to be a black song or a white: it doesn't trailer 'ballad', 'blues' or recognisable genre. It just pulls you into its musical well. Then the vocal comes in, more muttered than sung and yet most beautifully sung: a sustained and concentrated whole, nuzzlingly intimate, smouldering yet fastidious. And without anything so obtrusive as a vocal mannerism, he gives us the best breathing and dyings-away of any Bob Dylan vocal for many years, soaked in regret and consternation, mortal fear and supernatural dread. The unexpected extra two musical notes he adds at the end of the word 'deep', to make it 'dee-ee-eep', is done not only long after you assume that the first note and syllable will continue its long dying-out, but is effected with the most understated discretion you will ever hear: at light-years' remove from easy pop cliché; the slightest possible pause on 'mourn' is likewise an irreproachable gesture, so subtly done as to be barely discernible, such that what we're offered is a performance that demands, and amply rewards, the closest possible attention.

This is itself the optimum matching of subject matter to approach: Dylan inhabits the character of the murderous heroine so well that it's as if her secret pathology, her suppressed jealousies and seething, quiet derangement have been kept so tightly clutched in her heart that the listener must put an ear close to the singer's chest to hear at all the rangey, fitful ebb and flow of an infantile anger, dark despair and spectral desperation.

[Francis James Child, The English and Scottish Popular Ballads, 1882–98: a standard work. Bertrand Harris Bronson, The Traditional Tunes of the Child Ballads—Vol. II, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1962, pp.60–82. Tristram Potter Coffin, The British Traditional Ballad in North America, Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1950 & 1977. Carl Sandburg, An American Songbag, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1927.

Harry Smith's American Folk Music, Folkways FP251–253, NY, 1952, CD-reissued Smithsonian Folkways SFW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997; Dick Justice: 'Henry Lee', Chicago, 20 May 1929, issued ditto. Peggy Seeger: 'Henry Lee', nia, Prestige PRS 13005, nia. John Jacob Niles: 'Lady Margot and Love Henry', nia, Tradition TRD 1046, nia. Darby & Tarlton (but this track is only Tarlton): 'Lowe Bonnie', Atlanta, 3 Dec 1930; Folksong Society of Minnesota LP KB3796, Minneapolis-St. Paul, 1960 (very rare: but Dylan was in the right place at the right time to hear it), 1st widely circulated on Darby and Tarlton, Old Timey OT112, El Cerrito, CA, 1970s, CD-reissued On the Banks of the Lonely River, County CTY 3503, Floyd, VA, 1994. P.J. Harvey, Nick Cave & the Bad Seeds: 'Henry Lee', nia, REP 46195, nia. June Tabor: 'Love Henry' (demo), UK, Mar 1990, Circle Dance, Hokey Pokey cassette, London, 1990. Hedy West: 'Love Henry' nia, Ballads, nia, 1967.

Tom Paley: 'Love Henry', Beckenham, UK, 1964, on Peggy Seeger & Tom Paley: Who's Gonna Shoe Your Pretty Little Feet?, Topic 12T113, London, 1964. Information that Paley took 'Love Henry' from Folksongs of Alabama is from Paley (London, phone-conversation with this writer, 22 Apr 1999).]

'Love Sick' [1997] One of the immediate responses to Time Out of Mind, on which 'Love Sick' is the opening track, was disappointment at Dylan's automatic concentration on Lurve as subject matter (though concentration seemed not much in evidence). Across most of the album this apparently exhausted topic demanded our attention without offering one tangible feeling, evocative moment or observant sentence. All this croaking phlegm about lost love, all this cocooned preoccupation with it, this trying to sound tragic about vanished impossible perfect loves: was there nothing else to engage the intelligent adult's interest, or to be written about?

He promises something else, in the opening song, summing up the situation with admirable terseness: 'I'm sick of love / I hear the clock tick / This kind of love—/ I'm love sick', yet for much of the album 'this kind of love' seems the only topic, and an awareness of time running out does not seem to concentrate its singer's mind on other matters. Far from sounding like the mature work of a major artist in middle-age, dealing with the serious questions of life, or even with its small pleasures, all this crying in the doorway, calling out his baby's name, enchained and haunted by the ghost of an old love, all this wondering if you'll be true—it sounded more like the posturing of a spoilt celebrity hamming up gravitas.

The production, for all DANIEL LANOIS' alchemical skills, sometimes accentuates this sense of a sham. Lanois explained exactly the intention behind the distorted vocal sound on 'Love Sick': 'We treated the voice almost like a harmonica when you over-drive it through a small guitar amplifier.' That's spot on: the track's distorted sound is familiar because it does recreate the harmonica sound on things like the King Biscuit radio shows of the early 1950s. But does it work? If it gives 'Love Sick', and therefore the album's opening moments, a sort of stark drama, it comes very close to contrived starkness and melodrama.

'I'm walkin' . . .', announces this sepulchral voice, 'through streets that are dead': and if Boris Karloff isn't lurking behind a lamp-post, LEONARD COHEN surely is.

['Love Sick', Miami, FL, 13–28 Jan 1997, Time Out of Mind, 30 Sep 1997. Two 4-track 'Love Sick' CD singles were issued: 'CD1' comprised a live 'Love Sick' (Grammy Awards performance, NY, 25 Feb 1998) + live cuts of 'Cold Irons Bound' & 'Cocaine Blues' (both LA, 16 Dec 1997) & 'Born in Time' (Newark, NJ, 1 Feb 1998), Columbia COL 665997 5, US, 1998. 'CD2' comprised the album version of 'Love Sick' + live cuts of 'Can't Wait' (LA, 20 Dec 1997) & 'Roving Gambler' (LA, 17 Dec 1997) & 'Blind Willie McTell' (Wantaugh, NY, 17 Aug 1997, & not as stated on the sleevenote), Columbia COL 665997 2, US, 1998. The song's live début was at Bournemouth, UK, 1 Oct 1997 (the day after its album release); since then it has become one of his 30 most performed songs.]

Lovelle, Herb [1924 -] Herbert E. Lovelle was born in New York on June 1, 1924. A jazz drummer, he lowered himself to play on a number of rock'n' roll, folk and rock records in the 1950s and 60s, including playing for LaVern Baker on 'Tweedle Dee' and for (or against) Bob Dylan on the Freewheelin' sessions of November 1 and 14, 1962. The results can be heard on 'Mixed-Up Confusion' and 'Rocks and Gravel', neither of which made it to the album.

Jazz musicians generally regarded the blues, too, as beneath them, and thereby disqualified themselves from performing any of it well. A splendid tirade from BIG BILL BROONZY against these people is quoted in ALAN LOMAX's The Land Where the Blues Began: 'Got they dark glasses on. Some of um wearin' their little bebop goatees . . .'

Since 1988 Herb Lovelle has moved into acting, starting as a hospital clerk in Sidney Lumet's Running on Empty. He has a moustache but no little bebop goatee.

[Alan Lomax, The Land Where the Blues Began, London: Methuen edn., p.455.]

Lovesick* [album, 2004] See co-option of real music by advertising, the.

lowlands, the In Dylan's song 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands', his metaphoric reference is surely to the lowlands of the Mississippi Delta: the lowlands which imperilled people down in the floods, where all those crashes on the levee happened, where all that high water was everywhere, and which have in turn flooded American folk consciousness. These are the lowlands that spread across Blonde on Blonde, an album saturated in the blues.

The flooding of the delta only became a problem when agriculture intensified, so that instead of the annual flood replenishing the land naturally, it threatened the new inhabitants—imported Chinese as well as black labour—and infrastructure. Levees had not been needed before this intensification. Indeed the forests of the Delta were still being cleared in the years just before the 1920s. In A Turn in the South, 1989, V.S. Naipaul tells of meeting Louise, a woman of 80, in Jackson in 1987, who remembers the wilderness: 'The land hadn't been cleared and travel was hard. . . . And it was beautiful country . . . great oaks that had not been harvested. This was before the plantations. . . . It was a land of flowers, all kinds of wild iris and wild violets, water lilies and alligators. . . . I had malaria every summer when I was a child. It took a while to clear the Delta. It flooded every spring. When I was a little girl—say in 1915—they were still clearing it. They would go and chop around these mighty oaks and they would let them die and then they would cut them. . . . I took it for granted. I played in the woods. . . . It was a privilege to live in the Delta. At night we would hear animals in the forest. A panther. It sounded like a woman crying.' (Naipaul comments: 'There is no landscape like the landscape of our childhood. For Louise . . . the "big cotton patch" that the planters had created in the Delta was a disfiguring of the forest . . . [but] for Mary, born in the Delta forty years later, there would be no landscape like the flat, stripped land she had grown up in. She said: "I think there is nothing more beautiful than the flat, flat land and the big, big sky."') ALAN LOMAX's The Land Where the Blues Began, 1993, has a good description of the clearing of the jungle to create the cotton wealth of the Delta, and argues that African agricultural know-how created the Delta farmland from the wilderness.

Though the Delta flooded annually, 1927 brought a spectacularly big flood, over an area the size of Scotland; workers were kept in camps at gunpoint to make them repair the levees; and blues-singers were called in to help in the propaganda effort to get people to come to do flood-relief work. As BIG BILL BROONZY once explained to a European audience, 'They sent for a lot of musicians. They didn't have to send for me 'cos I was already there . . . and whoever wrote the best song got 500 dollars. So Bessie [Smith] got the 500 dollars, so we always played hers . . . "Back-Water Blues".' (Not that it matters in this context, but folklorist David Evans has recently established that Bessie Smith's song was originally composed in response to a different flood altogether: a Christmas Day flood that struck Nashville in 1926.)

Dylan himself performed her song at his first real concert, at New York City's Carnegie Chapter Hall on November 4, 1961. It opens like this: 'It rained five days and the clouds turned as dark as night / It rained five days and the clouds turned as dark as night / Lotta trouble takin' place, Lord in the lowlands that night'—which is interesting for its conventional prefiguring of Dylan's unconventional 'She can take the dark out of the nighttime and paint the daytime black' (a perfect blues line) and for that specific citing (and siting) of 'the lowlands'.

Forty years later he returns to the subject in the "Love and Theft" song 'High Water (For CHARLEY PATTON)', which consciously builds from the levee of Patton's own 'High Water Everywhere Part 1' and 'Part 2'. Patton is remembering the 1927 flood, and his opening phrase is 'Well, backwater done rose . . .' He doesn't use the phrase 'the lowlands', but he catalogues where they're under water all through the song, as he aspires to their opposite: 'I would go to the hilly country but they got me barred', he sings halfway through 'Part 1', and then ends with a renewed resolve: 'I'm goin' back to the hilly country, won't be worried no more.'

[V.S. Naipaul: A Turn in the South, New York: Knopf, 1989. Alan Lomax: The Land Where the Blues Began, New York: Pantheon, 1993. Bill Broonzy quote: introducing his own 'Backwater Blues' [sic], 12–13 Jul 1957, The Bill Broonzy Story, Verve MGM-3000-5 (5-LP box set), US, nia. Bessie Smith: 'Back-Water Blues', NY, 17 Feb 1927. Charley Patton: 'High Water Everywhere Part I' and 'High Water Everywhere Part II', Grafton, WI, c.Oct 1929.]

Lynch, Stan [1955 -] Stanley Lynch was born in Gainesville, Florida, home of almost all the members of TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, on May 21, 1955. He learnt to play drums, moved to Los Angeles and became a founding member of that group, remaining with it from its beginning in 1975 until he quit with some acrimony in 1994 (though he and the others seemed cordial later, and he took part in their Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame induction, MC'd by JAKOB DYLAN, in 2002).

In 1985, Lynch began a regular writing and producing partnership with Don Henley; he collaborated on the Eagles' 10-million-selling album Hell Freezes Over and co-produced tracks on Henley's The End of the Innocence (the title track of which Bob Dylan has sung in concert). Lynch has also co-written songs with THE BYRDS, RINGO STARR, Toto, the Fabulous Thunderbirds and many more. As a session player he has worked with Jackson Browne, Aretha Franklin, the Eurythmics, T-BONE BURNETT, WARREN ZEVON and others.

His contribution to Dylan's work, however, was solely from within Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers.

[Source: mainly www.gonegator.com/news/tom_petty_news_022003.asp, seen online 5 Jun 2005.]

Lynne, Jeff [1947 -] Born in Birmingham, England, on December 30, 1947, Lynne came to prominence playing second fiddle to Roy Wood in the Move (actually, Wood played his own fiddle, Lynne played guitar), when the original line-up changed after the group's disastrous excursion into cabaret in the late 1960s. The first Move album with Lynne on it was Looking On, 1970. Lynne later formed the Electric Light Orchestra (originally intended as a Roy and Jeff collaboration), an increasingly successful, florid, corporate-rock outfit designed to reveal Lynne as the ultimate wannaBeatle. (The BEATLE he wanted to be was PAUL.)

Exactly the sort of person who can't see the point of Bob Dylan, Lynne became the least interesting TRAVELING WILBURY (the Graham Nash of that particular super-group), his heavy hand deleteriously present in the group's songwriting and production values.

MacColl, Ewan [1915 - 1989] There is no better introduction to the significance of two British communists, MacColl and A.L. Lloyd, to the folk scene that preceded 'the denim-clad and Dylan-esque' than the second chapter of C.P. LEE's 1998 book Like the Night: Bob Dylan and the Road to the Manchester Free Trade Hall, which stresses the role of the Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) in keeping the post-World War II folk scene purist and traditional, and looks at the figures of MacColl and Lloyd within it.

(Lloyd—whose mid-1960s book Folk Song in England attempted to chart its subject's development in Marxist terms—is the large man with the menacing grimace sitting high up behind Dylan in those pictures from the latter's early British gig at the Singers Club party at the Pindar of Wakefield pub in Gray's Inn Road, London, on December 22, 1962. The Singers Club was run by MacColl and his wife Peggy Seeger, sister of PETE.)

M

MacColl, as C.P. Lee notes, typified 'all that was good and all that was bad about the Folk Revival'. The good is that he wrote fierce pro-proletarian songs of quality in the immediate post-war period, the best of which was 'Dirty Old Town' (opening line: 'I met my love by the gas works wall', and a song covered to great effect by the Pogues on their 1985 album Rum, Sodomy & the Lash); and, put together with Lloyd by ALAN LOMAX in England in 1951, MacColl and Lloyd produced a radical series of now-legendary radio programmes, 'Ballads and Blues', which placed alongside each other previously separate styles of music including British jazz, Calypso music and American blues. Later, with Seeger and Charles Parker, he pioneered the yet more radical so-called 'radio-ballad', an audio documentary format that looked at the lives of railway workers, fishermen, teenagers and so on, by combining songs and instrumental music with sound effects and, crucially, the recorded voices of 'ordinary people', the subjects of the documentaries. Earlier radio documentaries had always hired professional actors to do all the speaking.

What was bad was that MacColl was a hypocritical old Stalinist who was against anything innovative or non-CPGB yet whose own purity and uncommerciality were in doubt from the start. MacColl wasn't even his real name; it was a showbiz name. He was born James Miller, on January 25, 1915—and not in Scotland but in Salford, just outside Manchester, where he grew up. He was married three times, first to the distinguished British theatre figure Joan Littlewood (he was an actor and dramatist on the London stage before becoming a folksinger and man of the people) and then to a Jean Newlove, whom he left in 1956 to take up with the much younger Ms. Seeger (for whom he wrote the maudlin 'The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face').

Unsurprisingly, MacColl was famously quick to declare of Dylan that he was 'unable to see in him anything other than a youth of mediocre talent', and that 'Dylan to me is the perfect symbol of the anti-artist in society—the last resort of somebody who doesn't want to change the world. . . . I think his poetry is punk.' And on the other hand: 'Poetry? What poetry? . . . embarrassing fourth-grade schoolboy attempts . . .'

Within the fecund group of traditional songs known as the 'Unfortunate Rake' cycle, one version is 'The Trooper Cut Down in His Prime', which MacColl learnt from the Norfolk (UK) traditional singer Harry Cox and recorded. It ends with these lines: 'Then beat the drum slowly and play your fife lowly / And sound the Dead March as you carry me along . . .', which Dylan folds into his Oh Mercy song 'Where Teardrops Fall' as 'We've banged the drum slowly and played the fife lowly / You know the song in my heart', so neatly suggesting within his own song that the song in his heart is the Dead March.

Four years after Oh Mercy, when Dylan issued his sublime recording of the far more ancient ballad 'Love Henry' (on World Gone Wrong, 1993), he says he took the song from TOM PALEY. He doesn't specify that he took it from a recording, and certainly he watched live performances by Paley in the early 1960s, but nevertheless there is a Paley recording of the song—and Paley says that this, cut in 1964, was made at the home of Ewan MacColl and Peggy Seeger.

MacColl died on October 22, 1989. The contemporary singer Kirsty MacColl was his daughter. She died in a boating accident in December 2000, off the coast of Mexico.

[Ewan MacColl, 'A Symposium', Sing Out!, NY, Sep 1965; as quoted in Broken Arrow, the Neil Young Appreciation Society quarterly, Scotland, no.93, Feb 2004, p.54; and Sing Out! again. Ewan MacColl: 'The Trooper Cut Down in His Prime', 1958; issued on Bless 'Em All, Riverside RLP 12-642, NY, 1958; collected on The Unfortunate Rake: A Study in the Evolution of a Ballad, various artists, compiled by Kenneth Goldstein, Folkways FS3805, NY, 1960.

C.P. Lee, Like the Night: Bob Dylan and the Road to the Manchester Free Trade Hall, London: Helter Skelter, 1998; updated edition, Like the Night Revisited, London: Helter Skelter, 2004. Tom Paley: 'Love Henry', Beckenham, Kent, UK, 1964, issued on Peggy Seeger & Tom Paley: Who's Gonna Shoe Your Pretty Little Feet?, Topic 12T113, London, 1964. Paley recording info from Michael Gray: Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, p.774, footnote.]

MacLeish, Archibald [1892 - 1982] Archibald MacLeish was born in Glencoe, Illinois, on May 7, 1892, graduated from Yale in 1915, served in World War I, took a Harvard law degree, edited The New Republic, practised law for a short period and in time became a distinguished poet, though too much influenced by T.S. ELIOT and EZRA POUND for many tastes. He was also a playwright and, as it were, an official appointee, active in academic and public life, not least in becoming the US Government's Librarian of Congress from 1939–44, an Assistant Secretary of State for Cultural Affairs the following year, a US representative at UNESCO and Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory at Harvard from 1949 to 1962. He achieved these appointments despite earning the antipathy of the FBI and Senator Joe McCarthy and espousing Left Wing and anti-war causes, and after having been, in the 1920s, one of those poetry-writing Americans in Paris (1923–28).

His early poetry collections were Tower of Ivory (1917), The Happy Marriage (1924), The Pot of Earth (1925), Streets in the Moon (1926) and The Hamlet of A. MacLeish (1928). After returning from France he published New Found Land (1930), Conquistador (1932) and Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's City (1933). His best-known short poem, taking Horace's title, is Ars Poetica, and very neatly gives voice to the main tenets of the modernist poetics; it begins 'A poem should be palpable and mute / As a globed fruit' and ends 'A poem should not mean / But be.'

His verse plays include Nobodaddy (1926, its title taken from WILLIAM BLAKE's term for the unwise God stumbling around creating the flawed universe, 'Nobadaddy' being an ellipse of 'nobody's Daddy'), Panic (1935), J.B. (1958) and Herakles (1967). He also wrote striking plays for radio, including The Fall of the City (1937) and The Trojan Horse (1952). Many of these works had socio-political themes: in the latter two cases totalitarianism and the 1950s US fear of Communism respectively. It was to write songs for another such play that MacLeish asked Bob Dylan to go and see him at his home outside Conway, Massachusetts, at the end of the 1960s.

In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan describes these visits in great detail—he specifies the kinds of flowers in the room, the names of many poets MacLeish asked Dylan if he had read, and a good deal of fragments of their conversations—perhaps not least because unlike CARL SANDBURG, who in 1964 wouldn't let Dylan any further than his pig-farm porch, MacLeish invited Dylan into his inner sanctum. They got on well (Dylan soon refers to him as 'Archie') but there was no real chance of their working together as MacLeish hoped: his notion of Bob Dylan was of the protest singer, the socio-political poet of 1963—even specifying that he liked Dylan's song 'John Brown' (it would be interesting to know how MacLeish knew this); he didn't realise how much Dylan's artistic interests had shifted and developed. 'After hearing a few lines from the script,' Dylan wrote, 'I didn't see how our destinies could be intermixed.'

Nonetheless at their first meeting MacLeish gave Dylan some suggestions for song titles, and Dylan says that 'a few of them' were 'Red Hands', 'Lower World' and 'Father of Night': this last being a title Dylan duly used. It became the last track on the album New Morning. Dylan also says that he wrote that album's title track as a song for MacLeish's play. But the old poet-playwright—he was in his late 70s when they met—wondered 'why the songs weren't darker than they were'.

As Dylan writes at the end of this section of his memoir (it is the last sentence of the section titled 'New Morning'): 'The MacLeish play Scratch opened on Broadway at the St. James Theatre on May 6, 1971, and closed two days later on May 8.'

The middle night of Scratch's humiliatingly short run was MacLeish's 79th birthday. He had another 11 years to go, and died in Boston on April 20, 1982.

[Archibald MacLeish, Collected Poems, 1917–1982, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1985. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.113, 129 &141.]

McCartney, Paul [1942] James Paul McCartney was born in Liverpool, UK, on June 18, 1942. As the other main songwriter in THE BEATLES besides JOHN LENNON—and not always the less avant-garde of the two: he was interested in Yoko Ono's work before Lennon (and it was Lennon, after all, who famously said that 'avant garde is French for bullshit')—McCartney has affected Dylan's output just as Dylan's own work influenced that of the Beatles. Dylan first met all four Beatles in New York City in 1964 (see Aronowitz, Al). A subsequent meeting when McCartney and Lennon called at the London Hilton during Dylan's May 1966 visit resulted in a typed unfinished lyric jointly produced (in both senses) by Lennon-McCartney-Dylan, known now as 'Pneumonia Ceilings'. It went like this:

'Words and phrases right / Cigarette ash keeps me up all night / How come your mama types so fast? / Is daddy's flag flyin' at half mast? / Pneumonia ceilings, pneumonia floors / Daddy ain't gonna take it no more / Elephant guns blazing in my ears / I'm sick & tired of your applesauce tears! / Thermometers donat tell time no more / Since aunt mimi pushed them off the 20th floor / So say goodby to skyscrapers / You'll read about it in the evening paper/ I picked my nose & I'm glad i did'. It's said that in a cultural act prefiguring A.J. WEBERMAN, a hotel maid rescued it from the waste-bin in Dylan's room (but then sold it to a Beatles fan for next to nothing).

The two bumped into each other from time to time—as for instance at the wedding of Chick Edwards, drummer with the group Bittersweet, in San Francisco in 1974. But as to real work, ex-

Quarryman and ex-Silver Beatle Paul became the only ex-Beatle with whom Bob Dylan has had no professional dealings.

McCoy, Charlie [1941 -] Charles Ray McCoy was born in Oak Ridge, West Virginia, on March 28, 1941, making him an almost exact contemporary of Bob Dylan, for whom he played on that crucial run of albums from Blonde on Blonde to Self Portrait. He grew up in Miami and played harmonica from the age of eight, adding guitar in his teens. He became a Nashville-based multi-instrumentalist session musician of resourceful versatility, though primarily a master harmonica player, and at different times he played harmonica, harpsichord, bass and trumpet behind Dylan. It's also possible that he played the lovely acoustic guitar part overdubbed onto the last track to be recorded on Highway 61 Revisited, 'Desolation Row'. (This is something no-one seems to agree about. CLINTON HEYLIN suggests that BRUCE LANGHORNE played that guitar, though Langhorne has no recollection of being at the session; AL KOOPER maintains that it was Charlie McCoy; TONY GLOVER, who was probably at the sessions, denies that McCoy was there; MICHAEL KROGSGAARD and GLEN DUNDAS merely report these warring claims. The liner notes to the album itself, as given online at www.bobdylan.com, credit McCoy as a guitarist, and since he played on no other track this credit must be for 'Desolation Row'. But then, the official musician credits on Dylan tracks are not always reliable.)

At any rate, certainly Charlie McCoy plays the harmonica that sounds like a 'normal' harmonica, as opposed to Dylan's harmonica work, on that minor Blonde on Blonde song 'Obviously 5 Believers'. Elsewhere on the album he plays guitar and bass, and on '4th Time Around' he plays harpsichord, a part overdubbed in June 1966 (as were some KENNY BUTTREY drums), four months after the rest of the track. Al Kooper writes that when Dylan, ROBBIE ROBERTSON and himself first arrived in Nashville for the sessions, though they were harassed in town because of their appearance, in the studio things were fine: 'The cast was mighty: Charlie McCoy, ersatz leader, played bass, trumpet, guitar and harmonica—no mean feat on a Dylan session.' Kooper writes too of how that trumpet got onto 'Most Like You Go Your Way (And I'll Go Mine)':

'I came up with this little organ lick after each phrase. . . . Charlie McCoy was playing bass and said to me that he'd like to overdub a trumpet playing that lick with me. "Bob is not a big fan of overdubbing", I reminded Charlie. . . . Bob had gone out of his way to not overdub anything on this album and play everything live. . . . [So] Charlie . . . said to us "I can actually play both at the same time . . ."' And he did.

On the pared-down John Wesley Harding album, McCoy was the bass player throughout, and was so again on the more musically expansive Nashville Skyline. He also played bass for Dylan's 'JOHNNY CASH TV Show' appearance of late spring 1969, and played further studio sessions for Self Portrait. He therefore appears too on the Dylan album, which pulled together outtakes from these and New Morning sessions.

In 1992 there was a curious Record Collector interview with McCoy, which throws an odd light onto how some of these sessions worked. The interviewer put it to McCoy: 'The last album you did with Dylan was Self Portrait. Do you have any idea what he was trying to create out of that strange mixture of covers and new songs?' McCoy replied: 'In my estimation, Bob had already decided by that point that he wasn't going to work with BOB JOHNSTON any more—for what reason, I don't know. Bob Johnston brought us a tape full of demos that Dylan had done—just guitar or piano and vocals—and on a lot of the songs, Kenny Buttrey and I simply overdubbed drums and bass. Dylan did do a couple of sessions here [i.e. in Nashville] for that album, but he wasn't here for the whole thing, by any means. I'm not sure, actually, that Self Portrait was a "mutual agreement" project. Either Dylan told Bob [Johnston] to just go ahead and finish it up, by taking those demos and patching them up; or else maybe Bob Johnston still had to come up with some more tracks to complete his production contract with Dylan, and he just did them off his own bat. We never knew what the deal was.'

McCoy had played vibes, too, on an overdub session that April, and in New York as late as July 23, 1970 he was overdubbing bass onto attempts at 'Went to See the Gypsy', 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue' and 'If Not for You'—songs that would end up, recorded again without McCoy, on New Morning. It was the end of their association.

McCoy had also played on ELVIS PRESLEY sessions and in the late 1960s and 1970s performed with many other big names in rock, folk and country. It's said that in his prime he was playing on 400 sessions a year (more than one a day!) but he was a live performer too and in 1969 joined Area Code 615. He made a solo album the same year, inevitably titled The Real McCoy, but though it did nothing at the time, a track played on radio two years later gained such audience response that 'I Started Loving Her Again' became a top 20 hit single in 1972. McCoy wisely retained his session-work, and also moved across from Area Code 615 into its mutated successor Barefoot Jerry. In the 1980s he toured Europe and in the 1990s semi-retired. In 1994 he released an instructional video, Beginning Country Harp—though how he remembered his way back to being a novice is surely a mystery. In 1996 he and HARGUS ROBBINS, another Blonde on Blonde musician, played with the Jordanaires and others in an all-veterans combo behind a cult deconstructionist duo called Ween. He is still touring in 2006, in North America and Europe, and in 2005 released a CD of country standards played as instrumentals highlighting his harmonica, Classic Country.

[Charlie McCoy: Beginning Country Harp, OV11128, video, US, & Classic Country CD, nia, from www.charliemccoy.com. 'In the Studio: Charlie McCoy on Dylan', Record Collector, UK, Sep 1992. Data too from the entry by Jason Ankeny in the online All Music Guide. Bruce Langhorne non-recollection, e-mail to this writer, 9 Feb 2006.]

McCrary, Regina [1958 -] Regina McCrary (sometimes billed under her previous married names Regina Havis and Regina McCrary Brown) was born on May 22, 1958 in Nashville, the daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Brown, who as Sam McCrary was lead singer of the Fairfield Four gospel group in the 1940s (the group had been formed in the 1920s; re-formed in the 1980s, the Fairfield Four performs 'Lonesome Valley' on the soundtrack of the film O Brother Where Art Thou?). The younger sister of gospel-singer Ann McCrary, she was encouraged to audition for a place in Dylan's back-up singers' group by her friend CAROLYN DENNIS, whom she had known since they were small children.

She auditioned when the 1978 World Tour hit Nashville on December 2, almost at the end of its long run—and she was brought in for the sessions for Slow Train Coming in spring 1979, beginning with vocal overdubs in the Muscle Shoals studio in Sheffield, Alabama, that May 5 and continuing on May 7, 10 & 11. Next, the very beautiful Ms. McCrary formed part of the back-up singing outfit on Dylan's 'Saturday Night Live' appearance on October 20, 1979 and then embarked on the first Dylan gospel tour, starting with the long run of sold-out dates at the Fox Warfield in San Francisco that November 1 and finishing on December 9 in Tucson, Arizona. She had no idea how 'big' Bob Dylan was when she signed up with him: it was only when confronted with these audiences that she registered how important a figure he was to so many people.

Carolyn Dennis was not in the group on this tour: Regina's vocal colleagues were Mona Lisa Young and HELENA SPRINGS. The group sang some opening numbers each night before Dylan himself came on, but he plunged Regina in at the deep end by making her deliver as a monologue a particular 'Christian homily' story she'd known all her life and been heard retailing backstage.

In 1980 McCrary stayed on the Dylan payroll, remaining all through the year's touring—from snowy Portland, Oregon, on January 11 through to Charleston, West Virginia, on February 9, and from Toronto on April 17 through to Dayton, Ohio, on May 21. She was there too for the recording of the Saved album in between the two tours, beginning in the studio on February 13, along with Mona Lisa Young and CLYDIE KING, and she sang behind Dylan on 'Gotta Serve Somebody' at the Grammy awards show on CBS-TV in LA that February 27. (In March, when Dylan played harmonica on KEITH GREEN's track 'Pledge My Head to Heaven', two other McCrary sisters, Charity and Linda, were the back-up singers.)

On the second 1980 tour, she duetted with Dylan on his little-known song 'Ain't No Man Righteous, No Not One' at Hartford, Connecticut, on May 7, and two weeks later sang it solo on the tour's last night. Again, this tour did not include Carolyn Dennis.

In 1981 Regina McCrary was still with Dylan when he went into the studios in Santa Monica on March 11 to start work on the Shot of Love sessions, and towards the end of that month during one day's session she not only sang back-up vocals but was recorded singing solo lead vocals on 'Please Be Patient With Me' and (as she had done live the year before) 'Ain't No Man Righteous, No Not One'. She and Dylan even co-wrote a song at these sessions, 'Got to Give Him My All' (though it has never circulated, by either singer). She remained at the sessions until May, though she seems to have left before the last session, at which were Carolyn Dennis and MADELYN QUEBEC but no Regina.

On the June–July 1981 tour, Regina was there again, and sang solo lead vocal on 'Till I Get It Right' in an early slot at each concert, and duetted with Dylan on 'Mary from the Wild Moor' at the third London performance on June 28.

In all, she had been with Bob Dylan on three albums and over 150 concerts. By 1999, when interviewed for the US Dylan fanzine ON THE TRACKS, McCrary was working 'as a drug counselor in a Christian ministry' and singing on 'The Bobby Jones Gospel Show', then the largest gospel TV show in the country, which went out twice each Sunday via cable TV channel BET from Nashville, her home base. By 2004 she had become the Rev. Regina McCrary and was billed as a guest speaker at the Surviving Heartbreak Hotel Women's Retreat, again in Nashville.

In 2003, a circle of sorts was completed with the release of the various-artists compilation album Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan, which features two relevant items (alongside Dylan's own duet with MAVIS STAPLES): here we find an a cappella 'Are You Ready?' by the newest incarnation of the all-male Fairfield Four—and a version of 'Pressing On' billed as by the Chicago Mass Choir on which the lead vocalist is . . . Regina McCrary.

McGhee, Brownie [1915 - 1996] Walter Brown McGhee was born in Knoxville, Tennessee, on November 30, 1915. He was the older and smoother brother of Granville Sticks McGhee, composer of 'Drinkin' Wine Spo-Dee-O-Dee', with whom Brownie played in New York in the early 1940s, and on whose brother's huge hit record of 1949 Brownie too played and sang. He learnt ukelele, five-string banjo, piano and guitar but concentrated on guitar, met harmonica player SONNY TERRY in 1939 and off and on worked with him for 40 years thereafter.

McGhee first recorded in August 1940 in Chicago (his début track was 'Pickin' My Tomatoes'), and being an exemplar of the Piedmont blues school (if, in fact, there ever was such a thing) he was promoted as the successor to BLIND BOY FULLER, with whom he and Sonny Terry had both worked shortly before Fuller's death. He made one gospel session in 1941—as it happens, the day before Bob Dylan was born—billed as Brother George and his Sanctified Singers and he was recorded for the Library of Congress in 1942.

With and without Sonny, Brownie recorded for Folkways from the mid-1940s till the late 1950s (though moonlighting under pseudonyms for many other labels) and the two became an omnipresent part of the folk revival and blues revival scene in New York City (McGhee had even played on the soundtrack of Elia Kazan's 1957 film A Face in the Crowd, and both would do more film-work later).

By the time Bob Dylan arrived in Greenwich Village they were perhaps the world's best-known still-active blues artists. McGhee's Leroy Carr-inspired 'In the Evening' was in Dylan's repertoire by the time he went back to Minneapolis in December 1961 to show his old friends there his greatly improved skills and knowledge.

Dylan mentions Sonny & Brownie alongside THE BEATS and the jazz musicians when listing, in the Biograph box set interview of 1985, the constituent parts of the underground, bohemian scene that he found and tagged onto just before it was too late. But as Tony Russell sums it up, 'They were around for so long that they began to be overlooked or underestimated. Their blues stories, once new and fascinating, were still worth listening to but they had told them too often and like pub bores they . . . lost their audience. Still, for a generation they had been despatch riders of the blues . . .'

Sonny & Brownie, as it was sufficient to call them, played all through the 1960s and survived beyond them, recording, in 1973, a 'contemporary' album (itself just called Sonny & Brownie) on which they were joined by CLYDIE KING, Don 'Sugarcane' Harris, JOHN MAYALL and even (on a cover of Randy Newman's splendid song 'Sail Away') ARLO GUTHRIE, and which included versions of 'People Get Ready' and SAM COOKE's 'Bring It on Home to Me'.

By this point, the two could hardly stand each other though their duo continued until 1982, after which McGhee recorded with the inferior harp player Sugar Blue. He long outlived his ex-partner and died of cancer in Oakland, California, on February 16, 1996, aged 80.

[Brownie McGhee: 'Pickin' My Tomatoes' (& 3 others), Chicago, 6 Aug 1940; Sonny Terry & Brownie McGhee: Sonny & Brownie, A&M 64379, US, 1973, CD-reissued A&M 210-829, 1989 & Mobile Fidelity 641, US, 1995. A Face in the Crowd, dir. Elia Kazan; Newtown Productions, US, 1957.

Bob Dylan: 'In the Evening', Minneapolis, MN, 22 Dec 1961, unreleased. Tony Russell, The Blues From Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Aurum Press, 1997, pp.62–63. Also used: The Blues Encyclopedia vol. 2, New York: Routledge, 2005, pp.670–71.]

McGrath, Scott [1969 -] Scott McGrath was co-editor with RICHARD DAVID WISSOLIK of the book Bob Dylan's Words—A Critical Dictionary and Commentary, 1994. McGrath, born in the USA in 1969, was a graduate student in English Literature at Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, when he helped Wissolik compile and write this book; a published poet, artist and illustrator, McGrath dropped out of graduate school, taught in South Korea and cannot currently be traced. For his main contribution to Dylan matters, see Tarantula.

[Wissolik & McGrath: Bob Dylan's Words—A Critical Dictionary and Commentary, Greensburg, PA: Eadmer Press, 1994.]

McGregor, Craig [1933 -] Craig Rob-Roy McGregor was born in Jamberoo, New South Wales, Australia, on October 12, 1933. He is the author of 23 books, several of them on popular culture, including Pop Goes the Culture; People, Politics and Pop; and The History of Surfing. He has also written political biography and studies like his well-regarded analysis of the class structure of Australian society, very reasonably titled Class in Australia. From 1988 to 2000 he was Associate Professor and then Emeritus Professor of Visual Communication at the University of Technology, Sydney (which has 24,000 students).

He first became interested in Dylan in 1963, when he was writing on pop, jazz and folk for the Sydney Morning Herald and heard PETE SEEGER sing 'Who Killed Davey Moore?'; then he got to know WILFRID MELLERS, who visited Australia and lectured on Western pop music. Dylan's records only arrived in Australia later.

However, McGregor achieved an unusual access to Dylan when he and THE HAWKS arrived in Australia in April 1966 (accompanied by their manager, ALBERT GROSSMAN). At a time when the rest of the Australian press seemed determined to be offended and offensive, to trivialise and deride, McGregor knew what he was talking about, took Dylan seriously but wasn't intimidated, and wrote with flair. Still working for the Herald, he attended the hostile press conference held at the airport on Dylan's arrival, listened in on the separate interview given to some hopeless, pathetic TV smoothie, and didn't leave when the rest of the press did. He was there to see Dylan mobbed by fans when he emerged too, and wrote up what he'd seen. In a surprising break with tradition, his piece, though cut in half, was published on the front page of this staid and haughty paper.

In response, Dylan's road manager phoned to say he wanted to meet him that night at the concert—and when he arrived, he was told Dylan wanted to see him during the interval. Naturally, this was a difficult encounter, but McGregor returned the following night and then went to Dylan's hotel room, talked very briefly to a more relaxed Dylan but then in front of everyone had to pass the test of having some Blonde on Blonde acetates played to him. This went badly but when, later, McGregor was charged with inviting Dylan to a party laid on for him by local folkies, Dylan said he'd come if McGregor came too.

Later he wrote all this up in his very honest, absorbing introduction to the book of early, important writings about Dylan that he edited. This book, one of the first of any kind on Dylan, was published as Bob Dylan: A Retrospective in 1972, and collected together for the first time such historically significant pieces as ROBERT SHELTON's New York Times review of Dylan from September 1961, a number of items from IZZY YOUNG, PAUL NELSON, IRWIN SILBER, RALPH J. GLEASON and others, through to a testy review of Tarantula by Robert Christgau in the New York Times in 1971. The book ended with a specially commissioned piece by Wilfrid Mellers, which ended by expressing the wish that he might still be alive in 2000 to find out whether Dylan would 'preserve his folk-like integrity from youth through the middle years and even into a venerable old age'.

On Dylan's return visit to Australia in 1978, Craig McGregor was given a long interview, later incorporated into the 1980 edition of Bob Dylan: A Retrospective published in Australia. In the US the book was republished in 1990 as Bob Dylan, the Early Years: A Retrospective but excluded the 1978 interview.

[Craig McGregor, 'Bob Dylan's Anti-Interview', Sydney Morning Herald, 13 Apr 1966; Bob Dylan: A Retrospective, New York: William Morrow, 1972; also published in Australia (Sydney: Angus & Robertson, 1980), the UK and Sweden; reprinted as Bob Dylan, the Early Years: A Retrospective, New York: Da Capo, 1990; Pop Goes the Culture, London: Pluto Press, 1984; People, Politics and Pop, Sydney: Ure Smith, 1968; The History of Surfing, Sydney: Palm Beach Press, 1983; Class in Australia, Sydney: Penguin, 1997.]

McGuinn, Roger [1942 -] James Joseph McGuinn III was born in a Chicago suburb on July 13, 1942, the son of James and Dorothy McGuinn, whose book Parents Can't Win, a comic parody of the Dr. Spock genre, became a bestseller in 1947, and whose house was full of artistic friends as young Jim was growing up. Musically, his first inspiration was ELVIS PRESLEY, but he claimed that this was a short-lived interest (more fool him) and that rock'n'roll was displaced in his affections by folk when he saw Bob Gibson play, after which he wanted to get a banjo and a 12-string guitar and learn play folk songs, and absorbed the records of PETE SEEGER, ODETTA, BIG BILL BROONZY, LEADBELLY and FLATT & SCRUGGS. However, he has given other accounts that stress the Elvis phase rather more, suggesting that it led him to acquiring his first guitar at age 14, and to GENE VINCENT, CARL PERKINS, THE EVERLY BROTHERS and the rockabilly era of JOHNNY CASH before the Bob Gibson encounter. At any rate he was then one of the first pupils to enrol at the new Old Town School of Folk Music in Chicago, where he remained from 1957 to 1960, learning guitar, banjo and 12-string and an extensive folksong repertoire.

McGuinn started to play acoustic guitar in local clubs while still at school, was recruited into the Limelighters, brought to LA to play live and on their 1960 LP Tonight in Person and then fired within weeks as an economy drive by the core of the group. He stayed on in LA, met DAVID CROSBY, then moved to San Francisco, found himself recruited into the Chad Mitchell Trio and taken to Greenwich Village, where he played on their albums Mighty Day on Campus and Live at the Bitter End (1961 and '62), toured South as well as North America with them and then was just about to defect to the New Christy Minstrels when the excellent teen idol turned SINATRA wannabe Bobby Darin offered him a back-up guitar rôle in his new move into supper-club folk music. He never played on any Darin records but he became a writer in Darin's Don Kirscher-run Brill Building publishing company, where with co-writer Frank Gari he turned out surf songs, several of which turned into records as by the City Surfers (a quietly candid name) on which Gari sang, McGuinn played guitar and Darin drummed: 'Beach Ball' c/w 'Sun Tan Baby' and 'Powder Puff' c/w '50 Miles to Go' were 1963 singles.

At the same time, McGuinn was playing down in the Village again, and on sessions, including for Hoyt Axton and on JUDY COLLINS #3 (1963), which included the Seeger song 'Turn! Turn! Turn!' that McGuinn would later recreate with THE BYRDS. After all this came a return to LA, a gig at the Troubadour and before too long, the Byrds. (For Dylan's relationship with the Byrds and the McGuinn of those years—the period during which he switched from being Jim to being Roger—see separate entry on the group.)

After the end of 1965, when Dylan appeared on stage and sang fleetingly with the Byrds at Ciro's in LA, he and McGuinn never worked together again until Bob gave Roger a line or two informally for his song 'The Ballad of Easy Rider', written for the Easy Rider soundtrack in the late 1968;

McGuinn tried to give Dylan a co-writer's credit; Dylan was furious and made him remove it. (The film was released in 1969.) Dylan also appeared to rebuke McGuinn when, with HAPPY TRAUM, he re-recorded his own 'You Ain't Goin' Nowhere' in 1971 and sang 'Pack up your money, pull up your tent, McGuinn', as if correcting the Byrds' version of the line.

The two didn't try again until after McGuinn 'went solo' in 1972, at which point Dylan dropped in on the sessions for his début album in LA that August or September, and played harmonica on the song 'I'm So Restless', which duly became the opening track on 1973's Roger McGuinn. This album contained no Dylan songs, but the McGuinn solo albums that followed reverted to the Byrds-style habit of covering Dylan's catalogue; so Roger McGuinn & Band (1975) covered 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', Cardiff Rose (1976) included the Blood on the Tracks outtake song 'Up to Me' and Thunderbyrd (1977) included the Desire outtake 'Golden Loom'.

After the unexciting collaboration on 'I'm So Restless', McGuinn recurs in the Dylan story innumerable times, all equally insignificantly. It's always been intriguing that someone with McGuinn's heavyweight credentials and, as leader of the Byrds, a seminal place in the shaping of the 1960s—and someone who, face to face, has an almost intimidatingly powerful aura—should always come over, placed alongside Bob Dylan, as a conspicuous drip and so awkwardly unnecessary an appendage.

He plays anonymous guitar and adds backing vocals on the LA sessions for Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid (and so is in there somewhere on 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door') and he and Dylan share a sometime producer in Don DeVito and a sometime songwriting partner in JACQUES LEVY. He becomes one of the name artists on the Rolling Thunder Revues in 1975 and 1976, with his own short slot in each concert, inevitably centred around 'Mr. Tambourine Man' and his electric 12-string, plus a sharing of vocals with Dylan on 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'. There he is, therefore, in Renaldo & Clara, and there he is in SAM SHEPARD's Rolling Thunder Logbook, looking a twit in every photograph and sounding one in Shepard's polite description: 'Roger has a portable telephone'—he's always been into boys' toys and sci-fi techno-fantasy, and here he is in 1975, projecting himself into the cell-phone future years before the rest of us—'that he carries everywhere, contained in a black attaché case. . . . He usually dresses in a black silk top hat, brown hunting jacket, beige jodhpurs, riding boots and a whip.' Shepard adds (surely superfluously): 'The whip is more for show than anything else.' When he comes on stage, the audience has no idea who he is till JOAN BAEZ introduces him. Then, with his big guitar and his curiously sheep-like voice, he performs 'Chestnut Mare' or 'Eight Miles High' and the crowd goes apeshit.

It is on these tours that Dylan develops, even more slapstick-aggressively with McGuinn than with Baez, his habit of treating a duet as a duel: of goading and torturing the adversary at the microphone by singing as waywardly as possible and thrusting his face disconcertingly close to theirs. Some people hold their own; some wilt away; some, like Roger, stand there with a wan and feeble grin, being a victim but coming back for more, over and over again. In McGuinn's case this can be seen on film to high comic effect years later when they come together to sing 'Mr. Tambourine Man' at the ROY ORBISON tribute concert in LA on February 24, 1990 (a song with no connection to Roy Orbison at all, and sung less competently than Orbison ever sang anything).

In between the Rolling Thunder years and the Orbison occasion, McGuinn had first reappeared as a guest at the last of the 12 tremendous San Francisco concerts in 1980. That November 22, Dylan brought him on and introduced him with his customary mix of apparent enthusiasm and barely disguised belittlement: 'All right. We been here for 12 nights I think, and different people have been stopping down. I wanna thank them all. JERRY GARCIA was here, let's see: ELTON JOHN, BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, Captain Beefheart. They all went through here one time or another. Anyway got another special guest, ha ha, tonight. Can't get away, we know so many people you know. Anyway I first met this next man I think about, almost 20 years ago if not that. Probably was, and he was playing in a group. I don't remember the name of the group actually, but he went on and started a group called the Byrds: I'm sure you heard of them. Anyway we've played together before, been on tours together and all that kind of stuff. I'll bring him out here now, you know who he is: Roger McGuinn!'

Next McGuinn was the opening act on the 1987 European tour by Dylan with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS—inevitably coming on stage for a Dylan encore more nights than not, and standing there at the dread shared microphone like a medieval peasant in the stocks. He was there again in 1989, at a Dylan Never-Ending Tour concert in Tampa, Florida, duetting on, ho hum, 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' and retiring to guitar only for 'Maggie's Farm'. In 1992 he was one of the guests at the so-called 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration event for Dylan at Madison Square Garden, where he secured the penultimate slot, just ahead of Dylan himself, inevitably occupying it with 'Mr. Tambourine Man' (backed by Petty, the Heartbreakers, JIM KELTNER and Anton Fig), and then joining in, one of the chosen few, alongside Dylan once again for 'My Back Pages'. In 1996, McGuinn came on stage yet again, at yet another Never-Ending Tour concert, this time in Cleveland, singing backing vocals on 'My Back Pages' and playing guitar on that and 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'. He'll be along again any minute.

[Roger McGuinn: Roger McGuinn, Columbia C-31946, US 1973; Peace on You, Columbia KC-32956, 1974; Roger McGuinn & Band, Columbia PC-33541, 1975; Cardiff Rose, Columbia PC-34154, 1976; Thunderbyrd, Columbia PC-34656, 1977. The Limeliters: Tonight in Person, RCA RD7237, US, 1960. The Chad Mitchell Trio: Mighty Day on Campus, Kapp KS 3262, US, 1961 & At the Bitter End, Kapp KS 3281, 1962. The City Surfers: 'Beach Ball' c/w 'Sun Tan Baby', Capitol 5002 & 'Powder Puff' c/w '50 Miles to Go', Capitol 5052, both US, 1963. James & Dorothy McGuinn, Parents Can't Win, New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, c.1947.

Background data sources incl. 'Jim McGuinn the Early Years 1956–1964' & 'The Roger McGuinn Discography', both at http://ebni.com/byrds/memrm1.html & interview in Tower Records' epulse July 2, 1999, all online 19 Jan 2006; & interview by this writer, Birmingham, UK, 1974.]

McLagan, Ian [1945 -] Ian 'Mac' McLagan was born on May 12, 1945 in Hounslow, Middlesex, England (that is, neither in London nor the countryside out beyond it), grew up playing piano, acquiring a Hammond organ and, in an early band, the Muleskinners, backing HOWLIN' WOLF, Little Walter and other scary figures on their quick, cheap tours of Britain in the early 1960s. In 1965 he joined the Small Faces, which turned into the Faces in 1969. The Faces broke up when RON WOOD joined THE ROLLING STONES; McLagan joined them as a sideman later. In 1984 he was the keyboards player on Bob Dylan's European tour (Dylan's first since the semi-gospel tour of 1981), playing from May 28 in Verona, Italy, through to Slane, Ireland, on July 8: a total of 27 concerts. Thirteen years later, though the detail is murky, he says he was on a session for Time Out of Mind—including on the song 'Love Sick'—but that the versions he played on were not used.

Near the end of the 1990s, McLagan published a well-received memoir, All the Rage, and though the original hardback edition is out of print, the paperback is advertised online with this nicely judged short blurb: 'The book covers pre-Small Faces days with the Muleskinners, the great days with the Small Faces and the Faces. After that Mac plays with a number of bands including the Rolling Stones, Bonnie Raitt and the ever-cheerful Bob Dylan. He talks about both sides of the Moon (Keith, that is), the losses of Ronnie [Lane] and Steve [Marriott], his fight with drugs and drinks and what Rod Stewart is really like. Furthermore, he gets royalties on this so buy it now.'

The great British music critic Charles Shaar Murray elaborates on this in the review he gave the book in Mojo in January 1999: 'All the Rage contains an unfeasibly large helping of unforgettable vignettes of the rich and famous at work and play. . . . Here's KEITH RICHARDS, back in his druggy period [?], shooting himself up in the arse straight through his jeans, and then walking around with syringe still protruding from his butt. Or Bob Dylan replying to a large man introducing himself as "Hello, Bob, I'm Peter Grant. I manage Led Zeppelin", with a terse "I don't come to you with my problems." '

Long since married to Kim, the former Mrs. Keith Moon (a man much loved by McLagan even though Moon once paid someone to break his fingers—Pete Townshend paid the same man the same amount again not to), Ian McLagan has lived in Austin, Texas, for some years. It is a very different place from Hounslow, Middlesex.

[Ian McLagan, All the Rage: A Rock'n'Roll Odyssey, London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1998; republished as All the Rage: My High Life with the Small Faces, the Faces and the Rolling Stones, London: Pan, 2000. Time Out of Mind session claim in interview by Kent H. Benjamin, 5 Dec 1997 for Pop Culture Press no.44, US, 1998.]

McLuhan, Marshall [1911 - 1980] A Canadian academic who became a cultural guru of the 1960s–70s, McLuhan coined or made famous the phrases 'the medium is the message' and 'the global village'. His works include The Gutenberg Galaxy: The Making of Typographic Man, 1962; Understanding the Media, 1964; and The Medium Is the Massage [sic], 1967.

Dylan told Scott Cohen (Spin vol.1, no.8, USA, December 1985): 'I say, if you want to know about the '60s, read Armies of the Night by Norman Mailer, or read Marshall McLuhan. . . . A lot of people have written about the '60s in an exciting way and have told the truth. The singers were just a part of it.'

McLuhan's first name was Herbert.

McTell, Blind Willie [1903 - 1959] William Samuel McTell was born in the Happy Valley area south of the small town of Thomson, Georgia, in 1903. May 5 has long been rumoured the specific date, but this is impossible to confirm. (Until very recently it was thought that his birth was in either 1898 or 1901; it was also assumed that his first name was Willie, rather than William.) Before he reached adolescence, he and his young mother moved to Statesboro, Georgia, a far larger and more progressive town, and he thrived within it.

McTell grew up to be the most important Georgia bluesman to be recorded. He was a songster of wide repertoire and as fine a 12-string guitarist as ever lived. The dexterity of his playing was extraordinary, and his voice was an unusually smooth tenor. The interplay between voice and guitar also brought into the equation McTell's intelligence and wit, and it was the fusion of all these elements that led Bob Dylan to write in his 1983 tribute song that 'no-one can sing the blues like Blind Willie McTell.'

McTell explodes every archetype about blues musicians. He is no roaring primitive, no ROBERT JOHNSONesque devil-dealing womaniser. He didn't lose his sight in a juke-joint brawl, or hopping a freight-train. He didn't escape into music from behind a mule in the Delta. He didn't die violently or young. Instead, blind from birth but never behaving as if handicapped, this resourceful, articulate man became an adept professional musician who travelled widely and talked his way into an array of recording sessions.

He never achieved a hit record, but he became one of the most widely known and well-loved figures in Georgia. Working clubs and car-parks, playing to blacks and whites, tobacco workers and college kids, Blind Willie McTell, human juke-box and local hero, enjoyed a modest career and an independent life.

He recorded prolifically from the early days of blues recording and laid down a masterpiece on his first day in a studio, in 1927. In the mid-30s, as the Depression gripped, he dropped from sight. In 1940 John Lomax's wife spotted him playing in Atlanta, and he was recorded singing and talking for the Library of Congress. He was paid a dollar and his taxi-fare and dropped from sight once more: just another blind singer, and now turning 40.

He survived, and managed a return to commercial recording in 1949–50, with sessions for Atlantic Records and Fred Mendelson's small label Regal. By now there was no market for his pre-war acoustic blues style. MUDDY WATERS had already electrified Chicago. McTell disappeared once again. He was recorded, privately, one more time, in 1956 (by which time rock'n'roll was shaking up the blues in yet another way) and he died in obscurity in 1959—the very year his 'Statesboro Blues' became a 'discovery' of the new folk and blues revival movement. It would become a million-selling hit by the Allman Brothers Band (also from Georgia) in the 1970s.

No inferior shellac crackle dooms Blind Willie McTell to the ranks of the almost unlistenable. His pre-war recordings, like his diction, are clear, while the best of his lyrics show him to be an inspired individual composer within a milieu of shared, communal composition. Even where his lyrics are common-stock, the early voice is quietly pained and intimate.

This is evident on 'Mama 'Tain't Long fo' Day', the gem from McTell's début day in the studio, October 18, 1927. Early on, McTell tended to make songs more by putting together stock couplets of blues lyric poetry than by conscious composition. Yet here, though the great opening lines of verses 1, 3 and 4 ('Wake up mama, don't you sleep so hard', 'Blues grabbed me at midnight, didn't turn me loose till day' and 'The big star falling, mama 'tain't long 'fore day') derive from early vaudeville women performers and BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, he reworks them into a song of real individuality, made unforgettable by his voice and playing. A universe of communication seems held in tension between the exquisite keening of his bottleneck guitar and the vulnerable, edgy hope in his voice.

It's easy to hear too why 'Statesboro Blues' became much loved: this 1928 recording is so rock'n' roll. The lyrics are full of expressions baby boomers will recognise from JERRY LEE LEWIS records and the like: 'Sister got 'em . . . brother got 'em . . .' and 'hand me my travelin' shoes'. In truth these come from old hokum songs and gospel, but McTell propels them forward with fresh exuberance. The record's abrupt start signals its restlessness. It's as if McTell had begun before the machinery was ready and the first notes of the tumbling opening phrase are missing.

Woody Mann wrote of McTell's idiosyncratic genius on the 12-string: 'He treats each phrase of his music as a separate entity with its own rhythmical and melodic nuances. . . . As McTell's musical stream-of-consciousness wanders, so do his bar structures; he may follow a verse of ten bars with another of fourteen.' It's debatable whether McTell represents a Piedmont 'school' of guitarists, but there's no doubting his distinctive mastery of a difficult instrument. His is always uncannily well tuned, evincing a great sense of pitch, and he can make it do anything—on 'Atlanta Strut' he has it imitate mandolin, bass, cornet and trombone. He also played other instruments: harmonica and accordion. Later he experimented with electric guitar, and still owned one at the time of his death.

McTell mastered a number of styles and he could adopt a different accent for a particular recording. When he cut 'Motherless Children Have a Hard Time' for Atlantic Records in 1949, he made it a memorial to his long-dead friend BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON by a sustained imitation of both Johnson's voice and the distinctive atmosphere of Johnson's recordings. On 'Hillbilly Willie's Blues' in 1935 he indulged his penchant for wry impersonations of the hillbilly singers who lived in the Appalachian hills above his native Georgia plains: a talent first glimpsed on his début session's 'Stole Rider Blues', the finest record JIMMIE RODGERS never made.

McTell attended to white musicians as well as singers. 'Warm It Up to Me', 1933, may have been a re-write of any one of a number of similar songs, but noticeably it resembles white veteran guitarist JIMMIE TARLTON's 'Ooze Up to Me', cut in Atlanta 18 months earlier.

As well as being a friend of Blind Willie Johnson and good friends over a long period with fellow-Georgians Curley Weaver and Buddy Moss, with whom he recorded, McTell reportedly knew LEADBELLY, BLIND BLAKE, Lemon Jefferson, GEORGIA TOM and Tom's sometime partner Tampa Red. Their hit 'It's Tight Like That' was adapted on record by McTell and Weaver as 'It's a Good Little Thing', as was 'You Can't Get Stuff No More', while their 'Beedle Um Bum' was remembered by McTell nearly 30 years later at his 'last session'. He also knew and heard many performers who never recorded—among them the guitarist brothers Jonas and Hollis Brown (yes) from Atlanta.

For McTell it paid to be able to perform different sorts of material at different sorts of gigs, but he took pride in being a songster, knew all about the history of his material and felt deep affection for many kinds of song. Equally, he felt entitled to reshape them. As he says of 'Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues', 'I had to steal music from every which way to get it to fit.' He also said, of others' songs he performed, like Blind Blake's 'That Will Never Happen No More', 'I jump 'em from other writers but I arrange 'em my way.'

Few documents exist about McTell, and some that do, such as his marriage and death certificates, contain false or misleading information. His very surname dissolves and re-forms as it is scrutinised. His father's name was McTear or McTier, and members of his family swapped between these spellings. His professional pseudonyms included Pig'n'Whistle Red, Hot Shot Willie, Georgia Bill, Barrelhouse Sammy and Blind Sammie. Among friends he seems to have been known as Willie in Atlanta but in Thomson and Statesboro as Doog or Doogie.

Early on, he ran away from home: 'I run away and went everywhere, everywhere I could go without any money. I followed shows all around till I begin to get grown . . . medicine shows, carnivals, and all different types of funny little shows.' His recorded songs mention seven towns in Georgia plus Baltimore, Birmingham, Boston, East St. Louis, Florida, Lookout Mountain, Memphis, Newport News, Niagara Falls, New York, Ohio, Tennessee and Virginia. He also knew New Orleans, Kate McTell says he once took her to Oakland, California, and in 1935 the two of them recorded in Chicago.

Willie told Kate: 'Baby, I was born a rambler. I'm gonna ramble till I die.' However, McTell's romantic rambling spirit has probably been over-stressed, and it seems clear now that McTell spent the great majority of his time within Georgia, and that his traveling was mainly following the tobacco markets—Statesboro was an important tobacco town—and playing to winter tourists in Florida. Late in life his travelling routine centered around church concerts in the patches of Georgia he knew best and where he had relatives with whom he stayed recurrently throughout his life. He was a member of churches in Atlanta, Statesboro and Happy Valley, and often performed at church concerts, sometimes with gospel quartets. At WGST in Atlanta he sang spirituals on the air in the early 1950s, as he did for WEAS in nearby Decatur.

His country-gospel sides can delight: 'Pearly Gates' (Atlantic), 'Hide Me in Thy Bosom' and 'Sending Up My Timber' (Regal) make a thrilling trio. McTell was alive with conviction for these performances, while his Library of Congress session gives us a fond reminiscence about 'those old-fashioned hymns' his parents used to sing around the house before going out to work in the fields. McTell sings material like 'I Got to Cross the River Jordan' without melodrama and with great simplicity.

For all his efforts, and the extraordinary quality of his talent, Blind Willie McTell's career was doomed. By the time he was 50, to the extent that he was known at all, it was as an old Atlanta street-musician. McTell does not seem to have become embittered, though he drank, at times heavily, and suffered health problems.

Helen Edwards, with whom McTell had lived for at least 14 years—far longer than with Kate, who has received all the attention by having survived to be interviewed in the 1970s—died in November, 1958. The following spring McTell had a stroke, and moved back to Thomson to live with relatives. For a while his health improved and he played guitar once more. But suddenly in summer his health deteriorated again and he was admitted to Milledgeville State Hospital (a mental hospital). He died there one week later, on August 19, 1959, of 'cerebral hemorrhages'.

He was buried at Jones Grove Baptist Church, in Happy Valley, south of Thomson. Kate McTell learnt of the funeral too late to fulfil his request that one of his guitars be buried with him. This was not the only slip-up. The stonemason mixed up the name of the person who'd commissioned it with that of the person it was to commemorate, so Blind Willie's gravestone offered us one last pseudonym. It read EDDIE MCTIER 1898–AUG 19 1959 AT REST.

The white clapboard church has now been rebuilt in concrete, and David Fulmer, who directed the documentary film 'Blind Willie's Blues', has replaced McTell's gravestone with a new one, with a large picture of a guitar below the inscription BLUES LEGEND 'BLIND WILLIE MCTELL' BORN WILLIE SAMUEL MCTIER MAY 5, 1901 DIED AUGUST 19, 1959.

Since his death the re-emergence of his many recordings has shown that McTell was one of the blues world's consummate artists. Little of his influence shows in contemporary music. Unlike some of the Delta stars, he is not a father of rock'n' roll, but points backwards into an earlier world. Nevertheless, a well-kept secret among blues and folk fans in Britain and America since the 1950s, Blind Willie McTell is the last unrecognised superstar of the blues.

Not unrecognised by Bob Dylan, however, who, like his fellow Greenwich Village folkies, knew McTell's work from the inclusion of 'Statesboro Blues' on the compilation album The Country Blues issued to accompany the pioneering book of the same name by SAM CHARTERS. And Dylan not only respects and learns from that distinctive McTell interplay of music and quick intelligence, but deploys particulars of the older man's work resourcefully, and sometimes unexpectedly, in his own.

A very secular Blind Willie McTell line gets quoted in the 1979 album version of Dylan's Christian song 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking'. The song is full of the one 'authority on high', waved over us in all his Jehovah-severity, and verse six opens with the narrator on his way to following what he's earlier called 'a different set of rules': he's now 'got a God-fearing woman'. Yet, concerned to insist that she's a multi-dimensional character, he effects the surprise of slipping in a bit of raunchy approbation—letting into his evangelical, flagellant mansion the fresh air of an outside world. He sings ambitiously of a woman who is both the queen of his flesh and the lamp of his soul: a woman so well-balanced that 'She can do the Georgia crawl / She can walk in the spirit of the Lord.'

That 'Do the Georgia crawl' doesn't come straight from McTell, but it arises in Dylan's work because McTell used it. It's odds on that Dylan himself knew the earlier song, Henry Williams' and Eddie Anthony's 1928 'Georgia Crawl' (in which the singer's 'Aunt Sally . . . Do the Georgia Crawl till she died away'). It was an influential recording in its own right, by a popular local string band, and McTell certainly knew it, and took up its title phrase, making it his own by using it often, primarily on several versions of the song Bob Dylan finally puts on record himself on World Gone Wrong in 1993, 'Broke Down Engine [Blues]': a song Dylan suggests he came upon 'second-hand' yet which he calls 'a Blind Willie McTell masterpiece.' On McTell's first, and best, version of this song, 'Broke Down Engine Blues' from 1931, he sings 'What makes me love my woman: / She can really do the Georgia crawl', which he repeats on a 1933 re-recording, 'Broke Down Engine'. He sings the variant line 'What make me love little Sara, she can do the Georgia crawl' (that 'Sara' an odd little coincidence) on the 1933 remake 'Broke Down Engine No. 2'.

Three days later, McTell also puts a passing reference to 'that old Georgia crawl' into his version of 'East St. Louis Blues'—on which he also anticipates Bob Dylan by pulling in from elsewhere the folk refrain 'fare you well': 'Fare ye, honey, fare ye well. / You can shake like a cannonball / Get out and learn that old Georgia Crawl. / Fare ye, honey, fare ye well.' Bob Dylan recorded 'Fare Thee Well' in Minnesota back in May 1960, and then on another early, privately recorded performance of the wonderful 'Dink's Song', he quotes roughly the same line from 'Fare Thee Well' that McTell quotes in 'East St. Louis Blues', using it, like McTell, as a repeated refrain: 'Fare thee well my honey, fare thee well.' He even throws in, right next to it, as McTell does, the phrase 'like a cannonball'.

Just as Dylan puts that old Georgia Crawl to use in 1979 and 1993, so he uses other fragments from McTell recordings at different widely spaced points in his work. McTell's 'Southern Can Is Mine', recorded the same day as his first 'Broke Down Engine Blues', includes these lines: 'Ashes to ashes and sand to sand' and 'You might wiggle like a tadpole, let it jump like a frog', which Dylan utilises on two occasions over 20 years apart. When it was announced that he would found his own record label in the late 1960s, it was to be called Ashes & Sand; in 1990, on the album Under the Red Sky, the other line from the same McTell song gets tweaked into service for the lyric (such as it is) of Dylan's 'Wiggle Wiggle'. More interestingly, 'Rough Alley Blues', sung by Ruth Willis but with McTell providing the guitar-work, chorus singing and spoken commentary, includes the line 'Lay across my big brass bed.'

Then there is the talking blues 'Travelin' Blues', the stand-out track from McTell's session of autumn 1929. When we attribute Bob Dylan's talking blues style to WOODY GUTHRIE, we forget that black artists also explored this form, and that Guthrie himself listened attentively to black music. Specifically, we forget that Blind Willie McTell's 'Travelin' Blues' is a renowned example of the genre. His artistry and quick intelligence combine here to produce a talking blues of great good humour and poise, deftly quoting snatches of older popular songs ('Poor Boy' and 'Red River Blues'), imitating train noises on the guitar, recounting a long dialogue between the speaker trying to bum a ride and the railroad man refusing and tormenting him, and sewing together all these elements and more into a quirky, playful, sardonic whole.

Passages of its lyric, as well as quirks of McTell's delivery, cannot but put us in mind of Bob Dylan. What could be more 'Dylanesque' than McTell's insouciant spoken opening?: 'I was travelin' through South Americus / Walked up to a lady's house / [pause] Called her Grandma / [pause] Didn't know 'er name / [pause] She give me someth'n' to eat. / Walked on down the road.' Strongly reminiscent of 'I Shall Be Free No. 10' and with something akin to the flavour of 'Motorpsycho Nitemare', the McTell song also anticipates not only Dylan's mood and delivery but even, with that 'Walked on down the road', a line of lyric, from 'Talkin' World War III Blues', while the memorable way Dylan mumble-jerks the line 'Well I asked for something to eat', on 1965's 'On the Road Again', is a direct echo of the way Blind Willie McTell delivers the same little phrase in 'Travelin' Blues'.

On top of all this there is the parallel between McTell's switch to religious recordings and Dylan's. As noted, McTell's gospel sides of 1949–50 catch him performing with a renewed vigour. Similarly, Dylan's gospel tours of 1979–80 show him remarkably fired-up, while his newfound conviction inspired an explosion of songwriting more prolific than any since the mid-1960s. McTell's great 'Hide Me in Thy Bosom' sounds recorded behind fibreglass, yet at almost 50 he can still make you think of PRESLEY's 'That's All Right', his fluid vocal rides and swoops with such unloosed passion. There is also a particular, inspired piece of singing, early in the track, that one can imagine Dylan coming up with. On repeats of the line later in the song McTell is content with the conventional 'feed me, feed me, feed me', which follows the rhythm and gets its excitement from sheer insistent repetition, but the first time around he hits instead a long, sustained, utterly unpredictable 'feeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeed me', cutting across the rhythm and holding a note between the expected two. Dylan has done much the same in concert with the chorus of 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', turning 'knock knock knocking' into 'kno——ckin'', and you can imagine him doing the same in the course of a live performance of something from Slow Train Coming or Saved.

The two shared evangelically Christian interests at this point in their lives are. 'Sending Up My Timber' states the 'Are You Ready?' theme, performed with the same crusading spirit as the 'Saved' sessions generally: 'It may be morn or night or noon / But I do not know just how soon . . .' while McTell's Library of Congress session gives us a reminiscence about 'those old-fashioned hymns' his parents used to sing around the house before going out to work in the fields, one of which carried the same message: 'Are you just well to get ready?: You got to die, you got to die / Just well to get ready, you got to die / It may be tomorrow, you can't tell the minute or the hour / Just well to get ready, you got to die, you got to die.'

Most interesting here is the switch from the righteous 'you' in 'Just As Well Get Ready, You Got to Die' to the affecting 'I', in 'I Got to Cross the River Jordan': 'I got to face my dear Saviour, / I got to face Him for myself . . . / I got to lie in some old lonesome graveyard / I've got to lie there by myself / There's nobody there can lie there for me / Lord, I got to lie there for myself.' McTell sings this such that we feel his faith to be a struggle: a summoning of courage a hair's breadth from the bereft. It clinches the case for Blind Willie McTell's ability to lament for us—to be the artist onto whose shoulders Bob Dylan can place the weight of his visionary requiem for America's past and everybody's future.

So does 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues'. This is Willie's personalised version, one among a whole sequence of songs, based on the traditional English ballad 'The Unfortunate Rake' and which also becomes the black standard 'St. James Infirmary'. 'The Unfortunate Rake', 'St. James Infirmary' and 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues' all end up wondrously transmuted—see separate entry on this—into 'Blind Willie McTell'.

[Blind Willie McTell (all tracks listed here under this name, regardless of pseudonym on 78rpm records at the time): 'Mama 'Tain't Long Fo' Day' & 'Stole Rider Blues', Atlanta, 18 Oct 1927; 'Statesboro Blues', Atlanta, 17 Oct 1928, The Country Blues, RBF RF-1, NY, 1959 (issued alongside Sam Charters, The Country Blues, NY: Reinhart, 1959); CD-reissued Blind Willie McTell: The Early Years (1927–1933), Yazoo CD-1005, NY, 1990; 'Atlanta Strut' & 'Travelin' Blues', Atlanta, 30 Oct 1929; 'Motherless Children Have a Hard Time' & 'Pearly Gates', Atlanta, Oct 1949, Blind Willie McTell: Atlanta Twelve String, Atlantic SD 7224, NY, 1972; CD-reissued Atlantic 7 82366-2, 1992; 'Hillbilly Willie's Blues', Chicago, 25 Apr 1935; 'Warm It Up to Me', NY, 14 Sep 1933; 'Beedle Um Bum' & 'Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues', Sep 1956, Blind Willie McTell: Last Session, Prestige Bluesville 1040, Bergenfield, NJ, 1961, CD-reissued Prestige Bluesville Original Blues Classics OBCCD-517-2 (BV-1040), Berkeley, CA, 1992; 'Hide Me in Thy Bosom' & 'Sending Up My Timber', Atlanta, May 1950; 'I Got to Cross the River Jordan' & 'Just as Well Get Ready, You Got to Die', Atlanta, 5 Nov 1940; 'Broke Down Engine Blues' & 'Southern Can Is Mine', 23 Oct 1931; 'Broke Down Engine' & 'Broke Down Engine No. 2', NY, 18 Sep 1933; 'East St. Louis Blues', NY, 21 Sep 1933;. Ruth Willis (with McTell): 'Rough Alley Blues', Atlanta, 23 Oct 1931.

Woody Mann quote from sleevenotes by Stephen Calt & John Miller for Blind Willie McTell 1927–1935, Yazoo L-1037, NY, 1973. McTell quotes Atlanta, GA, Sep 1956, recorded by Ed Rhodes, issued Blind Willie McTell: Last Session. Kate McTell quote from interview with Kate McTell Seabrooks by Anne M. Evans, Blues Unlimited no.125, Sussex, UK, Jul/Aug 1977, p.6. David Fulmer, Blind Willie's Blues, Missing Lenk [sic] Video, Lawrenceville, GA, 1996; DVD-reissue within a Blind Willie McTell limited-edition box set due late 2005, details tba, still unreleased as of Apr 2006.

McTell's biography—Michael Gray, Hand Me My Travelin' Shoes: In the Footsteps of Blind Willie McTell, London: Bloomsbury—is due out in 2007, represents the first new research into his life since work by David Evans and his family in the 1970s, and will yield new information about McTell's life.]

Madhouse on Castle Street, The [1962 - 1963]
This was a BBC Television Drama (at the time there was only one BBC channel), filmed in London on December 30, 1962 and January 4, 1963, and transmitted in the UK that January 13. It was a consciously modernist play, written by the contemporary white Jamaican playwright Evan Jones, directed by Philip Saville—a young man of 28 at the time (he was born in London in October 1934)—and starring the young and relatively unknown ex-RADA (Royal Academy of Dramatic Arts) and Royal Shakespeare Company actor David Warner, and the still more unknown Bob Dylan.

The plot centres around a man who locks himself in a room in a boarding house—the 'madhouse' of the title—leaving a note announcing that he has decided to 'retire from the world'. His sister and the other residents try to find out why.

Philip Saville had seen Dylan perform in Greenwich Village and had managed to get the BBC to bring him over, paying a fee of 500 Guineas (at the time a couple of thousand US dollars) plus expenses; Saville also spent some time with Dylan in London in this period, Dylan staying as a guest at his home in affluent Hampstead, entertaining his two Spanish au pair girls late into the night and asking why he wanted to live the family life: why didn't he abandon it for the life of the road?

Saville wanted to incorporate Dylan's striking way with a folksong within the body of a play he much admired, but when it came to it, the play had to be altered at the last minute, separating the singing and acting rôles and bringing in David Warner for the latter (as Lennie) because Dylan flunked it when it came to the pre-performance readings. (This solution to the problem was the playwright's idea.)

Dylan (as Bobby) sat on the stairs and sang four songs (though as broadcast they were shown in often fleeting sections, never as whole-song performances): the traditional 'Hang Me Oh Hang Me' (aka 'I've Been All Around This World') and 'Cuckoo Bird' (aka 'The Cuckoo Is a Pretty Bird'), plus 'Blowin' in the Wind'—which had been recorded but not yet released, which Dylan had been performing in the Village for some time and which Philip Saville particularly wanted to include—and a song written in folksong style by Evan Jones, 'The Ballad of the Gliding Swan', which Dylan amended on the spot and never performed again.

After the broadcast, David Warner rapidly became a star. He was acclaimed for his role in Morgan, A Suitable Case for Treatment and for his playing of Hamlet at the RSC, both in 1966, and since then has appeared in almost 150 films including Straw Dogs, The Omen and Titanic. The tapes and film of Madhouse on Castle Street were retained by the BBC until these participants were huge stars, and then, in 1968, they destroyed the footage.

For over 40 years this unusual early moment in Dylan's career was thought to have been irretrievably lost—no footage of the play has yet come to light—until in 2005 Anthony Wall, a director of the BBC-TV arts series Arena, made an appeal for rare Dylan treasures while planning some extra material to augment the first British TV showing of MARTIN SCORSESE's documentary No Direction Home in September 2005.

Pete Read, a schoolboy at the time, had made a recording, and so had HANS FRIED, a young music enthusiast who had met Dylan, by chance, in a London jazz record shop very soon beforehand (see Graves, Robert), and who achieved a reasonably good sound on his tape, using a Baird reel-to-reel machine. For some time, this copy's existence had been known to IAN WOODWARD, a British Dylan expert and acquaintance of Fried's, and Woodward passed the recording to the BBC. (This was the second time the BBC's Arena series had unearthed early Dylan recordings: see also earliest extant recordings.) Later, but in the nick of time, a third and much superior tape-recording came to light, made by a Ray Jenkins from Esher in Surrey.

Until these tapes were gathered in, the lyrics of 'The Ballad of the Gliding Swan', as improved by Dylan, were lost to posterity. They begin memorably, yet in the style of an ancient ballad: 'Tenderly William kissed his wife / Then he opened her head with a butcher's knife / And the swan on the river went gliding by. / The swan on the river went gliding by. / Lady Margaret's pillow was wet with tears . . .'

These recordings were supposed to be publicly transmitted at long last in September 2005, within Anthony Wall's Arena: Dylan in the Madhouse, part of a short BBC4 'Dylan season'. In the event, not only did the programme spend most of its time on old news footage of Britain going through the exceptionally cold winter of 1962–63 (such that had the winter been mild, Arena's programme would have lasted about 15 minutes), and not only did it fail to press David Warner for detail on his recollection of meeting up with Dylan years afterwards (Dylan recalled 'You played me!' and astonished Warner by remembering the names of all the other actors), but these much-trumpeted recordings were treated in a most dilatory way, with no attempt to play them straightforwardly for all those who had turned their TVs on especially to hear them: and indeed the fragments that were played were from the inferior recordings, right until the closing moments of this hopelessly spun-out yet careless programme, when a few seconds of the superior version was played, as if deliberately to taunt the disappointed viewer.

Evan Jones, who had been born in Portland, Jamaica, in 1927, was most highly thought of in exactly the period of Madhouse on Castle Street. Film director Joseph Losey, given the chance to direct The Damned (1962), threw away the script, used a better one written by Jones, and delivered an uncompromising, bleak thriller. Jones went on to write screenplays for King and Country, Modesty Blaise, Funeral in Berlin and many later films. In 1976 his play The Man with the Power was commissioned and screened within the BBC's TV drama series Playhouse: The Mind Beyond, which looked at paranormal phenomena. The year before that, he had co-written the BBC's TV documentary series The Fight Against Slavery. In 1999 his memoir 'A Cushion for My Dreams' was collected in A Tapestry of Jamaica—The Best of SkyWritings, published by Macmillan Caribbean.

Philip Saville, who had started out his media life as an actor (he played a teenage dinner guest in the would-be surreal 1948 film A Piece of Cake) went on to direct, among much else, the film Stop the World I Want to Get Off in 1966, the TV series 'The Boys from the Blackstuff', written by Alan Bleasdale, which was the critical and commercial success of 1982, Life and Loves of a She-Devil in 1985, and the film Metroland in 1997.

It should be counted another of his successes that he brought Dylan over to London in 1962—that he brought him over to Europe for the first time in his life—and thereby introduced him to the English folk scene, to its clubs and prejudices and personnel, to Martin Carthy and so to 'Scarborough Fair' and 'Lord Franklin', and more: not to mention that Philip Saville gave Dylan his first experience of high-production-value broadcasting: network TV that was rife with the sense of its own importance; and all this at the very moment when the 1960s were beginning to dawn.

Mansfield, David [c1956 -] David Mansfield is very coy about his birth date but he was born around 1956 in Leonia, New Jersey, where he grew up to be a multi-instrumentalist, playing mostly violin, mandolin and guitar. His first band is said to have enjoyed the name Quacky Duck and His Barnyard Friends, which, as if that weren't bad enough, also included two of Tony Bennett's children.

He arrived, out of nowhere, in GUAM, not the unfortunate US dependency but the band put together for the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue tour, and unlike most of the Revue musicians, he continued to play not only through the second Rolling Thunder tour of 1976 but rejoined Dylan for the entire 1978 World Tour. (STEVEN SOLES and ROB STONER were the only others to do so.) All through this period, he looked about 12 years old, and not necessarily in a good way. 'Genius kid. Played everything but the kitchen sink,' wrote SAM SHEPARD, observing Mansfield in action on the first Rolling Thunder tour, without any hint that he found him likeable. Shepard watched him play, 'looking like Little Lord Fauntleroy, and impressing everyone with his classical violin technique.' Shepard noted too that Mansfield was 'often referred to' by ALLEN GINSBERG, also on the tour, as 'the boy with the Botticelli face'—a propos of which RONNIE HAWKINS would later tell this endearingly Hawkins story:

> 'Darlin' Doug was beautiful, but he wasn't gay. But he wanted to be a hero. He couldn't figure out why he wasn't on top of the world, he was so goodlookin' and this and that. And so I played a little joke on him. I was over talking to Allen, and Allen said "Who's that good-lookin' kid over there?" I said, "Oh, that's my rhythm-guitar player", I said, "But he's a little mixed-up." I said, "He thinks he wants to be gay." Of course Allen, the sweat broke out on him! Then I went over there and told Darlin' Doug, I said: "Now listen, see that guy over there? His name is Allen Ginsberg. He's the one that made Bob Dylan. He's worth billions. If he likes you, he'll buy a record company for you!" So Darlin' Doug goes over, and they sit down with each other, and meanwhile I'm hid in a corner watching the play! Oh man, it was a classic! Should have filmed that one.'

The main Rolling Thunder violinist was SCARLET RIVERA, but Mansfield played violin too, plus dobro, steel guitar and mandolin. Between the end of the Revue and the start of the '78 tour, Mansfield and Soles plus T-BONE BURNETT formed the Alpha Band, which released three albums. On the 1978 tour, while still ornamenting the sound with mandolin and guitar, Mansfield came into his own as sole violinist. He also played on the Street Legal album (violin and mandolin) as well as on the two live albums Hard Rain (his credit here is for guitar) and At Budokan.

Mansfield was also, like Soles and Burnett, a committed Born Again Christian, and therefore one of those quizzed about his faith by Dylan in 1978 as he tottered towards Jesus himself.

In 1986 Mansfield was in Bruce Hornsby and the Range just long enough to play on their hit 'Mandolin Rain' (guess what instrument he plays on that), but not long enough to go on tour with them. Both sides of the Hornsby job, he continued session-work, including for Edie Brickell, JOHNNY CASH, NANCI GRIFFITH, ROGER McGUINN, the Roches, Spinal Tap, Lucinda Williams and DWIGHT YOAKAM. He had also begun film work in 1980; perhaps it was ironic that after Renaldo & Clara, he and Ronnie Hawkins should both find themselves appearing next in Heaven's Gate, Michael Cimino's famously studio-busting commercial flop in 1980, in Mansfield's case playing the violin on roller skates as a member of the Heaven's Gate Band (along with T-Bone Burnett); but he also wrote the film's original music, after which he composed for many other films, including, more recently, co-writing the score for the 2002 film of Divine Secrets of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood, to which Dylan contributed the indifferent 'Waitin' on You'. And in 1996, when Ginsberg was giving early readings, set to music, of the last poem in his Collected Poems 1947–1995, 'The Ballad of the Skeletons', which grew into a collaboration with PAUL McCARTNEY, Philip Glass, Lenny Kaye and eventually the four-minute video directed by Gus Van Sant (1997), it was the no longer quite so Botticelli-faced David Mansfield who played guitar behind him.

[Sam Shepard quoted from Rolling Thunder Logbook, London: Penguin edn., 1978, pp.17 & 31. Ronnie Hawkins' story, told to this writer, St. Johns, Newfoundland, fall 1985, in '1976 & Other Times: Ronnie Hawkins, Rock'n'Roller', collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.]

Manuel, Richard [1943 - 1986] Richard Manuel was born in the small town of Stratford, Ontario, Canada, a few miles southwest of Toronto, where he joined RONNIE HAWKINS & THE HAWKS in the summer of 1961, aged 18, as the group's pianist. He had learnt to play as a young teenager, 'brought in gospel music from his church upbringing,' as RICK DANKO noted, and could sing in conscious imitation of RAY CHARLES—though later, in THE BAND, he found his own style without ever abandoning the Charles resemblance. A highlight of this fusion, caught on the album Islands yet even better on the unissued alternate take, is his 1977 recording of 'Georgia on My Mind'.

However, first came touring and recording with Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks, then with LEVON & the Hawks and then with Bob Dylan. The Hawks met Dylan in 1965 and that September got together with him to rehearse in Woodstock, New York (with Manuel on piano), for further live gigs beyond those already played with Levon & Robbie and other, non-Hawk musicians in the aftermath of 'going electric' at Newport that July. The first Dylan concert Richard Manuel played was probably October 1 at Carnegie Hall. Quite some initiation.

On October 5 the group went into the studio with Dylan for the first time, followed by more live concerts and a second studio stint—minus Helm—on November 30 (from which comes the single 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?'). This session has also now yielded the version of 'Visions of Johanna' released on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7, 2005.

The now-Helmless Hawks were back in the studio in New York at Dylan's behest on January 21–22, 1966, where they helped create that quintessential mid-60s Dylan record, 'She's Your Lover Now' (finally issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991), but when Dylan, Robertson and Rick Danko returned to the studio three days later, for sessions held January 25–28, Richard Manuel and GARTH HUDSON were not with them.

Manuel and Hudson certainly were there, however, for the madness and the glory of Dylan's 1966 so-called World Tour, beginning in Louisville, Kentucky, on February 4 and going across the States, into Canada and Hawaii, across to Australia and then to Europe, where they began in Stockholm, Sweden, on April 29 and ended at the Royal Albert Hall in London on May 27.

After all that came the calm of Woodstock and West Saugherties, 1967, when the Hawks were working very differently with Bob Dylan, laying down the Basement Tapes and preparing to turn into The Band.

Now, Richard Manuel came more fully into his own. He was, aside from ROBBIE ROBERTSON, the songwriter of the group. This side of his gift was previewed during the Basement Tapes sessions (when he was also, in Levon Helm's continued absence, playing drums). From here came the all-too-brief 'Beautiful Thing', the co-written 'Ruben Remus' and (co-written with Dylan) 'Tears of Rage'.

And this is the song that opens the great Music from Big Pink. As Barney Hoskyns writes: 'Richard Manuel's is the first voice you hear on the first Band album . . . his aching baritone launches into the first reproachful line of "Tears of Rage". . . . And by the end of the first chorus you realize why . . . fellow Band vocalists Levon Helm and Rick Danko always looked upon him as the group's "lead" singer.'

Manuel also wrote the painful yet shimmering 'In a Station', 'We Can Talk' and the exquisite, anguished 'Lonesome Suzie' on that album, and after 'Tears of Rage' he shared lead vocals with Robertson on 'To Kingdom Come', sang lead again on 'In a Station' and on 'We Can Talk' and 'Chest Fever', 'Lonesome Suzie' and the closing song, his lovely rendition of Dylan's 'I Shall Be Released'. He also sang back-up vocals and played keyboards.

On the even better second album, The Band, Richard Manuel was already starting to slide away from a prominence as great as Robbie Robertson's. While Robertson co-wrote or wrote everything on the album, Manuel this time merely co-wrote three songs: 'When You Awake', 'Whispering Pines' and 'Jawbone', though he was still very present as a multi-instrumentalist (he's credited with playing piano, drums, baritone sax and harmonica) and as lead vocalist on 'Across the Great Divide' and 'Jawbone', and shares lead vocals too on 'Whispering Pines', 'Rockin' Chair' and 'King Harvest (Will Surely Come)'.

Subsequent albums came, so much less wondrous than those first two. Manuel's contribution to their composition diminished till it disappeared. Many people would say that these two things were directly related. The group that had started out as so effective a demonstration of the rich fruits of collaborative labour now seemed increasingly led by Robertson's ego. On the third album, Stage Fright, Manuel co-wrote just one song, 'Just Another Whistle Stop'. On the fourth, Cahoots, nothing. On 1975's Northern Lights—Southern Cross, nothing. (Meanwhile Dylan, at Madison Square Garden on December 8, 1975, the last night of the first Rolling Thunder Revue, says when introducing 'I Shall Be Released': 'Gonna dedicate this song to Mr. Richard Manuel, who does it so well.')

On the original 3-LP set of The Last Waltz, even though this is supposed to take us back through classic Band repertoire, not one track—not one!—is either a Manuel composition or even co-composition.

He's there as musician, of course, and he's the lead vocalist on, aptly, 'The Shape I'm In' and co-lead singer with VAN MORRISON on 'Tura Lura Lura' and with Dylan on 'I Shall Be Released'. Shamefully, however, Richard Manuel's wonderful 'Georgia on My Mind' is still missing, even on the new 4-CD set of The Last Waltz. He really does get squeezed out.

And then, with The Band disbanded, Manuel was the one to suffer most. Raddled with addiction, to both alcohol and cocaine, he was the one who couldn't make it on his own. He made no solo albums; he joined no other band.

Somehow, when The Band itself re-formed, in 1983, Manuel was there, addiction free and functioning well, though some of the spine-tingling ethereal quality was now missing from his still-soulful voice. One of the great oldies he performed at this point was the Eddy Arnold song that had given Ray Charles a big hit in 1962, and which Dylan started performing some years later on the Never-Ending Tour: 'You Don't Know Me'.

Encouraged by Levon Helm, in 1985 Manuel was filmed in a small acting rôle, as Vigilante no.1, in the film Man Outside (Hudson, Helm and Danko appeared too), released in 1986 to no particular success.

In January 1986, disaster came swiftly. The old Band (and Dylan) manager ALBERT GROSSMAN died. Richard Manuel lost a man he'd come to depend upon to keep him relatively straight. He plunged back into addiction. Levon Helm's book This Wheel's on Fire claims that he was drinking as much as 12 bottles of Jack Daniels a day—possibly the heaviest consumption ever attributed to anyone, and scarcely credible. Whatever the details, it was an addiction that took a lethal toll. In the early hours of Tuesday, March 4, 1986, after a Band gig at the Cheek to Cheek Lounge in Winter Park, Florida, Richard Manuel hanged himself from his Quality Inn motel room's bathroom curtain rod, leaving his wife to find him.

He never played in public with Bob Dylan after 1976, and never made a solo album, though he did make, weirdly, posthumous appearances on a couple of albums by The Band. More significantly, in 2002 the Japanese label Dreamsville released a CD Whispering Pines: Live at the Gateway, taken from two intimate shows Richard Manuel gave at a club back in Saugherties, New York, on October 12, 1985, on which many tracks are solo but a few feature Rick Danko, Jim Weider and harmonica player Sredni Vollmer: 18 tracks, including two versions of 'Georgia on My Mind' and two of 'Across the Great Divide'.

'For me,' said ERIC CLAPTON, 'he was the true light of The Band.'

[Band album details see The Band. Richard Manuel: Whispering Pines: Live at the Gateway, Dreamsville YDCD-0082, Japan, 2002 (Other Peoples Music CD-OPM-6603, US), 2005. Man Outside, dir. & written Mark Stouffer, US, 1986. For a full Manuel discography see http://theband.hiof.no/albums/manuel_index.html.]

Marcus, Greil [1945 -] Greil Marcus was born in San Francisco on June 19, 1945. He became one of the writers who created rock criticism. Taking an interest in Dylan's work in 1963, he later started writing as a music critic for the 1960s Underground Press, penning eloquent, influential pieces on Dylan such as 'Let the record play itself', in early 1969, which derided A.J. WEBERMAN's crude 'interpretations' of Dylan's lyrics and used WILLIAM BLAKE to argue a point. His first piece of published writing on Dylan had been shortly before this: 'The Legend of Blind Steamer Trunk', San Francisco Express-Times, December 24, 1968.

His Rolling Stone review of Self Portrait in 1970 famously began by demanding: 'What is this shit?'; yet Marcus was invited to write the sleevenotes to the officially released double-LP The Basement Tapes in 1975. The same year saw publication of his fine and impassioned book Mystery Train. Later he moved on to works on punk and other subjects, and to speaking engagements, magazine columns, appointments such as being a Director of the National Book Critics Circle (1983–88) and academic posts.

Marcus then contributed to the positive sea change in Dylan's critical and popular esteem that suddenly occurred from 1996 onwards when he published a critical study centered upon one aspect of Dylan's work, Invisible Republic: Bob Dylan's Basement Tapes (1997), soon republished under the title he had wanted all along, The Old, Weird America: The World of Bob Dylan's Basement Tapes (2001): a book that was accorded a huge amount of reviewing attention in the press on both sides of the Atlantic, breaking down barriers thanks to Marcus' stature in cultural studies criticism, and even earning a mention in Dylan's own Chronicles Volume One. In 2005 Marcus published the book Like a Rolling Stone: Bob Dylan at the Crossroads, centered around Dylan's recording of that song. The book was written hurriedly, contains various errors of fact and has received rather more mixed reviews than he is accustomed to.

Marcus has, in other words, made a very significant contribution, and been well rewarded for it, but there is always a detectable groundswell of muttered resistance to the charms of his prose and the weight of his eminence. He sometimes comes close to self-parody, and sometimes may not actually be saying anything. Here he is, for example, in an essay published with the compilation album And the Times They Were a-Changin' in 1998: 'Bob Dylan's "All Along the Watchtower" takes place outside of time; JIMI HENDRIX's accepts time, and then unravels it.' It's a great technique, used sparingly, and his writing seems to pluck these verdicts from the air—verdicts with all the cryptic power of a guru up a pole, so that the hapless reader feels he can argue with neither the supreme self-confidence of the delivery nor with the content, since this is as ungraspable as it is forcefully done.

A good test is to put them the other way round and see if it makes any difference: 'Hendrix's "Watchtower" takes place outside of time; Dylan's accepts time, and then unravels it.' Hmm. Nonetheless, Marcus is a major figure, and, to his eternal credit, one of those who first insisted to the critics and guardians of mainstream culture that rock'n'roll music mattered and that figures like Bob Dylan mattered a lot.

[Greil Marcus, 'The Legend of Blind Steamer Trunk', San Francisco Express-Times, 24 Dec 1968 (revised version collected in Rock and Roll Will Stand, ed. Marcus, San Francisco: Beacon Press, 1969); 'Let the record play itself', San Francisco Express-Times, 11 Feb 1969; 'Album Review: Self Portrait', Rolling Stone no.25, San Francisco, 23 Jul 1970; Mystery Train: Images of America in Rock 'N' Roll Music, 1975; essay with album And the Times They Were a-Changin' (Various Artists, Débutante DeLuxe 555 431-2, PolyGram, London), 1998.]

Marquand, Richard [1938 - 1987] Richard Marquand was born in Cardiff, Wales, on April 17, 1938. After an education in England and France, he worked first as a television newscaster in Hong Kong (when this was still a British colony), getting into films via BBC documentaries and in 1979 making the dramatised TV film The Birth of THE BEATLES. From here his career took off, with 1981's post-war spy story Eye of the Needle, despite its mixed reviews, leading directly to his being hired by George Lucas to direct the third Star Wars movie, Return of the Jedi. In 1984 he directed a less successful love story, Until September, before his 1985 thriller Jagged Edge proved another high-quality work within its chosen genre, and enough of a commercial success that he could try to realise, next, a personal ambition to make a film with Bob Dylan: and not just a film, but Dylan's first mainstream rôle since Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid more than a decade earlier.

Unfortunately for him, Dylan and the rest of us, Marquand seemed to become curiously paralysed by being granted his wish, and never arrived at any clear idea of what film to create with Dylan or how to gain anything more from this artist than his signature on a contract. Though sharing the same writer (Joe Eszterhas) as well as director, none of the flair, freshness or intelligently devised drama of Jagged Edge was even hinted at in Hearts of Fire.

The film was barely finished when Richard Marquand died from a stroke in Los Angeles on September 4, 1987, at the age of 49. At least he didn't have to read the reviews. On the other hand, as WOODY ALLEN once remarked: 'Life is scarier than art. If you fail in life it can be dangerous. If you fail in art it's only embarrassing.'

[Birth of the Beatles, ABC, UK, 1979; Eye of the Needle, Juniper/King's Road, UK, 1981; Star Wars: Episode VI—Return of the Jedi, LucasFilms, US, 1983; Until September, MGM, US, 1984; Jagged Edge, Columbia, US, 1985; Hearts of Fire, written Joe Eszterhas & Scott Richardson, Lorimar/Warner Bros., US/UK, 1987. Woody Allen, BBC-TV interview, 1992.]

Marqusee, Mike [1953 -] An American left-wing writer and political activist, Marqusee was born in New York City in 1953, grew up in Scarsdale, NY, moved to Britain in 1971, spent three years at Sussex University and then settled in London, his base ever since. He is the author of the award-winning 1999 MUHAMMAD ALI biography Muhammad Ali and the Spirit of the Sixties (updated 2nd edition 2005), Anyone But England (on race, class and nationality in cricket, 1994) and War Minus the Shooting (on the Cricket World Cup in South Asia, 1996).

In 2003 he published the excellent study Chimes of Freedom: The Politics of Bob Dylan's Art. This refocusing of attention upon Dylan's early political songs—the so-called Protest Songs—was a timely and useful counterweight to the long general pull of Dylan studies and of opinion among Dylan aficionados that these songs are his least interesting. At the same time, Marqusee is eloquent on Dylan's abandonment of such overt political writing, and acute on the difference between that and an abandoning of political consciousness itself. Here he is on 'My Back Pages':

> 'Here he sneers at "corpse evangelists" who use "ideas" as "maps", who spout "lies that life is black and white" and who fail to understand that "I become my enemy in the instant that I preach." Alarmed by the discovery of authoritarianism at the heart of the movement for liberation (and within himself), he rebels against the left's self-righteousness. . . . [The song's] refrain—a recantation in every sense of the word—must be one of the most lyrical expressions of political apostasy ever penned. Ex-radicals usually ascribe their evolution to the inevitable giving-way of rebellious youth to responsible maturity. Dylan reversed the polarity. For him, the retreat from politics was a retreat from stale categories and second-hand attitudes. The refrain encapsulates the movement from the pretence of knowing it all to the confession of knowing nothing.'

And on the work that follows:

> 'Dylan's break with politics and the movement that had been his first inspiration unleashed his poetic and musical genius; it freed him to explore an inner landscape. His lyrics became more obscure; coherent narrative was jettisoned in favour of carnivalesque surrealism; the austerity of the acoustic folk troubadour was replaced by the hedonistic extravagance of an electrified rock'n'roll ensemble. The songs depicted a private universe—but one forged in response to tumultuous public events. It's remarkable that so many of Dylan's left critics failed to see the politics that infuse his masterworks of the mid-sixties.'

Ironically, given his comments on 'My Back Pages', Marqusee was involved that same year (2003) in classic left-wing internecine squabbles. Having left the Labour Party unable to stomach any more Blairism, he worked with, but was not a member of, the Socialist Workers Party, in the short-lived Socialist Alliance and in the Stop the War Coalition but found this an entirely negative experience: 'corpse evangelists'.

An updated, revised edition of Chimes of Freedom, re-titled Wicked Messenger: Bob Dylan and the 1960s, was published in late 2005, to include assessments of Dylan's film Masked and Anonymous and of his book of memoirs, Chronicles Volume One.

As well as an author and political activist, Marqusee is also a prolific, pithy journalist and reviewer: see, for instance, his sharp, clear-eyed review of Like a Rolling Stone: Bob Dylan at the Crossroads by GREIL MARCUS in The Guardian, May 28, 2005, which includes a fine brief description of the Dylan song itself. Finally, he is unique among authors of books on Dylan in having given a series of public talks about Dylan in India (2005).

[Mike Marqusee, Chimes of Freedom: The Politics of Bob Dylan's Art, New Press, 2003; revised edition published as Wicked Messenger: Bob Dylan and the 1960s—Chimes of Freedom, Revised and Expanded, New York: Seven Stories Press, 2005. For the political squabbles referred to, see the Morning Star, London, 13 Aug 2003 and Marqusee's own website, www.mikemarqusee.com, which also posts the review of Marcus' book on 'Like a Rolling Stone'.]

Marsalis, Wynton [1961 -] Born October 18, 1961 in New Orleans, Marsalis studied trumpet from age 12 and in high school performed in marching bands, jazz bands, funk bands (it says here) and classical orchestras. He attended the Juilliard School of Music at 18, and the year after became a member of Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers and signed with Columbia Records. Since his début LP in 1982, he has sold millions of jazz and classical albums, co-founded Jazz at Lincoln Center, won the first Pulitzer Prize for Music, been more fêted by the American cultural establishment than any other black person in history . . . and generally serves to remind us that Bob Dylan is still an outsider.

The first time Wynton Marsalis and Dylan performed 'together' it was at a distance of 650 miles, when Marsalis was part of the Atlanta, GA, ensemble singing a posthumous 'Happy Birthday' to Martin Luther King while Dylan was part of the ensemble singing it simultaneously at the main event venue in Washington, D.C., on January 20, 1986. (King's birthday is now officially celebrated in the US on the 19th; his real birth date was neither the 19th nor 20th but January 15; he was born in Atlanta in 1929.)

Dylan and Marsalis worked together properly, if very briefly, on June 7, 2004, at the Apollo Theater, NYC, when on a mixed bill of performing artists—Dylan, James Taylor, Al Jarreau, Branford Marsalis, Renee Olstead and the Wynton Marsalis Septet—Dylan sang and played harmonica on 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' and 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', backed by the Septet: surely a most interesting combination, likely to have discomfited Dylan more than somewhat. No tape has emerged. This may be connected to the fact that the 800 tickets on sale for this event cost $1,000 and $2,500 each. (Tables of ten were available from $10,000 to $35,000.) It was a benefit concert for the Jazz at Lincoln Center Benefit Concerts fund.

Masked & Anonymous* [film & soundtrack, 2003] This large-scale film marked Dylan's first ambitious movie project since the badly received four-hour Renaldo & Clara, released in 1978. This time the acolytes surrounding Dylan are Hollywood rather than rock and poetry stars: Jeff Bridges, Penelope Cruz, John Goodman and Jessica Lange instead of ALLEN GINSBERG, JOAN BAEZ, RONNIE HAWKINS and SCARLET RIVERA. The production companies behind the making of Masked & Anonymous, however, are comparable not to those of Renaldo & Clara but of No Direction Home (2005). Dylan's chief factotum JEFF ROSEN, plus film man Nigel Sinclair, co-produced both.

When the forthcoming project of Masked & Anonymous first made the papers, in February 2002, it was said to be based on a short story called 'Los Vientos del Destino' ('The Winds of Destiny'); in April this was said to be by an Enrique Morales and there was speculation that perhaps this was a Dylan pseudonym; on July 2 Morales was said to be 'an obscure Argentinean writer'; ten days later Morales, who was indeed both a real person and an Argentinean writer, and living in Paris, denied all knowledge of any such short story. By this point it was strongly suspected that the movie's credited writers, Sergei Petrov and Rene Fontaine, were Bob Dylan and the director, LARRY CHARLES. The pseudonym Sergei Petrov was taken from the name of an actor from the silent-movie era, who had appeared as a soldier in the weird 1928 Russian film Arsenal and had survived to take a final rôle in 1960 in the much-admired Roman i Francheska, directed by Vladimir Denisenko. (Another Sergei Petrov is a contemporary photographer working out of Arlington, Virginia; another is a distinguished Russian architect.) At any rate, this pseudonym sounded a better name that than of the character Dylan was to play in the film: Jack Fate. That did sound bad.

Filming took place in Los Angeles from June 17 to July 21, 2002, in the period between that year's Never-Ending Tour spring leg, which ended with two exceptionally good concerts at London's Docklands Arena on May 11 and 12, and the start of the next leg, in August in the USA.

Those who like the result use terms like 'an imaginative allegory' that 'overturns expectations' with 'a barrage of wit', 'energy and spirit' and 'creative vision'. Salon.com declared it 'an exhilarating jumble' and a 'brilliant must-see film'.

Well. First, it's only two hours long but like Renaldo & Clara it is partly a film about Bob Dylan's mystique, which dooms us to watching much forelock-tugging to the maestro while little more is required of him than that he stand there looking unimpressed.

The finest moment in the entire two hours of Masked & Anonymous occurs in the caravan of tiresome scuzzy-manager character Uncle Sweetheart, as Bob Dylan sits sideways and drapes his contrastingly bony, bony legs over one arm of the chair (naturally, he is placing himself obliquely). The enormous John Goodman protests that he is only human, and Bob responds: 'I know. It ain't easy bein' human.' Dylan delivers the line disarmingly, sounding, for almost the only time in the film, well, human, yet contriving to look, while saying it, uncannily like a monkey.

What seems welcome in this perplexing, vexing, lavishly tatterdemalion movie is its preparedness to say things like that. To hold out lines that are not from Hollywood; to offer a script that plays by a different set of rules. This is not 'realistic' dialogue. Everyone is constantly discussing the meaning of life. If they are speaking at all. It is all as stylised as can be, and its cadences are familiar to anyone who has ever heard Dylan's songs or even read his album sleevenotes or interview answers.

To hear Goodman cascading on about Alexander the Great and crankcase oil is to remember the mutterings about soldiers in the mud in Dylan's notes to the World Gone Wrong album. To listen to Jessica Lange holding forth about Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus and war is to recall the long harangues on the inner sleeves of Biograph. But sometimes to listen is to squirm, and to watch this film tensed against those moments when the script is so Dylanesque it's just dismal. There are less stressful (and funnier) moments, when these pronouncements veer towards the Donald Rumsfeld cliff-edge of cleverness, as when the Jack Fate character (Dylan) intones that 'Sometimes it's not enough to know the meaning of things: sometimes we have to know what things don't mean as well.'

As recurrent as the lengthy preacher-like pronouncements is the opposite stylistic tic, the dialogue built of extra-compressed monosyllables. Often the two forms meet: the Jeff Bridges character, or the Val Kilmer madman, rap on at wizened, silent Bob for minutes on end, only to elicit a grunt in response. Bob's facial expressions are so enigmatic they're often motionless. Sometimes he's so gnomic he's garden-gnomic.

But constant discussion of the meaning of life makes a pleasant change from soap-opera atavism and piety, and it's by no means always portentous. When the two idle members of the road crew are talking, their earnestness is nicely comic. The always-compelling Bruce Dern, though here distressingly shrunken and almost as simian as Bob in that chair, has a nice line: 'What am I drinking? I'm drinking my life away.'

The postmodern discussions of the meaning of Dylan's songs are comic too—at one point Penelope Cruz discusses their open-endedness with the Pope and Gandhi—except that this is a running joke that rests on knowingness, which is never as attractive as sincerity. Throw-ins like the wall of song titles that includes 'I Hate You' as well as 'I Want You'—these are the jokes that wear thinnest quickest.

Best is when the dialogue brings an unexpected moment of human warmth into the verbal play—as when Jeff Bridges, the loathsome journalist (and in Bobland there is no other sort) is grinding out his weary cynical take at Penelope Cruz, belabouring her with the standard orator's trick of three-point argument, that 'It's an overcrowded world. It's hard to get to the top. There's a long line at the elevator,' and she undercuts him with humane simplicity, saying: 'It doesn't matter. We'll take the stairs.'

This is Bobland in other ways too. Here is the same world he sings of in 'Angelina' (whose melody, uncredited, plays at the film's final end) and 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar': the world of interminable war and corruption, greed and meaninglessness, the America that is not merely North America but teems with the poor and the enslaved, the third world, the world that speaks in Spanish and knows that everything is broken. But unlike the songs, the film works so hard and so clumsily to say so. And though, as he wanders through his fallen world, there's a sense of Dylan the Sam Spade fan behind it, terse one-liners are not enough, and Bob looks more David Niven than Humphrey Bogart.

The big downside of characters who are archetypes instead of individuals is that they're doomed to be cardboard, managing therefore to be both flimsy and stiff. (Blame Dylan's lifelong fondness for Francois Truffaut's film Shoot the Piano Player.) It's no triumph of form that you never for a moment watch a single scene and forget that it isn't real. You watch Bob on the bus and he's keeping up a ponderous rocking from side to side that is clearly false in itself and shown to be the more so by the fact that none of the other passengers moves remotely like this. And there's an awful lot of watching Bob riding in vehicles to be got through, just as there's a great deal of watching him walk a hat around the place.

Worse, several key ingredients found only in truly bad films that are conventional Hollywood are here too. One: war backdrop or not, the whole plot rests upon people saying 'Hey! Let's put on a concert!' Two: we're asked to take at face value, solemnly, that the main character and a suitably subservient buddy (Bob and Luke Wilson) are Firm Friends who'll do anything for each other. Three: there's a random moment when, for no reason (there's not even a lame attempt to convey one) our main character walks out on things, and has to be begged to remain—and this is imagined to be a moment of drama. Four: there's a gruellingly pathetic fight scene, in which our hero is pushed reluctantly into Man of Action.

Scenes like these force you to concede with shame and sadness that for all its strenuous efforts to be art, and all its good intentions, at bottom Dylan's Masked & Anonymous is just an ELVIS movie. The music's better though.

Other artists on the soundtrack album include Swedish vocalist Sophie Zelman muttering 'Most of the Time' (in English) and Turkish pop star Sertab Erener singing 'One More Cup of Coffee'. (Sertab, born in Istanbul in 1964, had made her début album in 1992, and the same year as she appeared on the Masked & Anonymous soundtrack she won the Eurovision Song Contest for Turkey.) The more interestingly 'foreign' soundtrack items were Japanese duo the Magokoro Brothers with a cover of 'My Back Pages' sung in Japanese, taken from their 1995 album King of Rock (their début single had been in 1989; they'd disbanded by the time the Dylan film came out) and two contrasting Italian items: Francesco de Gregori (born in Rome in 1950, whose début album had been made in 1970) singing a translation of 'If You See Her, Say Hello' titled 'Non Dirle Che Non E' Cosi', and the 'spaghetti funk' rap duo Articolo 31 with their splendid rapping-in-Italian 'Like a Rolling Stone', 'Come Una Pietra Scalciata', which incorporated fragments of Dylan's original studio version. This comes from their 1998 album Nessuno, recorded in New York City. (The duo, J. Ax, aka Alessandro Aleotti, and DJ Jad, aka Luca Perrini, named their act after the article of the Italian Constitution that guarantees the freedom of the press, and made their début album in 1993.)

Dylan's own Jack Fate 'concert sequence' was filmed at Canoga Park, California, on July 18, 2002 and comprised 11 numbers, nine of which are featured in the film, with a tenth ('Standing in the Doorway') shown as a 'deleted scene' in the 'extras' on the commercially issued DVD. The nine are 'Down in the Flood', 'Amazing Grace', 'Diamond Joe' (not the same song as on the solo acoustic album of 1992, Good as I Been to You), 'Dixie', 'I'll Remember You', 'Drifter's Escape', 'Watching the River Flow', 'Cold Irons Bound' and 'Dirt Road Blues'. The 11th number, recorded but unreleased, was 'If You See Her, Say Hello'. On the soundtrack album the four 'concert sequence' tracks included are 'Down in the Flood', 'Diamond Joe', 'Dixie' and 'Cold Irons Bound'. Again, opinions vary from how thrilling this music is and how great to see Dylan and his excellent band playing at such close range, through to how embarrassingly bad Dylan's vocal is on this version of 'Dixie', how tediously raucous 'Down in the Flood' and 'Cold Irons Bound' are, and how aesthetically displeasing it is to see Dylan in his overly tight, urine-yellow suit.

Dylan's band at the time, and therefore in the film, comprised guitarists LARRY CAMPBELL and CHARLIE SEXTON, bass player TONY GARNIER and drummer GEORGE RECELI. In late July Dylan and a Biff Dawes mixed the 'concert sequence' recordings in Studio City, California.

The film was first premiered on January 22, 2003 at the Sundance Film Festival in Park City, Utah; various editing changes (shortenings) were then made; it was released in movie theatres that July 24. The DVD was issued on February 17, 2004.

[Masked & Anonymous, dir. Larry Charles, written by Bob Dylan & Larry Charles as Sergei Petrov & Rene Fontaine, prod. BBC Films / Destiny Productions / Grey Water Park Productions / Intermedia Films / Marching Band Productions / Spitfire Pictures, US, 2003. The DVD release (Columbia TriStar Home Entertainment, US, 2003) also includes the 16-minute 'making-of' feature 'Masked & Anonymous' Exposed, dir. & written (it says here) by Alexander Yves Brunner & Matt Radecki, Spitfire Pictures, US, 2003, with movie main participants interviewed by co-producer Jeff Rosen. Shoot the Piano Player, dir. Francois Truffaut, Les Films de la Pléiade, France, 1960.]

Masterpieces* [1978] A distinctive compilation album, this was a Japanese triple-LP set later released elsewhere. A lavish compilation, mostly of obvious selections from other albums but also collecting for the first time on album versions of 'Mixed-Up Confusion' (an alternative take from that on the 1962 single) and 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' (the single) from 1965; the live-in-Liverpool '66 cut of 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' (surely the greatest track in recorded history), the magnificent solo version of 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue' and 'George Jackson (Big Band Version)' from 1971 (all previously only issued as B-sides of singles) plus an inconsequential outtake from the Desire sessions, 'Rita May'. An expensive way of acquiring these.

[Released as 3-LP set, CBS/Sony 57AP-875/6/7 (Japan), Mar 1978.]

Mayall, John [1933 -] John Mayall was born in Macclesfield, near Manchester, in north-west England, on November 29, 1933. He was a multi-instrumentalist, playing harmonica, organ, piano and guitar and having trained on the London clubs circuit under the wing of Alexis Korner, he formed his group the Bluesbreakers, from within which emerged, as if conjured into being by morose magician Mayall, a troop of individual players who all became stars: ERIC CLAPTON, Peter Green (who with founding Bluesbreaker bass player John McVie duly formed Fleetwood Mac), MICK TAYLOR, Aynsley Dunbar, Keef Hartley, JACK BRUCE . . .

The only times Dylan and Mayall met up were in London in 1965. It was in the middle of this weird American folkie protest singer's last solo tour, and to oblige his record company back home, which wanted him to record a sales convention message, he stuck his head into the lion's mouth of a small London studio where Mayall was ringmaster (though TOM WILSON had been flown over as producer). Dylan's attempt to lay down a cut of 'just one verse' of his novel song 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', backed by John Mayall's Bluesbreakers, soon collapsed, since Dylan proved himself too embarrassed to count the others in competently and they were too perplexed to follow him. Eric Clapton, a recent recruit to the group, was in the room at the time, but did not play. Mayall and the others were unimpressed. 'Do it in time!' someone said, as if to an idiot. 'You haven't worked much with bands, have you?' asked someone else. Yet this was on May 12, 1965, by which time Dylan had already recorded Bringing It All Back Home, with a slew of musicians in New York (and, as it happens, versions of 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now' at the same sessions), the album had been released, and 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' had arrived in the British top 20 twelve days earlier, and had just jumped to no.6 that very week. The Bluesbreakers didn't even have a record deal at the time.

Mayall later called the session a two-hour-long 'fiasco', and claimed that he himself hadn't played behind Dylan anyway. Drummer Hughie Flint said: 'It was just messing around. I don't think we played a complete number. It was a real mess. There was a lot of booze there. . . . I'd never seen so much wine, and everybody got very pissed very quickly.' (A couple of years later the band McGuinness-Flint would make an album of Dylan covers, Lo and Behold.)

Despite all this, Mayall makes a brief appearance in Don't Look Back, seated in between Dylan and JOAN BAEZ in the back of the limo as they're driven from London to Birmingham exactly a week before their studio 'fiasco'. In the film scene, Baez is singing (as usual) and eating a banana. Dylan is writing down the words to a song (also as usual). He asks: 'Do you have some more paper where I can write out these things here?' Mayall gives the stolid reply, 'I'm afraid you'll have to make the most of that.'

Mayall went on to make jazz-blues fusion albums in the early 1970s, moved to Laurel Canyon in 1974, came back, reformed the Bluesbreakers in 1982 and was awarded the Order of the British Empire (even though there isn't one) in 2005.

Mellers, Wilfrid [1914 -] Wilfrid Howard Mellers was born in Leamington (pronounced Lemming-ton) Spa, in the English Midlands, on April 26, 1914. Educated at Cambridge, he fell under the rigorous influence of the pre-eminent and now deeply unfashionable literary critic F.R. Leavis, becoming a literary critic himself and writing for Leavis' defiant journal Scrutiny before turning towards music, publishing his book Music and Society: England and the European Tradition in 1946 and becoming, by the mid-1960s, the new University of York's first Professor of Music and a composer of distinction. He continued to straddle the rôles of critic and creative artist, and the genres of popular and classical music. His book Music in a New Found Land, written in the early 1960s and published in 1964, has held up creditably, and is remarkable for, among other things, its early (as it were) critical appraisal of ROBERT JOHNSON.

If it seemed an oblique comment when in 1967, in a news magazine survey titled 'Sixties', Mellers wrote that Blonde on Blonde was 'concerned more with incantation than communication', this may have been because at that point, like so many other musically sophisticated people, his interest in 'pop' was almost entirely taken up with an entrancement by THE BEATLES. He was among those who found the blandishments of Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band more beguiling than Dylan's work, and his book Twilight of the Gods was an early professorial rush into print with a Beatles study.

However, he never stopped paying attention to Dylan's output, and he was extremely well informed as to many of its antecedents—and while in 1980 he could produce the detailed, part-Freudian, part-musicological study Bach and the Dance of God, and three years later Beethoven and the Voice of God, a year after that he could offer A Darker Shade of Pale: A Backdrop to Bob Dylan. Awkwardly titled, and more backdrop than Dylan, it has proved more and more interesting and relevant since its publication in 1984. When it was new, it was received without enthusiasm by many of us who still, as the 1980s dawned, preferred to insist upon the blazingly unerring individuality of Dylan's art rather than concede that he stood in a tradition occupied by wrinkly old people with fiddles and banjos and obdurately conservative faces. In retrospect we can be grateful for, and a little impressed by, the sharp but serious attention it pays to the CARTER FAMILY, Nimrod Stoneman, Aunt Molly Jackson, Roscoe Holcomb, JIMMIE RODGERS and others from among the souls who have haunted Dylan's imagination and suffused his own art.

In 2004 the York Late Music Festival opened with a weekend's tribute to Mellers, and that October (not April) a tribute concert was held at Downing College, Cambridge, to mark Mellers' 90th birthday.

[Wilfrid Mellers, Music and Society: England and the European Tradition, London: Dennis Dobson, 1946; Music in a New Found Land: Themes and Developments in the History of American Music, London: Stonehill, 1964 (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1965); 'Sixties', New Statesman, London, 24 Feb 1967; Bach and the Dance of God, London: Faber & Faber, 1980; Beethoven and the Voice of God, London, Faber & Faber, 1983; A Darker Shade of Pale: A Backdrop to Bob Dylan, London: Faber & Faber, 1984.]

'Memphis Blues Again' [1966] See 'Stuck Inside of Mobile With the Memphis Blues Again'.

Memphis Jug Band, the The Memphis Jug Band was one of the most popular and important outfits of its kind in the late 1920s and early 1930s. It was formed by Will Shade in the mid-1920s and many different musicians passed through its ranks; those who performed with the group (rather than in it) included MEMPHIS MINNIE and Furry Lewis. They recorded prolifically between February 1927 and November 1934 and they performed live in greatly varied settings, from country clubs to street corners and from political rallies to fish fries. Their success created a craze for jug bands in Memphis, among them GUS CANNON's Jug Stompers and Jack Kelly's South Memphis Jug Band.

What makes a jug band unique is explained in an excellent short passage from Robert Gordon's It Came from Memphis, 1995: 'It creates a sound where there should be none, from instruments intended for other purposes. . . . The handmade equipment—a guitar from a cigar-box, a harmonica from a corn-cob—conveyed an egalitarianism that reached into the guts of their audience . . . [while] the jug blowers made keeping the beat into a touch of God. Their whoomp whoomp filled with character, the musicians themselves responding to the audience's disbelief of their capabilities, pushing their talents to new heights while their heads floated off their shoulders from hyperventilating.'

While Bob Dylan's 1965 song title 'On the Road Again' might be taken as a direct reference to JACK KEROUAC's novel On the Road, it is also a well-known track from 1928 by the Memphis Jug Band, whose records 'Bob Lee Junior Blues' (1927) and 'K.C. Moan' (1929) had been among the tracks on the crucial 1952 HARRY SMITH anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC—making them well-known items in the folk-revival repertoire—while their 'Stealin' Stealin' (1928) was one of the young Bob Dylan's early favourites.

The Memphis Jug Band's 'Bottle It Up and Go' (1932 and 1934) is one of those that led to BLIND BOY FULLER's big hit 'Step It Up and Go', revisited by Dylan on Good as I Been to You in 1992 but he had sung both 'K.C. Moan' and 'Stealin' Stealin' at the other end of his career—'K.C. Moan' as early as August 1960 in Minneapolis, and 'Stealin' on the December 22, 1961 taping done in Minneapolis, on the CYNTHIA GOODING 'Folksinger's Choice' WBAI radio programme in early 1962, live at the Finjan Club, Montreal, that July and in February 1963 on the so-called Banjo Tape with GIL TURNER on backing vocals. It's a song he loved, and performed extremely well.

The Memphis Jug Band couldn't get into a record studio again after 1934, though individual members continued to thrive. Will Shade survived until 1966, by which time the Greenwich Village and Cambridge, Massachusetts, folkie crowds had formed a whole new generation of jug bands, whose members included, at one time or another, JOHN SEBASTIAN, MARIA MULDAUR, SAM CHARTERS and many others with links to the Bob Dylan story.

[Memphis Jug Band: 'Bob Lee Junior Blues', Atlanta, GA, 19 Oct 1927; 'On the Road Again', Memphis, TN, 11 Sep 1928; issued on a soon-withdrawn British EP, HMV 7EG8073, London, nia, under the wrong title—i.e. as 'Overseas Stomp', another Memphis Jug Band track, itself more usually called 'Lindberg Hop', recorded the same day as 'On the Road Again'; 'Lindberg Hop', 2 takes, take 1 issued X, RCA Victor LVA3009, NY, nia (as it happens, Dylan, as Blind Boy Grunt, contributed to a version of 'Overseas Stomp' cut by Dick Farina & Eric von Schmidt, London, 10–11 Jan 1963, issued Dick Farina & Eric Von Schmidt, Folklore F-LEUT-7, UK, 1963); 'Stealin' Stealin'', Memphis, 15 Sep 1928; 'K.C. Moan', Memphis, 4 Oct 1929; Memphis Jug Band (as by the Picaninny [sic] Jug Band): 'Bottle It Up and Go', Richmond, IN, 3 Aug 1932 & (as by Will Shade & the Memphis Jug Band): 'Bottle It Up and Go', Chicago, 7 Nov 1934.

Robert Gordon, It Came From Memphis, Winchester, MA: Faber, 1995, p.42.]

Memphis Minnie [1897 - 1973] Lizzie Douglas was born in Algiers, Louisiana, on June 3, 1897, but moved to just south of Memphis as a child. She may have run away and joined Ringling Brothers Circus for a period, but certainly she was discovered (by Columbia Records) on Beale Street in 1929. She is an important artist in the history of the blues: an assertive singer, a very able lead guitarist and the confident composer of several classics. The country blues milieu was a male one, but she had great command of her material and a strong, confident voice; yet it was a voice full of subtle nuance as well as great directness. She brought women's blues forward, breaking free of the 'classic' style by bringing to her work less theatre and more musicianship. Lawrence Cohn calls her one of BIG BILL BROONZY's 'many gifted protégés', but the track of his that most resembles Memphis Minnie's style, his 1937 side 'Come Home Early', is strongly reminiscent of her mature work, suggesting another side to the question of who taught whom.

One of her husbands was Joe McCoy; they married in 1929, moved to Chicago in 1930 and recorded many sides together, some with great guitar duets, before they split up in 1935. (Wilber 'Joe' McCoy, an excellent guitarist, recorded between 1929 and 1937, using names from Mississippi Mudder to Kansas Joe to Hallelulah Joe, and joining the Harlem Hamfats in 1936 with his brother Charlie; both were influenced by Tommy Johnson. Joe also secured a reluctant Kokomo Arnold his record deal, and wrote 'Oh Red', a big record for BLIND BOY FULLER. McCoy was one of the earliest on record with the phrase 'shake, rattle and roll', which he built into his 'Shake Mattie': 'Shake shake Mattie, shake rattle 'n' roll / I can't get enough now, satisfy my soul.')

Playboy asked Dylan in 1977 what music he listened to—by implication wanting to see whether he would confess to keeping an ear on what was contemporary and popular. Dylan replied: 'I listen to Memphis Minnie a lot.' In 1985, when Spin magazine asked him to list his all-time top 10 favourite records, Minnie's classic 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues' was in there.

You can also hear it on that blues-soaked album, Blonde on Blonde. 'Obviously 5 Believers' is a filler track on the album, with a repetitive and undistinguished lyric; yet it stands in a distinguished tradition, its melody and structure and riff taken wholesale from 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues': a song with a history that is complicated to unravel but is a useful indication of how communal composition can work inside the blues.

Minnie was performing the song years before her 1941 recording. In 1933, Big Bill Broonzy lost a blues-playing contest to Memphis Minnie in a Chicago club, when he played 'Just a Dream' and she played 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues'. The judges were SLEEPY JOHN ESTES, Tampa Red and the man who wrote the lovely classic blues 'Trouble in Mind', Richard Jones. The prize was two bottles of whiskey. Broonzy, who must have had mixed feelings about losing to someone who might be called a protégé of his, says he lost the contest but ran off with the whiskey.

The story of the contest is especially interesting because if Broonzy is right about the date then Memphis Minnie was performing 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues' before Sonny Boy Williamson I put out his record of 'Good Morning, School Girl' and before competition judge Sleepy John Estes' 'Airplane Blues', though both are built on the same frame. Minnie's song even pre-dates the 1934 recording called 'Back and Side Blues' by Estes' pal from Brownsville, Tennessee, Son Bonds, cut at his début session, which 'Good Morning School Girl' also uncannily resembles. If Broonzy is wrong about the date of his story, then the contest probably took place in 1938—still three years ahead of Minnie putting her song on record—in which case Son Bonds would seem to have been the first into the studio with a song using this strongly distinctive structure and tune. Either way, it surely wasn't Sonny Boy Williamson's 'Good Morning, School Girl' that used this melody and structure first.

Memphis Minnie finally recorded 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues' in May 1941, three days before Bob Dylan was born. Within a year the now-forgotten Mabel Robinson went into the studios in New York and cut that rare thing, a worthy jazz version: one that doesn't patronise or apologise for the blues simplicity of the song but seizes joyfully on its strengths and retails it again, in this case sizzling with panache from the trumpet, tenor sax, piano, guitar, bass and drums of Sam Price's Blusicians (more or less the US Decca house-band, and featured on very many sides of the period).

In roaring contrast, in 1965, came a version by Big Mama Thornton which, more even than 'Ball and Chain', shows what a Thorntonnabe Janis Joplin was. Big Mama's 'Me and My Chauffeur' is not only uncannily Joplinesque, to put it the wrong way round, but offers the sort of grunge-rock that pterodactyls might have used as mating-calls. Less than a year later, Bob Dylan was disguising the song as 'Obviously 5 Believers'. (Jefferson Airplane put 'Me and My Chauffeur' on their second LP, Surrealistic Pillow, in 1967.) In 2005 the release of the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: the Soundtrack included an outtake of 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat', another blues from the Blonde on Blonde sessions (and essentially based on a LIGHTNIN' HOPKINS record): but Dylan, here taking the song much slower than on the album version, sings a previously unknown verse, possibly improvised, that almost gives the Memphis Minnie song its due name-check. Making a funny rhyme of it too, and giving us an outrageously overlong third line, he sings: 'Well can I be your chauffeur, honey can I be your chauffeur? / Well you can ride with me, honey I'll be a chauffeur / Just as long as you stay in the car: if you get out and start to walk you just might topple over / In your brand-new leopard-skin pill-box hat.' Sublime.

Memphis Minnie survived the Depression and the war years, and recorded again post-war. She recorded four numbers for a session in Chicago in 1952 for the Chess company's Checker label, re-recording 'Me and My Chauffeur' with Little Walter on harmonica. It was released as a single, but it first came out, as it happens, the same year that Dylan made and issued Blonde on Blonde.

Linda Dahl, in Stormy Weather, writes that '. . . she moved back down to Memphis in the mid-fifties in poor health. She spent the last years of her life in a nursing home and died in 1963,' but this date is wrong. In Paul Oliver's Story of the Blues, 1969, there is a photo of Minnie captioned 'at her Memphis home after a recent stroke'. She died there on August 6, 1973.

[Memphis Minnie: 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues', Chicago, 21 May 1941, issued on Paul Oliver's compilation The Story of the Blues, CBS (M) 66218, London, 1969, 2-CD reissue Columbia 468992 2, NY, 1991; session for Checker, incl. re-recorded 'Me and My Chauffeur', Chicago, 11 Jul 1952, The Blues Volume 5, Cadet LP 4051, Chicago, 1966. Joe McCoy: 'Shake Mattie', Chicago, c.Feb 1931; Memphis Minnie Vol. 2: With Kansas Joe, 1930–31, Blues Classics BC-13, Berkeley, CA, 1967. Big Bill Broonzy: 'Come Home Early', Chicago, 16 Aug 1937, Good Time Tonight, Columbia Legacy Roots N' Blues 467247-10, NY, 1990. Lawrence Cohn, notes to ditto. Sonny Boy Williamson: 'Good Morning, School Girl', Aurora, IL, 5 May 1937. Sleepy John Estes: 'Airplane Blues', NY, 3 Aug 1937. Son Bonds: 'Back and Side Blues', Chicago, 6 Sep 1934. Mabel Robinson: 'Me and My Chauffeur', NY, 20 Jan 1942. Big Mama Thornton: 'Me and My Chauffeur', LA, 1965, Kent 424, 1965.

Dylan quote, interview by Ron Rosenbaum, Burbank, Nov 1977, Playboy, Chicago, Mar 1978. Top 10 records list, Spin vol.1, no.8, US, Dec 1985. Minnie v. Bill song contest information from Big Bill Broonzy's book Big Bill Blues (as told to Yannick Bruynoghe), London: Cassell, 1955, retold in Linda Dahl's Stormy Weather: The Music and Lives of a Century of Jazz Women, 1984, and discussed at length in the chapter 'Me and My Chauffeur' in Paul & Beth Garon, Woman With Guitar: Memphis Minnie's Blues, New York: Da Capo, 1992.]

Memphis Slim [1915 - 1988] John Peter Chatman, son of a juke joint operator, singer, guitarist and boogie-woogie pianist, was born in Memphis on September 3, 1915 and grew up to spend the 1930s playing piano and singing in dance halls, sporting houses and honky-tonks mostly in and around Memphis. In 1940, having moved to Chicago, he made his recording début as Peter Chapman, but later that year used the name Memphis Slim on further 78rpm releases. He became a session player for Bluebird and as such cut many tracks with BIG BILL BROONZY, but from the mid-1940s went out on his own and became a long-term success not only as a singer and pianist but as a songwriter and a bandleader with a shrewd ear for modern trends. His predilection for jump-band arrangements, strong rhythm sections and ensemble saxes did not stop him spotting a white 'folk' market in the late 1950s and consequently working with the world's least jump-band-minded person, PETE SEEGER. In 1960 he débuted in Europe, touring with Willie Dixon. In late 1961 he emigrated to Paris and for nearly 30 more years enjoyed an agreeable and graciously handled eminence among expat musicians, making return visits to the US now and then, acting in French films—including, curiously, a small part in a 1963 French TV drama based on Harriet Beecher Stowe's 19th century novel Uncle Tom's Cabin, namely Le Théâtre de la jeunesse: La case de l'oncle Tom—and being awarded (some years ahead of Bob Dylan) the title of Commandeur de L'Ordre des Arts et Lettres.

For Dylan's strong reliance upon Memphis Slim's song 'Mother Earth', first recorded in 1954, see 'Gotta Serve Somebody'. He died in Paris on February 24, 1988.

[Le Théâtre de la jeunesse: La case de l'oncle Tom, dir. Jean-Christophe Averty, Paris, 1963.]

Meyers, Augie [1940 -] Augie Meyers, born in San Antonio, Texas, on May 31, 1940, contracted polio as a child, and is reputed to have taught himself to play piano when, to constrain the walking he found difficult, he was tied by a rope to the upright instrument owned by the grandparents who raised him. Later he played the Vox organ and accordion, and from local San Antonio bands of the late 1950s moved into a musical partnership with DOUG SAHM that enjoyed early success with the Sir Douglas Quintet but lasted, more on than off, until Sahm's death in 1999.

Bob Dylan first played alongside Meyers on the sessions for Doug Sahm and Band in New York in October 1972. Photos taken informally at the sessions show Dylan, a youthful 31, looking sexily radiant, at ease and in his prime; a few feet away, just as relaxed, there's Augie Meyers in a check shirt, overhauls and what might be a Davy Crockett hat, with a big black beard and a grin on his face, looking as if he just stepped out from behind a tree to exchange pleasantries with bears. Meyers plays guitar, organ and piano on the sessions (release details in the entry Sahm, Doug).

Twenty-five years later, Dylan brings him to Miami to play on the sessions for Time Out of Mind, on which he plays his Vox Continental—'your magic Vox', as Dylan calls it—supplying the sound that made the Sir Douglas Quintet so instantly recognisable on hits like 'Mendocino'. In 2001, Meyers comes back and plays it all over again on "Love and Theft", while son Clay contributes bongos. Dylan is quoted as declaring:

> 'Augie's my man. . . . the shining example of a musician, Vox player or otherwise, who can break the code. His playing speaks volumes. Speaks in tongues actually. He can bring a song, certainly any one of mine, into the real world. I've loved his playing going all the way back to the Sir Doug days when he was featured and dominant. What makes him so great is that internally speaking, he's the master of syncopation and timing. And this is something that cannot be taught. If you need someone to get you through the shipping lanes and there's no detours, Augie will get you right straight through.'

The most recent of a string of Augie Meyers solo albums, which began with Augie Meyers Western Head Music Co. in 1971, is Blame It on Love, in 2002.

[Augie Meyers: Augie Meyers Western Head Music Co., Polydor 24-4069, US, 1971; Blame It on Love, Texas World, US, 2002. Dylan quote from www.augiemeyers.com.]

Midler, Bette [1945 -] Bette Midler was born on December 1, 1945, in New Jersey, but grew up in Honolulu, Hawaii, where she majored in drama at university. Moving to New York City in the second half of the 1960s she soon made Broadway (in Fiddler on the Roof), but really made her name as a hyper-cabaret artiste in a gay bathhouse. She slid over to the mainstream via records (her first album went platinum, and in 1989 she had a no.1 hit single, 'Wind Beneath My Wings'), theatre and eventually film (among many others, she starred in Down and Out in Beverly Hills, Ruthless People and Outrageous Fortune in the second half of the 1980s, worked with WOODY ALLEN in the early 1990s and appeared in the remake of The Stepford Wives in 2004).

When Dylan was first asked to duet with Midler, he wanted them to record a version of 'Friends', a song she'd put two versions of on her début album, The Divine Miss M in 1973. After rehearsing it, they swapped to 'Buckets of Rain' instead, giving it a pleasing, relaxed but rollicking pace and an appealing melody line—it would be country if Midler's arranger and producer had been less mainstream showbiz—and with an altered lyric far more flirtatiously throwaway than the original, not least in singing of 'nuggets' instead of 'buckets', and ending with this spoken exchange:

Bob: 'Hum, meany.'

Bette: 'Oooh, you don't even know. You have no idea.'

Bob: 'I don't want to know. . . . You and PAUL SIMON should have done this one.'

This was not the last flirtation between the two, though it seems to have been very one-sided. Ms. Midler was quoted in British tabloid newspaper The Sun in 1982 as saying that she has tried and failed to seduce Bob: 'I got close . . . a couple of first bases in the front of his Cadillac.' At the end of the 1985 recording of 'We Are the World', the charity fund-raising single in response to famine in Ethiopia, Dylan avoids the embrace of many an over-excited fellow star, but cannot 'evade a block tackle by linebacker Bette Midler. . . . This time her determination proves irresistible.' She hugs him and tells him 'Goodnight, dearest.'

An earlier take of their duet on 'Buckets of Rain', with more conversation, has circulated among collectors. For more on Dylan's original lyric, see separate entry on the song.

[Bette Midler (with Bob Dylan): 'Buckets of Rain', NY, Oct 1975, Songs for the New Depression, Atlantic SD 18155, US (Atlantic K50212, UK), 1976; CD-reissued Atlantic 82784-2, US, 1997. Bette Midler: The Divine Miss M, Atlantic SD 7238, US, 1973. 'We Are the World' hug: breakfast time, 29 Jan 1985; quote from JOHN BAULDIE: '1980s: Dylan and the Making of USA-for-Africa', Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: Futura edition, p.214.]

'Midnight Special' A traditional prison song about a train, associated with LEADBELLY. One of Dylan's earliest professional studio jobs was as harmonica player on a HARRY BELAFONTE version of the song, recorded at Webster Hall, NYC, February 2, 1962. At least 20 takes were attempted; one was released on Belafonte's album Midnight Special (RCA LMP 2449, NY), March 1962. Dylan, discounting his work on a CAROLYN HESTER album and indeed his own first LP, describes his Belafonte studio session as 'my professional recording début'; and then he adds, 'Strangely enough, this was the only one memorable recording date that would stand out in my mind for years to come. . . . With Belafonte I felt like I'd become anointed in some kind of way.'

Pop singer and writer Paul Evans notes re its 'shine your light on me' lyric that 'there was a legend in the southern states of America that if the light from the Midnight Special shone into your cell, you would be pardoned.'

[Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.69. Paul Evans, undated interview by Spencer Leigh in Baby, That Is Rock and Roll: American Pop 1954–1963, p.132.]

Mississippi Sheiks, the The Sheiks comprised, on record, fiddle player Lonnie Chatmon and singer-guitarist Walter Vincson (aka Walter Vinson, Walter Vincent and Walter Jacobs), plus, sometimes, Chatmon's brothers Sam and Bo (aka Bo Carter). In live performance they were often augmented by yet more Chatmons and the great Jackson Mississippi mandolinist Charlie McCoy (not to be confused with the harmonica player and multi-instrumentalist on Dylan's late-60s albums). Live, too, Lonnie Chatmon played tremendous waltz and hoedown fiddle music within the duo/group; on record, they were more constrained by record company demands for the blues. This made them the most successful black string band of the pre-war period, and they started their prolific recording career with a bang, not only enjoying a hit from their first session with their own 'Sitting on Top of the World' but hearing it become a standard that crossed over swiftly to country, Western swing and bluegrass, and remained almost compulsory in the repertoires of innumerable musicians in these and later genres, as well as prompting plentiful covers and wide recognition within the blues.

Among those to cover the song pre-war were the Beale Street Rounders, Sam Collins and Joe Evans & Arthur McClain. ALAN LOMAX calls it 'the Delta favourite'. Post-war it continued to thrive, recorded by everyone from HOWLIN' WOLF to Bill Monroe & His Blue Grass Boys in the 1950s (with composer credits given to 'Henderson-Young-Lewis'), by DOC WATSON in the 1960s and by the hobo-white-blues-pre-rockabilly artist Harmonica Frank Floyd in 1974. (Sittin' on Top of the World was also the title track of the Johnny Shines collection issued by Biograph in the 1960s.)

There's an interesting variant on 'Sittin on Top of the World' by Bumble Bee Slim, 'Climbing on Top of the Hill' (1934), covered within a year by the man who popularised 'Step It Up & Go', BLIND BOY FULLER. Other songs using the melody and theme of 'Sittin' on Top of the World' are BIG BILL

BROONZY's 'Worrying You Off My Mind' (1932), Black Ace's lovely 'You Gonna Need My Help Someday' (1937) and SONNY TERRY's 'One Monkey Don't Stop the Show' (1960).

The very next song the Sheiks cut back at that début session (which was in Shreveport, Louisiana, in February 1930) was their next biggest hit, 'Stop and Listen Blues', which came from the great Tommy Johnson's own classic, 'Big Road Blues'. Their last session was over 100 sides but only five years later—some recordings were made under names like the Blacksnakes and the Mississippi Mud Steppers—after which, musically, Lonnie Chatmon left the building. Walter Vincson continued to record till 1941 and again post-war, reappearing in the 1960s and making sides under the name Mississippi Sheiks, but without its old sound, as late as the 1970s.

For details on Dylan's early recording of 'Sitting on Top of the World' see Williams, Big Joe. He revisited the song 30 years down the line on his return to a solo acoustic album, 1992's Good as I Been to You, and then relied on two further old Sheiks records, again both original compositions of theirs (probably Vincson's), on the album after that, 1993's World Gone Wrong. By the time he came back to 'Sitting on Top of the World', he could draw upon it, granted the history of its fortunes, to help build his album as a fusion of black and white repertoire. Yet the 1990s Dylan version surely fails. Of all the songs on these two solo acoustic albums, this is the one that Bob Dylan could most definitely do far better on another day. There's a strange rigidity to the rhythm, something Dylan is virtually never guilty of, and what explains this is to be found by listening to the Mississippi Sheiks version. Dylan replicates it—at the same pace, and word for careful word! Everyone has sung this song, and everyone has personalised it; the lyric variations are boundless . . . and Bob Dylan stands aside from all that, and reproduces the Sheiks' 1930 version! It's too scrupulous, too carefully exact; and its failure is compounded by the way that while Dylan adds harmonica accompaniment—and the harp suffers from the tentativeness that has been its fatal main characteristic for so long now—he offers no equivalent to the bluegrass flavour that makes the Sheiks' version attractive. The Sheiks have each other to raggedy it up, and give it internal movement. Dylan, on his own, lacks this. The flaccid ending is like a giving up, an admission of failure.

Not so—very much the opposite—when he turns his attention to the two Sheiks songs he uses on World Gone Wrong, though describing the group perhaps surprisingly straightforwardly in his liner notes, he still seems concerned to stress that their work needs no alteration:

> '. . . the Mississippi Sheiks, a little known de facto group whom in their former glory mustve been something to behold. rebellion against routine seems to be their strong theme. all their songs are raw to the bone & are faultlessly made for these modern times (the New Dark Ages) nothing effete about the Mississippi Sheiks.'

Throughout, these liner notes are part of Dylan's armoury of insistence on the contemporary relevance of such material: the continuing value and pertinence of both the poetry of the old blues world and that of medieval balladry. The title-character in 'Love Henry' is presented immediately by Dylan as 'Henry—modern corporate man . . .' He writes of the Civil War song 'Two Soldiers' something he clearly applies to all: that they're about 'learning to go forward by turning back the clock, stopping the mind from thinking in hours, firing a few random shots at the face of time.'

So too he changes the Mississippi Sheiks' title 'The World Is Going Wrong' into 'World Gone Wrong', deploying the past tense for present pertinence. In making this small, deft change, despite the insistence that all the Sheiks' songs are 'faultlessly made for these modern times', Dylan is updating. For the Mississippi Sheiks, 'The World Is Going Wrong'; for Dylan it's already a 'World Gone Wrong' (though he retains their present-tense version of the line in the repeated refrain—in fact singing it so that it's almost impossible to distinguish between the two). And here, as with 'Delia' on the same album, Dylan takes something jaunty and close to throwaway, something recorded in a few minutes back in 1931, and, as it were, restores it to a greatness it never knew it had.

The song's first phrase, too, makes such a good Bob Dylan opening statement: 'Strange things have happened . . .' is decidedly Dylanesque. It has a flash of mischief about it too, as well as its mordancy—the mischief of following up an album called Good as I Been to You with a similar album that begins 'I can't be good no more . . .' And as he occupies the song, it is far more poignant, far less preachy, than the rumours preceding its release had suggested—and he sings it so aptly, with a lovely, wriggling, burrowing delivery.

When Dylan comes to 'Blood in My Eyes', which they call 'I've Got Blood in My Eyes for You', here too he deepens it: he reaches higher than the Sheiks did. Again, he abbreviates their title and extends their contents. He has gained, by gaining middle-age, the ability to sing so sour and 'adult' a love song without it either ringing false or glamourising the unglamourously cynical, as a more youthful performer, a more youthful Dylan, would surely do. His version stalks along with predatory, loping menace, its quiet unhurried unstoppability sinister and brooding, the terrible calm of the guitar-work enacting some old, twisted animal's implacable pace. Early on, it even halts altogether for a moment—a moment in which anything might happen: and then it simply resumes its hunt.

The words are just lies, snares, hooks, traps. The singer is asked 'Hey hey man, can't you wait a while?' and he answers 'No, no, babe . . .' and even this is a lie. The long guitar-break comes in at this point, as if he can wait, and will wait, because waiting is part of the pleasure of the kill. He's like the treacherous judge in 'Seven Curses', whose 'old eyes deepened in his head'. And at the end, what is the last noise on the track? A cough! He coughs, like an old man. Like an old lion who has choked on his food. It is a vividly imagined, powerful performance, and as a reading of the Sheiks' song, indisputably up at the creative end of song-interpretation.

Dylan has never performed 'World Gone Wrong' live, but he has twice performed 'Blood in My Eyes': at the New York Supper Club early shows on November 16 & 17, 1993. He also made a terrific promo video of the track, filmed by DAVE STEWART, wandering round the streets of Camden, London, in July 1993. It's one of the few Dylan videos that's any good. Aptly for the era of the song, it's shot in black and white, and Dylan walks around like a New Orleans undertaker, complete with black top hat.

NB: It's fairly certain that Dylan knew all three of these Mississippi Sheiks recordings in the 1960s, but it's striking too that all three used on these two Bob Dylan albums were reissued on one Yazoo CD in 1992.

[Mississippi Sheiks: 'Sittin' on Top of the World', Shreveport, LA, 17 Feb 1930; 'The World Is Going Wrong', Atlanta, GA, 24 Oct 1931; 'I've Got Blood in My Eyes for You', Atlanta, 25 Oct 1931, all on Stop and Listen Blues: The Mississippi Sheiks, Mamlish S-3804, NY, 1974; CD-reissued on Stop And Listen, Yazoo 2006, NY 1992. Bob Dylan, 'Blood in My Eyes' promo video, London, 21 Jul 1993.

Beale Street Rounders: 'I'm Sittin' on Top of the World', Chicago, c.13 Oct 1930, CD-reissued Memphis Harp & Jug Blowers (1927–1939), RST Blues Documents BDCD-6028, Vienna, 1992. Sam Collins: 'I'm Still Sitting on Top of the World', NY, 8 Oct 1931. Joe Evans & Arthur McClain as the Two Poor Boys: 'Sittin' on Top of the World', NY, 21 May 1931, Early Country Music, Historical HLP-8002, Jersey City, NJ, nia, CD-reissued The Two Poor Boys, Document DOCD-5044, Vienna, 1991. Johnny Shines: Sittin' on Top of the World, Biograph, nia, 1960s, reissued Biograph BLP 12044, Canaan, NY, 1973. Bill Monroe & His Blue Grass Boys: 'Sittin' on Top of the World', nia, Knee Deep in Bluegrass, Stetson, US, 1958, reissued Stetson HATC 3002, nia. Doc Watson: 'Sitting on Top of the World', NY, 25/26 Jan 1963, Doc Watson, Vanguard VRS-9152 (mono) & VSD-79152, NY, 1964. Harmonica Frank: 'Sittin on Top of the World', Blues That Made the Rooster Dance, Barrelhouse BH 05, US, 1974.

Bumble Bee Slim: 'Climbing on Top of the Hill', Chicago, 10 Sep 1934. Blind Boy Fuller: 'I'm Climbing on Top of the Hill', NY, 23 Jul 1935, CD-issued Blind Boy Fuller: East Coast Piedmont Style, Columbia Roots N' Blues Series 467923 2, NY, 1991.

Big Bill Broonzy: 'Worrying You Off My Mind', NY, 29 Mar 1932, CD-reissued Big Bill Broonzy: Good Time Tonight, Columbia Roots N' Blues 467247-10, NY, 1990. Black Ace: 'You Gonna Need My Help Someday', Dallas, TX, 15 Feb 1937, New Deal Blues (1933–1939), Mamlish S-3801, NY (& on the EP Black Ace, XX Min701, UK), 1971, CD-reissued Black Ace: I'm the Boss Card in Your Hand, Arhoolie CD 374, El Cerrito, CA, c.1990. Sonny Terry: 'One Monkey Don't Stop the Show', Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 26 Oct 1960, Sonny's Story, Bluesville BV-1025, nia.

Alan Lomax quoted from The Land Where the Blues Began, New York: Pantheon, 1993.]

Mitchell, Joni [1943 -] Roberta Joan Anderson was born on November 7, 1943 in the tiny town of Macleod (now Fort Macleod), Alberta, Canada. She grew up teaching herself guitar and piano, both of which she plays like no-one else, so that these unique styles have themselves been the shaping forces behind many of her highly personal songs, along with lyrics of great intelligence and emotional directness mediated by acute self-observation and lightness of touch, all of which qualities were clear even on her début album, Joni Mitchell, produced by DAVID CROSBY in 1968, on which, despite its occasional immature gush, she was already evidently an original writer, capable of complexity of form and content. She also has a highly distinctive voice of great range (if with a tendency, unchecked early on, to shriek off at the top end).

The result is that she has been absolutely the most important female singer-songwriter of Bob Dylan's generation, and the greatest such figure alive today. It is a reflection of our culture's continued disinclination to take women as seriously as men that her work is not more commonly mentioned in the same breath as, if not Dylan's then at least VAN MORRISON's and NEIL YOUNG's. Like Dylan she has never been content to stay in one place artistically, and has created a large body of variegated, honourable work achieved over several decades. She has become too a figure of dignity and gravitas, a rôle model for women through her skilled, unpreachy delineation of the predicaments and inconsistencies of being a contemporary woman in the modern world as well as through her insistence on high standards for her artistry.

She began her career in the folk clubs of Toronto before belatedly joining the New York City folk scene in the mid-1960s and finding her first success as the writer of 'Urge for Going', recorded by Tom Rush and George Hamilton IV, and 'Michael from Mountains', recorded by JUDY COLLINS, who enjoyed a hit with Mitchell's 'Both Sides Now', one of the songs on her second album, Clouds, in 1969, along with the widely covered 'Chelsea Morning'. All these songs were picked up by other artists before Joni Mitchell landed her record deal. (Judy Collins' version of 'Both Sides

Now', for example, started out as a track on her 1967 album Wildflowers.)

In 1970 Mitchell had her own first hit single with 'Big Yellow Taxi', from her third album, Ladies of the Canyon, which also included the song 'Woodstock', covered by Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young, and 'The Circle Game'. Next came the lovely albums Blue and, even better, 1972's For the Roses, an album not far short of, and preceding, Dylan's Blood on the Tracks as a superb, contemporary yet timeless work of mature intelligence, fully achieved. 'Woman of Heart and Mind' is sublime, and is followed by the closing track of this masterwork, the dark and glorious 'Judgement of the Moon and Stars (Ludwig's Tune)'. The album also contained the hit single 'You Turn Me on, I'm a Radio'.

Sometimes, following this, Joni Mitchell would veer off into unwelcome jazz explorations, but she always came back, sometimes bringing something useful with her. There isn't the space here to do justice to her long, subsequent career, though any list of her other finest albums would have to include Hejira (1976), Night Ride Home (1991) and Turbulent Indigo (1994).

Bob Dylan first came to her attention back in 1965, when she was a struggling and unknown folkie with songwriting ambitions—and heard 'Positively 4th Street' on the radio: 'When I heard Bob Dylan sing, "You got a lotta nerve", I thought "Hallelujah!, man, the American pop song has grown up. It's wide open. Now you can write about anything that literature can write about." Up until that time rock & roll songs were pretty much limited to, "I'm a fool for ya, baby".'

Oddly, in the light of that, when it came to the Starbucks album Artist's Choice: Joni Mitchell—Music That Matters to Her, 2005, the Dylan track she includes is 'Sweetheart Like You', from the Infidels album of 1983. (She also chooses a track of her own, 'Harlem in Havana'.)

Dylan recorded a delightfully casual but convincing version of her 'Big Yellow Taxi' in the studios in New York on June 4, 1970, at one of the sessions for the New Morning album; it was issued not on that LP but on the subsequent compilation Dylan issued in late 1973. Mitchell and Dylan first worked together two years after that, when she dropped in on the Rolling Thunder Revue tour of 1975—by which time she was a major star in her own right. SAM SHEPARD reports DAVID BLUE as eagerly awaiting the psychic catfight in prospect when SARA DYLAN was due to arrive: 'Just wait,' said Blue, 'till her and Joni get around each other. You'll get some shit on camera then. . . . Sara's a very regal, powerful chick, and Joni's gettin' into her empress bag now. I mean Joni's a real queen now. She's really getting' up there.'

And she was. However, though no clash between her and Sara Dylan occurred, she did find the whole business of supporting RUBIN HURRICANE CARTER rather difficult. She never believed he was innocent (and she was probably right); nor did she enjoy the concert held in his presence at the Correctional Institute for Women in Clinton, New Jersey on December 7, 1975—on the eve of the 'Night of the Hurricane' concert at Madison Square Garden. Rolling Stone reported that the 'mostly black audience of prisoners . . . loved Dylan, Roberta Flack and ALLEN GINSBERG, but Joni Mitchell's supercilious songs were booed and she shrilly lectured Carter and the rest of the inmates: "We came here to give you love; if you can't handle it that's your problem."'

In Austin, Texas, on January 28, 1976, three days after the second and final fund-raising Rolling Thunder gig for Carter (staged in Houston), Dylan made a surprise guest appearance at a Mitchell concert, coming on stage to duet with her on 'Both Sides Now' and then to sing 'Girl of the North Country' by himself.

They next appeared on stage together at the Farewell Concert by THE BAND later that year (and consequently in the film The Last Waltz), but after that there seems to have been no conjunction till both performed, separately and together, in Japan in May 1994, at the so-called Great Music Experience at the Todaiji Temple, Nara, when for the finale of the third and final night's concert, on May 22, Joni shared vocals with Dylan on 'I Shall Be Released', backed by the Tokyo New Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Michael Kamen. This was televised around the world and caught Joni Mitchell looking askance at Dylan throughout this duet. Afterwards she complained that he never cleaned his teeth.

Undaunted, she reappeared on a triple bill with him and Van Morrison at a series of six West Coast concerts in May 1998, beginning in Vancouver on May 14. On the opening night she stood at the side of the stage for Dylan's set after completing her own. In the town of George, in Washington State, on May 16, she shared vocals with Bob and Van on the tenth song of Dylan's set, 'I Shall Be Released'. It was alleged that on the second of two dates at UCLA in Los Angeles, on May 22, Dylan came on during Joni's set to share vocals with her on 'Big Yellow Taxi'—but this didn't happen: Joni just imitated his voice on one verse. The last night of the six was at Anaheim on May 23.

Like Dylan, she has slowed down her output in middle age. She released only three albums of new material in the 1980s and a further three in the 1990s. But her career proceeds, recurrently beset by fights with the music-biz, which she has often roundly condemned, in tandem with her life-long interest in painting. She has painted not only a number of her own album covers but also for example the cartoonish front of the 1974 Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young album So Far.

Nor has she lost her sense of humour. The cover of Turbulent Indigo is a self-portrait of Joni as Van Gogh, complete with bandaged ear. And in 1996 she released two compilation albums. One was called Hits: the other, Misses.

NB: the 2005 Joni Mitchell—Collector's Edition 2-DVD set, combining the unmissable 2003 documentary A Woman of Heart and Mind with a 1998 live show previously released as Painting With Words and Music, is advertised as having a duet with Joni and Dylan on 'Positively 4th Street': but this is actually a clip of Joni singing along to the Dylan record. A bit of a swizz as a duet but belated proof of that special fondness for 'Positively 4th Street'.

[Joni Mitchell: Joni Mitchell (later re-titled Song of a Seagull), Reprise, US, 1968; Clouds, Reprise, 1969; Ladies of the Canyon, Reprise, 1970; Blue, Reprise, 1971; For the Roses, Asylum, US, 1972; Hejira, Asylum, 1976; Night Ride Home, Geffen 24302, US, 1991; Turbulent Indigo, Reprise / WEA 45786, US, 1994. Artist's Choice: Joni Mitchell—Music That Matters to Her, Starbucks / Hear Music / Rhino Special Products OPCD-7699 LMM-286, US, 2005. Joni Mitchell—Collector's Edition 2-DVD set, Eagle Eye Media EE 39072-9, US, 2005 (the 1st DVD includes brief footage of Dylan at Newport Folk Festival and from Don't Look Back). Quote re 'Positively 4th Street' from Bill Flanagan, Written in My Soul, Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1986; Rolling Stone quoted from online review of movie Hurricane, posted 2000, nia.]

'money doesn't talk' One of Dylan's best-remembered lines of the 1960s is that snarl from 'It's Alright Ma (I'm Only Bleeding)', that 'Money doesn't talk, it swears.' But while this spin on the phrase 'money talks' is Dylan's, the notion of making such a spin comes down through the blues from even further back, in black-face vaudeville. A Victor catalogue of 'Darky ditties' from around 1903 contains, in the category 'Comic and Coon Songs by Arthur Collins', one called 'If Money Talks, It Ain't on Speaking Terms with Me'; years later the same idea had migrated into an early blues that begins 'I can't make a nickel, I'm flat as I can be / Some people say money is talking, but it won't say a word to me.'

[Victor catalogue reproduced in Tony Russell, Blacks Whites and Blues, London: Studio Vista, 1970. Early blues song source unknown.]

More Bob Dylan Greatest Hits* [1971] UK title for Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits Vol. II.

Morrison, Van [1945 -] George Ivan Morrison was born in Belfast, Northern Ireland, on August 31, 1945, and grew up in that harshly divided sectarian city. At 12 he joined the skiffle group Deannie Sands and the Javelins, later touring Germany's clubs in the Monarchs before returning to Belfast to become the lead singer of Them, one of the funkiest of the British beat groups reviving Chicago blues and rock'n'roll for teenage Saturday night dances in the early 1960s. All these groups attacked their material with crude simplicity—guitar, bass and drums all playing three-chord numbers in a home-made style—but Them's special funkiness was due in large part to the exceptional, almost venomous devotion to soul singing on the part of Morrison himself.

Them, a five-piece group, were signed to a major UK label, Decca—the one that had rejected THE BEATLES—and achieved hits first with a revamp of BIG JOE WILLIAMS' 'Baby Please Don't Go' and then with two songs that swiftly became anthemic classics, 'Here Comes the Night' and the Morrison-penned 'Gloria', though their studio work ranged more widely than this perfect pop and the group, at Morrison's prompting, was quick to make an audacious 'cover' of Dylan's 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue'—the first overt indication that Dylan's work had in any way impinged upon this very different artist.

Tiring of the lumpen limitations of the rest of the group, and never especially skilled at intrapersonal relations, Van Morrison went solo, signing a new deal with Bert Berns, who had been the group's manager and producer. Berns, an ex-Juilliard School of Music pupil but also one of the era's bumptious entrepreneurs, who might have sold frozen foods as easily as popular music, had enjoyed great success with various other R&B-style singles acts, and who, with the Erteguns and JERRY WEXLER, had recently formed Bang Records in New York.

Using session musicians just as capable as Them of dragging down Morrison's already extraordinary emergent talent, as both composer and vocalist, Berns produced the now-legendary Bang sessions in 1967 that included prototypes of 'Beside You' and 'Madame George', songs destined to re-emerge in transcendent form on Astral Weeks astonishingly soon afterwards; but the Bang sessions also included the lyrical and catchy 'Brown-Eyed Girl', a Morrison composition that revealed his rapturous muse and again became a 'classic', and a US top 10 hit.

Bert Berns died suddenly of a heart attack on December 30, 1967 and Morrison, freed to sign elsewhere, made Astral Weeks for Warner Brothers in 1968. This was a jaw-dropping quantum leap in Morrison's work, an album utterly unlike any ever made before and achieved by an artist who was 22 years old at the time of its recording. It is the most radiant weave of sounds and feelings, of words and music, of timing and phrasing, its exquisite yearning expressed in a soaringly imaginative, emotionally truthful way, and all achieved with immense dexterity and delicacy yet such shimmering ardour, in which every note played is vibrant with physicality and every vocal line a gloriously inspired solo. It is, in the words of the All Music Guide, 'not only Morrison's masterpiece, but one of the greatest records ever made'—to say which still seems to pay scant tribute to its unfathomable genius.

It was not immediately a successful album in commercial terms, yet somehow everyone came to know it, it touched people's lives deeply, it expanded the possibilities of the medium for everyone, and no-one doubted its artistic achievement. Unarguably, there were now two vast mountains on the musical planet, utterly different from each other yet of comparable mass: Bob Dylan and Van Morrison.

Like Dylan's 'She Belongs to Me', the Astral Weeks song 'Slim Slow Slider' was an utterly modern, hip evocation of things fleeting and beguiling, a track so markedly contemporary that you might never notice it was structured as an old-fashioned 12-bar blues. Like Dylan, Van Morrison made no attempt to make a follow-up album, and his next works led us through mostly very different staging-posts on the Morrison journey of exploration.

After two albums strikingly unlike Astral Weeks yet similar to each other, Moondance and His Band & the Street Choir (both 1970), came the mellower Tupelo Honey (1971), the majestic Saint Dominic's Preview (1972), the thinner Hard Nose the Highway (1973) and Veedon Fleece (1974), this last coming after Morrison's first return in eight years from the soft California hippie US universe to the embittered streets of Belfast. After much dithering came the uptight A Period of Transition (1977), the more rhapsodic if oddly produced Wavelength (1978), Into the Music (1979) and then Common One (1980), the first of a long run of albums hard to distinguish from each other.

Unlike Dylan, Morrison was intensely demanding musically, as the exquisite jazz-virtuoso playing on Astral Weeks had suggested, and soon afterwards he was prepared to form, rehearse and maintain a large unit of players, his Caledonia Soul Orchestra; one result was the 1974 double-LP It's Too Late to Stop Now, one of the most glorious, and most attentively recorded, live albums of all time. It also showed that Morrison, however difficult and prone to erratic behaviour on as well as off stage, could rise to the most intense demands of his own talent and deliver live performances of blazing charismatic power, volatile excitement and immense resourcefulness, calling up that golden voice and some of the timeless catalogue of work he had already dreamed into existence, and on other occasions taking solos himself with authority yet entirely without flash on guitar, harmonica and saxophone.

Despite the fact that Morrison was utterly undependent upon Bob Dylan's work for his own, it was perhaps inevitable that these two very different northerners would meet up professionally in the long run. It didn't happen easily, however. Morrison's ex-wife Janet Planet paints this picture of how things stood in the Astral Weeks period, when, she claims, she and Van moved to Woodstock largely to be near Bob Dylan: 'Van fully intended to become Dylan's best friend, but the whole time we were there they never met. Every time we'd drive past Dylan's house—Van didn't drive, I did—Van would just stare wistfully out the window at the gravel road leading to Dylan's place. He thought Dylan was the only contemporary worthy of his attention. But back then, Bob just wasn't interested in him.'

Their first encounter was nevertheless thanks to Woodstock residents THE BAND, on whose 1971 album Cahoots Morrison had performed, so that he was rightly a guest at their so-called Farewell Concert in 1976, filmed as The Last Waltz by MARTIN SCORSESE. There is Van, already beginning to put on weight and dressed inadvisedly in a purple jumpsuit, kicking his little legs in the air and reprising the incandescent melodrama of his long-drawn-out live 'Caravan'. Van also joins in the vocal chorus on Dylan's performance of 'I Shall Be Released'.

Since then, Dylan and Morrison have come together on stage many times, starting on Dylan's 1984 tour of Europe, when Van popped up in Paris and London to share vocals and play guitar on 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' (July 1 and 7); and for the tour's last concert, at Slane, Ireland, on July 8, they followed 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' with a 'Tupelo Honey' on which Van took lead vocals and Dylan joined in on the choruses.

Their next rendezvous, in June 1989, was for the filming of the BBC-TV arts documentary 'Arena: One Irish Rover', on which they sat together on the Hill of the Muses in sight of the Parthenon in Athens and were filmed performing 'Crazy Love', '(And) It Stoned Me', 'Foreign Window' and 'One Irish Rover', with Dylan contributing guitar and vocal accompaniment, and on 'Foreign Window' playing harmonica. Omitting '(And) It Stoned Me', this odd, nicely quiet collaboration was first broadcast in March 1991 on British television. Watching it, it was striking (and funny) that while Van was the avowed subject of the programme, the camera just couldn't help but keep swinging around to linger on the infinitely more charismatic, aesthetically pleasing Bob.

The night after the filming, Morrison came on stage near the end of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour set in the city and took lead vocals on 'Crazy Love' and '(And) It Stoned Me'. Dylan flew back to the US straight after this for a concert in Peoria, Illinois, three nights later, and in it ventured a version of 'One Irish Rover' himself.

When Dylan's Never-Ending Tour arrived in Belfast on February 6, 1991, Van joined him on stage for one song-performance towards the end of his set, on which 'Tupelo Honey' segued into 'Why Must I Always Explain?' and in Milan, Italy, that June 8, Dylan reciprocated, joining Van on stage to play harmonica on 'Whenever God Shines His Light' and 'Enlightenment'. In Dublin on February 6, 1993, Dylan joined Van on stage again, this time to play harmonica on a Morrison version of 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue'—with a line-up that included Chrissie Hynde and KRIS KRISTOFFERSON on backing vocals. Four months after that, it was tit for tat again as Van joined Bob to share vocals on 'One Irish Rover' in the middle of Dylan's performance at the Fleadh (pronounced Flah) in London's Finsbury Park on June 12, 1993.

In LA in January 1994, Dylan filmed a televised message for Morrison for a UK awards ceremony, broadcast as 'The Brit Awards' on BBC-TV that February 15. Playing the game but wanting to show a cynical cool about the whole charade at the same time, Dylan somewhat gracelessly said this: 'Congratulations, Van, on this very prestigious award. "The Brit Award." No-one's more deserving of it than you for writing all those fine songs and giving us all that inspiration through the years. Thanks a lot. God bless you, Van. Blah, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah.'

In the spring of 1995, on the latest leg of the Never-Ending Tour—the leg that had begun with Dylan's début concerts in Prague, in the recently formed Czech Republic (as opposed to the old Czechoslovakia), and then wended its way through Germany, the Netherlands, France, Belgium, England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland—when Dylan and his band then moved down to Dublin, Van Morrison joined them on stage that April 11, as did CAROLE KING and ELVIS COSTELLO. Van's contribution was to share vocals with Bob on Van's song 'Real Real Gone' (from his 1990 album Enlightenment) and to share vocals with Bob and Elvis on 'I Shall Be Released' and 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'. (Carole King played piano on the two Dylan songs but not on 'Real Real Gone'.)

In July 1996, they both found themselves on the bill of a jazz festival in Molde, Norway (Morrison surely the better qualified to offer anything that might reasonably be called jazz), and here again Van joined Bob on stage to share vocals on 'I Shall Be Released' and 'Real Real Gone'. Two years later, they finally co-headlined some tour-dates together, which might be said to have been small parts of Dylan's long 1998 tour. For Dylan its first leg started in the US on January 13, in New London, Connecticut, and ran through till February 22 in Fairfax, Virginia. The concerts in New York City and in Boston—five nights at Madison Square Garden, no less, plus two at the Boston Fleet Center—were co-headlined with Morrison. During Van's set on the third consecutive concert night, January 18, Dylan came on stage and shared vocals on 'More and More', and on the last New York night, January 21, he came on in Van's set to share vocals on 'Blue Suede Shoes', two days after CARL PERKINS' death. They repeated this tribute at the second of the Boston dates, January 24, but this time Van also came on stage towards the end of Dylan's set to share vocals on 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'.

In May came a short series of West Coast dates co-starring not only Dylan and Morrison but JONI MITCHELL too. On May 16 at George, Washington (yes), both Van and Joni joined Dylan to share vocals on 'I Shall Be Released', on which Van also played harmonica (rather better than Dylan might have done). By June 15, Dylan and Morrison were both in Europe in amongst the summer festivals circuit, and that night co-headlined in Rotterdam just ahead of a further series of co-headline concerts in the UK, starting in Belfast on June 19 and playing at Newcastle (June 20), Glasgow (21), Sheffield (23), Birmingham (24), Manchester (25) and London (27). But the only night that saw any collaboration was at Birmingham, when Morrison played harmonica and shared vocals on Dylan's 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'. Finally, three months later, there was another short West Coast series of shared dates, from September 22 in Puyallup, Washington to the 27th in Reno, Nevada. On this leg, there was no on stage collaboration at all. Nor has there been any professional connection between the two artists in the eight years since.

Van Morrison flirts with the postmodernism of the self-reflexive text with 'I'd Love to Write Another Song', from 1989's Avalon Sunset album, a song which, far from offering insight into the elusiveness of the muse, is only a declaration of its absence, necessarily portentous and uninteresting. (This particular cul-de-sac was perhaps first explored by that renowned avant-gardeist Tommy Steele, with his 1962 'Hit Record', the lyric of which affects to put together a list of the ingredients you need to put together to have a hit record: thereby, and with cockney cheeriness too, taking as its immediate subject the commercial processes by which it is itself brought into being. Or not, since the record was a deserved flop. This did not discourage others, and by 1974 we started to get knowing album titles such as I Thought Terry Dene Was Dead, a compilation of tracks by another early British rock'n'roller.) Such items have never been popular, and Van Morrison's 'I'd Love to Write Another Song' was no exception.

In general, though, Morrison's work from the 1980s onwards has been characterised not by postmodernism but conservative sameness. With two or three exceptions (most appealingly Irish Heartbeat, with the Chieftains, in 1988 and, for its consummate 'Georgia on My Mind', 2002's Down the Road), all his albums since Common One have blurred into each other, expanding only in quantity. They form one big generic work, within which there is a heavy reprocessing of titles, phrases and lines from earlier songs, while the voice too has settled into a never-changing instrument: a fatter, infinitely less expressive older cousin to the marvellously fluid, vivaciously imaginative, lithe vocalist so sublimely present on Astral Weeks. Van has become the SINATRA of 'My Way' rather than of 'Come Fly with Me'.

Yet in concert he can still offer more. He can still give a vocal performance more felt and delicate live than in the studio, and can make all that reprocessing seem a richer thing—can make you feel, in concert, that one of the glories of his 1980s-onwards repertoire has become its threading-through with strands of earlier songs: not only from his own back-catalogue but from the whole canvas of other people's works that he has learnt from and loved. He can sing ‘Cleaning Windows’ (a directly autobiographical song from Beautiful Vision) so as to offer more than the lyric’s inbuilt allusions to LEADBELLY, BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, MUDDY WATERS and others (not forgetting the poetic inspiration from KEROUAC): he can also invoke that aeons-earlier autobiographical work ‘The Story of Them Parts 1 & 2’ and, in a playful, inspired flash, pop George Formby into the picture simply by switching pronunciation from ‘windows’ to ‘winders’.

To defer to the judgement of the All Music Guide again: ‘Equal parts blue-eyed soul shouter and wild-eyed poet-sorcerer, Van Morrison [has been] among popular music’s true innovators, a restless seeker whose incantatory vocals and alchemical fusion of R&B, jazz, blues, and Celtic folk [has] produced perhaps the most spiritually transcendent body of work in the rock & roll canon.’

Here is a man who has made large journeys—from the long-gone dance-halls of the early 60s, where all such wannabe soul singers found themselves on the wrong side of the Atlantic with the wrong colour skin, through the unimaginable post-Astral Weeks hipness of California dreaming and back: back to self-knowledge and unapologetic middle-aged Irish blokeness, with a little ‘Enlightenment’ and WILLIAM BLAKEness thrown in. The man is grumpy, belligerent and spoilt; the artist is invaluable. And he is much loved because in journeying, he has summoned up more and more will-power for holding true to two vast diversities: the tumultuous embrace of the world of JOHN LEE HOOKER blues clubs, alongside the magic pantheism of the natural world with its rivers and green valleys, ancient lanes and timeless rapture.

There are very few great artists. Van Morrison is one of them.

[Van Morrison: ‘Brown-Eyed Girl’, NY, 1967 Bang, US, 1967; the Bang Sessions, NY, 1967, released retrospectively on The Complete Bang Sessions, Purple Pyramid/Cleopatra CD, UK, 2002; ‘Slim Slow Slider’ and the rest of Astral Weeks, NY, 1968, Warner Bros WS 1768, UK, 1968; It’s Too Late to Stop Now, London, summer 1973, Warner Bros K86007, UK, 1974; ‘I’d Love To Write Another Song’, UK, prob. late 1988, Avalon Sunset, Polydor 839 262-4, London, 1989; ‘Cleaning Windows’, Beautiful Vision, 1982; ‘Enlightenment’ & ‘Real Real Gone’, UK, 1990, Enlightenment, Polydor 847 100-1, UK, 1990; Down the Road, Exile/Polydor 589 177-2, UK, 2002. Them: ‘Baby Please Don’t Go’, London, 1965, Decca, UK, 1965; ‘Here Comes the Night’, ditto; ‘Gloria’; ‘It’s All Over Now, Baby Blue’, London, prob. 1966; ‘The Story of Them Parts 1 & 2’. Van Morrison & the Chieftains: Irish Heartbeat, Dublin, Sep 1987–Jan 1988, Mercury MERH 124, UK, 1988. Van Morrison & Bob Dylan: ‘Arena: One Irish Rover’, filmed Athens, 27 Jun 1989, broadcast UK, 16 Mar 1991; ‘Crazy Love’ & ‘(And) It Stoned Me’, Athens, 28 Jun 1989. Bob Dylan: ‘One Irish Rover’, Peoria, IL, 1 Jul 1989.

Tommy Steele: ‘Hit Record’, Decca, London, 1962; The Happy World of Tommy Steele, Decca Records [S]PA 24, London, 1969. Terry Dene: I Thought Terry Dene Was Dead, Decca SPA 368, London, 1974.

Quotes on Morrison from Jason Ankeny, All Music Guide, seen online 31 Dec 2005 at www.vh1.com/artists/az/morrison_van/bio.jhtml. Quote from Janet Planet, Los Angeles Times, 17 Nov 1998, seen excerpted online 31 Dec 2005 at Bob Dylan Who’s Who, www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/who.html.]

Morton, Dave [1939 -] David Morton, one of Dylan’s Dinkytown and Minneapolis friends, was born in Salt Lake City, Utah, on November 14, 1939. At age three, he moved with his family to Berkeley, California, and then to upstate New York, arriving finally in St. Paul, Minnesota, in 1947 or ’48. He grew up with folksong. ‘We knew those folk songs when we were five,’ he says.

He spent one year at the high school run by the University of Minnesota and there met the others in the Dylan Minneapolis crowd. He’s lost touch now with HARVEY ABRAMS, though he heard not long ago that he was still alive, and still remembers him playing Dylan ‘a bunch of records’. Dave was one of the bohemians, though only 18 months older than Dylan. He played guitar himself, wrote songs and collected records. He also gave DAVE RAY guitar lessons, and with his musical partner Vic Kantowski was the first act ever at the 10 O’Clock Scholar.

Asked what Dylan might have gained from him, Dave says modestly: ‘Really nothing, except I encouraged him to stop singing those glitzy BELAFONTE songs. I said “If I can write songs, you can write songs.” And then he did pretty good at that, didn’t he?’

In summer 1963 Morton founded a small literary magazine, entitled region, which ran throughout the 1960s and published political material, poetry and fiction. Dave wrote poetry, and gave readings ‘from coast to coast’ in that decade. He got to know a lot of rock music people, including Janis Joplin: ‘the nicest rock’n’roller I ever met: just a sweetheart’.

Dave Morton lives up in northern Minnesota these days: he moved out to Grand Rapids in 1970, and then settled in Angora in 1971. ‘I dropped out of college for 30 years,’ he says. ‘Moved up north and went into cement work. Did OK: I have a big house with 40 acres and I’ve put my two daughters through college. One of them got a PhD: works for the Audubon Society nowadays.’

Dave is rumoured to leave Angora only to attend and perform at the annual Jug Band Festivals, principally those in Minneapolis and Duluth, the town of Dylan’s birth. He and a friend founded these, by starting up the Minneapolis one, and then re-starting it in 1980.

After Duluth’s ‘8th Annual Battle of the Jug Bands’, in 2004, he was written up as follows online: 'Next, The Jook Savages, aka The Duke Sandwiches Jugband, from days of yore, 1964 to be exact. Down from Angora, on the Iron Range of Northern Minnesota. David Morton, chief instigator Buffalo Nickel, was among those few white boys who revived jugband music in the early sixties. SALUTE! Mort always seems to delight in walking the line between chaos and confusion and bringing harmony out of it in a remarkable way. We love it when he pulls off his "Poor Man's Jazz". Never one to play by the rules, or fair, he doesn't wait for applause, but just keeps on singing and playing, and even tuning without stopping. Changing tempo? No problem. He just keeps on playing and lets others catch up. We are honored to have him each year.'

That sounds spot on for an old compadre of Dylan's. The wordplay with the group name the Jook Savages seems a tradition. At the 23rd Annual Minneapolis Battle of the Bands, that same year, when the schedule of who was to play was posted up, someone changed 'Savages' so that it read 'Sausages'.

[Dave Morton Duluth jug band festival performance report: seen online 4 Oct 2005 at www.elliotbrothers.com/8thbattlreview.html. Literary magazine: region #1, MN, summer 1963. All quotes & biographical information phone call with this writer, 11 Oct 2005.]

Moss, Wayne [1938 -] Wayne Moss is the Nashville session player who created that 16th-note guitar lick that recurs all through 'I Want You', on Blonde on Blonde, the only Dylan album he contributes to. AL KOOPER remembers: 'The first time he came up with that, my jaw dropped—not only for the lick but for the effortlessness he played it with.'

Bradley Wayne Moss was born February 9, 1938 in South Charleston, West Virginia, where he grew up learning FLATT & SCRUGGS licks with a banjoist friend, then discovering Chet Atkins. He first came to Nashville in 1959 to work in Brenda Lee's backing band, and in 1962 set up his Cinderella Studios in Madison, Tennessee, and learnt to be a producer, eventually becoming one of the many regular Nashville cats, so many of whom gathered for those Blonde on Blonde sessions. It was HARGUS 'PIG' ROBBINS who first got him a session gig, but Wayne and CHARLIE McCOY had been playing together earlier in the 60s, in Charlie McCoy & the Escorts (along with KENNY BUTTREY, BILL AIKINS and others), back in the days of pencil-sharp suits hung on bony young bodies that tottered under the weight of huge greased quiffs—and Moss' rollmop style, was the best in the group. His retrospective album Wayne's World has a great shot of him from those days, a cheery reminder of what CARL PERKINS once said about this generation of young hopefuls: 'ELVIS,' he said, 'was the only one of us who didn't look like Mister Ed.'

After Dylan, Moss was one of those who joined Area Code 615 and when they mutated into Barefoot Jerry, he was the longest lasting, remaining in place till the end. The group went through several labels and many line-ups, the last of which, recruited by Moss, made the final Barefoot Jerry album, Barefootin', in 1977. The group had worked and travelled for 11 years; 25 people had passed through its ranks. They once played 31 dates at the Paris Olympia theatre with 'the Elvis of France', er, Eddie Mitchell.

By this time Moss had also played on hundreds of other people's sessions, including on ROY ORBISON's 'Pretty Woman', a Ray Price album produced by veteran Columbia A&R man Don Law in 1967, Danny Boy, Waylon Jennings' album Waylon in 1970, and on work by everyone else from Nancy Sinatra to Mike Nesmith and from the Steve Miller Band's 1970 album Number 5 to the Robert Mitchum single 'Little Ole Wine Drinker Me'.

In recent years, Moss has reformed a Barefoot Jerry/Area Code 615 band that is very big in Japan. And unlike most of these good ole boys, he's still so thin he could still wear that Escorts suit.

[Some data from Moss' website www.barefootjerry.com; more from Moss, phone call to this writer, 5 Apr 2006.]

Motion, Andrew [1952 -] Born in London, October 26, 1952, Motion is a prolific poet, biographer and anthologist, and a keen public advocate for poetry. Well-positioned in the contemporary British literary establishment, he read English at Oxford, taught at the University of Hull (where he met Philip Larkin), edited Poetry Review, was Poetry Editor and Editorial Director at Chatto & Windus publishing house (1983–89), succeeded Malcolm Bradbury as Professor of Creative Writing at the University of East Anglia, has been Chairman of the Arts Council's Literature Panel and is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature.

Like GREIL MARCUS, Motion contributed to the 1996+ positive sea-change in Dylan's critical and popular esteem when in late 1998, a few months before being appointed the United Kingdom's new Poet Laureate, Motion discussed the newly released 1966 concert recording from Manchester Free Trade Hall in terms of 'the tremendous beauty and subtlety of the songs and the matchless voice that sings them.'

[Andrew Motion: Daily Telegraph, London, 10 Oct 1998.]

MTV Unplugged*™ [album, 1995] The dreariest, most contemptible, phony, tawdry piece of product ever issued by a great artist, which manages to omit the TV concert's one fresh and fine performance, 'I Want You', but is otherwise an accurate record of the awfulness of the concert itself, in which the performer who had been so numinously 'unplugged' in the first place ducked the opportunity to use television to perform, solo, some of the ballad and country-blues material from his most recent studio albums, Good as I Been to You and World Gone Wrong. That could have been magical. Instead—instead of seizing this moment and really stepping into the arena—we got the usual greatest hits, wretchedly performed in a phoney construct of a 'live' concert. This is what happens when Bob Dylan capitulates and lets overpaid coke-head executives, lawyers and PRseholes from the Entertainment Industry tell him what to do.

[Recorded NY, 17 & 18 Nov 1994; released US as Columbia CK 67000, 30 Jun 1995 but in Europe & UK as Columbia 478374 2, 25 Apr 1995. In UK also released as 2-LP set, Simply Vinyl SVLP 100/Columbia 478374-1.]

MTV Unplugged*™ [video, 1995] See MTV Unplugged [album] for main details. The video release includes 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', which is omitted from the album. Both omit 'I Want You', which was included in the version televised on PBS-TV stations in the US in 1995. The original TV airing, on MTV, December 14, 1994, was as on the subsequent video.

[Recorded NY, 17 & 18 Nov 1994; released as Columbia Music Video 19V-50113 (US) and SMV 50113 2 (UK & Europe), 25 Apr 1995.]

Muddy Waters [1915 - 1983] McKinley Morganfield was born at Jug Corner, Issaquena County, just across the county line from Sharkey County's little town of Rolling Fork, Mississippi, on April 14, 1915. He grew up on Stovall Plantation, near Clarksdale, was 'discovered' by ALAN LOMAX and was thus more or less literally field recorded before the end of World War II. These titles included 'Country Blues' and 'I Be's Troubled', both smouldering blues in the spirit of SON HOUSE. However, moving to Chicago and encouraged by BIG BILL BROONZY and Sonny Boy Williamson I, he soon created for that great city the template for its barband music, its post-war blues by—in Tony Russell's phrase—'reenergizing Chicago's formula-bound music with a waft of soul from the Mississippi bottomlands.'

His 1948 record 'I Can't Be Satisfied' was innovative, and in the 1950s he was in his prime, with a number of his songs becoming Chicago anthems (and later passing into the repertoire of every British beat group), as with 'I'm Your Hoochie Coochie Man' and 'I Just Want to Make Love to You' (both 1954) and 'Got My Mojo Working' (1956). He was a strong singer, a deft slide guitarist and a ready composer and re-composer of the blues. On top of which, he had gravitas—in his case an authoritative mix of shrewdness and dignity of carriage. A long list of great musicians played in his band and benefited from the experience and the exposure.

Eleven years on from 'I Can't Be Satisfied', Muddy Waters performed at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL of 1960, though VAL WILMER recalls that he caused 'controversy by playing the electric guitar in Britain' as early as 1958. In this respect, then—in producing an electric guitar in front of an audience expecting a 'folk' performance—the Bob Dylan of 1965 found himself re-enacting a scene already lived through by the great Mississippian bluesman.

Waters' 1960 Newport appearance was, as the late Mike Leadbitter put it, 'Muddy's first real crack at the white market'. Waters performed again with his band at the 1964 Festival, and, though his playing time was encroached upon by the addition of NEIL DIAMOND to the bill, he also performed at the Farewell Concert for THE BAND in San Francisco in November 1976, and thus appears in the SCORSESE film The Last Waltz. By this time Muddy Waters had quit Chess and become a regular on the campus circuit and the annual round of blues festivals. His 1969 Vogue album Fathers and Sons paired Waters and Otis Spann with PAUL BUTTERFIELD and MIKE BLOOMFIELD; and between 1977 and 1981 he made four albums for Columbia/Blue Sky produced by Johnny Winter.

Bob Dylan hadn't been at Newport 1960 but a couple of years earlier, back in high school in Minnesota, he had already expressed admiration for Waters and for JIMMY REED. In May 1961 in Minneapolis he was recorded performing Muddy's 1950s number 'Still a Fool'. In January 1962, on the unedited tape made for a New York radio programme (it first emerged, on a bootleg CD, 30 years later), Dylan tells CYNTHIA GOODING that he knows the work of Muddy Waters; that July, at the Finjan Club in Montreal, Dylan again performs 'Still a Fool' (sometimes known as 'Two Trains Runnin'). Of Muddy Waters' three verses, Dylan's version here uses two and then adds two more, of which one shows a personalised contribution by Dylan himself and both show his familiarity with common-stock blues lyric poetry.

A couple of years later, he makes subtle use of this song again inside his own work. In 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream', while 'I saw three ships a-sailin'' is (vernacular dropped 'g' apart) a verbatim quote from the Christmas carol, when you add in the line Dylan adds, you find it is also a turnaround of a blues song's re-statement of the common folkloric commuter's lament about waiting for buses and trains and the wrong ones always turning up first. Dylan's 'I saw three ships a-sailin' / They were all heading my way' neatly reverses a blues line from 1927, 'They's two trains runnin', none of them going my way', from 'Frisco Whistle Blues' by Alabama's splendid blues artist Ed Bell (tagged in the Paramount catalogue as the Weird Guitar Player), from his début session. But you might approach the same putative traffic-jam from a later vantage-point, and conclude that the line Dylan attaches to the carol's 'I saw three ships a-sailin'' makes a darting imaginative connexion with—perhaps deliberately echoes—the Muddy Waters song. Waters' 'Well now two, there's two trains runnin' / Well they aint never goin' my way' becomes Dylan's 'I saw three ships a-sailin' / They were all headin' my way.'

The Muddy Waters song derives either from Robert Petway's pre-war classic 'Catfish Blues' or from his friend and performing partner Tommy McClennan's copy of it, 'Deep Blue Sea Blues', which both re-work a traditional Mississippi blues. Tommy Johnson's 1928 'Bye Bye Blues' has the similar line 'Well, two trains runnin', runnin' side by side' and the same tune as 'Still a Fool'. These things are hard to pin down but Dylan probably got it from Muddy Waters and Waters primarily from McClennan.

Aside from converging at The Band's Farewell Concert, Dylan and Muddy Waters met on stage just once. On June 30, 1975, Muddy and his band were playing the first of three consecutive nights at the Bottom Line, New York City, doing two sets per night. Dylan was in the audience, with SCARLET RIVERA and others, wandering among the tables dressed in a black leather jacket over a striped t-shirt and pale brown flared trousers. Muddy was up on stage in a loud red shirt, big-check golfer's trousers and matching waistcoat. Muddy brought on VICTORIA SPIVEY, and later his ex-harp player Paul Oscher, and later still Dylan. Oscher gave him a microphone and a harmonica, and Muddy asked him: 'Fast or slow?' Bob said: 'Fast', and off they went, beginning with a long harp solo from Dylan from which Muddy turned it into a 1930 MEMPHIS MINNIE number he'd just been recording, 'What's the Matter With the Mill?'. Mid-way through they were joined on stage by a cornet player and by Dylan's companions, Scarlet Rivera on violin and another woman on tambourine. The resultant jam lasted at least 15 minutes. Dylan and friends disappeared with Waters, heading for Victoria Spivey's place in Brooklyn. Two nights later, he was again in the audience for Muddy's set, this time accompanied by PATTI SMITH, but didn't return to the stage. This might have been because of Waters' announcement to the crowd: 'John Dylan is in the house!' Bob soon wasn't.

In 1990, when Dylan played his remarkable four-set gig at Toad's Place in New Haven, Connecticut, he performed a one-off of a song that was partly Muddy Waters'. 'Someday Baby Blues' is SLEEPY JOHN ESTES' particularly heartfelt and individual variant of 'Sittin' on Top of the World', which has in turn been revised and revisited in several guises. CHUCK BERRY's 'Worried Life Blues' uses the Estes chorus but thoroughly different verses; the Allman Brothers' version of the Muddy Waters version, 'Trouble No More', does the opposite, reinstating an approximation of Estes' verses while abandoning his chorus. When Dylan sang it at Toad's Place, it was recognised as the same song as Muddy Waters', and duly appears in the various listings of his performances as 'Trouble No More', though really Dylan brings it all home to Sleepy John Estes.

There was no such mixed parentage to sort out when Dylan alighted on another piece of Muddy Waters' repertoire and performed it in concert in a series of US concerts in late 1992. Starting on October 24 in Storrs, Connecticut, Dylan opened with 'I Can't Be Satisfied', and kept it as the opening number for a further four consecutive concerts; and after dropping it on November 1, he restored it at once, opening a further five consecutive concerts with it. On November 11, 1999, in Augusta, Maine, he sang a one-off 'Hoochie Coochie Man'.

In late 1997 (we think), Dylan was asked for a quote on Waters for a tribute show on PBS, aired in 1999. His brief comments at once cut to the core of what made Muddy's Chicago blues so powerful: 'He had that "dark woods" he brought up there with him. He was able to keep that in the city.'

Not everyone likes his particular kind of boastful insistence upon a voodoo masculinity. All that 'seventh son of the seventh son', that 'mojo' magic, that incantatory swagger, that 'I'm a MAN!': some people would rather drink muddy water than listen to much of him strutting that particular stuff. Yet there is hardly a more important figure in the history of the blues.

Muddy Waters died in Westmont, a Chicago suburb, on April 30, 1983. He had just turned 68.

[McKinley Morganfield: 'Country Blues', Stovall, MS, c.24–31 Aug 1941 (field-recorded for the Library of Congress), 1st vinyl-issued on Afro-American Blues and Game Songs, AFS L-4, Washington, D.C., 1962 and Muddy Waters: Blues Man, Polydor UK 236.574, London, 1969, the former CD-reissued Rounder CD 1513, Cambridge, MA, 1999; also CD-reissued The Complete Plantation Recordings: Muddy Waters: The Historic Library of Congress Recordings 1941–1942, MCA CHD 9344, London, 1993. Muddy Waters: 'Still a Fool', Chicago, 1951; 'Trouble No More', Chicago, Oct 1955, Chess 1612, Chicago, 1955.

Bob Dylan: 'Still a Fool', Minneapolis, May 1961 & Montreal, 2 Jul 1962; 'Trouble No More', New Haven, CT, 12 Jan 1990; all unreleased. Dylan's quote on Waters aired PBS, 27 Jan 1999. Memphis Minnie: 'What's the Matter With the Mill?', Chicago, 11 Oct 1930. Val Wilmer, Mama Said There'd Be Days Like This, London: Women's Press, 1989 & 1991. Mike Leadbitter, reviewing Muddy Waters at Newport, Checker 6467 416, UK, 1973, in Blues Unlimited no.103, Bexhill-on-Sea, UK, Aug/Sep 1973. For more detail (and photos) of Dylan & Waters at the Bottom Line, see Isis no.115, Bedworth, UK, Jun–Jul 2004.]

Muhammad Ali [1942 -] Cassius Marcellus Clay Jr. was born in Louisville, Kentucky, on January 17, 1942. He grew up to be one of the greatest athletes in history: a boxer so talented, handsome and lithe that he made a whole generation of people who didn't like boxing watch the sport; a pioneering African-American celebrity who, in the civil rights era, lent his name to the cause by changing it, from Cassius Clay to Muhammad Ali—throwing off the heritage of slavery at the height of his initial fame, and so scandalising the forces of reaction in white America; a commoner who refused to bow down before the machine—refusing to fight in the unjust war in Vietnam and facing gaol, death threats and persecution instead; an intelligent, witty, charming, immensely gifted man who brought a new style of outrageous boastfulness, undercut by sly self-mockery, to the promotion of his fights and the discomfiture of his opponents, and who ran rings around the standard expectation that, well, OK, you could escape the ghetto by becoming a fighter but only if you minded your p's & q's and played by a set of rules stacked high against you.

In 'I Shall Be Free No.10' on Another Side of Bob Dylan in 1964, Dylan gives him a playful name-check as Cassius Clay—the name under which he was a Gold Medallist at the Rome Olympics of 1960, only to return to a segregated Louisville that failed to welcome him home as an American hero; the name under which he won his next 19 fights, 15 by knockouts; under which the brash 22-year-old knocked out the supposedly invincible Sonny Liston in the 7th round on February 25, 1964.

Dylan's song, recorded on June 9 the same year, says this: 'I was shadow-boxing earlier in the day / I figured I was ready for Cassius Clay / I said "Fee, fie, fo, fum, / Cassius Clay, here I come / 26, 27, 28, 29, I'm gonna make your face look just like mine / 5, 4, 3, 2, 1, Cassius Clay you'd better run / 99, 100, 101, 102, your ma won't even recognize you / 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, gonna knock him clean right out of his spleen." '

Clay announced his conversion to Islam and his taking of the name Muhammad Ali shortly afterwards. His title was revoked in 1967 when, citing his faith, he refused induction into the US military and was fined $10,000 and sentenced to a five-year prison term (which he didn't, in the end, have to serve). The US Supreme Court did not officially reverse his conviction for draft evasion until 1971 but Ali resumed fighting in 1970, knocking out Jerry Quarry and Oscar Bonaven to earn a chance to regain his heavyweight crown. On March 8, 1971, Ali suffered the first loss of his career, losing to Joe Frazier in 15 rounds, but regained the heavyweight championship on October 30, 1974, in Kinshasa, Zaire (now the so-called Democratic Republic of Congo), knocking out George Foreman in 'the rumble in the jungle'. Ali defended his title ten times in the following four years, including victory over Joe Frazier in 1975 in the Philippines. In 1977 he played himself in a competent bio-pic based on his own book, The Greatest. He lost his crown again to Leon Spinks in Las Vegas in early 1978 but, unbelievably, regained it one more time that September at their rematch in New Orleans. He was the only fighter ever to win the heavyweight crown three times. He announced his retirement from boxing in June 1979, but within a year challenged champion Larry Holmes for the crown. On October 2, 1980, in Las Vegas, Nevada, Ali suffered the worst, most punishing loss of his career and retired permanently at the end of 1981.

When he was reigning heavyweight champion of the world, he appeared at Bob Dylan's fund-raising benefit concert for RUBIN 'HURRICANE' CARTER at the end of the first Rolling Thunder Revue, at Madison Square Garden, New York City, on December 8, 1975: the 'Night of the Hurricane'. Addressing the overwhelmingly white crowd, Ali declared: 'You've got the connections, and the complexion, to get the protection!' Backstage, Ali and Dylan posed together for photographer KEN REGAN, for what turned out to include an utterly charming, evocative, funny, touching picture of the two, standing like brothers in arms, looking right into the camera.

MIKE MARQUSEE's book Redemption Song: Muhammad Ali and the Spirit of the Sixties makes articulate and telling comparisons between the two figures, who are a mere eight months apart in age.

[Michael Marqusee: Redemption Song: Muhammad Ali and the Spirit of the Sixties, London: Verso, 1999. Ken Regan photo of Dylan &Ali republished in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph: The Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.]

Muir, Andrew [1958 -] Andrew Muir was born in Cowdenbeath, Fife, Scotland, on August 16, 1958. He first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1973, and in 1990 set up the first of the two UK fanzines he has edited, the crudely produced Homer, the slut (named after a character in Dylan's novel Tarantula). This ran to 11 issues, plus four 'specials', starting in May 1990 and ceasing publication with the final 'special' at Christmas 1995.

In 2000 he published his first book, Razor's Edge: Bob Dylan & the Never Ending Tour, a book characteristic of Muir's work in its straddling of the divide between critical assessment and factual reportage. It looks in great detail at specific concerts, year by year from the tour's beginning in 1988 through to 2000, but also succeeds in its aim of putting the Never-Ending Tour into perspective and assessing its significance within Dylan's career as a whole. At the same time, Muir also worries away with self-deprecating humour at the ever-knotty problems of experiencing from the inside levels of fandom that most people in the world regard as crazy. Hence the great Chapter 8 of the book, '21st July, 1993', which logs Muir's own thoroughly unexpected encounter with the man himself: a terrific, affecting piece of comic writing.

In 2003 came Muir's second book, Troubadour: Early & Late Songs of Bob Dylan, a thoughtful elaboration of his critical stance that scrutiny should be jargon-free and range widely, in a study of specific songs from the early 1960s right through to work on the Time Out of Mind and "Love and Theft" albums. The book begins with an extremely good, substantial introduction discussing the thorny questions of performance versus words in Dylan's art, which he covers very thoroughly and with great alertness of judgement. And does so in a fresh tone of voice, which is quite an achievement.

That hugely valuable freshness steps up a whole other level when he looks anew at 'Blowin' in the Wind'. It's a main strength of the book that Muir refocusses on exactly the songs we most take for granted and so largely fail to hear. Indeed he has tackled 'Blowin' in the Wind' better than anyone has ever done: bringing out, and with genuine vigour, not only the whys and hows of its original impact but equally well the enduring subtleties and intelligence of the song. At the other end of Troubadour is a very substantial scrutiny of the "Love and Theft" album, with some invaluable tracking of what has been loved and thieved from where, assiduously footnoted yet assembled with all the enthusiasm prompted by the newness and excellence of the album.

This book was a mix of new writing and some revised selected pieces from the fanzines to which Muir had contributed—and by this point the range of these, taking in ON THE TRACKS, Isis, Dignity and FREEWHEELIN', included his own new journal, the good-looking and generally rigorous Judas!, which began publication in April 2002 and has, above all other fanzines, generally held out for critical writing of quality as well as of passion: sometimes achieving this in the face of strong deadline pressures to react swiftly.

Issue 15 was a case in point, arriving with subscribers on October 19, 2005 and containing, among much else, a considered and recurrently observant long piece by Nick Hawthorne, productively attentive to small significant detail, about Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack and an essay by Peter Stone Brown on No Direction Home, the film, which opens with three pages of marvellously vivid, elegiac prose almost wholly derived from paying close, scene-by-scene attention to the movie's structure.

Behind the scenes Andrew Muir is also one of the great communicators within the Dylan world, constructively in touch with almost everyone, including those who will not speak to each other. In outside life he is a teacher of business and academic English in Cambridge, UK, and a vociferous supporter of Rangers, a Scottish football team.

[Andrew Muir, Razor's Edge: Bob Dylan & the Never Ending Tour, London: Helter Skelter Publishing, 2001; Troubadour: Early & Late Songs of Bob Dylan, Huntingdon, UK: Woodstock Publications, 2003. Judas!, ditto, and www.judasmagazine.com.]

Muldaur, Geoff [1943 -] Geoffrey Dayton Muldaur was born in Brooklyn, New York, on August 12, 1943. He moved almost at once to Pennsylvania, then to Connecticut and had moved again, to Pelham, New York, by the age of three. He grew up there listening to New Orleans jazz and doo-wop, and became a highly regarded singer in and around Greenwich Village, making his first solo album in 1963. Years later RICHARD THOMPSON would proclaim: 'There are only three white blues singers, and Geoff Muldaur is at least two of them.'

He was one of the featured artists on the Various Artists album The Blues Project, put out by Elektra in 1964—and he was the one who brought Bob Dylan into it. The other featured artists were DAVE RAY, ERIC VON SCHMIDT, DAVE VAN RONK, Ian Buchanan, DANNY KALB and MARK SPOELSTRA.

Muldaur, known to his friends as Mole, brought Bob Dylan along to a New York City session for this project early that year and had him and Von Schmidt both play piano on 'Downtown Blues' (a song Muldaur had earlier performed and recorded with the JIM KWESKIN Jug Band, one of whose other members was Maria D'Amato; when they married she continued her career as MARIA MULDAUR). The other musicians on 'Downtown Blues' were John 'Fritz' Richmond (bass) and JOHN SEBASTIAN (harmonica). When the album was issued, Dylan was credited under the anagramous name Bob Landy. It isn't very good.

Muldaur appeared soon afterwards with his jug band at that year's NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, and the year after performed alongside Maria Muldaur and Eric von Schmidt. The Kweskin Jug Band collapsed in 1968; he and Maria moved to Woodstock and made two albums together before they too split up and he and PAUL BUTTERFIELD formed Paul Butterfield's Better Days in 1972. He 'took a sabbatical' for the 1980s and most of the 1990s, but has been active again as a songwriter and recording artist since the fall of '97, when BOB NEUWIRTH said to him: 'I'm going to play Italy . . . want to join me and find out what it feels like'? A year later he released his first new album in 17 years, The Secret Handshake, and followed it with Password in 2004. He lives in Venice, California, now.

[Geoff Muldaur: 'Downtown Blues', NY, early 1964, The Blues Project, Elektra EKL 264, NY, Jun 1964; The Secret Handshake, Hightone HCD8097, US, 1998; Password, Hightone HCD8125, US, 2004.]

Muldaur, Maria [1943 -] Maria Grazia Rosa Domenica D'Amato was born in New York City on September 2, 1942 or September 12, 1943, and grew up close to Greenwich Village—where she can be glimpsed in black and white footage in the Dylan film No Direction Home, looking about 15 years old, all puppy-fat and pigtails, singing with one of the jug band revival groups of the early 1960s. These groups, a quirky ingredient in the Folk Revival mix, harked back to the recorded black outfits of the 1920s like the MEMPHIS JUG BAND and Cannon's Jug Stompers.

After a childhood enthusiasm for country music, and membership of a high school pop group, the Cashmeres, and after being one of those young white enthusiasts who went down to the Deep South to 'rediscover' old black bluesmen during the early 1960s' blues revival, Maria was a performer in two revivalist jug bands: the Even Dozen Jug Band, which played old-timey folk, blues and jazz, and then the similar JIM KWESKIN Jug Band, which was based in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

In the Even Dozen Jug Band, the line-up was D'Amato on vocals (though she also played fiddle), Stefan Grossman, Steve Katz, Joshua Rifkin, JOHN SEBASTIAN, DAVID GRISMAN and Peter Siegel. They signed to VICTORIA SPIVEY's label, Spivey Records (for which Dylan recorded as harmonica player and back-up vocalist for BIG JOE WILLIAMS and Spivey herself in March 1962), but Elektra bought out their contract and issued their eponymously titled and only album before they disbanded.

Maria D'Amato then joined the Jim Kweskin Jug Band, in which Kweskin was joined by Maria's future husband GEOFF MULDAUR (lead guitar and vocals), plus Bill Keith, the future religious cult-leader Mel Lyman on harmonica, John 'Fritz' Richmond, Richard Greene and, on vocals and kazoo, Maria.

This outfit lasted longer and recorded more, including the comic piece 'Never Swat a Fly', which has remained in Maria Muldaur's repertoire. After moving to Cambridge, she duly married Geoff, and after the disbanding of the Jim Kweskin Jug Band in 1968 they moved to Woodstock, NY, and performed and recorded as Geoff & Maria Muldaur, issuing two LPs, Pottery Pie (1970, which included a cover of 'I'll Be Your Baby Tonight') and Sweet Potatoes (1971). In 1972 the two split up, and Maria Muldaur launched an immediately successful solo career. Her first album, Maria Muldaur, included 'Midnight at the Oasis', which became a huge hit single. Her second album, Waitress in a Donut Shop, was also well-received.

Subsequent albums were not so successful and in 1979 Muldaur had to cope with her daughter's involvement in a near-fatal car crash. 'My whole life was severely jolted,' she explained later—at which point she heard Dylan's new album, Slow Train Coming, and 'realized that, no matter how successful your life, without a relationship with God or a higher power, there was something very big missing. It wasn't even a conscious intellectual decision. At that moment, I surrendered . . .'

During Dylan's run of dates at the Fox-Warfield in San Francisco in November 1980—the 12 dates that opened the short tour on which he reintroduced secular material—Maria Muldaur made a guest appearance on November 19, coming on stage and singing 'Nobody's Fault But Mine' as the evening's tenth song.

It was Maria Muldaur who told Dylan biographer HOWARD SOUNES that she thought Dylan 'dated some of these black girls because they didn't idolize him. They were real down to earth, and they didn't worship him. They are strong women who would just say, cut your bullshit.' (Sounes elaborated: 'While women from his own, white middle-class background often saw him as an over-awing presence, he was just another guy to African-American women and this was refreshing to him.')

Maria Muldaur also appears in colour in No Direction Home as a middle-aged interviewee, speaking especially as a witness to the furore when Dylan went electric at the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL. She reports that later that night, when she asked Bob if he'd like to dance, he replied, 'I'd dance with you, Maria, but my hands are on fire.' She seems impressed with the profundity of this remark, but only succeeds in making it sound empty.

It seems an unfairness of the film that while it shows her in unformed youth and in blowsy middle age, it doesn't show footage of her as a solo artist in her prime in the early 1970s, when she looked absolutely gorgeous and sang with shimmering, poignant beauty.

She continues to perform and record, and many people claim that her voice now is even better than in her younger days, having deepened and broadened, making it more able to handle material drawn from the repertoires of the women blues singers she always admired—especially that favourite of hers who was always a favourite of Dylan's too, MEMPHIS MINNIE, in tribute to whom (among others) Muldaur recorded her 2001 album Richland Woman Blues.

She credits Dylan with having brought her back to this music, too. The sleevenotes refer to hearing him give a 'stunning performance' in Memphis and then reading his own 'wonderfully written liner notes' to World Gone Wrong and being inspired by his warning: 'Look out! There won't be songs like these anymore—factually there aren't any now.' Muldaur comments: 'I realized he was right. . . . Right then and there, I got the idea and inspiration for this musical tribute to all the blues legends who so deeply inspired and influenced me early on to follow my own path both musically and spiritually.' Guest players and singers on the album, which was released four months ahead of Dylan's own "Love and Theft", include Bonnie Raitt, John Sebastian, Taj Mahal and that other great bluesy survivor, Tracy Nelson. The title track is a song by MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT; other tracks include BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON's 'Soul of a Man' and, naturally, Memphis Minnie's 'Me and My Chauffeur Blues'.

On the front cover of the album, Maria Muldaur stands at the side of the road, leaning on a marker that reads 'Old Hwy. 61'.

[The Jim Kweskin Jug Band: Jim Kweskin & the Jug Band: Greatest Hits, CD-reissued Vanguard, NY, 1991. The Even Dozen Jug Band: The Even Dozen Jug Band, Elektra 7246, NY, 1964, CD-reissued Collector's Choice, 2002. Maria Muldaur: Richland Woman Blues, Stony Plain Music 1270, US, 2001.]

Murphy, Elliott [1949 -] Elliott James Murphy Jr. was born at Rockville Center, New York, on March 16, 1949, grew up in Garden City and started playing the guitar at age 12. His band the Rapscallions won the 1966 New York State Battle of the Bands. He began writing songs while busking in Europe in 1971, returned to the States and issued his first album, Aquashow, in 1973. Its critical success had him declared one of the 'new Dylans' (awful category), along with BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, JOHN PRINE and others. More albums followed, first on major labels and then independents. By the late 1980s he was mostly touring Europe; he moved to Paris in 1989 and lives there still. He records and keeps touring, playing well over 100 shows a year in Europe. The vinyl limited-edition issue of his 2002 album Soul Surfing included as a 'bonus track' a version of 'If You See Her, Say Hello'.

As well as performing, Murphy has written for Rolling Stone, Spin and several European publications. His semi-autobiographical novel Cold and Electric has been published in France, Germany and Spain, and he has published two short story collections, The Lion Sleeps Tonight and Where the Women Are Naked and the Men Are Rich, and the book Café Notes.

Murphy first listened to Bob Dylan at Christmas 1962 or '63, when his sister gave him the first Dylan album. He was about 13 years old, and knew at once that here was something beyond the clean-cut America of the Kingston Trio and John F. Kennedy. Forty years later he wrote an articulate and respectfully affectionate essay on Dylan, 'The Picasso of Rock and Roll', published as the Foreword to an Italian Dylan-for-beginners book by PAOLO VITES. It is also posted on the official Elliott Murphy website. It includes this simple truth, with which so many of us can identify:

> 'I was born at the right time, I know that, because I fell in love with the guitar and rock and roll and I have walked on this planet in the shadow of ELVIS PRESLEY and the footsteps of Bob Dylan.'

[Elliott Murphy, 'The Picasso of Rock and Roll', Foreword to Paolo Vites, Bob Dylan—1962–2002: 40 anni di canzoni (with appendix by Alessandro Cavazzuti), Rome: Editori Riuniti, 2002; and online at www.elliottmurphy.com/writings/picassorockroll.htm.]

musical accompanists to Dylan, other Space prevents giving an entry to every musician and backing singer who has ever played or sung with Dylan on stage or in the studio. No slight is intended to any of those listed communally here instead. Nor is any judgemental distinction implied between those with an explanatory description and those simply namechecked. Apologies for omissions.

Tawatha Agee on the Feeling Minnesota soundtrack version of 'Ring of Fire'; Butch Amiott, on the unreleased Chicago 1992 sessions: see Bromberg, David; Joshie Armstead, on Self Portrait and a July 1975 session; Kenny Aranoff, on Under the Red Sky, a 1993 WILLIE NELSON TV show and the 1994 Dylan-TRISHA YEARWOOD TV duet; Hilliard Atkinson, on Under the Red Sky. Byron T. Bach and Brenton Banks, on Self Portrait; Stan Barrons in November 1989.

George Barnes (1921–77) was one of the great jazz guitarists of the 1940s–50s but he began backing blues singers at the age of 14—and if it is true that he played on a couple of Bob Dylan's Freewheelin' sessions, on November 1 & 14, 1962 (yielding the 'Rocks and Gravel' issued on early withdrawn copies of the album and reissued on the Highway 61 Interactive CD-Rom, and yielding 'Mixed-Up Confusion', an early single reissued on Biograph and Masterpieces) then he gave the young Bob Dylan a direct link back to his pre-war blues heroine MEMPHIS MINNIE: the teenage George Barnes played behind Minnie in 1935. Playing alongside Barnes (if it really was him) behind Dylan were drummer HERB LOVELLE, bassist Gene Ramey and Dick Wellstood, the New York-based jazz pianist who played on a couple of Dylan's Freewheelin' sessions in 1962 and on ODETTA and the Blues the same year.

Richard Bell, at the 'Absolutely Unofficial Blue Jeans Bash for Arkansas', 1993: see Stephen Stills, below, for details; Vincent Bell on a July 1975 session; Ray Benson, October 1996 and spring 2000; Bill Berg on the December 1974 sessions for Blood on the Tracks in Minneapolis; Byron Berline on the Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid sessions, 1973; Rayse Biggs on Under the Red Sky; George Binkley on Self Portrait; Dyan Birch, July 1975; Roy Bitten, February 1985.

Brady Blade Jr. was the percussionist who played bongos, tambourine and shaker at Dylan's Frankfurt concert of April 15, 2002. Based in Stockholm, he was flown in as a replacement drummer when GEORGE RECELI was having arm and shoulder problems. He is the older brother of BRIAN BLADE (a drummer on much of Time Out of Mind).

Peggi Blu on Infidels, plus May 1986 and June 1987; 'John Boone', supposedly the bass player on one session for Bringing It All Back Home. He played (with BRUCE LANGHORNE, JOHN HAMMOND JR. and JOHN SEBASTIAN) on the evening of January 14, 1965, from which nothing was issued on the album, though the session's less-than-best version of 'I'll Keep It With Mine' was released on Biograph 20 years later. Boone seems to have disappeared from public sight. Maybe he never existed, and the bassist on the session was in fact Steve Boone, who played bass in John Sebastian's band the Lovin' Spoonful and co-wrote songs with Sebastian.

Mary Elizabeth Bridges, 1980 tour; Robert Britt on Time Out of Mind; Alexandra Brown, June 1987; Charles Brown III and Tony Brown, in ERIC WEISS-

BERG's Deliverance, on the New York September 1974 Blood on the Tracks sessions; Mickey Bucklins on Slow Train Coming; Malcolm Burn, a session player who often works with DANIEL LANOIS, played guitar and bass on Oh Mercy. Albert W. Butler, on Self Portrait; Debra Byrd in February 1985.

Jorge Calderon in June 1985; Chris Cameron on the Chicago sessions, 1992; Fred Carter Jr., April 24, 1969 and Self Portrait; Cindy Cashdollar on Time Out of Mind; Lenny Castro in March 1994; The Cate Brothers, closely associated with, and sometimes in, reformed versions of THE BAND, for whom Dylan played guitar at the 'Absolutely Unofficial Blue Jeans Bash for Arkansas' in 1993. Fred Catz on Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid; Marvin D. Chantry on Self Portrait; Robin Clark and Dennis Collins in February 1996; Frances Collins and Mel Collins on a July 1975 Desire session. Mel was a top UK sax player, old colleague of IAN WALLACE and member of Kokomo at the time of the session.

Ron Cornelius was the young Nashville producer who often worked with PETE DRAKE and played guitar with BOB JOHNSTON behind LEONARD COHEN when Cohen played in London in 1972; but it was in New York studios that he played guitar overdubs on Self Portrait (on March 13, 1970). On June 1 he was a guitarist in the group of musicians playing behind Dylan on a session that yielded the Dylan album takes of 'The Ballad of Ira Hayes' and 'Sara Jane', and on the next day's session, which gave us the Masterpieces version of 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue' and the Dylan cuts of 'Mr. Bojangles' and 'Mary Ann'. Over the next three consecutive days he was playing on 'Can't Help Falling in Love' and 'Lily of the West' (Dylan) and the New Morning track 'One More Weekend', all recorded June 3; on 'Three Angels' and 'New Morning' (both New Morning) and 'Big Yellow Taxi' (Dylan), June 4; and the six New Morning tracks achieved on June 5: 'If Dogs Run Free', 'Went to See the Gypsy', 'Sign on the Window', 'The Man in Me', 'Father of Night' and 'Winterlude'.

Roddy Colona, March 1989; Joey Cooper, March 1971; Dominic Cortese, July 1975; Thomas Cosgrove, on New Morning; Sammy Creason, the January 20, 1973 Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid session; Steve Cropper at 'Guitar Legends', Seville, October 1991; Paulino da Costa, on Under the Red Sky.

Marvin Daniels on Infidels and February 1985; Karl Denson on October 19, 1990; Jim Dickinson is the Memphis-based pianist who says he'd been a Dylan fan for 35 years before finally getting to play on Time Out of Mind. He plays piano, Wurlitzer electric piano and pump organ and appears on all tracks except 'Standing in the Doorway', 'Cold Irons Bound' and 'Make You Feel My Love'.

Dottie Dillard on Self Portrait; Daryl Dixon on Infidels and February 1985; Leslie Dowdell on stage at Slane, Ireland, on July 8, 1984; Charlie Drayton at 'Guitar Legends', Seville, 1991; Debi Dye, December 1977.

Peter Ecklund, Chicago 1992; Dolores Edgin on Self Portrait; Bernard Edwards in February 1996; Larry Estridge in May 1974; Robin Eubanks on Infidels and February 1985; Gwen Evans, 1980 tour.

Andy Fairweather-Low, not a name you'd expect to find linked to Dylan's, played on stage with him on June 30, 1999 during ERIC CLAPTON's Benefit for the Crossroads Concert at Madison Square Garden. British ex-mod and founding member of late-1960s group Amen Corner, Fairweather-Low (born in Cardiff, Wales, on August 2, 1948) played guitar as Dylan performed on a handful of numbers.

The oddly named Fick Fegy was on the Chicago 1992 sessions and the delightfully named Buzzy Feiten was a guitarist on New Morning.

Anton Fig, born in 1952 in Cape Town, where he grew up, learning drums by the age of eight, moved to the US in 1970 and became a prominent drummer, playing for many years with the CBS Orchestra for 'The Late Show with David Letterman' and others, and on sessions. He has worked with, among others, Joan Armatrading, James Brown, Robert Gordon, PAUL SIMON and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, and first encountering Bob Dylan in July 1984, when he played on sessions that turned out to be for Empire Burlesque and Knocked Out Loaded—including one session that yielded a circulated take each of 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore' and 'Go 'Way Little Boy' on which RON WOOD plays guitar, and another session that gave Dylan the Empire Burlesque track 'Clean-Cut Kid' and the Knocked Out Loaded track 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore'; this was later radically overdubbed but Fig still gets a sleevenote credit. Next he plays on the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame event in New York on January 20, 1988, alongside Dylan on guitar behind everyone from Billy Joel and Ben E. King to MICK JAGGER, Springsteen and BRIAN WILSON; and he plays behind a number of people including Dylan at the so-called 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration in New York City on October 16, 1992.

Sammy Figueroa on April 19 and May 2, 1983; Carl Fortina and Gary Foster on Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid; Solie J. Fott on Self Portrait; Bubba Fowler on Self Portrait; Eric Frandsen, July 1975; Robben Ford on Under the Red Sky; Glen Fukunaga, March 1989. Full Force (Lucien & Paul & Brian George, Curtis Bedeau and Gerard Charles) provided backing vocals overdubs on Dylan's 'Tell Me' (cut New York City, April 21, 1983 and issued on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991) and on 'Death Is Not the End' (cut New York City May 2, 1983 and issued on the 1988 album Down in the Groove). Their overdubs for both were done in New York City on May 18, 1983.

Jimmie Dale Gilmore, October 25, 1991; Mat Glaser, violin on November 10, 2000; Andrew Gold, who on May 31, 1981 overdubbed some guitar onto four Shot of Love tracks: 'Watered-Down Love', 'Property of Jesus', 'Shot of Love' and 'Every Grain of Sand'; Dennis A. Good on Self Portrait; Emmanuel Green in March 1970; Lloyd Green on New Morning;

Willie Green on Down in the Groove and Oh Mercy; Myron Grombacher on Down in the Groove.

Omar Hakim in February 1996; Tony Hall on Oh Mercy; Hilda Harris on Self Portrait; Jo Ann Harris, a backing singer throughout the 1978 World Tour and on Street Legal. John Hart, described by Dylan as 'the spitting image of Blind GARY DAVIS', is the sax player with Rockin' Dopsie & His Cajun Band who adds the lovely sax part to 'Where Teardrops Fall' on Oh Mercy. The rest of the band were brought in by Daniel Lanois to play on 'Dignity' after Dylan felt (rightly) that it was OK the way it was. The re-make didn't work well, and 'Dopsie got almost as frustrated as me,' Dylan says in Chronicles Volume One; but afterwards, 'playing any old stuff . . . like we were on a party boat', they all recorded 'Where Teardrops Fall'—which is when John Hart's 'sobbing solo' arrived. Later, Dylan overdubbed new vocals, Lanois got Malcolm Burn to overdub bass and later still overdubbed a guitar himself. The credits on the album don't mention Burn but do credit the members of the Dopsie band.

Warren Haynes, lead guitarist of Gov't Mule and the Allman Brothers Band, but also a longtime member of PHIL LESH & Friends, played on stage with Dylan on the fall 1999 leg of the Never-Ending Tour, which was shared with Lesh's group. During Dylan's set on November 18 in Amherst, Massachusetts, Haynes played guitar on 'All Along the Watchtower', 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'Not Fade Away' and 'Alabama Getaway'. Jorma Kaukonen, also a Lesh guitarist but with a longer pedigree, being 20 years older and having co-founded Jefferson Airplane and Hot Tuna, played on the same Dylan songs the same night (except for the first of the four). Don Heffington in December 1984 and February 1985; Sharon Hendrix, aka Muffy (don't ask), on Infidels.

John Hiatt, a singer but primarily a songwriter, came from Indiana, moved to Nashville, worked in music publishing, got two brief record deals in the 1970s and another in the 80s, became an alcoholic, formed Little Village with Ry Cooder, JIM KELTNER and Nick Lowe and had a big hit in 1987 when Bonnie Raitt covered 'Thing Called Love'. By then Dylan had covered 'Across the Borderline' (which Hiatt co-wrote with Cooder and Jim Dickinson) in 1986 concerts with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS (and would revisit at the Guitar Legends Festival in Seville in 1991) and had been so desperate for a song while filming Hearts of Fire that in August 1986 he recorded Hiatt's tedious, posturing 'The Usual' for its soundtrack, also releasing it as a single, in 1987 (and in a vile picture sleeve): the first time Dylan had offered someone else's composition as an A-side. Hiatt has continued to plough his grunge-country furrow.

Rosie Hicks on the 'George Jackson' single, 1971; Frederick Hill on Self Portrait; Beau Hills in August 1986; Hilton, February 1996; Karl T. Himmel on Self Portrait. Jim Horn, top LA-born sax player, first with Duane Eddy, King Curtis and PHIL SPECTOR (his sax is on the Righteous Brothers' 'You've Lost That Lovin' Feeling'), worked with LEON RUSSELL and Joe Cocker in the 1970s, played at the Concert for Bangla Desh and since then with everyone from the Beach Boys to WARREN ZEVON; he has also made solo albums. He played on Traveling Wilburys Volume 1 and Volume 3, and was in the massed army of musicians behind Dylan on the 'Late Night with David Letterman' 10th Anniversary Show, recorded January 18 and televised February 6, 1992.

Bruce Hornsby, the interesting Virginia-born singer-songwriter, pianist and accordionist, who in 1984 formed Bruce Hornsby & the Range (one of whom was DAVID MANSFIELD), who from 1988 onwards made over a hundred concert appearances with the Grateful Dead and in 1989 co-wrote and played piano on Don Henley's hit 'The End of the Innocence' (sung in concert by Dylan in the 2000s), then played piano on two tracks on Dylan's 1990 album Under the Red Sky, 'Born in Time' and 'TV Talkin' Song', and on May 8, 2003 played piano on the encore number 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35' at Dylan's Portsmouth, Virginia, concert.

Neil Hubbard in July 1975; Carol Hunter on Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid. Chrissie Hynde, from Akron, Ohio, was at Kent State University in 1970 when the US National Guard shot four students dead and injured many more (for general information see radical political activity in 1960s–70s US, the strange disappearance of), moved to London, reviewed for the NME, and formed the Pretenders in the late 1970s. On Dylan's 1984 European tour, Hynde played harmonica and sang back-up behind Dylan (and alongside Eric Clapton) on 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat', 'It's All Over Now Baby Blue', 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' at the London Wembley Stadium concert of July 7. She reappeared singing behind Dylan in New York on the 'Late Night with David Letterman' 10th Anniversary Show in early 1992 and was back in London to sing backing vocals alongside CAROLE KING at Dylan's Brixton concert of March 31, 1995.

Greg Inhofer in Minneapolis for the December 1974 Blood on the Tracks sessions; Randy Jackson; Randy Jacobs in March 1994; James Jamerson Jr.; Paul James; the JB Horns on the 'Late Night with David Letterman' 10th Anniversary 'Like a Rolling Stone'; Flaco Jiminez; Alphonso Johnson on June 24, 1984; Bashiri Johnson on Infidels; Darryl Johnson on New Morning; Don Johnson on the 'Blue Jeans Bash'; Philip Jones, congas in May 1986; Steve Jones on Down in the Groove; Steve Jordan in May 1987 and at 'Guitar Legends' in Seville 1991.

Miles Joseph replaced Gary Richrath as REO Speedwagon's lead guitarist, and then Dave Amato replaced Miles Joseph, both in 1989. In 2004 he was a guitarist on the album Scrape, by AARON NEVILLE's son Ivan. Miles Joseph played guitar with Dylan's band on August 31, 1990 in Lincoln, Nebraska, on September 1 in Lampe, Missouri, on September 2 in Hannibal, Missouri, and in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on September 4.

Mindy Jostyn rehearsed with Dylan and his touring band, playing violin generally and singing vocals on the non-Dylan songs 'Both Sides Now', 'Too Far Gone' and 'California Blues' at a New York studio in mid-May 1989, but never did tour with him.

Dennis Karmazin played cello on Shot of Love; Martin Katahn on Self Portrait; Ben Keith at the S.N.A.C.K. Benefit on March 23, 1975; Dan Keith on the 'George Jackson' single; Jerry Kennedy on a Blonde on Blonde session in February 1966; Jewel Kilcher in April 1996. Bobby King contributed background vocals to three tracks on Down in the Groove: 'Sally Sue Brown', 'Death Is Not the End' and 'Ninety Miles an Hour (Down a Dead-End Street').

Millie Kirkham on Self Portrait; Larry Klein on Down in the Groove; Danny Kortchmar in March 1981 and again in 1987; Alison Krauss, September 1995; Lenny Kravitz on October 19, 1990; Greg Kuenn in the 'Sweetheart Like You' promo video; Sheldon Kurland on Self Portrait.

Dickie Landry, on sax on April 26, 2003; Michael Lawrence in July 1975; Bernie Leadon in March 1994; Chuck Leavell at 'Guitar Legends' 1991; Perry Lederman in July 1975; John Leventhal in April 1993; David Lindley on Under the Red Sky; Curtis Linberg on the 1992 Chicago sessions; Claudia Linnear on the March 1971 'Watching the River Flow' and 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' session; Jody Linscott, July 1975; Chuck Loeb, August 20, 2003; Mike Love at the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame gala in January 1988; Glenn Lowe in Chicago, 1992; Stan Lynch at the 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration in New York in October 1992.

Hugh McCracken in July 1975; Martha McCrory and Barry McDonald on Self Portrait; Kathie McDonald in 1971; Paddy McHugh, July 1975; David McMurray on Under the Red Sky; Joseph Macho Jr. played bass on the 'Like a Rolling Stone' sessions, 1965; Steve Madaio on Street Legal and Infidels; Gary Mallabar; Tony Mangurian on Time Out of Mind; Ed Manion at 'Guitar Legends' 1991. Aimee Mann, a singer-songwriter who emerged out of the group Til Tuesday in the 1980s, and who on May 17, 1996 played acoustic guitar on stage with Dylan on 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', his encore in Cleveland, Ohio, that night.

Phil Manzanera at 'Guitar Legends'; Rick Marotta in June 1970; Queen Esther Marrow on Empire Burlesque and Knocked Out Loaded and in the QUEENS OF RHYTHM backing group. Vince Melamed, rock, country and R&B musician and songwriter who played organ and synthesiser on one or two tracks on Empire Burlesque and Knocked Out Loaded, including on 'Something's Burning Baby' and 'Brownsville Girl'. Melamed also played on the Eagles Live album and on tours and sessions for Bobby Womack, Jimmy Buffett and many others, and has written, among much else, Trisha Yearwood's big hit 'Walkaway Joe' and the alt country smash 'Tell Me What You Dream' by Restless Heart.

Clay Meyers, son of AUGIE MEYERS, bongos on "Love and Theft"; Brian Mitchell, accordion December 17, 2000; Donald Mitchell on Under the Red Sky; Oliver Mitchell on Self Portrait; Ted Michel/Mitchell on Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid; Carol Montgomery and Bob Moore on Self Portrait; Gary Moore; Ian Moore in November 1995; Leroy Moore in July 1996; Tommy 'Mad Dog' Morrongiello, mostly Dylan's guitar technician but played guitar at some 2004 concerts; Benjamin Muhoberac on Under the Red Sky; James Mullen, July 1975; Gene A. Mullins on Self Portrait; Charlie Musselwhite in March 1994; Larry Myers in May 1986.

Cyril Neville on Oh Mercy; the New West Horns in August 1986; Henry Newmark in November 1989; Stevie Nicks several times, including February 6 and 12, 1986, the end of 1993 and November 1995.

Tony O'Malley in July 1975; Kevin Odegard at the December 1974 Minneapolis Blood on the Tracks sessions; Carla Olsen on the 'Sweetheart Like You' video.

Joan Osborne, a singer who was one of the Dead associates, was the opening act for Dylan for part of 1997, and sang 'Man in the Long Black Coat' in her set. In New York that December 8, in a small venue, she was at the bar while Dylan was performing, and suddenly she heard him say: 'And I'd also like to thank Joan Osborne. Joan and I are gonna sing a song'—so she leapt to her feet to come to forward, when Dylan added: 'but not tonight.' But the following Hallowe'en, backed by Dylan's touring band but in a studio, they did sing together: on 'Chimes of Freedom', 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' and 'Forever Young'. The first of these was released on the compilation album 'The 60s'—the TV Soundtrack in early 1999. They also came together during some Dylan-Dead double-bill concerts in 2003: she shared vocals on 'Friend of the Devil' (July 30, Tampa, FL), 'Tears of Rage' (August 5, Noblesville, IN, and August 6 in Columbus, OH), and sang backing vocals behind Dylan and Phil Lesh on 'Oh Boy' (August 5 again), and on 'Tangled Up in Blue' and 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' in New York State on August 8.

Peter Ostrouchko at the December 1974 Minneapolis Blood on the Tracks sessions.

June Page on Self Portrait; Pino Palladino and Phil Palmer in May 1994; John Paris, July 1984; Brenda Patterson and Terry Paul on Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid; Rex Peer on Self Portrait; Shawn Pelton on drums on December 17, 2000; Albert Perkins in May 1986. Ted Perlman, husband of Peggi Blu and guitarist friend of Dylan's: on February 24 and March 4 1985 and May 1986 sessions; Bill Peterson at the Minneapolis Blood on the Tracks sessions; Simon Phillips at 'Guitar Legends'; Carl Pickhardt in March 1981; Raymond Lee Pounds on Infidels, October 31, 1985 and April 1987; Billy Preston on Blood on the Tracks.

Don Preston, the guitarist from Leon Russell's band who played on the Dylan session of March 16–19, 1971 in New York, which Russell produced and from which came 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' (on Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits Vol. II) and the 'Watching the River Flow' single. He is not the same person as Mother of Invention Don Preston, FRANK ZAPPA's brilliant keyboards player (who once received one of guitarist Preston's royalty checks by mistake and cashed it; meeting Leon Russell years later, he apologised).

Bill Pursell on Self Portrait.

Carl Radle on the March 1971 'Watching the River Flow' and 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' session; Mickey Raphael in April 1993; Duke Robillard on Time Out of Mind; Nile Rodgers in February 1996; Alvin Rogers on Self Portrait.

Arthur Rosato, long-term Dylan technician and general factotum who in 1981 became his second drummer on the first 18 October–November North American dates, from October 16 to November 8 and on the last night of the tour, November 21. Rosato was replaced by Bruce Gary for the November 10–20 dates; Jim Keltner was main drummer. (NB: some sources don't mention Bruce Gary and say Rosato played all dates.)

Mason Ruffner on Oh Mercy and on October 13, 2003.

Katey Sagal, real name Catherine Louise Sagal (born LA, January 19, 1956) rehearsed as a backing singer for Dylan's 1978 tour, and thus can be heard along with Debi Dye on the circulating rehearsal recording from Santa Monica, December 30, 1977; but Dylan allegedly fired her after one day (she reportedly claims to have rehearsed with him for six weeks) because she behaved too much like a fan. She went on to fame of her own as Margaret 'Peggy' Bundy, wife of Ed, in the successful American sitcom 'Married with Children' and more recently in 'Eight Simple Rules'. Her father Boris Sagal had directed ELVIS PRESLEY's dreadful 1965 film Girl Happy.

Vito San Filipo on Infidels and October 31, 1985; Kevin Savigar on Down in the Groove; Richard Scher on Infidels and February 1985. The attractively named Carl Sealove (born in August 1952 in Hempstead, New York, and who was therefore a 13-year-old when Dylan and THE HAWKS played an early electric concert there on February 26, 1966), played bass in December 1984 on some rehearsals and sessions for Empire Burlesque and on 'New Danville Girl', and therefore on 'Brownsville Girl'.

Sheena Seidenberg and John Sessewell in July 1975; Brian Setzer in February 1999; Doc Severinson on the 'Late Night with David Letterman' 10th Anniversary 'Like a Rolling Stone' in 1992; Paul Shaffer ditto, plus December 1993 and October 20, 1994; Jack Sherman on Infidels, June 1985, April 1987, November 1989 and on the GERRY GOFFIN session of 1995–96; Michelle Shocked on the Letterman 1992 'Like a Rolling Stone'; Ralph Shuckett on the Goffin session; Denny Siewell in December 1977; Paul Simonon on Down in the Groove; Vikki & Donna Simpson on May 13, 2003; Frank C. Smith on Self Portrait; Jo-El Sonnier on April 19, 1991; Alan Spenner in July 1975; Norman Spicher on New Morning; Henry Spinetti in August 1986; Richard Stevenson in February 1985.

Stephen Stills, who was on stage with Dylan at the 'Absolutely Unofficial Blue Jeans Bash for Arkansas' in Washington, D.C., on January 17, 1993, playing guitar behind Dylan on 'To Be Alone with You' and alongside Dylan behind the Cate Brothers on 'I Shall Be Released' and '(I Don't Want to) Hang Up My Rock'n'Roll Shoes', and behind whom, in turn, Dylan played guitar while Stills sang lead vocal on 'Key to the Highway'.

Brian Stoltz on New Morning. Marty Stuart, country music guitarist who played with WILLIE NELSON on the TV show 'Willie Nelson: The Big Six-O' recorded in Austin, Texas, on April 28, 1993, backing Dylan and Nelson as they shared vocals on 'Pancho & Lefty'; Stuart re-appeared on stage with Dylan for his concert at Antioch, Tennessee, on September 8, 1999, playing guitar and mandolin throughout (though only one at a time) and adding backing vocals to 'Like a Rolling Stone'. On the second number of the set, 'Mr. Tambourine Man', Stuart's presence seemed to enliven Dylan, who played a comparatively melodic harmonica solo right in the guitarist's face.

Jody Taylor in November 1989. Susan Tedeschi, contemporary youngish blues singer-songwriter, came on stage at Dylan's November 20, 1999 concert in Newark, Delaware, and played guitar in the melée on 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' and 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', and in between these two played guitar and shared vocals on 'Not Fade Away', after being the opening act for that concert: a slot she was offered after Dylan saw her jam with Phil Lesh, who'd been touring with Dylan that summer.

Anthony Terron on Self Portrait; Annette May Thomas on Infidels; Boyd Tinsley in July 1996; the Tokyo Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Michael Kamen (1948–2003), accompanied Dylan's performances at the so-called Great Music Experience, Nara, Japan, in May 1994; Derek Trucks, November 11, 1992; Robby Turner, March 1994; Ricky Turpin on fiddle on March 17, 2000; Mike Utley on Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid.

Steve Vai, star heavy metal guitarist recruited into Frank Zappa's band first as a music transcriber in 1980, and who in 1992 was one of the musicians in the general thrash behind Dylan at the 'Late Night with David Letterman' 10th Anniversary Show performance of 'Like a Rolling Stone' (invited on by house band leader and general irritant Paul Schaffer). Vai recalled that at the rehearsal Dylan 'was standing right in front of my amp . . . his head was directly in line with my amp. When we finished. . . . He made a comment about the way I was playing, that it was too soft, it was like an acoustic guitar, you know. So during the show I turned up really loud and put distortion on and really played hard and a lot. It was really like drilling him right in the head. And after the performance, on national television, he walked up to me and shook my hand. So I was very thrilled about that.'

Bobby Valentino on October 14, 1987; Gary Van Osdale on Self Portrait.

Waddy Wachtel on Under the Red Sky. Joe Walsh, guitarist and singer from the James Gang, who made successful solo albums, then replaced Bernie Leadon in the Eagles (he's on Hotel Califonia) and then went solo again, joined Dylan on stage at the second of two consecutive nights' concerts in Atlanta, Georgia, on July 25, 1988 (just seven weeks into the Never-Ending Tour) to augment Dylan's band with his guitar on the final two numbers, 'Forever Young' and 'Maggie's Farm'.

Mike Wanchic in November 1989; David Watson on Infidels; Kenny Wayne on November 23, 1996; Chris Weber on the December 1974 Blood on the Tracks sessions; David Weiss on Under the Red Sky; Donna Weiss on Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid; Kevin Welch in early 1993; Steve Wickham on violin at Slane, Ireland, on July 8, 1984.

Jack White of the White Stripes, a popular duo of the early 2000s, came on stage for the second encore of Dylan's Detroit concert of March 17, 2004 and helped out on guitar and vocals on Dylan's performance of the Stripes' own song 'Ball and Biscuit'. Dylan mumbled through the first verse, Jack took the second and they shared the choruses. 'There's no topping that,' said White afterwards, 'I can go on for an hour-and-a-half talking about it, or I can just say: It was splendid.' Stripes fans were touched that Dylan, the old, should embrace the new.

James Whiting aka Sugar Blue, harmonica at a July 1975 Desire session; Willie Murphy & the Bees in Minneapolis in August or September 1975; Bob Wilson on Self Portrait; Carl Wilson and Mary Wilson at the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame Gala in January 1988; Robert Wilson on February 13, 1969; Kip Winger in August 1986; Edgar Winter on the 'Letterman' 1992 'Like a Rolling Stone'; Stu Woods on Self Portrait and New Morning; Elisecia Wright at Farm Aid and on Hallowe'en 1985; Jeff Wysor on the 1992 Chicago sessions.

Andy York on August 20, 2003. Mona Lisa Young sang in Dylan's backing group on both his 1980 gospel tours and on the Saved album. She has been a back-up singer for many people, including Joe Cocker, Tom Scott (she's on his 1995 album Night Creatures) and AARON NEVILLE. She recorded one long-deleted solo album, Knife, released at the beginning of 1983; it was mostly cover versions performed in a funk'n'synth style; the session players included TERRY YOUNG on backing vocals, from whom she is divorced. Reggie Young in April 1993 and March 1994.

[Dylan's Dopsie & John Hart quotes, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.190. Steve Vai quote from undated mini-interview by Masato Kato, The Bridge no.17, winter 2003, p.75.]

musicians' enthusiasm for latest Dylan album, perennial No-one should ever believe what session musicians say about the imminent new Dylan album they've been working on. They always come out saying it's Bob's best since Blonde on Blonde and then it turns out to be Down in the Groove. It's natural that they should be so deluded. First, they're working in the presence of a genius, so they're bound to be dazzled, even if his genius isn't present; second, they've been hearing the playbacks on monumentally expensive speakers and very high-quality drugs; and thirdly, they have in mind the best tracks and the best mixes, which Dylan then deletes before the rest of us are offered the album. Normally. But next time . . . well, you just can't help but get your hopes up.

'Naomi Wise' [song] This old ballad, also known as 'Omie Wise', was briefly an item in Bob Dylan's early folksong repertoire, having been recorded in the 1920s by CLARENCE ASHLEY. He performed it on July 29, 1961 for the New York Riverside Church 'Saturday of Folk Music' (see also Rotolo, Suze and Kalb, Danny) and on the tape made in Minneapolis that December 22, from which it became one of the earliest tracks by Dylan in bootleg circulation, in appalling sound quality. He seems to have dropped it by 1962.

Anyone interested in the historicity of violent murder songs should enjoy reading about the lyrical development of 'Naomi Wise' in Eleanor R. Long-Wilgus' book Naomi Wise: Creation, Re-creation, and Continuity in an American Ballad Tradition, published by University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, in 2003.

N

Nashville c.1960, the influence of Counterbalancing developments in R&B at the start of the 1960s, the commercial country pop coming out of Nashville at the same time had become a strong part of the mainstream popular music of the day, and therefore a major influence on Dylan's pop education.

Nashville lay behind most of the period's rock revival records; RAY CHARLES mixed it with soul, and so did other black artists. 'Blue Moon' and 'You Always Hurt the One You Love' are sort of country songs. 'Blue Moon' was a 1961 US and UK no.1 by black vocal group the Marcels, though in the late 1950s the song was associated in the rock'n'roll world with ELVIS PRESLEY, whose recording was an eerie, surreal hillbilly interpretation. Dylan included a version on Self Portrait, 1970. 'You Always Hurt the One You Love' was a big hit for Clarence Frogman Henry in 1961, the follow-up to his huge hit 'But I Do'.

The EVERLY BROTHERS were Nashville. ROY ORBISON had emerged, like ELVIS PRESLEY and JOHNNY CASH before him, after a less successful start on the Memphis label, Sun, and long after the move to Monument Records and 'Only the Lonely' he was still singing Nashville pop-country songs on albums, including the much-recorded 'All I Have to Do Is Dream' (an Everly Brothers US no.1 in 1958, which, it was discovered in 1994, had been recorded by Dylan with GEORGE HARRISON in 1970).

Dylan owes a lot to this Nashville. Dylan hears DON GIBSON bring something close to perfection, in its own small way, with 'Sea of Heartbreak'; Dylan hears JERRY LEE LEWIS break into extraordinary lyrical piano-work on beautifully poised performances of songs like 'Cold Cold Heart', 'Your Cheating Heart', 'Together Again' and 'How's My Ex Treating You?'; Dylan hears and befriends Johnny Cash; Dylan hears FLATT & SCRUGGS, Patsy Cline, JACK SCOTT (not Nashville-based but sounding it), Marty Robbins and a hundred others, with and without international 'names'—all exploring different paths but from the same prolific headquarters. And then when all this music has become deeply passé and reviled by the hip, in the late 1960s, Dylan decides to commit himself to a country music album and the result, Nashville Skyline, is stunning because he sees through to the basics in whatever he tackles. He turns out an album unrivalled in country music, an album so precisely right, so faithfully lifelike and yet so alive, that it almost makes the rest of Nashville redundant. And then he records and releases Self Portrait: an album far more directly Nashville 1960 in style, which, ironically, proves far less of an artistic success.

See also country music, Dylan's early interest in.

[For relevant Ray Charles, Don Gibson and Jerry Lee Lewis records, see their entries. Elvis Presley: 'Blue Moon', Memphis, 19 Aug 1954, RCA Victor 20/47-6640, 1956. Clarence Frogman Henry: 'You Always Hurt the One You Love', New Orleans, c.Mar 1961, Argo 5388 (Pye International 7N 25089), 1961. Roy Orbison: 'All I Have to Do Is Dream', Monument MSP-003 2, 1963. The Everly Brothers: 'All I Have to Do Is Dream', Nashville, 6 Mar 1958, Cadence 1348, NY (London American HLA 8618, London), 1958. Bob Dylan & George Harrison: 'All I Have to Do Is Dream', NY, 1–2 May 1970.]

Nashville Skyline* [1969] The ninth album, and though not Dylan's first from Nashville—much of Blonde on Blonde had, amazingly, been recorded there—this was his first sustained leap into country music. Again a massive contrast to the previous album, John Wesley Harding: down-home instead of visionary, warm instead of severely ascetic, optimistic instead of dark, and more under the influence of sunshine and the big sky than of catechism and nemesis. It also offered a complete change of language: away from the impressionistic and the allegorical—away from the distinctive complexity of his previous work, using a language of extreme simplicity.

It was quite a shock, on a first playing of Nashville Skyline, back in 1969, to hear Dylan singing lines like 'For your love comes on so strong'; and then in the middle section of the same song ('Tonight I'll Be Staying Here With You') coming on even stronger with this 'new' language: 'Is it really any wonder / The love that a stranger might receive? / You cast your spell and I went under / I find it so difficult to leave.' This compares closely with the middle section of the later song 'Hazel', from Planet Waves: 'Oh no I don't need any reminder / To show how much I really care / But it's just making me blinder and blinder . . .' The joke-rhyming of 'wonder' and 'under', and even more so of 'reminder' and 'blinder and blinder', combined with the playful vacuousness of the melodies of both those sections, suggest the milieu of the Broadway musical more than anything. They'd go comfortably inside 'ON THE STREET WHERE YOU LIVE' from My Fair Lady. Not exactly Dylan terrain.

So what was he playing at? A useful comment was soon offered by a review of Self Portrait by Geoffrey Cannon, in the Guardian (June 26, 1970): '. . . the coup of Nashville Skyline [was] to demonstrate that proverbs are aphorisms when used (as they always are, except in books) by a particular person to a particular person, in a place and a time. It's human context, not verbal dexterity, that lets words, especially words of love, work.'

That account is a little dangerous, of course but it does illuminate Dylan's work on Nashville Skyline. When Dylan sings 'For your love comes on so strong', he is effectively saying that that phrase will do as well as any to cover the part of his feelings that can be put into words. And in saying that, he was rejecting a self-image of Dylan the brilliant poet in favour of a concept of himself as an ordinary man coping with love. That is how such phrases work. This is not Dylan patronizing the ordinary mind; it is a confession, candid and accepting, that he is, in ways that it matters to be honest about, an ordinary man himself.

There is something else to be said in relation to the kind of language Dylan deals in here and on Self Portrait—and it's a point that relates also to Dylan's consistent independence of rock modishness. John Wesley Harding was a dramatic gesture of distancing; so too was Nashville Skyline (and Self Portrait even more so). They are very much out on their own, and one main way this was emphasized was in Dylan's rejection of the language of a modish rock-culture here.

Before John Wesley Harding, Dylan's language had been scattered with the old familiar phrases: hung up, where it's at and so on, along with much hip drugs terminology. From John Wesley Harding through to Self Portrait, this disappears.

Patrick Thomas, commenting on this shift as evidenced on Nashville Skyline, wrote: '. . . the "new" Bob Dylan lyrics, which wring out responses from words like "suitcase" and "rumors", are simply recognition of the fact that not all Americans feel the dead-weight of thrice-throttled, TV-choked English.' And he contrasts this 'new' Dylan language to the 'constant overstatement of urban vernacular'. And indeed on Nashville Skyline Dylan is using his 'ordinary language' with a dignity of expression which involves much of that weapon of the great artist, understatement.

As Dylan suddenly embraced the simplicity and clichés that are the currency of ordinary Americans' speech, he used a new singing voice to go with it. Gone were the various husky, grating Dylans and on came a light, melodic, almost Orbisonian tenor.

This was all an off-loading of the Dylan Myth—which he was to do again from a different direction with Slow Train Coming and Saved a decade later. In Chronicles Volume One, 2004, he argues that the album was indeed an attempt to get people off his back—but methinks he doth protest too much, and this dubious claim takes no account of the obvious respect he has for the genre and the musicians (including JOHNNY CASH), some of whom, encountering this version of history, might rightly feel insulted.

In the end, Nashville Skyline is a lovely album but not a heavyweight contender, though its effects were major ones. Country music was despised, hick music when Dylan took it up. People were divided into the hip and the non-hip. The counterculture was in full swing and riddled with its own self-importance and snobbery. Nashville Skyline was a hard pill to swallow: but it did 'em good.

See also Flatt & Scruggs.

[Recorded Nashville, TN, 13–14 & 17–18 Feb 1969; released as stereo LP, Columbia KCS 9825 (in UK CBS SPBG 63601), 9 Apr 1969. Patrick Thomas: 'DOUG KERSHAW', Rolling Stone no. 39, San Francisco, 9 Aug 1969. Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, p.113ff.]

Nelson, Paul [1936 -] Paul Clifford Nelson was born on January 21, 1936 in Warren, Minnesota ('60 miles from Canada'), though he doesn't like giving out his birthdate. 'I was born just after the Civil War,' he prefers to say. Though his early interests as a critic and consumer were films and detective fiction, in 1959 he discovered the HARRY SMITH anthology of AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC (a 6-LP set of pre-war recordings issued in 1952), introduced it excitedly to his friend and fellow University of Minnesota student JON PANKAKE, became with him in 1961 the co-founder of the small but influential critical journal Little Sandy Review, and was one of those who knew Bob Dylan in his Twin Cities Dinkytown days (1959–60), seeing him perform—and watching him develop as a performer—and meeting up with him again on subsequent Dylan revisits to the North Country (1961–63).

Early on in this acquaintanceship he was a witness to Dylan's being chased down for the return of a shrewdly judged bunch of LPs he had removed from Pankake's apartment—a tale he tells when he appears, looking every inch the weather-beaten but still amused old hippie, quirky cap on head, eyes crinkling with ironic would-be-detached humour, on the filmed interview included in MARTIN SCORSESE's No Direction Home (though see the entry Pankake, Jon for a denial of the latter's participation in this escapade).

Paul Nelson's pre-traditional folk music listening was to HANK WILLIAMS and to jazz of the Gerry Mulligan kind, and he has maintained a lifelong habit of collecting Chet Baker releases. But by the early 1960s, Nelson had become one of the pioneers of rock writing (and may even have a claim to being one of the creators of 'the New Journalism' too). He reached New York City 'around 1963', long before Little Sandy Review's 30 issues were completed—it had started with three subscribers and peaked at 1,000—and started writing for Sing Out!. He became a loud opponent of the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL policy of packing in, indiscriminately, as many traditional and revivalist performers as possible (as in his 1965 Festival Program article 'A Voice of Dissent: How I Started Worrying and Learned to Bomb Newport': a scathing piece about the shortcomings of the 1964 event and its 'babyish, namby-pamby, goody-goody, totally phony atmosphere'); he was also one of the earliest supporters in print of Dylan's 'going electric'. But he didn't stick around long at Sing Out! to defend Dylan or not: indeed he quit because he 'knew they were going to nail him to the wall for not writing protest songs' and he 'didn't want any part of it'; he 'resigned out of protest' [as it were], because he 'knew what they would do to Dylan.' Nelson 'kept on watching Dylan's shows, like at Forest Hills [the first post-Newport 'electric' concert, August 28, 1965]. One Sing Out! critic left after the acoustic section. . . . A lot of people left . . . it was quite scary.' Nelson 'made it a point to applaud Dylan.' He says: 'People would come up to me and say, "JOAN BAEZ would never sell out." And I would say, "What does she have to sell out?"'

After Sing Out!, Nelson worked 'twice' at both teeny-bopper-to-rock magazine Circus and at Rolling Stone as a New York reporter ('or something like that') when it was San Francisco based. In 1970 he came in from the cold of freelance rock writing and took a press-office job at Mercury Records in New York, in which capacity he first met other critics like Robert Christgau, Dave Marsh and Richard Meltzer. He got fired because he signed and pushed the New York Dolls but had continued to write for Rolling Stone in any case. In the late 1970s he took over from Marsh as its Record Reviews Editor and stayed with it till 1983. In that period he gave Dylan's Shot of Love album an embittered-sounding mauling, excepting 'Every Grain of Sand', about which he rhapsodised that in this song Dylan 'touches you, and the gates of heaven dissolve into a universality.'

Since returning to freelancing in the mid-1980s Nelson has been, among other things, a copy editor at Jewish Week—partly in order to avoid writing—and has so far failed to create the 'hard-boiled detective novel' of his ambition. He has long since given up reading rock criticism—and Rolling Stone. 'A lot of us who worked there used to pose the question . . . if we didn't work there, would we buy the magazine, and my answer turned out to be no.'

By 2000, he was writing a screenplay that he felt had no prospect of interesting Hollywood, and working in a New York City video store. 'I don't really want a job anymore where you have to think,' he said.

[Quote from Shot of Love review, Rolling Stone no. 354, US, 15 Oct 1981; other quotes & background from 'What Ever Happened to Rock Critic Paul Nelson?' by Steven Ward, seen online 9 Oct 2005 at www.rockcritics.com/interview/paulnelson.html. Minnesota birth index 1935–2002, file no. 1936-MN-021393.]

Nelson, Ricky [1940 - 1985] Eric Hilliard Nelson was born in Teaneck, New Jersey, on May 8, 1940, the younger son of radio stars Ozzie & Harriet Nelson, on whose TV series 'The Adventures of Ozzie and Harriet' he featured as from its inception in 1952; by 1953 he had appeared in the musical film The Story of Three Loves, playing an 11-year-old musician, in amongst Kirk Douglas, Zsa Zsa Gabor, James Mason, Agnes Moorhead, Farley Granger, Ethel Barrymore, Leslie Caron and the lovely Pier Angeli. In 1954 his parents quit radio to concentrate on their TV success, and Ricky became the first young music star promoted via this medium.

He made the first of the quality pop records that made him a teenage idol when he was 16, signed to Verve, where he had a double-sided smash hit with 'A Teenager's Romance' and his white cover of FATS DOMINO's 'I'm Walkin' before signing to the same Hollywood label as Fats himself, where he began a run of hits with 'Be-Bop Baby' c/w 'Have I Told You Lately That I Love You'. In 1959, though, he made a very creditable appearance as the young gun in the major Hollywood western Rio Bravo, directed by Howard Hawks and co-starring John Wayne and Dean Martin. JOHNNY CASH wrote him a song for the film, 'The Restless Kid', but Dmitri Tiomkin would have none of it and it appeared on Ricky's third album, the insipidly titled Ricky Sings Again.

At their best, his records were superior to the milk-white pap they so closely resembled, thanks to Ricky's immaculate vocal delivery, JAMES BURTON's beautifully understated guitar and a glistening, warm production only achievable using the large, glowing valve amps of the day (soon to be vanquished by transistors in the name of convenience and cheapness: not, God knows, in the name of sound quality). His hits included 'Poor Little Fool' (his first US no.1, in 1958: he was 18 years old), 'Lonesome Town', 'It's Late' c/w 'There'll Never Be Anyone Else But You', 'Travelin' Man' c/w 'Hello Mary Lou' and 'It's Up to You'. Altogether he released 21 singles and 12 albums before switching labels to US Decca in 1963. Ten minutes later he was one of the many made to sound instantly passé by the emergence of the more harmonically adventurous, more energetic and more working-class BEATLES.

Ricky, however, was more interested in the arrival of Bob Dylan than of the Beatles, and he shifted his name to the more mature and purposive Rick, grew his hair, re-presented himself as a singer-songwriter, issued a 1966 album named Bright Lights & Country Music and formed a country-rock group, the Stone Canyon Band, with which he performed and recorded a fair number of mid-1960s Dylan songs, some released as A-sides: 'Walkin' Down the Line', 'She Belongs to Me', 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', 'I Shall Be Released', 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', 'Just Like a Woman' and (though this last went unreleased) 'Mama You Been on My Mind'.

When Rick appeared in his newer guise at a 'rock revival night' at New York's Madison Square Garden in 1971, he was booed by the crowd for not being Ricky. In response, he wrote the song 'Garden Party'—with which, ironically perhaps, he enjoyed his first top 10 hit single (and gold record) in many years, and within which he mentioned Dylan somewhat à la Don McLean's 'American Pie' (singing 'Mr. Hughes hid in Dylan's shoes wearing his disguise') but primarily asserted his right to look how he liked and, while happy to sing some of the old songs, to refuse to be frozen in rock'n'roll aspic, making his stance with this nice line in defiance: 'But if memories were all I sang I'd rather drive a truck.'

Clearly this was a sequence of events Bob Dylan could identify with, and in the fullness of time, he acknowledged it—but not in 1972, when 'Garden Party', a protest record of sorts, was a hit. Nelson continued to work live, on record and on TV and film, including a 'Streets of San Francisco' appearance in 1973, a 'Tales of the Unexpected' in 1977 and a hosting of 'Saturday Night Live' in February 1979.

On August 22, 1985, in Los Angeles, he and Fats Domino got back together—or rather, nearer to together than in the segregated 1950s when he had pinched 'I'm Walkin''—for the TV Special 'Ricky [sic] Nelson & Fats Domino: Live at the Universal Amphitheatre', accompanied by ELVIS PRESLEY's old backing-vocals group the Jordanaires. Rick must have decided not to drive that truck after all. However, on a flight with his band and new fiancée over De Kalb, Texas, four months later, their plane caught fire and crashed, killing them all, on New Year's Eve 1985.

Barely over a month later, on February 5, 1986, in Wellington, New Zealand, at the opening night of his first concert tour of the year (the first concerts on which he was backed by TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS), Dylan débuted a performance of 'Lonesome Town', one of the most crafted and memorable of Nelson's teen-idol hits—and duly performed it on all but two of the concerts that followed in New Zealand, Australia and Japan, its 15th performance being on the tour's last night in Tokyo that March 10. When the tour's US leg began in June, 'Lonesome Town' was still on the set-list, and was played every night but one.

Usually Dylan introduced it simply by saying that Ricky Nelson had sung a lot of his songs and he was going to sing one of Ricky's; but on the first night the tour arrived at Madison Square Garden itself (July 15, 1986) this was slightly augmented: 'Actually,' he added, 'I heard this song when I was about oh, say I dunno, two years old. It really had an impression on me.' At the same venue two nights later, Dylan offered his audience a dopily garbled version of the story of Nelson's unhappy 1971 appearance there, confusing the song Nelson wrote afterwards about the event with the repertoire for which he was booed on the night: 'I wanna play a real special song here in this special place. This is the very stage where Ricky Nelson got booed off for singing "Garden Party": this is the one, the very one. Anyway, it gives me a real great pleasure to sing one of Ricky's songs in this place. This is . . . called "Lonesome Town".'

Altogether on that US tour leg, the song was given 40 performances in the course of the 41 concerts—a total of 55 during the year—and then dropped. Ricky Nelson's version could be heard again in 1994 on the soundtrack of the movie Pulp Fiction, and ten years after that came Dylan's surprising homage to the former teen idol in the pages of Chronicles Volume One. Here, very early on in the book, we find the young folksinger who is trying to sound as gritty and 'authentic' and as far away from the world of late-50s commercial pop singles as possible, sitting in the kitchen of the Café Wha?, when he hears on the radio Nelson's 'new song, "Travelin' Man" [issued April 1961, and destined to be another US no.1]. . . . He was different than the rest of the teen idols. . . . Nelson had never been a bold innovator like the early singers who sang like they were navigating burning ships. He didn't sing desperately, do a lot of damage, and you'd never mistake him for a shaman. It didn't feel like his endurance was ever being tested to the utmost, but it didn't matter. He sang his songs calm and steady. . . . His voice was sort of mysterious and made you fall into a certain mood. I had been a big fan of Ricky's and still liked him, but that type of music was on its way out.'

After elaborating further on all this, Dylan produces one of the most adroit and cleverly used metaphors in the book. It's one of those moments when his sharp and literate mind darts out and surprises you, not by its intelligence (that's no surprise) but by its deft pinning-down of something not at all easy to describe: the area of affinity that he himself feels for Ricky Nelson—a figure most of us would assume he didn't much resemble at all:

'I'd always felt kin to him, though. We were about the same age, probably liked the same things, from the same generation although our life experience had been so dissimilar, him being brought up out West on a family TV show. It was like he'd been born and raised on Walden Pond where everything was hunky-dory, and I'd come out of the dark, demonic woods, same forest, just a different way of looking at things.'

[Ricky Nelson: 'A Teenager's Romance' c/w 'I'm Walkin'', nia, Verve 10047, US 1957; 'Be-Bop Baby' c/w 'Have I Told You Lately That I Love You', nia, Imperial 5463, US, 1957; 'Poor Little Fool', nia, Imperial 5528, US, 1958; 'Lonesome Town', nia, Imperial 5545, US, 1958; Rick Sings Again, Imperial LP-9061 (mono), US, 1959; 'It's Late' c/w 'There'll Never Be Anyone Else But You', nia, Imperial 5565, 1959; 'Travelin' Man' c/w 'Hello Mary Lou', Imperial 5741, 1961; 'It's Up to You', Imperial 5901, 1962; Bright Lights & Country Music, Decca DL 74779 (stereo), US, 1966; 'Walkin' Down the Line', nia, on Country Fever, Decca DL 74827, 1967; 'She Belongs to Me', nia, Decca 32550, 1969; 'She Belongs to Me', 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now' & 'I Shall Be Released', LA, 1969, Rick Nelson in Concert, Decca DL75162, 1970 (re-issued as Rick Nelson in Concert (The Troubadour, 1969), MCA MCA-25983, 1987); 'I Shall Be Released' c/w 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', Decca 32676, 1970; 'Just Like a Woman' & 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', nia, Rudy the Fifth, Decca DL 75297, 1971; 'Garden Party', nia, Decca 32980, 1972; 'Mama You Been on My Mind', spring 1978, unreleased. The Story of Three Loves, dir. Vincent Minelli, MGM, US, 1953. Rio Bravo, dir. Howard Hawks, Armada, US, 1959. 'Ricky Nelson & Fats Domino: Live at the Universal Amphitheatre', dir. Thomas V. Grasso; LaBuick & Associates Media Inc., LA, 1985.

Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp. 13–14. Most discographical detail from www.ricknelson.com/discogc.html, seen online 16 Dec 2005.]

Nelson, Willie [1933 -] William Hugh Nelson was born on April 30, 1933, in Abbot, Texas, was raised by his maternal grandparents, joined John Raycjeck's Bohemian Polka Band at the age of ten, joined the US Air Force after high school but left because of back problems and after a series of odd jobs, including selling encyclopedias, became a Fort Worth DJ while trying to launch his singing career. His inauspicious recording début was made with a cover of a Leon Payne song while he made the mistake of selling the rights in his own first successful composition, 'Family Bible', for $50.

After a short-lived move to Vancouver, Washington, he tried his luck in Nashville, arriving in the spring of 1960 and becoming Ray Price's bass player after Price recorded Nelson's song 'Nite Life' (later titled 'Night Life'), to which Nelson, still driven by family penury, again sold the rights. But for the support of others, especially friend Hank Cochran, he would have sold other songs without ever seeing the royalties they earned. He soon wrote the Faron Young hit 'Hello Walls' and ROY ORBISON's indifferent early record 'Pretty Paper'. His own first country hits, 'Willingly' and 'Touch Me' were both duets with his second wife, Shirley Collie, in 1962 (at which point he was dressed in a suit and tie, with brilliantined hair). He joined the Grand Old Opry and became a regular performer in 1964, though to little avail.

He has had a fitful career ever since, festooned about with lurid personal and professional problems, dramatic shifts as when he quit Nashville in the mid-1960s and 'retired' to Austin, Texas, yet also with mega-successes—platinum albums and no.1 country best-sellers galore—and the extravagant acquisition of resorts, golf courses, aeroplanes and, in 1990, a $16.7 million IRS bill. In 2005, with NEIL YOUNG and two business partners, his latest venture was to launch the energy company Willie Nelson's BioDiesel (or BioWillie, for short), selling this new-fangled fuel to truckers who might otherwise be the last to try it.

What matters, however, is that Charles Dickens look-alike Nelson is surely the most important figure in country music since HANK WILLIAMS, and just as effectively the father of that music today. Like anyone else remotely interested in or connected to it, Bob Dylan cannot help but have been touched by Nelson's influence. Blessed with a beautifully timbred voice and a concomitant sense of timing, such that as a singer he communicates, with the illusion of great ease, an affecting cocktail of emotion and intelligence, managing to sound both open and judicious, he is also the incomparable songwriter of the genre, whose songs have set the standards for others, whose catalogue stretches back further than Bob Dylan's and whose classics began with the unarguable fully formed achievement of Patsy Cline's sublime 1961 hit 'Crazy' (reputedly the most played record in jukebox history) and, cutting to the quick with a superb economy of line in both words and music, that numinous small masterpiece 'Funny How Time Slips Away', which has enriched many a singer's records since it was first a hit for Billy Walker: not least as by ELVIS PRESLEY and (better still, despite its cheap pop production values) by ARTHUR ALEXANDER.

Presley also covered Nelson's 'Always on My Mind' and perhaps it was this song Dylan had in mind when he paid this tribute on the TV show 'Willie Nelson: The Big Six-0: An All-Star Birthday Celebration' in 1993: 'He takes whatever thing he's singing and makes it his own, you know, and there's not many people who can do that. Even with something like an Elvis tune. You know, once Elvis has done a tune, it's pretty much done. But Willie's the only one in my recollection that has even taken something associated with Elvis and made it his.'

As a composer, of course, it already was 'his', and Dylan's tribute to Nelson's songwriting was as fulsome as to his performing skills: 'He's like a philosopher-poet. You know, he gets to the heart of it and in a quick way, gets it out and it's over. And it just leaves the listener to think about it.'

Nelson's other compositions include 'Mammas Don't Let Your Babies Grow Up to Be Cowboys', 'Bloody Mary Morning' and 'Blue Eyes Cryin' in the Rain'. As a performer he has sold millions of albums over a 40-year period, including albums of duets with others (most notably Waylon and Willie in 1978 and with different guests per track on Across the Borderline in 1993) and in the mid-1980s as one of the Highwaymen with Waylon Jennings, KRIS KRISTOFFERSON and JOHNNY CASH. He has also written music for, and appeared in, a number of Hollywood films, from The Electric Horseman (1979) to The Dukes of Hazzard (2005) and including a lead rôle in JERRY SCHATZBERG's 1980 film Honeysuckle Rose. And all this has been achieved with the public image of exactly the sort of weed-imbibing, long-haired, bandana'd old hippie that Nashville's country-music fraternity used to hate and fear.

It was in the 1980s that Nelson and Dylan began to work together, starting when Dylan's impolitic words at Live Aid about American farmers prompted Willie Nelson to organise the first Farm Aid, which took place in Champaign, Illinois, in September 1985, two months after Dylan's comments from the stage in Philadelphia. Dylan's own Farm Aid performance, backed by TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, took place on September 22, and for the last three numbers of the six-song set, they were augmented by Nelson playing guitar (on 'Trust Yourself', 'That Lucky Old Sun' and 'Maggie's Farm'). The following January, Dylan broadcast a TV message of congratulations to Nelson on his winning of a humanitarian award for that Farm Aid work, in which Dylan said this: 'It's not a bad thing to have a good idea, but it's an even better thing to take a good idea and do something about it. That's just what you did, Willie. You took time out from a busy career, you put in a lot of energy and money, you asked a lot of friends to help out and they did. You made Farm Aid a reality. For this, the music business thanks you, I thank you, the American farmer thanks you.'

Seven years on from Farm Aid, on October 16, 1992, Nelson was one of the many who participated in the so-called 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration for Dylan at Madison Square Garden, where Nelson, one of the oldest people present, chose to perform the newest song, the near-great, and in context savagely apt, 'What Was It You Wanted?', from the album of just three years earlier, Oh Mercy.

Three days after this concert, Willie and Bob went into the studio together in New York City to record their joint composition 'Heartland', on which they both played guitar and sang, and which was duly released on Nelson's album of duets Across the Borderline, in early 1993. This song, a return to the theme of Farm Aid in that it depicts a forgotten Heartland USA in which youth, hope and the natural world are blighted by economic neglect and by the rapacious greed of the moneymen and politicians who run things from the East. As with Eddie Arnold's contribution to that great song 'You Don't Know Me' (co-written with Cindy Walker), it's alleged that Dylan wrote only the title of 'Heartland', and that Nelson wrote all the rest. Vocally, it's a surprise that Dylan sounds the less shaky and the more reliable of the two.

In any case, to date it remains the only instance of their collaboration in the studio and as songwriters, though they do appear on adjacent tracks on the specially made 1997 album on Dylan's own Egyptian Records label, The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers—A Tribute, on which Dylan's tentative vocal on the comparatively obscure 'My Blue-Eyed Jane' is followed by a rather more spicey and alert Nelson rendition of 'Peach-Picking Time Down in Georgia'. Dylan had also recorded—and even released on the B-side of four different non-US singles—an appropriately wistful version of Nelson's song 'Angel Flying Too Close to the Ground', though not in Nelson's presence, at the sessions for the Infidels album of 1983.

In performance, however, Dylan and Nelson have come together on many other occasions. The two sang and played guitars on 'Heartland' on the TV show 'A County Music Celebration' recorded in Nashville on January 13, 1993 and broadcast by CBS-TV that February 6, and in late April, along with the televised tribute to Nelson's talents cited above, Dylan also gave three song performances for that 60th birthday programme: two of the STEPHEN FOSTER song 'Hard Times' and then one of Townes Van Zandt's 'Pancho & Lefty', a song much associated with Nelson, and on which, on this occasion, he contributed guitar and shared vocals.

A decade later, the two grizzled old contenders finally embarked upon a tour together. The summer 2004 leg of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour (though Nelson may not have accepted that he was standing under any such umbrella) saw the two sharing the billing on a tour that began for Dylan at an 800-capacity venue in Poughkeepsie, New York, on August 4 and for Nelson two nights later at an 11,500-capacity field in Cooperstown, New York, and ended for both on September 4 in Kansas City.

On May 5, 2004 they performed Hank Williams' song 'You Win Again' together for the TV show 'Willie Nelson & Friends: Outlaws and Angels', broadcast on the USA Network that May 31. Dylan's was an unannounced guest appearance, and greeted with wild enthusiasm. They had also duetted on 'I Shall Be Released' at some of the 2004 concerts, but not until August 27 at Madison Wisconsin did they début a live shared performance of 'Heartland'.

The following year they toured together again, this time opening in Fort Myers on May 25, 2005 and running through to July 12 in St. Paul, Minnesota—and including an appearance by Dylan at

'Willie Nelson's 32nd Annual 4th of July Picnic' in Fort Worth, Texas, at which the two again shared the microphone for a performance of 'You Win Again' midway through Dylan's set.

Not counting that one-off, the two had given a total of 52 shared-bill concerts in large-capacity sports parks and stadiums: 22 in 2004 and 30 in 2005. By the time these concerts ended, the combined age of their co-headliners was 136.

Three decades earlier, there had been a less amicable scene involving the two men, though in Nelson's case only indirectly. RONNIE HAWKINS remembers a post-Rolling Thunder Revue party at RONEE BLAKLEY's when Nelson's notoriously violent bodyguard was becoming belligerent towards Dylan:

> 'I got in a little trouble, because somebody was there knockin' Bob. . . . He and LEVON [HELM] got a little high, and they were singing, and cutting up, and this and that, and Bob was kinda nodding out . . . [and] Elliott Gould and the bodyguard for Willie Nelson, they were there, and they were drunk, and they were mouthing off at Bob and Levon. And I was a little drunk myself. I was gonna whip their ass right there at the damn party. . . . They were knockin' things, sayin' "Look in there—Bob's drunk and he's doin' this and ain't it awful?" I said, "Yes it is awful: he can draw more people drunk than all of you boys could if you were straight as a damn string." I was a little bit high, y'know. And this cat was supposed to be so rough and tough—had whipped three or four hundred people in Texas, and broke people's backs and stuff—Willie Nelson's bodyguard, that is. Well, I was gettin' ready to hit him in the head with a poker! They had a fireplace and I grabbed the poker and I was ready to whip him and that Elliott Ghoul real easy. I could have done it real easy; but they apologised and left.'

Since those days, Nelson has also been, allegedly, the man who started Bob Dylan playing golf. Ain't it funny how time slips away.

[Willie Nelson: 'Funny How Time Slips Away', Nashville, 14 Jun 1962, And Then I Wrote, Liberty LST-7239, US, 1962; 'What Was It You Wanted?', NY, 16 Oct 1992, Bob Dylan the 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration, Columbia 474000 2, US, 1993; 'Peach Pickin' Time Down in Georgia', Hollywood, nia, The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers—A Tribute, Egyptian/Columbia 485189 2, US, 1997. Willie Nelson & Bob Dylan: 'Heartland', NY, 19 Oct 1992, on Nelson: Across the Borderline, Columbia 472942 2, US (CK 52752, UK) 1993. Patsy Cline: 'Crazy', nia, Decca 31317, US, 1961. Elvis Presley: 'Funny How Time Slips Away', Nashville, 7 Jun 1970, Elvis Country, RCA 4460, US, 1971. Arthur Alexander: 'Funny How Time Slips Away', Nashville, Mar 1962, You Better Move On, Dot LP3434, US (London-American HA-D 2457, UK) 1962.

Bob Dylan: 'Angel Flying Too Close to the Ground', NY, 2 May, 1983, c/w 'I And I', CBS A 3904, Netherlands & Italy, 1983; c/w 'Union Sundown', CBS A 3916, UK & Spain, 1983; c/w 'Sweetheart Like You', CBS/Sony 07SP 765, Japan & CBS BA 223121, Australia & New Zealand; and c/w 'Jokerman', CBS 43560, Brazil, 1983. Dylan quotes, 'Willie Nelson: The Big Six-0: An All-Star Birthday Celebration', KRLU-TV, Austin, TX, 27 or 28 Apr 1993, broadcast CBS-TV, US, May 22, 1993 (& incl. in video release of same name, Columbia House 11141, Jun 1993); LA, Jan 1986, broadcast ABC-TV, US, 27 Jan 1986. Ronnie Hawkins quote, interview by Michael Gray, St. John's, Newfoundland, Canada, 30 Sep 1985, 1st published as 'The Wanted Man Interview: Ronnie Hawkins', The Telegraph no.22, UK, winter 1985, pp.72–86, collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.]

Neuwirth, Bobby [1939 -] Robert Neuwirth was born on June 20, 1939 in Akron, Ohio, attended art school in Boston and was a minor figure in the Cambridge folk scene; part of his time was spent in California, to which he hitchhiked in order to visit the bohemian bars of North Beach, San Francisco and the folk clubs of Berkeley. Dylan biographer CLINTON HEYLIN says that he and Dylan first met at the Indian Neck folk festival in May 1961 (Dylan performed there on the 6th), but Dylan's memoir Chronicles Volume One describes first encountering him at the Gaslight, earlier than that. He gives a vivid description of Neuwirth's spiky character, without managing to explain what he liked about a man who seems to so many the archetypal snivelling sidekick, stroking Dylan's ego all through Don't Look Back while kicking and belittling everyone else around—as when he says of JOAN BAEZ, right in front of her, 'Hey, she has one of those see-through blouses that you don't even wanna'—and generally game-playing, suffused with the vicarious power of being Bob's friend, a position he first assumed in February 1964, when he replaced Pete Karman after Dylan's Berkeley concert.

It was from this position that he got into a relationship with EDIE SEDGWICK, whom he and Dylan first met that December in New York City. By the time she quit ANDY WARHOL's Factory in February 1966, declaring that Bobby Dylan was going to give her a starring film rôle, she and Neuwirth (not Dylan) were having an affair. She said of it: 'It was really sad. . . . The only true, passionate, and lasting love scene, and I practically ended up in the psychopathic ward.' Neuwirth ended their relationship in early 1967, helping D.A. PENNEBAKER with the filming of that summer's Monterey Pop Festival and two years later attending the Woodstock festival before going to Nashville with the then-unknown KRIS KRISTOFFERSON, whose song 'Me and Bobby McGee' Neuwirth would soon afterwards teach to Janis Joplin, with whom he wrote her well-known song 'Mercedes Benz'.

Perhaps its mix of the clever and facile was characteristically Neuwirthian; but he was not only a songwriter and film scene person: he was also a painter. His now absurdly quaint in-your-face-modern-art pictures, like brazen parodies of Picasso, with their proud creator stood beside them looking defiantly mod and moody in Cambridge in November 1964, can be seen in a photograph by John Cooke in ROBERT SHELTON's biography No Direction Home, re-used in MARTIN SCORSESE's film of the same name. A photograph with more importance in which Neuwirth also appears is the front cover of the Highway 61 Revisited album. His are the legs standing behind motorbike-persona Dylan, his black-jeaned crotch just off to one side of Dylan's head, while his fist, thumb in pocket, holds a dangling camera on a strap. Those legs have always contributed a very, very slight hint of Warholian arty eroticism to the photo: they're part of what gives the cover its cutting-edge modernity and cool.

Bob Neuwirth continued to perform as a countryish singer, and a few months after Janis Joplin's death, when he played the Gaslight in Greenwich Village in March 1971, Dylan turned up to catch his set, and at the select second party to celebrate the end of Dylan and THE BAND's 1974 'comeback' tour, Neuwirth was one of the inner-circle guests.

After bringing Dylan on stage as his 'surprise backup guitarist' at the Other End (formerly the Bitter End) on July 2, 1975—the month that Dylan was, as in the old days, around in the Village all the time—Neuwirth duly reappeared in his Dylan-sidekick rôle when Dylan decided to go back on the road with what became the Rolling Thunder Revue. It was Neuwirth who organised 'the house-band' for the tour, GUAM, in which he included himself on vocals and guitar. That's him on the awful harmony vocals when Dylan opens his set wearing his Bob Dylan mask and singing 'When I Paint My Masterpiece'. (When the Bootleg Series Vol. 5: Bob Dylan Live 1975 was released, taken from five different concerts but put together to represent a complete Dylan set, it was decided to omit 'When I Paint My Masterpiece'. Some aficionados complained; very few people's ears did.)

But of course there was no getting away from Bob Neuwirth in the film Renaldo & Clara, and in the concert footage, he's the one mugging the bulbous-eyed faces and, in David Faciane's happy phrase, 'jumping around like he had to go to the bathroom'. On the second Rolling Thunder Revue, in 1976, Neuwirth shared vocals with Dylan not only on 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' but also on '(Where Did) Vincent Van Gogh?' He is therefore also to be seen in the TV Special 'Hard Rain', and is present on the album of that name.

In the 1980s Neuwirth recorded two albums of his own, Back to the Front and 99 Monkeys, and had songs recorded by k.d. lang and others; in the 1990s he and John Cale collaborated on the album Last Day on Earth, his 1996 album Look Up included a contribution from PATTI SMITH that was her first time on record in over a decade, and he toured with WARREN ZEVON and others.

In the 2000s he has co-produced Down from the Mountain, the D.A. Pennebaker film about the musicians who contributed to the hit movie O Brother Where Art Thou?, and performed Bascom Lamar Lunsford's trademark song 'I Wish I Was a Mole in the Ground' at the 'HARRY SMITH Concerts' in New York and London in 2004.

Yet whatever else he does, Bob Neuwirth will always be Robin to Dylan's Batman (or to put it another way, always batman to Bob). He is therefore also an interviewee in Scorsese's No Direction Home; by the time of this filming he had grown quieter, desiccated and slightly camp; but he remained articulate and gave illuminating testimony, as for instance when recalling that on the Village scene in the early 1960s, a key question always asked about any performer, even a musician who never used words, was 'Does he have anything to say?' In Dylan's case, of course, the answer had been an emphatic 'Yes'. In Neuwirth's case, it had probably been 'Neu'.

[Bob Neuwirth: Bob Neuwirth, Asylum 7E-1008, US, 1974; Back to the Front, Gold Castle 171015, 1988; 99 Monkeys, Gold Castle 71347, 1990; Look Up, Watermelon 1050, 1996. Bob Neuwirth & John Cale: Last Day on Earth, MCA 11307, 1994. Bob Dylan's Neuwirth portrait in Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp. 47–8. Edie Sedgwick quote on Neuwirth: Jean Stein, Edie: An American Biography, ed. George Plimpton, New York: Knopf, 1982, p.315. David Faciane, e-mail posting seen online 30 Nov 2005 at www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/n/neuwirthbobby.html.]

Neville, Aaron [1941 -] Aaron Neville was born in New Orleans on January 24, 1941 and grew up in the city to become one of the Neville Brothers, a soul singing group formed with siblings Art (a founder of the Meters, and a keyboards player), Charles (sometime saxophonist for B.B. King) and Cyril (percussionist on Dylan's Oh Mercy album and operator of the 'talking drum' on the outtake 'Series of Dreams', released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991).

The Neville Brothers' albums began to be released in the 1970s but they were most successful with Yellow Moon, in 1989, for which Aaron Neville wrote the title song. He has also recorded in a range of styles on 12 solo albums, though whether he is singing gospel, country, rock or blues he always throws over everything the same unmistakeable shimmering vibrato, which divides people sharply into those who consider it exquisite, delicate and beautiful and those who hear it as repulsively exaggerated and able only to besmirch every song it smothers.

Bob Dylan attended the 1988 session for the Yellow Moon album, produced by DANIEL LANOIS, at which Aaron Neville sang a version of 'With God on Our Side' that included his own extra, 'updating' verse: 'In the 1960s came the Vietnam War: / Can somebody tell me / What we were fightin' for? / Too many young men died, / Too many young mothers cried; / So I ask the question, / Was God on our side?'

Though he had never himself written anything so bald about the Vietnam War (indeed had only mentioned it twice in songs, and then only in the obscure 'Legionnaire's Disease' and 'Band of the Hand'), Dylan in turn promptly 'covered' the Aaron Neville version at a run of October 1988 concerts, débuting it in Upper Darby, Pennsylvania, on October 13, repeating it at the same venue the following night and then giving it the greater prominence of performances at all four consecutive nights' concerts at New York's Radio City Music Hall on October 16 to 19. After including it in his six-song set at the Bridge Benefit concert in Oakland that December 4, he dropped it again, and when he next revived the song, six years later for MTV Unplugged™, he had abandoned the Aaron Neville augmentation.

(Once, many years earlier, Dylan had given a one-off performance of 'With God on Our Side'—at the afternoon concert at Providence, Rhode Island, November 4, 1975, near the start of the first Rolling Thunder Revue—at which he'd added a last verse of his own, and actually it offered another mention of Vietnam: 'I've learned to hate Russia and China and Korea and Vietnam and Bulgaria and Poland and South America and Cuba, all of my whole life.' That 'Bulgaria' name-check was nicely comic.)

Neville has since contributed to two Various Artists albums with a Dylan connection: The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers—A Tribute (1997), on which he sings 'Why Should I Be Lonely?' comparatively robustly, and Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan (2003), on which, depending on the viewpoint, he sings 'Saving Grace' in his more usual sensitive style, or palpitates over it like an agitated hover-fly.

[Aaron Neville: 'Why Should I Be Lonely?', nia, The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers—A Tribute, Egyptian/Columbia 485189 2, US, 1997. 'Saving Grace', Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan, Columbia/Legacy CK 89015 (US) / Columbia COL 511126 2 (UK), 2003. Neville Brothers: 'With God on Our Side', 1988, Yellow Moon, A&M, US, Mar 1989. Bob Dylan: 1st performance of 'With God on Our Side' after 1988: NY, 17 & 18 Nov 1994, released on MTV Unplugged™, Columbia CK 67000, US (Columbia 478374 2, Europe & UK) 1995; 'Legionnaire's Disease', nia; 'Band of the Hand (It's Hell Time Man!)', Sydney, 8–10 Feb 1986, MCA 52811 (12-inch MCA 23633), US, Apr 1986 & on soundtrack album Band of the Hand, MCA 6167, US, May 1986.]

New Lost City Ramblers, the A revivalist string band (in the musically, not the religiously, evangelical sense) the New Lost City Ramblers, formed in 1958, played old-time Appalachian music in New York City, swiftly gaining a high profile in Greenwich Village. The group is still a working unit, though more as a hobby for its members than as a full-time act. The original group comprised JOHN COHEN (guitar), TOM PALEY (banjo, guitar & autoharp) and MIKE SEEGER (fiddle & mandolin). Paley left in 1962, to be replaced by Tracy Schwarz. They faltered in later decades but in 1997 they re-formed, made the album There Ain't No Way Out and in 1998 held a 40th Anniversary concert.

Original guitarist John Cohen sums up the New Lost City Ramblers like this:

> 'We've pointed to down-home sounds and authentic performance styles. Although we never had a hit record, we've influenced the shape of folk music and affected the work of musicians like Bob Dylan and JERRY GARCIA. We introduced the notion that it was okay for city singers to play roots music in traditional styles. Other musicians have taken up our ideas. Now there are many old-time fiddle bands playing better than we do. Some are as good as the old-timers we learned from.'

ROBERT SHELTON notes that in reviving the pre-bluegrass music of the 1920s and 30s, 'this proselytizing work . . . helped the rural musicians to come to the fore, while the city trio slid to the back of the stage. This selfless form of activity is one of the little-known aspects of the folk revival that, in its strange irony, gave the whole interchange between city and country a glow of beauty, ethics and honour.'

In Chronicles Volume One Dylan says that he had heard records by the New Lost City Ramblers before he arrived in New York; they were part of why he held Folkways Records in esteem. He writes of 'the Ramblers':

> 'I took to them immediately. Everything about them appealed to me—their style, their singing, their sound. I liked the way they looked, the way they dressed'—this is hard to credit, seeing the besuited bank clerks cavorting with their instruments on the group's early LP covers—'and I especially liked their name. . . . All their songs vibrated with some dizzy, portentous truth. . . . At the time, I didn't know that they were replicating everything they did off of old 78 records, but what would it have mattered anyway? . . . For me, they had originality in spades, were men of mystery on all counts. I couldn't listen to them enough.'

[The New Lost City Ramblers: The Early Years 1958–1962, Smithsonian Folkways 40036, 1991, CD-reissued 1992; There Ain't No Way Out, Smithsonian Folkways 40098, 1997. John Cohen quote from his There Is No Eye: John Cohen Photographs, New York: powerHouse Books,

2001, p.15. Robert Shelton, 'Something Happened in America', in Dave Laing, Karl Dallas, Robin Denselow & Robert Shelton, The Electric Muse: The Story of Folk Into Rock, London: Methuen, 1975. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, p.238.]

New Morning* [1970] This 11th album came a bit hastily after the tenth, Self Portrait, and seemed at the time a capitulation to the huge Dylan audience's demand that he return to the milieu of Blonde on Blonde. Lines like 'The man standin' next to me / His head was explodin' / I was hopin' the pieces / Wouldn't fall on me' (from 'Day of the Locusts') seemed a bit written-to-order. And Dylan, despite all the changes he'd gone through, had never done that before.

There's much more going on here than this, though. Throughout the album there is a subtle but sustained falsification of the rural/patriarchal ideas suggested here (and on Nashville Skyline): a persistent kind of Midas touch that deliberately makes the picture here an idealised and therefore not a real one.

It shows in his going not to 'the hills' at the end of 'Day of the Locusts' but to the American hills most artificialised by Tin Pan Alley, 'the black hills of Dakota'. It suggests Dylan rushing off to Doris Day; it makes his escape to the hills just a story, by making it just a joke—mere fictional allusion. (Dylan mentions Doris Day twice in Tarantula.)

Dylan's allusion is defter than that, though, for the Black Hills of (South) Dakota are 'Indian country' (as Doris sings): in fact the state's best-known 'great men' include Crazy Horse and Sitting Bull and its major towns include Sioux Falls. Thus Dylan might be said, as so often on this album, to be invoking a two-headed image, both unreal and real: the latter a terrain associated with an ancient American culture—and one offering a starkly different milieu and set of values from those of the honourary-degree ceremony at Princeton from which Dylan is escaping at the end of 'Day of the Locusts'. In 2004, Chronicles Volume One implied that there had been an extra level of allusion at work here too: he refers to the importance, in the Minnesota of his childhood, of the Black Hills Passion Play of South Dakota, which 'always came to town during the Christmas season', and in which his own 'first performances' were seen; he also says that at around the time of the making of New Morning, the feeling of invincibility that he remembered from those performances 'seemed a million years ago . . . a million private struggles and difficulties ago.' To know which is to hear a more heartfelt yearning in the lines of 'Day of the Locusts' about wanting to head for those 'black hills of Dakota'.

Just as the next song, 'Time Passes Slowly', takes up the story in the hills, so also it takes up the unreality suggested earlier: 'Time passes slowly up here in the mountains / We sit beside bridges and walk beside fountains', warbles Dylan—and plainly, as he's testing whether we'll notice, there aren't any fountains up mountains. The very word suggests the ideal, not the real. It offers a kind of exquisite, ethereal, pastoral conceit: a sort of Greek mythology-land, an Elysium. Something not there.

In 'Winterlude' the unreal becomes dominant and explicit. The title itself implies that the album is all a show, like, in this sense, A Midsummer Night's Dream. The rhythm is waltz-time; the clichés focus on a dream-world of romance, denying any corresponding 'real life' romance—the kind that sparkles through the Dixie Cups' record 'Chapel of Love' ('. . . my little apple / Winterlude let's go down to the chapel'). And it's not only a waltz: it's a skating song. Dylan On Ice. This carries a further suggestion of the unreal: the ice-top as merely a precarious covering, a sheet hiding and transforming something else. We can see this urged unreality too in the song 'New Morning' itself, with its intentional things-aren't-what-they-seem touch of 'a country mile, or two', while 'The Man in Me' has as its theme the message keep-it-all-hid. Then there is, beyond the obvious theatrical mystique of the title 'Sign on the Window', a beautifully achieved confession that even the wife-and-children may merely be a possible formula to try out: 'Build me a cabin in Utah / Marry me a wife, catch rainbow trout / Have a bunch of kids who call me Pa . . .' To clinch it, this is followed not only by a patently unconfident remark (made less positive still by its being repeated, as if for self-persuasion): 'That must be what it's all about / That must be what it's all about' but then by the capping touch of genius—that intentionally ingenuous little 'Oh-oh-oh-oh!' which Dylan puts over the end of the riff that follows. As for 'Three Angels', it is a song of many facets, but what impresses straight away is its being not only surreal (a different kind of challenge to reality) but as echoing that pop classic of false religiosity, Wink Martindale's 'Deck of Cards'. The 'real world' in Dylan's song passes like a pageant below the gaze of the narrator and his rather ungainly angels. Dylan's making them ungainly—keeping them perched up on poles wearing 'green robes, with wings that stick out'—is another wry confession of his intent.

The cumulative effect of all this carefully established unreality is to make New Morning very different, in its vision, from any other Dylan album. It begins to express a new optimism-through-doubt. He may have little to say but he has the courage to know it: and to make, to pass his time, an intelligent critique of what he doesn't believe in any more. New Morning says for his country persona what 'My Back Pages' said about his protest persona. And in fact there is a great deal of interesting comment from Dylan himself, in Chronicles Volume One, about the making of this album, and about the ways in which it was shaped by the keenness of ARCHIBALD MacLEISH to have Dylan write some songs for a play of his (the title 'Father of Night', for instance, Dylan says was suggested by MacLeish); but primarily Dylan's straightforward comments explain why he couldn't, in the end, collaborate with MacLeish—and much of the reason for being unable to do so was because, as Dylan is careful to describe, he felt that he had so little to say, and no sense of any burning urgency about new songs.

In retrospect, then, New Morning is a very individual album, a brave attempt to fuse the old surreal richness of feeling of the Blonde on Blonde era with a new desire to test the striving for stability through rural-based concerns. This is all felt by Dylan in a hesitant, pessimistic, confidence-lost way, which comes out too in the strange hesitancy with which the album attempts its musical fusion of a sort of grown-up acid-rock with both country picking and gospel.

We must have come a long way downhill since the album, when new, could sound over-produced and too professional. Now it sounds almost recorded round the camp-fire in the woods, with smokey acoustic playing, ample space and a sense of music played from love, with much individual extemporising towards a collective whole, and with Dylan's lovely untutored gospel piano as if miked up from inside some nearby clapboard church. There is a considerable gospel feel throughout the album, created not only by Dylan's own terrific piano-work but by the use of an old-church-type 'girl' chorus, topped off with the is-it-or-isn't-it-Christian? closing song 'Father of Night'.

This is a quirky album, from a Dylan not pointing a way for anyone, but from a great artist remaining at his work knowingly in the face of not being creatively on top form in the phenomenal way he had been in the period 1964–68. Warm and abiding, it sounds better and better as the years go by.

[Recorded NY, 3–5 Jun & 12 Aug 1970; released as stereo LP, Columbia KC 30290 (US) and CBS S 69001 (UK), 21 Oct 1970. Comments in Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.105–41.

Doris Day: 'The Black Hills of Dakota', Hollywood, 16 Jul 1953, Columbia 40095, NY (Philips PB 287, London), 1954. This was a top 10 hit in Britain. The song, by Paul Francis Webster & Sammy Fain, comes from the soundtrack of the film Calamity Jane, Warner Brothers, US, directed David Butler, 1953. The soundtrack album (10-inch LP) is Calamity Jane, Columbia CL6273, NY, 1953.

The Dixie Cups: 'Chapel of Love', NY, nia, the first release on the George Goldner-Jerry Leiber-Mike Stoller label Red Bird (Red Bird 10 001), NY (Pye International 7N 25245, London), 1964. It was a US no.1. The Dixie Cups were a New Orleans act. Wink Martindale: 'Deck of Cards', nia, Dot 15968, Hollywood (London American HLD 8962, London), 1959. In the UK this was a recurrent hit: first charting in December 1959 (top 20), re-charting in 1963 (top 5) and, reissued on Dot Records DOT 109, re-charting again in 1973 (top 30). This last time around, even more of the UK public bought the cover version by Max Bygraves (Pye Records 7N 45276). It was on Wink Martindale's local TV show on WHBQ in the early months of 1957 that Elvis Presley first saw 19-year-old beauty-contest winner Anita Wood (he was watching the show, she was appearing on it), who would become his principal girlfriend 1957–60. While Presley was in the army, Wood recorded 'I'll Wait Forever' (Memphis, 28 Dec 1960, Sun 361, Memphis, 1961).]

New World Singers, the See Traum, Happy and Turner, Gil.

Newport Folk Festival, the It's easy to assume that by the time Dylan débuted at the Newport Folk Festival in 1963, it was a venerable institution. But the first Newport Folk Festival had been in 1959 (JOAN BAEZ, already a folk star, had appeared); and after the 1960 event, no festival took place in 1961 or 1962, so that the extraordinary coming-together in July 1963 was only the third such event. The founders of the festival, in 1959, were George Wein (of the already established annual Newport Jazz Festival) and his partner, one ALBERT GROSSMAN.

In retrospect the real significance of the 1959 and 1960 festivals was probably the inclusion of a number of bluegrass artists, which brought this music right to the centre of the folk revival movement. RALPH RINZLER's placing of Bill Monroe on the 1960 festival bill turned his career around, restoring him to some of the recognition he richly merited and reflecting credit on the festival for its full-on inclusion of bluegrass.

Wein restarted the festival in 1963, forming a committee to organise the event, which took place over the three days of July 26–28. The committee comprised THEODORE BIKEL, Bill Clifton, Clarence Cooper, Erik Darling, Jean Ritchie, PETE SEEGER and Pete Yarrow of PETER, PAUL & MARY. Yarrow, particularly, pushed the policy that 'the young singer-songwriters were really important', insisting that the Festival board recognise these people as well as the traditional singers. Hence the festival, at Freebody Park, included Tom Paxton, IAN & SYLVIA, PHIL OCHS, PETE LaFARGE as well as the big names (Peter, Paul & Mary and Joan Baez), older mainstream folk acts like Seeger and RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT, gospel-oriented acts like the FREEDOM SINGERS, 'folk blues' performers like MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT and ODETTA and the truly 'traditional' white performers no-one had ever heard of. Arriving within this mix as one of the 1963 newcomers, Bob Dylan left as its star. The final evening ended with Baez, Peter, Paul & Mary and the Freedom Singers singing behind him on 'Blowin' in the Wind' and an ensemble 'We Shall Overcome'. A month later came the March on Washington. Everything seemed transcendent with hope, warmed by communal consensus and the politics of change.

By the time of the 1964 festival, John F. Kennedy had been assassinated and Bob Dylan had begun to 'defect' from the commune, from his rôle as the figurehead for the singer-songwriter New Left and the politics of protest. (As he would sing, looking back on it all a decade later, on the Planet Waves album's 'Wedding Song': 'It's never been my duty to remake the world at large / Nor is it my intention to sound the battle charge.') More generally, the 1964 Festival 'overreached' itself: too many performers, too many different genres: in Theodore Bikel's words, 'giving both the individual performer and listener too little chance for expression or absorption.' PAUL NELSON wrote tetchily that it had left him 'unmoved to the point of paralysis. Under the misguided conception that a couple of regiments of folk singers were preferable to a hand-picked two or three squads, the Newport Committee enlisted what looked to be every folk singer, or reasonable facsimile, on the North American continent, and proceeded to attempt to have them all perform in the space of a single weekend. Even God himself needed six days. Further, Newport proved to be less of a folk festival than a spectacular three-ring morality play of cult worship. The scores of traditional artists remained virtually unnoticed in the back pew, while the hungry throng of worshippers craved a blood sacrifice to mount on a pedestal, another golden saint to add to their socio-religious trilogy of Pete Seeger, Bob Dylan and Joan Baez. I find it far easier to believe in God than in the mythical heroes of Newport and the aspiring Christs who, in cowboy hats and motorcycle boots, pierce their sides and cry "I am the Way!" to the cheers and hoopla of the fraternity folklorists and record-company desperadoes.'

This was hardly the whole story. To look back now at the Newport 1964 performers' list is to realise what a golden age it managed to capture. If you had wanted to concentrate on the blues alone, and been a bit quieter about your grievances than Paul Nelson, you could have sat at the feet of SLEEPY JOHN ESTES, Mississippi Fred McDowell, Robert Pete Williams, Hammy Nixon and Yank Rachell, ELIZABETH COTTEN, SKIP JAMES, JESSE FULLER, Mississippi John Hurt and more besides. The Festival Board supported other, smaller festivals too, at which traditional performers continued to be able to play to their own local crowds.

By 1965, everything was in restless flux. The Festival Board of Directors was now Bikel, Ronnie Gilbert, ALAN LOMAX, Ralph Rinzler, Pete Seeger, MIKE SEEGER and Pete Yarrow. Mike Seeger, ignoring Paul Nelson, was arguing that 'there is fortunately room for as many different types of festivals as there are songs and styles.' Newport, he felt, 'being the largest and relatively free from the usual commercial pressures, can not only explore the many isolated and individualistic areas of folk song but also the elements of the three principal streams of folk song', which he designated as 'mountain or country music, from Eck Robertson and Horton Barker to Bill Monroe and Roger Miller; Negro tradition from Joe Petterson, the Moving Star Hall Singers, and MANCE LIPSCOMB to CHUCK BERRY; urban singers and composers of folk and folk-based songs, from THE NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS and the KWESKIN Jug Band to Bob Dylan and Joan Baez.'

Excitement, anticipation of big change, of the vanquishing of the Old Guard New Left (Pete Seeger, Alan Lomax, A.L. Lloyd), was tangible all through the crowd at the 1965 event, which was now spread over four days, July 22–25. Dylan wasn't the only person to play electric music at this event, but his playing it proved the incendiary moment. Accounts have been extremely various as to how key people behaved—among them Pete Seeger, who did try to cut the power during Dylan's set, albeit not actually with his axe, and Alan Lomax, who got into a physical fight with Albert Grossman for the contemptuous way he introduced the PAUL BUTTERFIELD blues band (though no-one can agree on what he actually said)—and equally about how the crowd reacted to Dylan's 'going electric' and how Dylan reacted in response.

There is, though, a certain plausibility to what ERIC VON SCHMIDT told ANTHONY SCADUTO; what he felt he witnessed was that 'whoever was controlling the mikes messed it up. You couldn't hear Dylan. It looked like he was singing with the volume off. . . . the whole thing [was] sounding like a Butterfield boogie and no Dylan. We were sitting in the press section, maybe thirty yards back, and yelling "Can't hear ya!" and "Cut the band down!" Only about four or five people were hollering. Then they went into the next song. . . . same thing, no voice coming through at all. . . . more people began shouting.'

By this analysis, people weren't anti-electric. As on the tour with THE HAWKS that followed, a lot of people were just anti bad sound. It's ironic, then, that there is no better single account of this most eventful weekend than that of the culprit sound engineer himself, insider Joe Boyd, the man who had already introduced MIKE BLOOMFIELD to the Paul Butterfield Blues Band and was later to be the manager and producer of the Incredible String Band and producer of the first Pink Floyd record, of Fairport Convention, of the first Kate & Anna McGarrigle album and of MARIA MULDAUR's Midnight at the Oasis, among other achievements. Joe Boyd's account is given in an interview by Jonathan Morley for The Telegraph in 1988, and republished in that fanzine's second anthology of pieces, Wanted Man: In Search of Bob Dylan. There may be an interesting revising of his account in the first volume of his autobiography, White Bicycles: Making Music in the 1960s, to be published in 2006.

In the end, though, whichever account or accounts you believe, the upshot of Dylan at Newport 1965 was a timely controversy that did his career nothing but good. As Scaduto summed it up, 'Although he may have lost a few folk fans, the publicity helped him gain an even wider audience among the young disaffected. His album began to sell at a quickened pace, and "Rolling Stone" shot up the charts.' It's a simplistic summary but fits the broad pattern of what people think happened, which is just as important as the minutiae of what actually did.

The institution of the Festival rolled on after 1965, though it folded again after the 1969 event and was only revived in 1985. The official recordings from Newport itself continued to flow from Vanguard Records. Dylan himself revisited the event in 2002.

[Bob Dylan: 'Talkin' World War III Blues', 'With God on Our Side', 'Only a Pawn in Their Game', 'Talkin' John Birch Paranoid Blues', 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', Newport, RI, 26 Jul 1963, unreleased; 'Blowin' in the Wind' (with Peter, Paul & Mary and the Freedom Singers), Newport, 26 Jul 1963, Evening Concerts at Newport, Vanguard VRS9148, NY, 1964; 'North Country Blues' & 'With God on Our Side' (latter with Joan Baez), 27 Jul 1963, unreleased; 'Who Killed Davey Moore?', 'Masters of War', 28 Jul 1963, unreleased; 'Playboys & Playgirls' (with Pete Seeger) & 'With God on Our Side' (with Joan Baez), 28 Jul 1963, Newport Broadside, Vanguard VRS9144, NY, 1964. 'It Ain't Me Babe', 'Mr. Tambourine Man', Newport, 24 Jul 1964, unreleased; 'It Ain't Me Babe' (with Joan Baez), 24 Jul 1964, Joan Baez Live at Newport, Vanguard VAN0077015-2, NY, 1998; 'All I Really Want to Do', 'To Ramona', 'Mr. Tambourine Man', 26 Jul 1964, unreleased; 'Chimes of Freedom', 25 Jul 1964, Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, Sony BMG Columbia Legacy 5203582001, NY, 2005. 'All I Really Want to Do', 'Mr. Tambourine Man', Newport, 24 Jul 1965, unreleased; 'Maggie's Farm', 25 Jul 1965, Bootleg Series Vol. 7, op.cit.; 'Like a Rolling Stone', 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' & 'Mr. Tambourine Man', 25 Jul 1965, unreleased; 19-song performance, Newport, 3 Aug 2002, unreleased. Some footage from various Newport 1964–65 Dylan song performances is included in the Murray Lerner film Festival, US, 1967, and further Lerner footage is included in the Martin Scorsese film No Direction Home, US, 2005.

General information sources include William Ruhlman's account excerpted on www.peterpaulmary.com and, for Bikel and Paul Nelson quotes, the 1965 Festival Program, ed. Ralph Rinzler & Robert Shelton (as Stacey Williams). Eric Von Schmidt & Anthony Scaduto in Scaduto, Bob Dylan, London: Abacus edn., p.215. Jonathan Morley, 'The Wanted Man Interview: Joe Boyd', Telegraph no.31, UK, winter 1988 & John Bauldie, ed., Wanted Man: In Search of Bob Dylan, London: Black Spring, 1990. Joe Boyd, White Bicycles: Making Music in the 1960s, London: Serpent's Tail, 2006.]

Nicholson, Jack [1937 -] John Joseph Nicholson was born in Neptune, New Jersey, on April 22, 1937, grew up thinking his mother was his sister, attended Manasquan High School, NJ—and turned up at his class' 50th reunion event in 2004—and worked as a gopher in MGM's cartoon department before getting his start in movies with Roger Corman. It was Easy Rider in 1969 that made him, and it was he who made Easy Rider, rescuing this smudged counter-cultural movie with the fresh air and bite of his performance as the dodgy lawyer. It was obvious in a trice that here was one of the full-on irresistible charmers of the age, a fine actor licenced to settle for hamming it up as much as he liked, as a boyish Hollywood life of pranks, womanising and mega-million dollar success inevitably fell into his lap.

By the late 1970s, an established star, he was unusual in Hollywood in making public avowals of his unbounded admiration for Bob Dylan, and in 1978 was to be seen backstage on Dylan's World Tour, at least in London that June, wearing the most benign version possible of his patented playful-devil grin, happy simply to be in the presence of what he had no doubt at all was Dylan's genius. In July 1985, it was Nicholson who stepped out in front of the huge live Philadelphia crowd and a worldwide TV audience of 1,500 million people to introduce Dylan at LIVE AID with bad grammar, suspect logic and absolutely dewy-eyed anticipation and respect. He said, to rising cheers: 'Some artists' work speaks for itself; some artists' work speaks for his generation. It's my deep personal pleasure to present to you one of America's great voices of freedom. It can only be one man! The transcendent Bob Dylan!' The transcendent Bob Dylan immediately stepped forward to fall spectacularly from grace.

Undeterred, six years on, it was Nicholson who, a little more nervously but with no diminution of willingness for the job, introduced Dylan on another reasonably large occasion, that of offering him a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award at Radio City Music Hall, New York, on February 20, 1991, again broadcast live on international TV. Having reportedly spent two of the previous three days in Dylan's company, possibly having a drink or two, Nicholson now took a deep breath and began:

'For the constant state of restlessness that has enabled you to seek newer and better means of expressing the human condition with words and music; for living your creative life fearlessly and without apology, and leading the way no matter how the times change—the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences joins a worldwide network of grateful fans in presenting you this Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award. Congratulations!' Then, steeled for anything, Nicholson had to stand there and witness Dylan's extraordinary out-on-the-edge response: a madly inspired acceptance 'speech' that was absolutely classic Dylan, pushing to the farthest limits of the occasion, starting out perilously enough, only to crank up the ante by making people sweat over an astonishingly long mid-speech tour de force of a pause: forcing the TV people, and Nicholson too, to wonder whether some awful puncturing of the whole ceremonial game wasn't happening or about to happen. And after the pause, what a route out: what a choice of topic, what a dark vibe Dylan reached for to end his deranged moment in the glittering lights. From start to finish, it went like this:

> 'Thank you. Well, um—alright. Yeah. Well my daddy he didn't leave me too much, you know: he was a very simple man and he didn't leave me a lot. But what he told me was this. He did say, "Son—" [long, long pause]—oh well he said so many things, you know?! [short pause] He said, "You know, it's possible to become so defiled in this world that your own mother and father will abandon you. And if that happens, God will always believe in your own ability to mend your own ways." Thank you.'

On March 3, 1994, Dylan was in the audience at the Beverly Hilton Hotel in LA to see Jack Nicholson given his own Lifetime Achievement Award for acting. Despite the undimmed incorrigibility of the recipient, it was not such a high-wire occasion.

1964 car ride through America, the By the beginning of 1964, Dylan was sufficiently famous that he needed his own 'staff', or 'protection': a road manager. He appointed Victor Maymudes (it has often been spelt Maimudes), a tall, beaky-nosed, saturnine, chess-playing ex-actor from LA, the son of Left-Wing activists and a man who, with Herb Cohen, FRANK ZAPPA's future manager, had opened LA's first coffee-house, the Unicorn on Sunset Boulevard, back in 1955. ROBERT SHELTON described him as having 'penetrating dark eyes, turbulent hair, and . . . an uncanny ability to keep his mouth shut.'

Opening it to HOWARD SOUNES more than 30 years down the line, Maymudes declared, in Sounes' summary, 'that Bob was not a very nice man at all, but a sociopath who, in his songs, became ten times the man he was in real life.' Dylan may have met first him in 1962 through mutual acquaintance RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT. In 1964 he was happy to take on the rôle of Dylan's batman: companion, chauffeur, bodyguard, bag-carrier.

With Maymudes to rely on, Dylan decided on an epic journey across America; a scheme impossible not to think of in terms of KEROUAC and On the Road. Along with Dylan and Maymudes came two companions paid for through one of Dylan's businesses created and part-owned by ALBERT GROSSMAN. One was folksinger PAUL CLAYTON, already fragile and burdened, reportedly, by being at least half in love with Dylan at the time, who brought with him a suitcase full of amphetamines and other drugs (well somebody had to . . .). The fourth member of the party was an old friend of SUZE ROTOLO and her family, Pete Karman, theoretically Suze's 'protection', somehow supposed to prevent Dylan's womanising in general and connecting up with JOAN BAEZ in particular. Karman, who had knocked around a bit despite his youth (he was a year older than Dylan but had been to Cuba and been a newspaper reporter) went along for the ride, literally, 'not as a spy but as a chaperone.' Dylan told Shelton later: 'We had to kick Pete out and send him home on a plane.'

Two days after Dylan filmed his TV performance on the CBC show 'Quest' in Toronto, he was back in upstate New York and they set out from Grossman's, in Bob's blue Ford station wagon, on February 3rd—though not till dusk—aiming to drive all the way west to California in time for his Berkeley concert, fixed for the 22nd. Mostly Maymudes drove, and Dylan wrote songs, sometimes with a portable typewriter on his knees but more often in a notepad. These conditions suited both equally. Maymudes is said to have appreciated above all things music, a well-turned phrase and a good joint; Dylan, in turn, appreciated Maymudes' dependability and silence. The trip yielded, among other things, 'Chimes of Freedom' and the first part of 'Mr. Tambourine Man'.

Their route was more direct existentially than geographically. They stopped the first night in Charlottesville, Virginia, where Clayton had been a student and still owned an old cabin out in the woods, picking up two dozen copies of The Times They Are a-Changin', which had been released only on January 13th, so that Dylan could hand them out to the deserving en route, as to the hitchhiker they picked up next day on the way to Harlan County, Kentucky, where they wanted to visit striking miners—representatives, for Dylan, of the world of several of his musical heroes: Frank Hutchison and Roscoe Holcomb among them—and bring them some clothes and blankets collected by union supporters and activists in New York. Pineville, Kentucky; a motel. Then Asheville, North Carolina, their first step into the segregated south and, as Shelton noted, 'birthplace of novelist Thomas Wolfe, who wrote You Can't Go Home Again' (though in truth that powerfully epigrammatic title was posthumously given). From there they drove on to Hendersonville, to seek a still-living literary figure, CARL SANDBURG. (See separate entry for their encounter.)

When they left the Sandburgs' pig farm, they crossed into South Carolina, then Athens, Georgia (one of the regular haunts of BLIND WILLIE McTELL), home of the venerable University of Georgia, where on the streets Dylan was widely recognised by students. Next day, Atlanta, where Dylan gave a concert at Emory University; the day after, still in Atlanta, he met the civil rights activists Cordell Reagon and 21-year-old Bernice Johnson (soon to be BERNICE JOHNSON REAGON). On from there, south and west into Mississippi, a land of green valleys, gentle hills and lakes and a panorama of segregation signage—WHITES ONLY, COLOREDS . . .

Shelton says they'd half promised 'to join SNICK [the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee] at Tougaloo College', but New Orleans and the Mardi Gras beckoned. They headed for the birthplace of jazz after a night in Meridian, Mississippi, birthplace of JIMMIE RODGERS—and the place where H.C. Speir, the pre-war Sam Phillips, brought CHARLEY PATTON after springing him from Belzoni Jail, to catch the train to New York so that Patton, 'the leadingest musicianer in Mississippi,' could record. Dylan & co. had no rooms booked in Mardi Gras-filled New Orleans, so all four shared one. They were woken by an ex-New York stripper who'd bumped into Pete Karman and been promised some grass; she showed up at three AM not knowing who his companions were. They were not pleased, but from next morning onwards, New Orleans was the delight and the festival of heightened sensations and serendipitous chaos it was supposed to be. Robert Shelton's biography describes it well, and in detail.

Moving on, they made a brief stop back at Tougaloo, and then had to drive west fast to get to Denver for another of Dylan's concerts scheduled beforehand. They went via Dallas, where President John F. Kennedy had been shot only three months earlier. Anxious but curious, they retraced Kennedy's route past the Book Depository.

They just made Denver for the concert. Pete Karman tutted that the whole jaunt was hopelessly disorganised, but the promoter was pleased with how it all went. Dylan wanted to look up JUDY COLLINS, but she was away, and his old Central City haunt, the Gilded Garter, but it was closed for the winter. Next day, as they left Denver, the car sustained its own BEATLES invasion, as the group's new hit 'I Want to Hold Your Hand' came on the radio. The group was in the States; they had been on 'The Ed Sullivan Show' and creating showbiz havoc while Bob and his old-style wannabohemians were driving cross-country.

Onward the compadres pressed, over the Rockies in a snowstorm; a night in Grand Junction, Colorado; a hairy moment when stopped by the police for speeding past a funeral: a delay but a lucky escape from a drugs bust; an all-night drive afterwards, through to Reno. On from there across the Sierra Madres into California and San Francisco.

It was over. For Dylan, maybe a last fling of youthful freedom was over with it. Artistically, as personally, it had been a memorable episode. En route, Dylan had undergone an epiphany of sorts, hearing the Beatles' boisterous rejuvenation of pop. He'd been struck at once by their freshness, their potency, their ability to resuscitate something close to the music that had been his first love, rock'n'roll. Yet while LENNON-McCARTNEY had been writing 'I Want to Hold Your Hand', a happy display of their ability with flyaway chords and harmonies, set to laughably shallow and simplistic words, Bob Dylan had been travelling across America several light-years ahead of them, writing 'Mr. Tambourine Man'.

Afterword: Victor Maymudes died, aged 65, in UCLA Hospital, Santa Monica, on January 26, 2001. From 1986 to 1996 he had returned to working as Dylan's personal manager but then, bitterly estranged from him, he retired to travel and write his memoirs. The result, The Joker and the Thief, was supposed to be published by St. Martins Press in 2002. It has never emerged.

[Maymudes data partly from www.sierrabravo.co.uk/victor/, online 10 Feb 2006; Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, ms pp.182–85. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., pp.240–49. Detail on Meridian: Michael Gray, 'Ghost Trains of Mississippi', unhappily renamed 'Rail Good Lesson in the Blues' by the Weekend Telegraph, London, 25 Sep 2004.]

1965 electric concerts, the A month and three days after re-launching himself with electric guitar at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL on July 25, 1965, Dylan began playing concerts with the same format that the British would find ourselves faced with in the golden maelstrom of May 1966—concerts at which he would play an acoustic first half and then after an intermission would bring out a bunch of unidentified musicians and blast through a second half that was the loudest experience his audiences had ever had.

What a curious itinerary these 1965 US concerts seem to have had, and how strange that the first ones were in places that presented particularly difficult acoustics problems. The first one was at America's most famous tennis stadium, a vast open-air venue adapted to accommodate a 15,000-seater concert. There was a five-night gap before he played again. The venue was another extremely famous, large out-door arena, the Hollywood Bowl, on September 3rd. Then—unless there are many undocumented (and unrecorded) extra ones, ones that have left no trace—there was a gap of a further three weeks before Dylan played two consecutive nights in Texas (at Austin and Dallas, on the 24th and 25th). Then there was another five-night space and then, only then, at the beginning of October, did something that looks like a tour itinerary kick in.

Even this was patterned strangely: two dates, six free nights, a third date, another five-night break, three more dates, a four-night break, three dates, a three-night gap, one date, one night off, one more date, five more nights off . . . and so on. The tour sprawled from October 1st to December 19th.

In all that time Dylan only once played more than three nights running, and appears to have given a total of 27 concerts over 80 days. In the literal sense, at the very least, it was certainly spaced out.

Not that he wasn't busy—he got married, recorded, did the original Nat Hentoff Playboy interview, the wonderful San Francisco and LA press conferences and more besides in this period—but as a Dylan tour itinerary goes, it's a curiously leisurely creature, especially since it was the focus of such fundamental controversy over his 'going electric': it was an oddly uncompressed start to this electric touring.

At any rate, these earliest electric concerts are not only a crucial part of the Dylan story but, because we have so little taped evidence of them, also deeply mysterious. The shows were necessarily experimental, with Dylan himself very new to fronting a professional rock band (or beat group, as we called them then), but beyond that, and over and above the way that everything Bob Dylan did in the mid-1960s was just absolutely it, there's the fact that these shows lie along the road that leads to Britain, May 1966, at which point the music being hurled out at us by Bob and his musicians, though still experimental in being a radical journey through an unknown universe, was nevertheless fully formed, was at its transcendent peak, was utterly and exactly what Bob Dylan wanted it to be. It's because what we got on that British tour is so immortally magnificent that we peer back so intently at the concerts that came before it. They may be invaluable in their own right, but they're the more so because they helped him achieve the impossible: helped him leap his dream of the music out into the world.

Until 1998, there was little on tape from these 1965 concerts to go on: an audience tape of the historic first show, Forest Hills, August 28th, but in very poor quality; bits of two or three others; another audience audiomurk through Berkeley, December 4th (almost unlistenable); and then a couple of lo-fi tapes of shows from February '66. Then, after a gap of almost 33 years, in the strange way that these things continue to happen, a pretty good quality tape came into circulation from the second electric concert ever, Hollywood Bowl, September 3, 1965. This clips off the beginning of the first electric number—an unfortunate moment to miss—but gives us the whole of the rest of the concert, acoustic and electric, and, in some ways just as importantly, the uninterrupted noises from the crowd at the end of each song.

The acoustic half starts with a 'She Belongs to Me' that has him singing wearily 'for Hallowe'en get her a trumpet', yet the harmonica flutters around proto-'66ishly but like a trapped butterfly. Then we get a mostly impatient 'To Ramona' and then a 'Gates of Eden' sung oddly straight, with such a plodding strummed guitar and nothing but a full-stop on the harp at the end. Yet this initial apparent boredom (see Dylan being 'bored' by his acoustic material 1965–66, the myth of) proves a fleeting mood, and it comes and goes, just like in concerts all through his career. Between the first two numbers somebody in the audience toots on what does sound like a trumpet, and Dylan, open and friendly and ready for anything, for any kind of spontaneous dialogue, asks 'What is that thing out there, man? What are you trying to say?!'—and in the middle of 'To Ramona' he finds himself again, beguiling himself anew with the song, or recalling its original range of feelings.

After 'Gates of Eden' there's no looking back. On comes 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' with every harmonica phrase intense, fresh and exquisite—and totally focussed: a solo any jazz musician would understand—even while he sounds oddly gauche as a vocalist. The furry quality so redolent of 1966 and Blonde on Blonde—a quality already present a couple of months later when he records 'Freeze Out' in New York in November—is completely missing here, and the voice sounds more Bringing It All Back Home than anything. Then someone shouts something and Dylan says 'I'm sorry, I can't hear you,' and then, 'This is called "Desolation Row"' and sings this very new, long song. He sings it so fast that it's well under ten minutes, and the audience laughs aloud at the jokey bits, and though the harmonica just replicates the recording (made just a month earlier and released four days before the show) and the guitar part here is just a rough strum, the vocal is light, fluid and warm, and he's warmed up transformingly by this point.

We're used to the song now, of course, but at the time, only two years on from 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', it was a modern poetry performance, very Left Bank, yet full of a unique Dylan frisson, the mind-blowing, mind-expanding world he introduced us to in 1965. Here it is, audibly arriving. And sure enough, the audience, which sounds to have a predominance of females in it, because this is the Dylan-the-pop-star period too, responds. At the end of the song two or three of them, obviously having resolved to do so, shout out in unison 'It's *so groo*vy!!', and it is, and this moment recaptures touchingly the feel of that period at its pure and well-intentioned beginning; and Dylan laughs a 'yeah' that's half question, half concurrence.

'Love Minus Zero' is so generously tender, and with such a great Buddy Hollyish riff on the guitar, that it tops 'Desolation Row'. The voice is so utterly commanding, and so utterly without swagger or bluff: he's always on the microphone, there's never any danger of a fluffed word or a cheap trick. And then comes 'Mr. Tambourine Man', with another strange combining of the unmistakeably 1965 vocal quality—including 1965's rapturous vigour, as if he's running along that beach with his arms windmilling—and a harmonica solo that, while a long way short of, say, the wondrous Dublin '66 one that echoes as in a cathedral, is, all the same, heading that 1966 way, all spacey and dreamy and pioneering and great.

Then it's the electric half. No wonder this is different from the British dates seven months later. Only one of Dylan's musicians is the same, ROBBIE ROBERTSON. 'Tombstone Blues' comes on with such a great riff, so perky, so 1965, and there are times when, as this tape happens to catch the mix at any rate, there's virtually just drums and voice. Then there's a great guitar solo—Robbie was perfect back then, before he grew post-BAND sulky and modish and funky—and Dylan comes back in after it in his trademark weird place, and it works. But it's ironic that here he is with his rockin' white pop/blues band and yet his own performance is shouted, not sung: it's a poetry recitation.

It's all more like the studio sound of 'From a Buick 6' than the whirlwind of 1966 in concert, and there's so much pop music still in there among the rock'n'roll—mostly, it must be said, courtesy of AL KOOPER, who doesn't seem to know quite what he's in amongst here. He keeps putting these tinkly, twinkly noises in everywhere, while the guitar bass and drums and Bob are taking a far heavier road—but the upshot is a reminder of the pretty melodic touch that Dylan was not averse to in this period: the touch that makes 'Positively 4th Street' such a hit record, for instance. It's here, in concert, on 'I Don't Believe You', which sounds so light, so lilting, so provisional on Bob's part, at least until he hits his long-drawn out lines like 'Am I still, dreaming ye——t!' At the end, after the applause, a bit of the crowd starts caterwauling, and this recurs, but not menacingly, never threatening to gain the momentum to derail it all.

Then it is 'From a Buick 6'—in which 'she walks like RIMBAUD' but Bob and the band still rock like BO DIDDLEY. He seems a big influence all through this part of the evening, with a tangible touch of the Sir Douglas Quintet thrown in, but a great guitar sound, great drumming, great bass. Howls of 'Get off!' at the end, and then they're into 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues', light-years away from Liverpool '66, all twinkles and tinkles and catchy riffs, yet growing as it progresses, gaining from that heavy drumming and the cutting guitar and the occasional sustained howl from Bob, all culminating in a magnificent instrumental break, like a great dark liner, prow bearing down upon you, majestic but threatening.

This is 1965 and Dylan and the group are reshaping it in front of our ears so that THE BEATLES never existed. You just have to hear it. You wouldn't swap it for 1966, but it's part of the story of how 1966 came into being.

1965–66: Dylan, pop & the UK charts Bob Dylan began 1966 at the soaring peak of his inestimable genius, leaping from crag to lofty crag at giddying, undreamt of heights of incandescent inspiration, shaking his curls above the clouds, hearing that wild mercury sound in a rarified wind. He was to become 25 that year—which seemed, at the time, rather old for anyone to keep on being the hippest person in the universe.

His newest album was Highway 61 Revisited, and his revolutionary hit single 'Like a Rolling Stone', the longest thing you'd ever heard on the radio, had been released in the summer of 1965. In Britain Bob had charted for the first time in March 1965, with 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', which was still climbing when 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' entered the charts a month later; both reached the top 10 while an immaculately cool, Carnaby Street Bob toured England with his giant lightbulb, dark glasses, Chelsea boots and acoustic guitar.

Two months after that, 'Maggie's Farm' arrived in the lower reaches of the chart, and on August 19 'Like a Rolling Stone', soon giving Dylan his first top 5 hit record in the UK. (It would be his only one, excepting 'Lay Lady Lay'.) At the end of October, the scathing lilt of 'Positively 4th Street' charted, soon becoming another top 10 hit. Within four weeks of New Year's Day 1966, Bob's next single, 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?', would join the hit parade too.

It was all go for Bob, the folk-singer who'd 'gone pop'. Except that it was obvious he hadn't. He was on his way somewhere else. Pop was all the others. THE BEATLES in 1965 were still moptops; their hit singles in Britain that year were 'I Feel Fine', 'Ticket to Ride', 'Help!' and 'Day Tripper' c/w 'We Can Work It Out': all no.1 smash hits and only just beginning to hint at something less vacuous than 'she loves you yeah yeah yeah' and 'I Want to Hold Your Hand'.

It took many people a while to get used to his voice, but once they could hear that within it lay such riches of expressive thought and feeling, such resources of intelligence, such clear-sighted, uncompromising purpose, they were hooked. He was crucial, the authentic contemporary heavyweight, an agent of the radical future, not as now a guardian of the past. He had cultural clout, not mere celebrity. He was also popular. You could play his albums without apology. (On the other hand he wasn't that popular: most of his records in circulation were still the pre-electric ones, you couldn't dance to him, and he was thought too doomy and intellectual for parties.)

Yet Dylan was becoming an ever-present, formative influence. From 1965 onwards, people's diaries and letters (people still wrote letters) began to alight more and more on moments and incidents for which a Dylan aphorism came as the natural bon mot—and they were all the more bon for their freshness. It was sparky then to throw off a line from 'Desolation Row' or 'To Ramona'. These records were almost new. Student newspapers too began to feature Dylanisms, sewn among their headlines and sub-heads.

Mostly, eager clusters of people just played the records. MARK KNOPFLER talks somewhere about listening to Blonde on Blonde over a million cups of coffee. That was exactly what people did. But it was like sitting round camp fires, waiting for smoke signals. There were no Bob Dylan networks then, nor any such concept, and things came through slowly. There was often a gap between when a record was released in America and in Britain, and often another gap between when it might be available in London and in the small provincial record-shops of the North. In most towns, you could only buy records at antiquated, infuriating hardware/electrical goods shops with a small record-section somewhere behind the vacuum-cleaners, refrigerators and lampshades; and the manager would be a tweed-jacketed, middle-aged man barely familiar with the name ELVIS PRESLEY, let alone Bob Dylan. The upshot was, for years, that if a record was in the top 10 they'd sold out of it and if it wasn't, they'd never heard of it. Under these conditions, news was a matter of leisurely-paced rumor rather than fanzined, hotlined, internetted instant dispersal.

Why didn't people go to all the 1966 British concerts? Because nobody did. Back then, nobody conceived of that level of fandom. You went to the one concert nearest your hometown, and you greeted this superlative genius, this pinnacle of 20th century art-in-action, with restrained applause from your seat.

Where Bob Dylan was going, nobody knew. Where the 1960s were going, nobody knew. It's as the original generation of rock'n'rollers always said decades later, it wasn't experienced as history-in-the-making at the time: at the time it was just how-things-are. But the feel of the period was upbeat: however fitfully or apparently randomly, we were escaping from 1950s drabness, its caution, predominant snobberies, poverty and grime. A boom economy meant that to be young then was to be allowed to be young: you no longer had to go down the mine, or work in that factory, or go to college solely to launch a sensible career along traditional lines. You could be fussy about which job you chose. You could go to university to postpone going to work. You could feel there was all the time in the world—unless they dropped The Bomb—before you condescended to write that great novel, or direct those films. The corollary was a freeing-up of the whole culture.

No Direction Home* [film, 2005] For this three and a half hour special (made for the American Masters PBS series, and first shown split into two parts on TV in the US and the UK), Dylan allowed MARTIN SCORSESE to draw from his and other people's priceless vaults of previously unseen, unheard material from the key years up to 1966: including, almost unbelievably, footage of the 'JUDAS!' moment from Manchester Free Trade Hall. Dylan also submitted, reportedly in 2000, to a ten-hour interview, given not to Scorsese himself but to Dylan's office manager and resident film producer JEFF ROSEN, as were the further interviews, excerpted in the film, with JOAN BAEZ, ALLEN GINSBERG, MARIA MULDAUR, SUZE ROTOLO, PETE SEEGER, DAVE VAN RONK and many others, all of which are interwoven with great imaginative skill with archive footage of telling contemporaneous events and quintessential items of popular culture from the years in which Robert Zimmerman grew up and became a series of Bob Dylans.

The film cost $4.5 million, of which Dylan took either $1m or $1.5m, and Scorsese took $1m, essentially for the use of his name. The BBC put in $500,000.

Scorsese's input to the film was very part-time; most of the real editing work was done by DAVID TEDESCHI—which is why his name is so prominent when the credits roll. On the other hand Scorsese has spoken thoughtfully in interviews about the challenges of the film: of how to make a narrative out of so many stories and so much material, about how to show footage of the civil rights struggle that people wouldn't already be inured to, and about how to set the scene, especially for younger viewers, as to what Greenwich Village, and the wider world it differed from, was all about.

There are, though, odd key misjudgments. The lack of attention paid to the impact of the blues on Dylan's formative years and on his own creative work is scandalous: we get less than ten seconds of HOWLIN' WOLF and of MUDDY WATERS, no mention of the impact of the pre-war blues greats who stood behind these men and no acknowledgement that a crucial part of what was going on in Dylan's Greenwich Village years was a blues revival as well as a (white) folk revival. Dylan himself has never underplayed this; Scorsese and Tedeschi obviously do. Which is odd, granted that they had worked together to produce a film about the blues for the PBS-TV series The Blues in 2003.

And though when the film first hits you, its enormous riches of Dylan concert footage leap out and thrill the viewer, as time passes it will surely come to frustrate the Dylan aficionado—just as it does in Don't Look Back, Eat the Document and Renaldo & Clara—that the music footage comes in snatches: that even in a seriously long film, over and over again we're denied complete song performances. Though the DVD release offers the Newcastle 'Like a Rolling Stone' complete, it doesn't offer the full Manchester version, and neither does the movie: even though this is the central drama, the culminating moment of the whole film. In this sense, No Direction Home is Dylan for beginners—palatable hors d'oeuvres of Dylan: a large number of them, of every variety, but always small samples and snatched away again too soon.

There is one clear moment where Scorsese's brilliant touch as an editor fails him, thanks to this distrust of the viewer's appetite. Marvellously plain-speaking young people are interviewed coming out of the 1966 British concerts—and this footage by D.A. PENNEBAKER, shot for what turned out to be Eat the Document, plunges us back magically into the vanished world of the still-industrial north of England that Dylan was visiting (as if from Mars)—but Scorsese, in general using this footage deftly, cuts from one young man deriding Dylan's harmonica playing to Dylan, on stage, just reaching the start of one of the two transcendental harmonica solos in 'Mr. Tambourine Man' . . . and cuts away from it immediately, where anyone attentive would have screened it: especially granted the gift in his lap of the highly attentive, heart-stopping close-up scrutiny that the 1966 camera had paid it.

Yet overall No Direction Home rises admirably to telling an impossibly large story, and does something remarkable: it tells that story so as to legitimise Dylan as an American golden boy. Untold numbers of people have said for decades now that Bob Dylan has been the most important this, the most influential that, the most significant the other—yet until now, his mysterious greatness has always been in the side tents of public acknowledgement. No Direction Home puts him up there with James Dean or Marilyn Monroe as a mainstream American hero. This is new.

[No Direction Home: Bob Dylan, dir. Martin Scorsese, BBC/Cappa Productions/Grey Water Park Productions/Spitfire Pictures/WNET-Channel 13 NY/PBS/Vulcan Productions/Box TV, US, 2005; No Direction Home: Bob Dylan, 2-DVD set, Paramount Home Video 0973603 10542, US, 20 Sep (UK, 5 Oct) 2005. Scorsese interview online 16 Oct 2005 at www.pbs.org/wnet/americanmasters/dylan/interview.html.]

Nobel Prize for Literature, Dylan and the See Ball, Gordon.

North Country* [film, 2005] See Self Portrait.

'Not Dark Yet' [1997] This sombre song, this dark recording, is surely one of the Time Out of Mind album's four great tracks—the others being 'Standing in the Doorway', 'Tryin' to Get to Heaven' and 'Highlands'; and DANIEL LANOIS, it must be said, helps them to be so. There's plenty of artfulness here, but it stands in the service of direct communication. There isn't a moment on any of these four when you think 'Ah, if only Dylan were younger, or still in his prime, he could sing that line beautifully.' He does sing it all beautifully.

Listen to how Dylan sings 'Not Dark Yet' from start to finish. The fit between every element in the song seems perfect, including Dylan's immaculately felicitous vocal. This is surely one of Bob Dylan's first-rate achievements: a song that can hold its own with those of earlier eras, in that it confronts a theme and pioneers a concentrated treatment of it.

If you were to ask for a work that expresses with dignity and fortitude the conviction that only decline lies ahead—decline of your powers and your capacity for openness to the world of colour and feeling—you could hardly ask for a better attempt than this: a better fusion of scrupulously concentrated singing, fittingly contemplative melody and resonant words.

The song's complex sombreness is constructed first by a slow, smouldering musical intro—an intro described by Richard Harrington as establishing 'a soft-spun martial cadence (the muffled drums evoke a funeral cortege)' complete with 'churchy organ'. Nineteen seconds in, presaged by a sketch of itself a few seconds earlier, a falling guitar line comes in, laid across the top of the rest, that is straight out of the musical introduction to the revisit-version of that great early EVERLY BROTHERS song 'I Wonder If I Care as Much': the version included on their influential Roots album of 1968.

This invoking of other songs is of course another of the album's most distinctive strengths; but of the many such sub-texts that Dylan calls upon in the course of Time Out of Mind, none is more apposite or cleverly placed than this. It is especially beguiling that he should let the thought be whispered 'I wonder if I care as much / As I did before' in the introduction to a song that explores the depths of Dylan's desolation and dares to say 'My sense of humanity has gone down the drain.'

This, the opening of the second verse, is so brave, clear and striking, and so attentively sung, that it combines with the stately pace and the stone steps of the descending chords in such a way as to seem like a sobered revisit to 'Like a Rolling Stone'. I wonder if I care as much. How does it feel?

What makes the words so resonant is that they mix powerful directness with subtle circuitousness. Balancing the clear-sighted confessional bluntness of 'My sense of humanity has gone down the drain' is the subtle complexity of feeling, two lines later, inside the couplet 'She wrote me a letter and she wrote it so kind. / She put down in writing what was in her mind.' Dylan's delivery of these edgy lines rises above guiding us as to their moral weighting. He remains magnificently inscrutable here. Is he recognising that her intention was 'kind' in setting down her feelings in a letter (something the narrator himself does to the 'you' in 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky'), or is 'she wrote it so kind' gallows sarcasm? Is there a barb here to the effect that ending a relationship—if that is what she's doing—would be kinder in person than by letter? More interesting, is the matter-of-fact 'She put down in writing what was in her mind' to be taken as honesty or, on principle, extreme foolhardiness? Is he condemning it as rash and dangerous? Should we? Is it an open question? This is writing of subtlety and strength, stripped of all adjectival elaboration. It can bear the weight of the conjecture it prompts from the listener, because it is thought out, and all its ambivalence is plausible.

Working out the balance of probability of meaning in this way is demanded of us at several other points in the song. In the first verse 'Feel like my soul has turned into steel': is this good or bad—toughened or dehumanised? If the latter, the truth of the lament is challenged in the line that follows: 'I've still got the scars . . .' is something only flesh or the psyche can claim.

When the third verse opens with 'Well I been to London and I been to Gay Paree', the effect is the opposite. Here the intensely expressive delivery belies the apparent neutrality of the line. This one is sung with shrivelling mordancy, conjuring a world of bleakness from this ostensible recitation of glamorous experience. It isn't as simple a snarl, on that long-drawn-out 'Gay—— Paree', as to suggest mere seen-it-all ennui—is it? What does it express? Murderous contempt for the vacuousness of the ooh-la-la, can-can Paris? Sullen resentment at having arrived too late to catch any of this except the seedy huckster version, a crumbling Moulin wearing too much Rouge? Despair at being unmoved even by this great chic European capital or by the contemplation of its immense and variegated cultural past?

Dylan's use of the word 'gay' is doubly insistent here—insistent because he holds the word on the note for so long, rolling it around in his mouth like a pretty poor sort of a toffee and then spitting it out into the waiting napkin of 'Paree', and because this is the second time he has used the word in the course of the album. It has been offered earlier, and in a phrase sufficiently surprising to draw attention to it, in the second verse of 'Standing in the Doorway', which finds him strumming on his 'gay guitar'. Does he do it to annoy, because he knows it teases? Yes. And the more purposive gesture that underlies this one is stubborn defiance of its appropriation by the thrash of sexual politics, and more generally as an insistence upon not submitting to the thought-police of political correctness.

This defiance draws on several different weapons. In 'Standing in the Doorway' the first weapon is comedy: 'I'm strummin' on my gay guitar, / Smokin' a cheap cigar' is inherently comic, partly for the joke of conceiving of such a thing as a homosexual guitar, partly by the notion of Dylan playing one and partly because, while retrieving the word 'gay' so as to have it mean 'cheery' again, he sings these cheery lines about pleasure with all the glumness of a great comedian, a Max Wall. In 'Not Dark Yet' the first weapon is licence. 'Gay Paree' is a phrase of unarguable familiarity: what, therefore, can possibly be wrong with using it?

But Dylan's underlying weapon in both these cases is the weapon of song. If he has asserted anything as strongly in the course of creating radical song-forms as in the course of re-stating the strengths of old ones, it is that the language of popular song can embrace an unconstrained vocabulary, drawing at will on the phrases and cadences of the Bible, the blues, folk balladry, highbrow poetry and the street—vocabulary that can be crude and sophisticated, simple and complex, modish and ancient. This is what he taught us in the first place, on the pioneering work of the 1960s. This unconstrained, resourceful flexibility is one of the main things he brought to rock'n'roll. On Time Out of Mind Dylan is asserting his defiant guardianship of the right—of everybody's right—to use and re-use an old word. Fighting with him he has all the old songs in which the word 'gay' means light-hearted or jolly, just as he has blues lyric poetry behind him when he wants to explore some other phrase that no-one else might dream of deploying inside their contemporary composition. To see this as an especially reactionary foray would be a mistake. The fact that many deeply conservative people are always moaning about the appropriation of the word 'gay' doesn't make Bob Dylan one of them. He isn't moaning; he isn't trying to stop its PC usage. He's just insisting on its revivable capacity to say something else. Were he to succeed in sparking off this renewed usage among the rest of us, he would rescue ELVIS PRESLEY's smouldering and macho song 'Paralyzed' from the unintended high comedy attendant upon its line 'I'm gay every morning, at night I'm still the same.' An uphill task.

In any case, Dylan's citing of 'Gay Paree' in 'Not Dark Yet' is one of those parts of the recording in which the subtleties of what is conveyed by Dylan's undimmed expressiveness of delivery get no clarification from the ostensible neutrality, or undirectingness, of the line itself. As we pass on through the lyrics, we return to writing that offers none of these complex weighings-up but offers instead a bleak straightforwardness—a plain-speaking this is how it is when things inside disintegrate: 'I ain't lookin' for nothin' in anybody's eyes.' 'I was born here and I'll die here against my will.' 'Don't even hear the murmur of a prayer.'

The metaphoric title line itself, of course, is also plain and unmistakeable in its import, even though we hear it first, as it closes the first verse, as a neat extension of the non-metaphor that ushers in the song's very first line. The first duty of 'It's not dark yet but it's getting there' is to round off a description of a particular day's end: to observe that dusk is drawing the curtains on a particular hot afternoon. The song's first lines are 'Shadows are falling, and I been here all day / It's too hot to sleep and time is running away.'

Only as that introductory particularity is, as it were, put to bed, should we accept the declared onset of darkness as the closing down of a life or a consciousness. As the line comes around again to conclude the other three verses, this metaphoric meaning is re-emphasised, of course, though whether the singer is looking forward to death as a release from this lingering, crepuscular shutdown, in which every nerve is 'vacant and numb', is again for the listener to try to put his or her finger on.

Whether the line announces an omnipresent consciousness of the comparative imminence of actual death or a consciousness that everything once worth savouring in life is losing its meaning, one of the things on offer here, as on 'Tryin' to Get to Heaven', is the sojourn of defeat. It is never more perfectly rendered than in the quiet achievement, in the song's concluding verse, of the line 'I can't even remember what it was I came here to get away from', on which Dylan achieves some extraordinary equivalence to onomatopoeia, enacting as he sings the line the long weary journeying, physical and emotional, away from something and somewhere. This is perfect singing and inventiveness, and quietly done.

[Bob Dylan: 'Not Dark Yet', Miami, FL, 13–28 Jan 1997. Richard Harrington: 'This Dylan's No Wallflower', Washington Post, c.Oct 1997. Everly Brothers: Roots, Nashville, summer 1968, Warner Bros. W 1752, US, 1968. Elvis Presley: 'Paralyzed', Hollywood, 2 Sep 1956, 1st issued Elvis Volume One EP, RCA Victor EPA-992, NY, 1956; re-issued on the CD box set The King of Rock'n'Roll: The Complete 50s Masters, BMG/RCA PD90689(5), 1992.]

nursery rhyme, Dylan's use of, an introduction No-one writing last century seems to link nursery rhyme and fairytale, nor even mention the one while discursing upon the other. Iona and Peter Opie's massive standard work, The Oxford Dictionary of Nursery Rhymes, published in 1945, ignores fairytales, though the Opies later published their own book of 'The Classic Fairy Tales'. Bruno Bettelheim's landmark study of fairytales, The Uses of Enchantment, ignores nursery rhymes. Vance Randolph, perhaps America's last great southern folksong collector, has written on and collected both fairytales and children's songs, yet separates the one wholly from the other. He collected folktales in the Ozarks, Arkansas, publishing them in The Devil's Daughter & Other Folk Tales in 1955; 25 years later much information on the songs and nursery rhymes behind 'Froggie Went a-Courtin" was included in his Ozark Folk Songs Vol. 1: British Ballads & Songs.

This rigid division does not obtain in the stories offered by fairytales and nursery rhymes themselves, nor in the minds of the children they appeal to, nor in earlier collections. Wedderburn's 16th century The Complaynt of Scotland includes fairytales and songs, and so do Halliwell's 19th century collections. Nor is there any rigid separation of the two forms in the work by Bob Dylan that draws upon them.

It may even be that each has its roots in an internationally common form, the canto-fable: that is, a work that switches back and forth between verse and prose. The late-19th century collector Joseph Jacobs wrote in 1898 that in addition to the well-known canto-fables of France, the same form can be detected in the Arabian Nights' tales, the folktales of Zanzibar and parts of the Old Testament (as in the stories of Lamech and Balaam), and that in the Grimms' collection, verses occur in nos. 1, 5, 11, 12, 13, 15, 19, 21, 24, 28, 30, 36, 38, 39, 40, 45, 46 and 47: that is, in 36 of the first 50 tales.

The distinction between adult song, nursery rhyme and fairytale is therefore not clear-cut, as at least three conjunctions on Dylan's 1992 album Good as I Been to You make clear. 'Yes kind sir I sit and spin', sings Miss Mousie in 'Froggie Went a-Courtin", describing just what princesses locked in the towers of fairytales must do. In the traditional 'adult' song that bears his name, Arthur McBride is told that he'll 'sup on thin gruel in the morning', a phrase offering the language and food of fairytales. 'Like a diamond in the sky', sings the hard-bitten narrator of 'Little Maggie', describing her eyes in the language of 'Twinkle Twinkle Little Star'.

F.J. CHILD (a happy name, in this context) writes that children's game songs are 'the last stage of many old ballads', and for ROBERT GRAVES 'The best of the older ones are nearer to poetry than the greater part of the Oxford Book of English Verse.' A specific example to back up such a claim is reiterated by the drama critic Ivor Brown: 'G.K. Chesterton,' he wrote, 'observed that so simple a line from the nursery as "Over the hills and far away" is one of the most beautiful in all English poetry'. Bob Dylan finally uses this very line—so knowingly yet so delicately—in his wonderful song of 1997, 'Highlands'.

The Opies emphasise that the adult-child distinction is not a clear one when they add that 'Chesterton would have been more exact if he had said "preserved by the nursery" rather than coming 'from the nursery' . . . the farther one goes back into the history of the rhymes, the farther one finds oneself being led from the cot-side. . . . the overwhelming majority . . . were not in the first place composed for children. . . . They are fragments of ballads or of folk songs . . . remnants of ancient custom and ritual . . . and may hold the last echoes of long-forgotten evil. . . . Some are memories of street cry and mummers' play. . . . Others are based on proverbs. . . . They have come out of taverns. . . . They are the legacy of war and rebellion. . . . They have poked fun at religious practices . . . and laughed at the rulers of the day. . . . They were the diversions of the scholarly, the erudite, and the wits.' (In a later period, the limerick form was lifted from a nursery rhyme, 'There Was a Sick Man of Tobago'.)

The age of the extant nursery rhyme varies enormously: many are ancient, but many others arise in the 19th century. 'We can say almost without hesitation that, of those pieces which date from before 1800, the only true nursery rhymes (that is, rhymes composed especially for the nursery) are the rhyming alphabets, the infant amusements (verses which accompany a game), and the lullabies.'

Yet 'At least a quarter, and very likely over half of the rhymes are more than 200 years old. . . . nearly one in four of all the rhymes are believed to have been known while Shakespeare was still a young man.' Lullabies and the counting-out rhymes are millennia old, and the 'infant amusements' can be ancient too. These include 'How Many Miles to Babylon?' and 'Handy Dandy', both of which Dylan draws upon in Under the Red Sky.

It is also in the nature of children to join in oral tradition very strongly: which makes them useful curators of folksong. So much so that there are instances of verses that make one chance written appearance and then no other till they reappear intact six or more generations later. A classic example relates to Dylan's work. Of the ballad 'Lord Randal', on which Dylan imposed his brilliant, visionary 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', there is a nursery rhyme version—with as many variants as the adult ballad, the best-known in England being 'Where have you been today, Billy, my son?'. Robert Jamieson wrote in Illustrations of the Northern Antiquities in 1814 that 'Lord Randal' 'has had the good fortune in every country to get possession of the nursery, a circumstance which, from the enthusiasm and curiosity of young imaginations, and the communicative volubility of little tongues, has insured its preservation.'

Cecil Sharp, rigid old-school folklorist that he was, nonetheless recognised the validity of nursery rhymes as a branch of folksong, collecting such material for his 1923 book Nursery Songs from the Appalachian Mountains. The Opies also note that '. . . most English nursery rhymes are better known in the States, and in the case of the older ones, often known in versions nearer the original, than they are in their home country.'

Another reason for an unclear distinction between child and adult song is that in many periods there has been an unclear distinction between child and adult altogether. As the Opies note, 'in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries children were treated as "grown-ups in miniature". . . . Many parents saw nothing unusual in their children hearing strong language or savouring strong drink. And behaviour was not as abashed as it is today.' Or rather, yesterday.

However, a residue of 'adult' ingredient is far from being what we need to find in order to imbue the nursery rhyme with value or interest: in fact a consideration of the triviality or worth of nursery rhymes must begin by dispelling such assumptions.

First, we were misled in being taught that the characters who populate the nursery rhyme world are all specific historical figures being attacked, lampooned or celebrated in verse—that Little Jack Horner is 'really' the Pope, or King James I, or whoever. This is a widely held belief, to hold which we often experience as a sign of our sophistication in early adolescence. It is quite unfounded. It arises from a clutch of wholly fraudulent 19th century books. There have been times when it has proved happily apt to mock kings, queens and politicians by comparing them to nursery rhyme characters; this continues to be apt, on occasion. But in almost every case ever cited, the nursery rhyme character arises before the real life satire victim is born. Similarly, the Opies do well to write of the Europe-wide ring-game song 'Ring a Ring o' Roses' in these robust terms:

> '. . . in satisfaction of the adult requirement that anything seemingly innocent should have a hidden meaning of exceptional unpleasantness, the game has been tainted by the legend that the song is a relic of the Great Plague of 1665; that the ring of roses was the purpuric sore that betokened the plague, that the posies were the herbs carried as protection against infection, that sneezing . . . was the final fatal symptom of the disease, and that "all fall down" was precisely what happened. This story has obtained such circulation . . . it can itself be said to be epidemic. . . . Those infected with the belief seem unperturbed that no reference to "Ring a Ring o' Roses" appears in Pepys' careful record of hearsay during the long months of the Plague, nor that Defoe's Journal of the Plague Year indicates no contemporary concern with either sneezing or redness of spots; nor by the fact that the song can be found, unassociated with sneezing and falling down, in America and all over Europe; nor by the fact that the linking of the song and the plague seems not to pre-date World War II.'

(This myth is kept in circulation in Bob Dylan's Words: A Critical Dictionary & Commentary edited by the American academics WISSOLIK & McGRATH, 1994, in a reference to Dylan's using the phrase 'ring around the rosey' in his novel Tarantula.)

The real value of nursery rhymes lies not in all this dodgy historical de-coding but in their poetry, their vivacity, their energy of character, story and language, and in the democratic, communal process (the oral tradition) that invents them and keeps them alive. As the Opies note, '. . . these trivial verses have endured where newer and more ambitious compositions have become dated and forgotten.'

As mentioned in discussing the Under the Red Sky song 'Cat's in the Well' in relation to HOWLIN' WOLF's blues, nursery rhyme has its value as a venerable yet living, expressive form of folklore—one with its own internal logic and integrity, celebrating the vibrancy of direct yet magical language. When Dylan comes to use it so thorough-goingly on Under the Red Sky, he is exploring one more form of Anglo-American folk culture, and another part of his roots.

As the power and popularity of fairytales also attest, children are often more in touch with their deepest psychic geography than grown-ups are. The child's verse is father to the man's poetry, and it is a superficial mind that automatically dismisses it. Indeed it's hard to understand how anyone who much appreciates Bob Dylan's genius can discount a song as reverberative, warm and true as 'Under the Red Sky' because it is 'kiddie-stuff' any more than they can validate a song as dead and untrue as 'Trust Yourself' or 'Never Gonna Be the Same Again' (both on 1985's Empire Burlesque) on grounds of their supposed 'grown-upness'.

Dylan has gone some way to specifying some of this himself. He chose for the inner sleeve to Shot of Love this well-known passage from Matthew (11:25): 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes.' And even those so hip and intellectual, and so divorced from the world of children that they're intolerant of the nursery rhyme's 'simplicity', might, before responding to Under the Red Sky from 1990 heed part of the hip young Dylan's 'Advice to Geraldine on Her Miscellaneous Birthday' from 1964: '. . . if his terms / are old-fashioned an' you've / passed that stage all the more easier / t'get back there.'

The proper dividing line between adult stories and fairytales is at least as blurred as that between grown-up song and nursery rhyme. Bruno Bettelheim finds this unsurprising:

> 'Like Biblical stories and myths, fairy tales were the literature that edified everybody—children and adults alike—for nearly all of man's existence. . . . nothing can be as enriching and satisfying to child and adult alike as the folk fairy tale. . . . Through the centuries (if not millenia) . . . they came to convey at the same time overt and covert meanings—came to speak simultaneously to all levels of the human personality, communicating in a manner which reaches the uneducated mind of the child as well as that of the sophisticated adult. Applying the psychoanalytic model of the human personality, fairy tales carry important messages to the conscious, the preconscious, and the unconscious mind, on whatever level each is functioning at the time. . . . When the unconscious is repressed and its content denied entrance into awareness, then eventually the person's conscious mind will be overwhelmed by derivatives of these unconscious elements, or else he is forced to keep such rigid, compulsive control over them that his personality may become severely crippled. . . . However, the prevalent parental belief is that a child must be diverted from what troubles him most. . . . There is a widespread refusal to let children know that the source of what goes wrong in life is due to our own natures. . . . Instead, we want our children to believe that, inherently, all men are good. But children know that they are not always good; and often, even when they are, they would prefer not to be. This contradicts what they are told by their parents, and therefore makes the child a monster in his own eyes. . . . The fairy tale . . . confronts the child squarely with the basic human predicaments. . . . evil is as omnipresent as virtue.'

All this, of course, is very recognisable as Bob Dylan thematic territory.

Bettelheim finds it natural, therefore, that '. . . our common cultural heritage finds expression in fairy tales, [which] . . . also abound in religious motifs; many Biblical stories are of the same nature as fairy tales. Most . . . originated in periods when religion was a most important part of life; thus, they deal, directly or by inference, with religious themes.'

The same connection is made by a different route in Roger Shattuck's description of the 1880s adolescent Erik Satie: '. . . at about the age of sixteen he . . . [became] deeply drawn to the mystic doctrine and ritual of the Catholic faith. In literature he turned to Flaubert and Hans Christian Andersen, an unusual combination of tastes which suggests that he discerned in both writers their veiled yet deep-seated religious preoccupation. It is what makes Flaubert at his most earnest often read like an author of fairy tales, and Andersen like an author of stories not at all for children but for unbelieving adults.'

Bettelheim adds that 'since polarization dominates the child's mind, it also dominates fairy tales. A person is either good or bad, nothing in between.' At the same time, he also perceives that 'The question for the child is not "Do I want to be good?" but "Who do I want to be like?"' Yet he does not lose sight of the fact that the fairytale 'could not have its psychological impact on the child were it not first and foremost a work of art.'

It is, in the end, as works of art and imagination that fairytales and nursery rhymes survive and hold their interest. Nothing could show this more clearly than the way a creative artist as resourceful as Bob Dylan has used them in his own vast body of work.

[Main sources: Bruno Bettelheim, The Uses Of Enchantment, London: Thames & Husdon, 1976; Iona & Peter Opie, Oxford Dictionary of Nursery Rhymes, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1945 (revised & reprinted 1951); The Singing Game, ditto, 1985 (Peter Opie died 1982; Iona completed the work, a companion volume to their Children's Games in Street and Playground, 1969); The Oxford Nursery Rhyme Book, ditto, 1955; & Jean Harrowven, Origins of Rhymes, Songs & Sayings, London: Kaye & Ward, 1977. The main early collections used by the Opies & mentioned here & in related main texts are: Joseph Ritson, ed., Gammer Gurton's Garland or The Nursery Parnassus, 1784; James Orchard Halliwell, The Nursery Rhymes of England, 1842-c.1860 & Popular Rhymes and Nursery Tales, 1849 & c.1860 (Bettelheim too cites Halliwell); & Alice Bertha Gomme, The Traditional Games of England, Scotland and Ireland, 2 vols., 1894–1898; their other sources include the Gesta Romanorum (stories & attached moralisations, prob. compiled England, late 13th century, & printed in Latin) & Wedderburn, The Complaynt of Scotland, 1549, plus the usual folksong source materials such as the works by F.J. Child.

Roger Shattuck: The Banquet Years: The Origins of the Avant-Garde in France 1885 to World War I, New York: Vintage, revised edn., 1968.]

nursery rhyme, Dylan's use of, pre-1990 Dylan has alluded to nursery rhymes and children's song, and used nursery rhyme formulae, all through his career. This includes performing, and referring to, songs by others either specifically written for children or where it is the child's penchant for oral repetition that has preserved parts of ancient folksongs as songs we've come to call 'nursery rhymes'. (Before 1824 'nursery rhymes' were simply called songs.)

As it happens, even the coffee-house in which Dylan made his début, the 10 O'Clock Scholar in Dinkytown, was named after an ancient nursery rhyme (one in print as early as 1784): 'A diller, a dollar / A ten o'clock scholar / What makes you come so soon? / You used to come at ten o'clock / But now you come at noon.' Since 'diller' and 'dollar' are thought to be dialect terms for 'dullard' this suggests that coffee-house owner David Lee held sardonic views about the students who spent their time on his premises instead of studying. It gives an extra fillip of sub-text, too, to Dylan's position then as university drop-out and his launching of a career ever since replete with disparagement of academia.

A traditional ballad Dylan performed at the start of his career, 'Barbara Allen', is linked to a children's circle-game song 'Old Roger', which begins: 'Old Roger is dead and laid in his grave . . . / They planted an apple-tree over his head . . .' In the game, one child plays dead in the middle of the circle until the time comes to jump up and counter-attack the apple-stealer. That it may have been a song before it turned into an acted-out game is suggested partly by the ancientness of these opening lines; as song or drama it shares with 'Barbara Allen' its expression of the ancient belief that the soul can pass into a plant or tree, and the plant or tree can then embody the person. A parallel children's game is called 'Dead Man Arise'. In many versions of 'Cinderella', including the Grimms', the lonely heroine is looked after by a tree that grows out of her mother's grave. In Greek mythology, when Adonis is killed by a wild boar, an anemone grows from his heart. This shared belief is one of the examples of the unkillable 'mystery' of traditional song that Dylan mentions specifically in the 1966 Playboy interview, when, giving it his inimitable twist, he refers to 'all these songs about roses growing out of people's brains . . .' It is a strong enough idea that it appeals equally to adults as the resolution of the tragedy of the 'Barbara Allen' story, in which the plants grow from the lovers' breasts and intertwine above their graves, and to children who love the drama of the dead person becoming the tree that can arise and hit back. ('Old Roger' was field-recorded in Glasgow in 1961, not so very long after Dylan was learning 'Barbara Allen'.)

The nursery rhyme 'The cuckoo is a merry bird' was said in 1796 to have already appeared in a children's book that had been published for years, if not for generations. Dylan was performing it, as 'The Cuckoo Is a Pretty Bird' at the Gaslight in October 1962. 'The Bells of Rhymney', an Idris Davies poem set to music by PETE SEEGER, is another song Dylan knew and performed early on: he was taped playing it on guitar back in 1961 and then singing it on the Basement Tapes in 1967 (by this time in a lovely version that seems to suggest Dylan's familiarity with the version THE BYRDS put on their first album, 1965's Mr. Tambourine Man). A protest song about industrial misery and exploitation in Wales, its majestic poignancy is achieved by its open re-writing of the children's game-song 'Oranges and Lemons'. (Its audacious couplet 'Even God is uneasy / Say the moist bells of Swansea' is omitted by the Byrds.)

It is a use of children's song Dylan mirrored exactly in his own work when he used 'Who Killed Cock Robin?' to build 'Who Killed Davey Moore?', while he also mirrored 'Oranges and Lemons' in mirroring 'The Bells of Rhymney' in a short, rather fine section of his fourth album's sleevenote poetry '11 Outlined Epitaphs': 'the underground's gone deeper / says the old chimney sweeper / the underground's outa work / sing the bells of New York / the underground's more dangerous / ring the bells of Los Angeles / the underground's gone / cry the bells of San Juan / but where has it gone to / ring the bells of Toronto.'

Dylan was also recorded performing some of WOODY GUTHRIE's childrens's songs in early 1961, including 'Car Car' and 'Howdido'. (There was a bout of interest in children's songs among the folk revival crowd in the early 1960s. A round-up of available LPs published in just one issue of Sing Out! in summer 1963 included the following: Rhythms of Childhood with Ella Jenkins, Jean Ritchie's Children's Songs and Games from the Southern Mountains, Pete Seeger's Children's Concert at Town Hall, American Game and Activity Songs for Children and Song and Play-Time, and the LEADBELLY album Negro Folk Songs for Young People. Almost 20 years later, in a speech on stage at the Fox-Warfield Theatre in San Francisco on November 12, 1980, Dylan talks of Leadbelly switching from prison songs to children's songs, using this as a parable about his own switch from street-legal to Christian songs.)

Dylan has been just as unapologetic about resting on nursery rhyme material. 1961's 'Man on the Street' shares its opening line, 'I'll sing you a song, ain't very long', with the nursery rhyme that runs 'I'll sing you a song / Though not very long / Yet I think it's as pretty as any / Put your hand in your purse / You'll never be worse / And give the poor singer a penny'. 1962's 'Ramblin Gamblin Willie' is prefigured by Scotland's 'Rattlin Roarin Willie', and both 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall' and 'Girl of the North Country' have significant nursery rhyme connections. Not only was the folksong on which the former is based, 'Lord Randal', one preserved in oral tradition by its nursery rhyme version; not only does Dylan's version still have room for nursery rhyme topography like the 'six crooked highways', rebuilt in the footsteps of the crooked man who walked a crooked mile—which Dylan echoes more audibly still in 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', with its 'walked a rugged mile'—but the apocalyptic heart of Dylan's version may itself have been midwifed into existence in some chamber of his imagination by a tradition of ostensibly visionary nursery rhymes. (This one, widely known in the mid-17th century and still popular with London schoolchildren 200 years later, has been preserved in American nursery rhyme collections—and might certainly be called Dylanesque: 'I saw a peacock with a fiery tail / I saw a blazing comet drop down hail / I saw a cloud with ivy circled round / I saw a sturdy oak creep on the ground / I saw a pismire swallow up a whale / I saw a raging sea . . .') It is 'ostensibly' visionary, because it belongs to a corpus of riddle or trick nursery rhymes which rely for their effects on layout and punctuation, the re-ordering of which reduces them to the mundane. As Walter de la Mare commented, 'So may the omission of a few commas effect a wonder of the imagination.'

The entanglement of 'Girl of the North Country' in traditional child-lore is of a different order, and brings together both nursery rhyme and fairytale. Dylan's song is clearly based upon the traditional or broadside song 'Scarborough Fair'—which does not necessarily include the repeated line 'Parsley sage rosemary and thyme' taken up by PAUL SIMON. Dylan's lyric hopes his ex is wrapped up warm against the howling wind; the Scottish borders version also moves on to questions of clothing, yet sticks closer to the key part of a far older story: one which is the basis for both a fairytale set down by the Grimms and the nursery rhyme which (published at least as early as 1784) preserves in its most common and accessible form the folksong cycle that lies behind both Dylan's and Paul Simon's recordings.

The nursery rhyme is 'Can You Make Me a Cambric Shirt?', which, like so many folksongs, has two narrators and comprises their dialogue. The fairytale version concerns a rich king; both involve setting tests for the 'true love', and the core of the story is so strong that in every extant version, in prose and verse, one of the tasks set is always the making of a shirt. This, as F.J. CHILD writes, is because 'A man asking a maid to sew him a shirt is equivalent to asking for her love, and her consent to sew the shirt is equivalent to an acceptance of the suitor'. Thus nursery rhyme and fairytale carry the deepest reverberations of the narrative that Dylan's song picks up on, and predate the folksong variants in which it is an old love who is challenged or, as in 'Girl of the North Country', merely remembered. But Dylan's 1960s song still holds in its invoking of the coat the vestigial traces of the pre-medieval tale: and it is the surviving nursery rhyme that shows the links between the two.

1963's 'Percy's Song' (issued on Biograph, 1985) begins and ends in the shadows of nursery rhyme. It opens with 'Bad news, bad news, / Came to me where I sleep', in which the repetition, for dramatic emphasis' sake, of the words 'bad news', echoes the 1690s broadside ballad 'The Unconstant Maiden': 'Bad news is come to town / Bad news is carried / Bad news is come to town / My love is marry'd'—which is itself in parodic echo of the nursery rhyme 'Brave news is come to town / Brave news is carried / Brave news is come to town / Jemmy Dawson's married', while the ending of the Dylan song, the lovely but formulaic 'And the only tune / My guitar could play / Was, "Oh the Cruel Rain / And the Wind" ' leans on a construct from the nursery rhyme 'Tom He Was a Piper's Son', with its repeated 'And all the tune that he could play / Was "Over the hills and far away"'.

The immediate echo behind the opening of 'With God on Our Side'—'Oh my name it ain't nothin' / My age it means less', derives from a Dominic Behan song, but behind that reverberates the many echoes of a children's game-song variously called 'Queen Mary', 'Sweet Dolly', 'Sweet Mary' and having many a relation with no name at all. The game, dating back centuries, is an Ur ring game—a simple, fast dancing game with one child in the middle of a ring—and the common factor in the lyric is that the song always starts, as Dylan's does, with the formula 'My name is X, my age is Y'. Hence 'My name is Queen Mary, my age is sixteen, / My father's a farmer on yonder green', or 'My name it is Jean, and my age is fifteen; / My father's a farmer, he lives on the plain', or 'My name is sweet Dolly, my age twenty three, / My father's a farmer over the Red Sea.' The Dylan song not only twists the formula of the opening line but shares with these far-flung children's versions the same rhyming pattern—each verse rhymes lines one with two and lines three with four—and shares the time signature of the tune, which is in 6/8.

Boots of Spanish leather were celebrated in song as the finest—as objects of desire—in nursery rhyme and singing-game in the 19th century. In Sons and Lovers, published in 1913 and set in Nottinghamshire, D.H. Lawrence has Mrs. Morel hearing children sing this in the street as the day is getting dark: 'My shoes are made of Spanish leather / My socks are made of silk / I wear a ring on every finger / I wash myself in milk', and variants collected earlier include 'Our boots are made of Spanish' and 'My boots are made of Spanish leather'.

That so much meaning is encapsulated as Dylan settles for these expensive boots at the end of the dialogue with his departed lover proves it one of the most deft, economical lines of writing in his whole repertoire. Yet it carries more than the young man's hiss of embittered rebuke. Underneath this literal pay-off, other reverberations rumble. If, like Mrs. Morel, we can hear the children singing the same words in the background, this adds an extra poignancy to the way the hurt scorn of Dylan's title-line both confesses the 'rejected' lover's immaturity, and tacitly acknowledges that the other has grown away from him. It's a further irony that the lines the children sing express aspiration towards such a grandiose, unreal idea of adulthood.

That there has not been, traditionally, any clear distinction between the two states is made very clear by the other song invoked in the background by Dylan's title 'Boots of Spanish Leather'—the omni-present 'Gypsy Davey' or 'Blackjack Davey', in which many versions bring us either boots or gloves of Spanish leather. Both, of course, carry similar strong sexual import, as is emphasised in almost every variant of the narrative. The ballad's heroine, at the same time as dealing in this symbolism of sex and power—and in doing so accepting responsibility for the momentous decision to abandon her baby—is a girl of only 15 herself. Yet 15 was the optimum age for a girl to marry in the Middle Ages, the period to which this ballad harks back. It is the marriageable age in fairytales too, including 'Cinderella', in which the shoe holds an equally strong sex-symbol rôle as the object of desire around which true love is measured by testing who fits, physically. (Here lies another example of fairytale and nursery rhyme coinciding—in the shared sexual significance of the shoe in 'Cinderella' and in the rhyme 'Cock a Doodle Do!': 'Cock a doodle do! / My dame has lost her shoe; / My master's lost his fiddle stick / And they don't know what to do!')

In his inimitable, gently off-kilter way, Bob Dylan sets 'Cinderella' humming in the background of another song of his a couple of years later, as he finishes '4th Time Around' (another love-triangle song) with these confusing signals of sexual symbolism: 'And when I was through' (which is to say, through with her: the other woman) 'I filled up my shoe / And brought it to you. / And you, you took me in . . . / And I, I never took much, / I never asked for your crutch, / Now don't ask for mine.' Similarly, 'Boots of Spanish Leather', especially the loaded potency of its ending, would be less complex if it did not offer all these reverberations from children's song, fairytale and an ancient ballad with a child-woman heroine.

1963's 'Seven Curses', as its title implies and its dénouement makes clear, deals in spell-like invocations of numbers modelled on the stuff of fairytales, while in 'Motorpsycho Nitemare', when the psychotic farmer asks 'What do doctors / Know about farms, pray tell?' the narrator's enigmatic response picks up on the fairytale milieu underlying that 'pray tell', so that he answers 'I was born / At the bottom of a wishing well.'

The last verse of 1964's 'Ballad in Plain D'—'Ah, my friends from the prison, they ask unto me / "How good, how good does it feel to be free?" / And I answer them most mysteriously / "Are birds free from the chains of the skyway?"'—echoes the nursery rhyme 'The Man in The Wilderness' plainly and simply (sufficiently that you can sing this nursery rhyme verse to his tune): 'The man in the wilderness askéd of me / How many strawberries grew in the sea? / I answered him, as I thought good, / "As many red herrings as grow in the wood"', and in 'Restless Farewell', the regular way that each verse begins—'Oh all the money that in my whole life I did spend'; 'Oh ev'ry girl that ever I've touched', 'Oh ev'ry foe that ever I faced', and so on—is modelled so closely upon a nursery rhyme (one collected by Halliwell in 1844, and which preserves the opening lines of a far older song) that as with the example above, you can envisage Dylan singing the nursery rhyme lines to his 'Restless Farewell' melody: 'Of all the gay birds that e'er I did see / The owl is the fairest by far to me / For all day long she sits on a tree / And when the night comes, away flies she.'

Dylan didn't appear to know, when asked to supply a rhyme for the word 'orange' at a 1965 press-conference, that the question was based on a nursery rhyme that expresses (and answers) much the same challenge: 'What is the rhyme for porringer? / The king he had a daughter fair / And he gave the prince of Orange her', but he was alive to much of the nursery rhyme and fairytale world at that time: alive to its innate surreality and its capacity for holding fundamental truths, as well as being quick to revivify its characters and bend them to his own requirements.

'Desolation Row' creates a world of mermaids and poisoning and of reciting the alphabet, of figures from the circus and from melodramas of fairytale proportions (doesn't 'The Phantom of the Opera' rewrite 'Beauty and the Beast'?) and children's folk heroes (Einstein wants to be Robin Hood). Cinderella is the cool, knowing star of a whole verse: a heroine identified with the narrator, one of the sane figures in the song's phantasmagoric pageant, one of those who has a hold on reality, because she lives on Desolation Row. In the prose-poem 'Alternatives to College' (1965) Dylan mentions, or rather tags other people as, 'little bo peep' and 'simple simon' and refers twice to 'crippled mermaid', an allusion to the Hans Christian Andersen fairytale 'The Little Mermaid', in which the heroine's fishtail is swapped, on account of love for a prince, for legs too painful to walk on. In Tarantula, written 1965–66, Dylan alludes to the nursery rhymes 'Jack and Jill went up the hill' (with 'would you like to buy a pail? jack,'), 'Ring a Ring O'Roses' ('ring around the rosey') and 'The butcher, the baker, the candle-stick maker' (the unaltered 'candle stick maker').

In 'Visions of Johanna' the ladies play a version of the children's game blind man's buff (nicely punned into 'blind man's bluff') and we meet Little Boy Blue's cousin 'little boy lost'. Another of Dylan's white-heat hip period songs is called 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' (in the 18th century, nursery rhymes were called 'Tommy Thumb's songs'). 1969's 'Country Pie' parallels this identification of song narrator with nursery rhyme hero in the line 'Little Jack Horner's got nothing on me', and the same song's 'Saddle me up a big white goose / Tie me on 'er and turn me loose' is in effect the song of Old Mother Goose: 'Old Mother Goose / When she wanted to wander / Would ride through the air / On a very fine gander.' And after the goose has laid the golden egg and this has been lost and recovered, the rhyme ends: 'And Old Mother Goose / The goose saddled soon / And mounting its back / Flew up to the moon.' (Nursery rhymes are still called 'Mother Goose's songs' in the US.)

And then there are the Basement Tapes, which often hover knowingly around the nursery (Dylan says so explicitly of 'Quinn the Eskimo', telling interviewer CAMERON CROWE that 'I guess it was some kind of a nursery rhyme'), while 'See Ya Later Alligator' mutating into 'See Ya Later ALLEN GINSBERG' is an excellent example, caught on tape, of the spontaneous wordplay process common to the playground. Likewise ROY KELLY writes (in a long, excellent essay, 'Bunch of Basement Noise', 1992) that 'Apple Suckling Tree' is 'nonsense lyrically . . . What, after all, is an apple suckling tree?' and that the song seems 'like a twisted kind of nursery rhyme with a floppy rock beat, a children's chant with a knowing, surrealist nod'—perhaps forgetting that plenty of nursery rhymes are of 'a twisted kind' anyway, and often have knowing, 'surreal' qualities of their own.

Kelly's main point is that 'musically it sounds . . . like Bob and THE BAND were plugging into some subterranean source, a common flow of American music.' This is close to reiterating what GREIL MARCUS wrote in the sleevenotes to the teasing sampler of the same 1967 material issued as the album The Basement Tapes in 1975: '. . . they seem to leap out of a kaleidoscope of American music no less immediate for its venerability. Just below the surface . . . are the strange adventures and poker-face insanities chronicled in such standards as 'Froggy Went a Courtin'' . . . 'Cock Robin' . . . or a song called 'I Wish I Was a Mole in the Ground' . . . one side of The Basement Tapes casts the shadow of such things and in turn is shadowed by them.'

The name of the music-publishing company Dylan formed in the early 1970s, Ram's Horn Music, recalls at least two different nursery rhymes: 'Can You Make Me a Cambric Shirt?', discussed above, and another quite separate nursery rhyme with many local British and American place-name variants, of which this is one example: 'Little lad, little lad, where were you born? / Far off in Lancashire under a thorn / Where they sup buttermilk with a ram's horn.' (Not that these nursery rhymes are the main associations with the name 'Ram's Horn' for Dylan: it has its religious significance too. The Shofah, or Shophar, is the ceremonial ram's horn sounded daily in the synagogue during the month of Elul and repeatedly on Rosh Hoshanah. It was used by the ancient Israelites as a warning or summons. When Joshua fit the battle of Jericho and the walls came tumbling down, the trumpets were, as the song says, ram's horns. Then of course there's the MEMPHIS MINNIE song that's a special favourite of Bob Dylan's, the well-known 'Me and My Shofar'.)

The centre of that tantalising 1973 song 'Nobody 'Cept You' (an outtake from Planet Waves, released first on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991) concerns childhood play and dance and song: 'Used to play in the cemetery / Dance and sing and run when I was a child'; and in adding that '. . . it never seemed strange' to be playing, singing and dancing in 'That place where the bones of life are piled', Dylan is not making himself out to be individually interesting or quirky but speaking for all children. Graveyard play among children and young adults is so ancient a custom as to merge back into the ring-dances of antiquity. Such dancing and singing—called 'caroling', and not necessarily in a circle, but as likely by the early Middle Ages to be in a sort of wild, snaking procession (we see a sort of caroling, with Dylan holding a trumpet, in Renaldo & Clara)—grew to be both a main activity on feast days and the bane of the church authorities. The church always opposed secular dancing—the ecclesiastical councils tried for over a thousand years to ban it—not only because such dancing was pagan and sexy (like the ring-games of the black children in 1930s–40s Mississippi described by ALAN LOMAX in The Land Where the Blues Began) but because of the widespread habit of using graveyards to dance in. Etienne de Bourbon, made Inquisitor in about 1235, fulminated against 'those most sacrilegious persons who tread down the bodies of holy Christian folk in the churchyards . . .'

The ghostly presence hovers here of the ancient legend of 'The Devil at the Dance', in which a young girl disobeys her parents by attending such a graveyard dance. The Devil makes off with her. In one version they fly off leaving hoofprints on the rocks by the sea; in another version, to which Bob Dylan might be referring in 'Idiot Wind', they take off through the roof of a burning church: 'The priest wore black on the seventh day / And sat stone-faced while the building burned.'

On the 1976 album Desire, 'Sara' has Dylan recollecting wistfully a time when his own children were playing games and being told one of the Grimms' fairytales: 'playin' leapfrog and hearin' about Snow White'. You could add that in the line 'I left town at dawn, with Marcel and St. John . . .' on 1978's 'Where Are You Tonight (Journey Thru Dark Heat)?' there lingers vestigially the idea of setting out on one's journey protected by the apostles, which is articulated in one of the two main nursery rhymes called 'Matthew Mark Luke and John' (the lovely Scottish version of which then runs 'Hau the horse till I loup on / Hau it fast an hau it sure / Till I get owre the misty muir').

You might feel too that the chorus of 1986's 'Brownsville Girl', rhyming 'Brownsville girl' with 'Brownsville curl', is asking to be a reminder of the nursery rhyme attributed to Longfellow—'There was a little girl and she had a little curl / Right in the middle of her forehead'—and that in the mid-1980s song 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky', Dylan's line 'For the love of a lousy buck I've watched them die' offers an inflation-linked twist on the nursery rhyme confession 'I love sixpence better than my life.' Or you may not. But there is nothing tenuous about the (mis)quoting of the nursery rhyme 'The rose is red, the violet blue' in the dark last verse of 'Where Teardrops Fall' on 1989's Oh Mercy.

[Bob Dylan: 'Car Car', East Orange, NJ, Feb–Mar 1961, Minneapolis, MN, May 1961 & at the Gaslight, Sep 1961; 'Howdido', Minneapolis, May 1961; 'The Bells of Rhymney', 2nd MacKenzies Tape, NY, c.4 Dec 1961, unissued, & West Saugerties/Woodstock, NY, Jun–Aug 1967, unissued. Press-conference, San Francisco, 3 Dec 1965, telecast KQED-TV.

Idris Davies' poem 'The Bells of Rhymney', collected in Dylan Thomas, ed., So Early One Morning, a selection of Welsh poetry (in English), 1954. (Davies was born in Rhymney, Wales, in 1905, went down the mines at 14 and died of cancer 1953, the same year Dylan Thomas died of alcoholic poisoning.) Pete Seeger: 'The Bells of Rhymney', NY, 27 Dec 1957, Pete Seeger & Sonny Terry at Carnegie Hall, Folkways FA 2412, NY, 1958, & 'The Bells of Rhymney', Newport, RI, Jul 1959, Folk Festival at Newport (Vol. 1), Vanguard VRS-9062 & VSD-2053, NY, 1960. The song was published in Sing Out! vol.8, no.2, NY, 1958 (& included in Reprints from Sing Out! Vol. 3, New York: Sing Out! c.1962).

The Byrds: 'The Bells of Rhymney', Hollywood, 14 Apr 1965, Mr. Tambourine Man, Columbia, US (CBS 62571, UK), 1965. Rhythms of Childhood with Ella Jenkins, nia, Folkways FC 7653, NY, nia; Jean Ritchie: Children's Songs and Games from the Southern Mountains, nia, Folkways FC 754, NY, nia; Pete Seeger: Children's Concert at Town Hall, NY, nia, Columbia CS 8747 (mono CL 1947), NY, nia, American Game and Activity Songs for Children, nia, Folkways FC 7003 (10″ LP), NY, nia and Song and Play-Time, nia, Folkways FC 7526, NY, nia, & Leadbelly: Negro Folk Songs for Young People, Folkways FC 7533, NY, c.1962. Sing Out! vol.13, no.3, NY, summer 1963.

Walter de la Mare, Come Hither, 1923; quoted by Peter & Iona Opie (for details of their work & sources, see endnotes to nursery rhyme, Dylan's use of, an introduction). An Ur ring game song is quoted in Wolfgang Schmeltzel, Quodlibet, 1544. 'Queen Mary' published in the Journal of the English Folk Dance and Song Society, Jun 1915 (but a variant still heard in Harrogate, UK, 1959); 'Sweet Dolly' heard in Soho, London, 1907; unnamed 3rd song quoted collected (by T.G. Stevenson) in Scottish Ballads and Songs, James Maidment, Edinburgh, 1859, but these lines and six others from same song also collected from a Newfoundland fisherman in 1929, published in Ballads and Sea Songs of Newfoundland, Elisabeth Greenleaf & Grace Mansfield, 1933, reprinted 1968.]

nursery rhyme on Under the Red Sky It is unsurprising that it's the middle-aged Dylan who creates an album like Under the Red Sky, which steps so merrily and resourcefully into the fairytale and nursery rhyme arena: unafraid to use its 'simple' language straightfowardly but far more often releasing it into new shapes and scenes and resonance from his own intelligent imagination. This isn't a case of throwing in a few obvious references to, and quotes from, nursery rhymes as well and widely known as 'Mary Had a Little Lamb' and 'Sing a Song of Sixpence', as he does when he gives 'Jack Frost' a co-producer's credit for the album. Bob Dylan is either inwardly familiar with, or has researched energetically into, a huge number of nursery rhymes and children's game-songs. He seems to have poked into as many corner-cupboards of the genre as he has in the pre-war acoustic blues. The evidence is scattered like a paper-chase all across the lyrics of Under the Red Sky.

Both the most innocuous and the most striking phrases Bob Dylan sings here, the most modestly slipped-in and the most 'Dylanesque', very often prove verbatim quotations from nursery rhymes and game-songs most of us don't know. These run from 'there was a man who had no eyes' to 'thank you for my tea' and from 'a stick in his hand' to 'eat off his head'. Other allusions prove non-verbatim only because Dylan has deftly reversed them, as with 'that soft silky skin' and 'the barn is full of the bull'.

This would be all well and good, but not especially valuable, if it were no more than a game, though the element of play involved—even the suspicion that it might have started out as a game on Dylan's part—is attractive, and of course accords with the spirit of the genre itself. What makes Under the Red Sky more satisfying than that is that Dylan goes beyond knowing a great deal of nursery rhyme. He respects its capacity to be numinous, and he gives the poet within him free rein to explore it.

The power and poetry of nursery rhyme language is often put to the service of trickery, the solving of which has a strongly bathetic effect, as the poetic evaporates into the mundane. One of the things Dylan does so marvellously on this album is to reoccupy the innate poetry, freeing it from its servitude to cheap trickery, letting it fly off as it might in directions suggested by Dylan's own feeling for it.

This is most evident on 'Handy Dandy', one of the album's best songs—see separate entry—but even 'Unbelievable' raids two different tricksy nursery rhymes, one a riddle and the other a hand game (like handy dandy). Dylan jettisons the 'puzzles' and sets free the characters. The riddle is 'There Was a Man Who Had No Eyes', which begins with that line and then continues: 'He went abroad to view the skies / He saw a tree with apples on it / He took no apples off, yet left no apples on it'—the solution is that he has one eye, the tree has two apples and he takes one off—while 'Lady, Lady in the Land' is 'an infant amusement' or playground game, one of an almost infinite number of variants stretching back probably for millennia and listed in print at least as early as 1534 (by Rabelais), the object of which is explained by the rhyme itself: 'Lady, Lady in the land / Can you bear a tickly hand? / If you laugh or if you smile / You'll ne'er be lady in the land.'

Dylan marries these two up, so that 'Once there was a man who had no eyes / Every lady in the land told him lies'. The best small thing he does here is to take the second line from the riddle about the man with no eyes—'He went abroad to view the skies' and rewrite it. As we know, the man in the riddle actually has one eye, so he can go out and 'view the skies'; the man in Dylan's song really has no eyes, and Dylan evokes his greater helplessness in the re-write, in which 'He stood beneath the silver skies': to which Dylan adds a rewritten fragment from yet another nursery rhyme, changing Little Bo Peep's empathetic pain felt for her regained but wounded sheep—'She found them indeed but it made her heart bleed / For they'd left their tails behind them'—into the pain the man with no eyes feels for his wounded self: 'He stood beneath the silver skies / And his heart began to bleed.'

Dylan's 'You go north and you go south / Just like bait in the fish's mouth', from earlier in the song, is a twisted twisting of another game, 'King William', a kissing game in which the person who is 'it' must 'Choose to the east and choose to the west / Choose the one that you love best'. (This is strikingly similar to 'Little Sally Walker', the game played by young black girls in the Mississippi Delta as witnessed by ALAN LOMAX in the 1940s, and about which he writes in his expansive 1993 book The Land Where the Blues Began.)

'Wiggle Wiggle', a title about as alluring as 'Woogie Boogie' or 'Emotionally Yours', incorporates fleeting moments from several different variants of a similar singing game called 'Kentucky' that, while retaining some mention of the early 1920s dance the Shimmy, inexplicably 'swept the country [Britain] with the speed of a pop song in the mid-1960s', and enjoyed similar transatlantic success, according to the nusery rhyme and children's game songs experts Iona and Peter Opie. This singing game, stripped down melodically almost to a one-note chant, includes the lines 'Rumble to the bottom, rumble to the top . . . / Twisty twisty twisty, twisty all around . . . / Oh shake it, baby shake it, shake it if you can', followed by the splendid 'Shake it like a milkshake and drink it like a man.' This might indicate that the SAM COOKE song 'Shake', from which 'Wiggle Wiggle' has taken the line 'Shakin' like a bowl of soup', itself owes something to this piece of communal juvenilia. Then there's a Hank Ballard & the Midnighters single from 1954, 'Sexy Ways', that seems to embrace the singing-game song and prefigure 'Wiggle Wiggle' rather more: 'Wiggle wiggle wiggle wiggle / I just love your sexy ways / Upside down, all around / Any old way, just pound pound pound.'

(Dylan's exact title first belonged to an obscure 'commercial' pop-rock single by unfamous vocal group the Accents, dating from 1958, itself a tired and nondescript copy of the pop classic 'Little Bitty Pretty One' and stressing the primacy of womanly wiggling over beauty and fine clothes—'so wiggle wiggle wiggle for me'. Written by group member Robert Draper Jr., the record scraped up to no.51 in the US hot 100.)

These resemblances don't stop 'Wiggle Wiggle' being, like 'Unbelievable', off-the-shelf rockism. Under the Red Sky co-producer DON WAS claimed in an interview that 'Wiggle Wiggle' is Dylan writing 'Tutti Frutti'. This is stoned dithyrambling. The Dylan song is retro, stale, guarded and uninventive where Little Richard's invented something radical, fresh, exciting and open. Nor is 'Wiggle Wiggle' much improved by its nod towards one of several nursery rhymes called 'Little Robin Redbreast', who 'Sat upon a rail / Niddle noddle went his head / Wiggle waggle went his tail', which survives from older, ruder versions.

Dylan also gives a nod to his own earlier 'children's song', 'Man Gave Names to All the Animals'. Where that song ends by forbearing to name the last animal as the snake, 'Wiggle Wiggle', having a snake at the end too, hisses the word out loud, its final line being 'Wiggle like a big fat sssnake.'

'2 x 2', with its refreshingy unDylanish, post-Beatleish instrumental intro, is also perfectly at home on Under the Red Sky in being a simple counting-song (of the sort Dylan parodies in 'I Shall Be Free No. 10'). Its very title is a clear echo of the well-known children's song 'The Animals Went in Two By Two' which is in turn the story of Noah's ark, told in Genesis (6:19 to 7:9), a connection Dylan re-articulates in the darker couplet 'Two by two they step into the ark / Two by two they step in the dark.' The most flaccid line in the song is 'Six by six, they were playing for tricks'; the best is the funny, truthful 'Nine by nine they drank the wine / Ten by ten, they drank it again'. The song is inevitably reminiscent too of the nursery rhyme counting-song 'This Old Man', which Dylan went on to record the year after Under the Red Sky, for an album in support of the Pediatric AIDS Foundation.

That patchy song '10,000 Men' also contains two lines taken straight from the poetry of nursery rhyme, the one as quiet and nondescript as the other is grotesque and bizarre—though only in the context Dylan gives it. The quiet-as-anonymous 'thank you for my tea' at the end—'Baby, thank you for my tea / It's really so sweet of you to be so nice to me'—may not be much of a line in itself but it's a quietly clever fusion of blues and nursery rhyme worlds. There's a common-stock blues couplet, found for instance in Dylan's old friend HENRY THOMAS' beautiful, affecting 'Don't Ease Me In' (recorded at the same session as his 'Fishing Blues'), in which 'She brings me coffee and she brings me tea / She brings me everything but the jailhouse key' (the same first line and an almost identical matching line can also be found for example on Sam Collins' 1927 'The Jail House Blues'), so that for the blues afficionado 'Thank you for my tea' is a recognisably apt remark to hear addressed to the visitor in a blues song—especially one about 10,000 men who are 'just out of jail', sung by a narrator who has women standing at his window and sweeping his room—while in a 'Little Robin Redbreast' nursery rhyme that is apparently quite separate from the one Dylan almost quotes from in 'Wiggle Wiggle', we find another visitor and the 'Dylan line' verbatim: 'Little Robin Redbreast / Came to visit me / This is what he whistled / "Thank you for my tea."'

In strong contrast, Dylan imports into an earlier part of his song a phrase that is also straight from a nursery rhyme—within which it is explicable, mild and unexceptional but becomes, plucked out of context by Dylan and released like a wild card into the realms of free play, so bizarre that people commenting on the album tend to pick it out as one of Bob Dylan's truly weirdest moments. The phrase is 'eat off his head', and here it is in its nursery rhyme context: 'A long-tail'd pig / Or a short-tail'd pig / Or a pig without any tail / A boar-pig or a sow-pig / Or a pig with a curly tail / Take hold of the tail and eat off his head / And then you'll be sure the pig hog is dead.'

This nursery rhyme is actually a street-vendor's cry from the 18th century, when sellers with trays of little sweetmeat pigs were common. The clinching salesman's couplet at the end there is designed to charm, not frighten, the children. When Tom Tom the piper's son stole a pig and away he run, it was this sort of pig he stole, not a real one. Dylan steals it too—he takes it and runs it right inside the madness of a luridly jealous mind: 'Hey! Who could your lover be? / Let me eat off his head so you can really see.'

It's a reversal as neat as it is bizarre to shift eating off his head so you can 'be sure the pig hog is dead' to eating off his head 'so you can really see' who he is underneath, which, as it were, turns on its head the most basic notion of how to tell one person from another. (Dylan makes a different reversal from the same nursery rhyme decades earlier, in Tarantula, in which 'the pig jumps on him [the good samaritan] & starts eating his face'.) Why someone with 10,000 women in his room should be jealous of his visitor's lover is as unexplained as everything else in this disjunctive narrative.

Inasmuch as the women are 'Spilling my buttermilk, sweeping it up with a broom' they are also brushing the nursery rhyme world, in which 'Milkman, milkman, where have you been? / In Buttermilk Channel up to my chin / I spilt my milk and I spoilt my clothes.' That last line is almost replicated, in its phrasing and its rhythmic thrust, in the Oh Mercy song 'Where Teardrops Fall': 'I've torn my clothes and I've drained the cup', while that 'Buttermilk Channel' might remind us too of 'the Buttermilk Hills', whose silence sounds like 'a voice cryin' "Daddy"' in 'Caribbean Wind', an earlier 1980s Dylan song. A woman sweeping a room with a broom also occurs in the long nursery rhyme 'Two Little Kittens', in which 'The old woman seized her sweeping broom / And swept the two kittens right out of the room.' These brooms occur in other Bob Dylan songs too, as it happens: songs before and after Under the Red Sky. In the Basement Tapes song 'Please Mrs. Henry' (1967) the singer declares himself 'ready for the broom' and in 'Million Miles', on Time Out of Mind (1997) a metaphoric broom is implicit in 'Gonna find me a janitor to sweep me off my feet'.

And so too 'Cat's in the Well' (mentioned as a song of barnyard apocalypse in the entry on Howlin' Wolf). More substantially than '10,000 Men', and in amongst its end-of-the-world material, this eloquent song uses nursery rhyme aplenty, and a little fairytale too, starting with the obvious founding of Dylan's title upon the well-known 'Ding dong bell, pussy's in the well' and/or on a more obscure nursery rhyme featuring a more exactly equivalent feline: 'Dingle dingle doosey / The cat's in the well / The dog's away to Bellingen / To buy the bairn a bell.'

Wells themselves, of course, for the modern western urban listener, are objects of another age. 'Jesus Met the Woman at the Well' evokes one of the ages they represent; in the blues, they are resonant of a life of hand-drawn water in the southern pre-war rural backwoods, and they can evoke equally the life of medieval Europe in folksong and the magic wishing-well that is an essential prop in fairytale.

This is not the only moment in 'Cat's in the Well' where nursery rhyme and blues lyric poetry fuse into one. 'Bumpity Bump' is the title of a Joe Turner-style early record by Smiley Lewis, a vaguely farmyardish piece of nonsense in which instead of cat and wolf 'the dog jumped the rabbit' (the chant 'hop, skip and jump' exactly replaces Turner's own 'Flip, Flop and Fly' on the song of that name) and as for the dog, 'his heart went bumpity bump.' But Dylan's horse going bumpety-bump has a much earlier and more direct ancestry, and one in which, as in the Dylan song, there is father-daughter difficulty, a wild creature invading the domestic scene and much falling down. This is the nursery rhyme 'A Farmer Went Trotting': 'A farmer went trotting upon his grey mare / Bumpety bumpety bump / With his daughter behind him so rosy and fair / Lumpety lumpety lump / A raven cried "Croak!" and they all tumbled down / Bumpety bumpety bump / The mare broke her knees and the farmer his crown / Lumpety lumpety lump.'

Meanwhile in 'Cat's in the Well' Back Alley Sally is doing the 'American Jump'—yet another game with a rhyme to go with it, and one in which the theme of falling down recurs: 'American jump, American jump / One—two—three! / Under the water, under the sea / Catching fishes for my tea / Dead or alive?' The game, like the farmer's grey mare, holds together child and grown-up. The grown-up holds the child's hands and jumps her up and down till the word 'three', at which there's an extra-big jump so that the child's legs twist around the grown-up's waist; while saying 'under the water' the child is held but falls slowly backwards; when asked 'Dead or alive?' if the child answers 'alive' she's pulled up again, if 'dead' is allowed to fall down and if 'around the world' is whirled round and round.

This is an appealing fantasy-version of how we face life, death and the world around us: a version in which, improbably, we choose our own fate and determine our own future. It's an ironic reference on Dylan's part, in a song which, like so much of his recent work, seems preoccupied with less rosy views of how we face life, death and the world around us. It's a further irony that Back Alley Sally—an appellation that could equally suit a child or an adult—appears to be playing this game by herself.

Like 'Cat's in the Well', many nursery rhymes are set around farmyards, and it is no surprise that a number of their dramas take place in barns. There's the English 'There was a little boy went into a barn' and the American 'Jemmy Jed went into a shed', and there's the muted drama of this better-known nursery rhyme, in which well-being within the ordered domain of the farmyard is threatened not by the unpredictable swooping down of wolf or raven but by that regular enemy, the winter, against which the barn offers some (limited) protection: 'The north wind shall blow / And we shall have snow / And what will poor robin do then, poor thing? / He'll sit in a barn / And keep himself warm / And hide his head under his wing, poor thing.' Before winter comes, the typical 'picture-book farm' scene, which Dylan's song parallels, is as laid out for us in this nursery rhyme: 'The cock's on the woodpile a-blowing his horn / The bull's in the barn a-threshing of corn / The maids in the meadows are making of hay / The ducks in the river are swimming away.' (Is the widespread popularity of such formulaic verses perhaps the explanation for the term 'a cock and bull story'? Were these verses in such common currency that their opening lines recognisably ushered in a particular kind of fiction: that is, a children's story in which things are idealised and simplistic?) In any case, Dylan parallels the nursery rhyme's 'a-blowing' and 'a-threshing' with his own 'a-sticking' as well as assembling his parallel menagerie, with cat, wolf, lady, horse, bull, servant and dogs in place of cock, bull, maids and ducks.

The line about the bull in the barn has proved popular: it is retained in a 1740 manuscript from Wiltshire published in the British journal Folk-lore in 1901, while a chant collected by Alice Bertha Gomme in the 1890s in her Traditional Games of England, Scotland and Ireland is even called 'The Bull's in the Barn'. Dylan's expressing this in reverse, in that lovely line 'The barn is full o' the bull', is one of his funny, graphic touches, not only punning playfully—his reversal of words letting the contemporary Americanism of 'you're so full of bull[shit]' chime alongside the old nursery rhyme language—but more arrestingly conjuring up such a swift comic picture, yet drawing on our sense of the bull's fundamental character: its bulging muscularity, its hugeness, its bull-at-a-gate, bull-in-a-china-shop unwillingness to be contained (its bullishness), and the equally vivid picture of the story-book or comic-strip barn's propensity to be so full that it strains and creaks and bulges.

Dylan is not finished with nursery rhyme and story there. The 'Dylanesque' couplet 'The cat's in the well and Papa is reading the news / His hair's falling out and all of his daughters need shoes' brings together a handful of such antecedents. It is a North African belief that ancient stories—myths and fairytales—that revolve around the breaking of a taboo (such as the opening of a for-bidden door) should never be told out loud in the daytime. To do so (to be heard 'reading the news') is to risk having your hair fall out. 'The Shoes That Were Danced to Pieces', sometimes called 'The Twelve Dancing Princesses', is a Brothers Grimm fairytale in which the king is tearing his hair out because despite locking them up in their room every night, every morning all of his daughters need new shoes, having danced the old ones to pieces. The pairing of 'news' and 'shoes' occurs in a rhyme for the paring of finger-nails ('Cut them on Wednesday, you cut them for news / Cut them on Thursday, a new pair of shoes') while one of the 11 verses of 'Old Mother Hubbard' goes 'She went to the cobbler's to buy him some shoes / But when she came back he was reading the news.'

Shoes and alleys figure too in the album's purposive, dignified and beautifully performed title-song—see separate entry. With great originality it pleaches the poetry of nursery rhyme and folklore, fairytale and the Bible into a 'simple', memorable whole. It is the song that sets the tone and establishes the territory for the better-intentioned, serious-minded, parts of the album.

There is, in addition to its unique and creative use of nursery rhyme, some fine, fresh writing and some sumptuous vocal performance, on Under the Red Sky: an album that offers, in particular, three wholly worthy additions to Bob Dylan's body of work in 'Under the Red Sky', 'Handy Dandy' and 'Cat's in the Well'. This last, on top of its already-catalogued virtues, contains one of the best lines of writing on the album, the deft, sharp stab of the second line of this couplet: '. . . the gentle lady is asleep / . . . silence is a-stickin' her deep.' This image, vivid and surprising, sudden and steely, in which silence is evoked as a pinioning visitation, a compressive staunch, seems to draw its blade of intensity from traditional ballads like 'Love Henry' without losing the good-humoured patoiserie of contemporary American street-talk.

Any listener ever exhilarated by what Philip Larkin called that 'cawing, derisive voice' and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN called 'the toughest voice I had ever heard . . . somehow simultaneously young and adult', and drawn into the churning worlds Dylan has evoked—any such listener to Under the Red Sky is going to hear within its nursery rhymes and fairytale landscapes many echoing shouts of joy and rejuvenation all the way from Highway 61 and the Basement. The distinctive achievement of this album and no other, is the tugging dynamics that come from combining this voice with that sensibility.

In all, alongside the innumerable quotes from and reminders of blues, R&B and rock'n'roll songs and the many allusions to biblical text, Under the Red Sky (a very short album) makes direct raids on 32 nursery rhymes and game-songs, and offers demonstrable correspondence with three fairytales and a further 15 nursery rhymes, not counting variants.

The first review Dylan's work ever attracted, back in the New York Times in September 1961, alluded to his Chaplinesque quality. It is a quality that phases of ennui, bitterness and portentousness have occasionally suggested has vanished; but here it is again, rocking back on its heels, nimble and light. When your heels are nimble and light is, in any case, the best time to be serious, as the language of rhyme and song for children reminds us. Dylan uses this nursery rhyme and fairytale with an imaginative adult intelligence, to re-walk the corridors of the childhood psyche, to liberate some vivid imagery from under the bushel of superficial riddle, and to give his songs the same underpinning in eternal verities that he gets from folk and blues. 'Strap yourself to a tree with roots', he sang, so long ago that at the time those for whom he embodied the integrity of restlessness thought he was joking. He wasn't, of course.

[Bob Dylan: 'This Old Man', Malibu, CA, early 1991, issued on the Various Artists album Disney for Children, Disney 60616-2, LA, 1991. Sam Cooke: 'Shake', nia, RCA Victor 47-8486, NY (RCA 1436, UK), 1965. Hank Ballard & the Midnighters: 'Sexy Ways', Cincinnati, 24 Apr 1954, Federal 12185, Cincinnati, 1954. The Accents: 'Wiggle Wiggle', NY, 1958, Brunswick 55100, US (Coral Q 72351, UK), 1958; CD-reissued The Golden Age of American Rock'n'Roll Volume 5, Ace CDCHD 600, London, 1995. Henry Thomas: 'Don't Ease Me In', Chicago, 13 Jun 1928 & Sam Collins: 'The Jailhouse Blues', Richmond, IN, or Chicago, c.25 Apr 1927; Really! The Country Blues, Origin Jazz Library OJL-2, NY, c.1961. Smiley Lewis (with the Dave Bartholomew band): 'Bumpity Bump', New Orleans, Mar 1955, Imperial 5356, US, 1955.

For details re Iona & Peter Opie's work, and their sources, see the endnotes to nursery rhyme, Dylan's use of, an introduction. Don Was, LA, 15 Oct 1990, published The Telegraph no.37, UK, winter 1990. Philip Larkin, in 'Jazz Review', Daily Telegraph, London, 10 Nov 1965, quoted in E. Thomson & D. Gutman, eds., The Dylan Companion, London: Macmillan, 1990. Bruce Springsteen: speech at Dylan's induction into the so-called Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, NY, 20 Jan 1988. Robert Shelton: 'Bob Dylan: A Distinctive Folk Song Stylist: 20 Year Old Singer is Bright New Face at Gerde's Club', New York Times, 29 Sep 1961.]

O

O'Brien, Brendan [1960 -] Brendan O'Brien was born in Atlanta, Georgia, on June 30, 1960. His production credits include the 2005 album by JAKOB DYLAN's band the Wallflowers, Rebel, Sweetheart.

He has also worked with BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, first on the album The Rising, released in 2002 and again on the 2005 album Devils & Dust. Springsteen says he tried recording the latter's title track as a rock song and as an acoustic ballad, but that it took producer O'Brien to bridge the gap. 'Brendan found something that put it in the middle,' Springsteen testified, 'where it picks up a little instrumental beef as it goes.' The same goes for the rest of the album, reportedly, on which O'Brien also plays bass; Springsteen thanks O'Brien for helping to rescue it from being another Ghost of Tom Joad (1995), giving Devils & Dust 'a more fleshed-out approach'.

If true, he has more to thank O'Brien for than Dylan has. All he did for 'Dignity' was ruin it. This outtake from the Oh Mercy sessions, suiting our times, is quick-on-the-ear, in effect quick-on-the-eye, and dancingly alert. It rollicks along, as 'on a rolling river': not cheap rockism 'n' roaring but real lithe Bob Dylan. It would have made a terrific opening track on Oh Mercy. Or rather, it would if they'd left it alone. When the unfinished outtake circulated among collectors, it sounded great. You could play it not only to non-Dylan-fans but even to people who thought they actively disliked him and they'd say it was great, and how come Dylan didn't release it, it would be a hit, you could just hear it on the radio . . . and you'd say, well, that's par for the course.

All it needed was an instrumental solo in the middle. It had an emphatic, compulsive rhythm that everybody loved, Dylan's vocals were strong and high in the mix, and his piano was Dylanesquely spiffing. One solo was all it needed . . . In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan acknowledges all this and more, as he describes the attempts to re-record it at the album sessions, bringing in Rockin' Dopsie and His Cajun Band:

> 'Once we started trying to capture it, the song seemed to get caught in a stranglehold. All the chugging rhythms began imprisoning the lyrics. . . . Every performance was stealing more energy. We recorded it a lot, varying the tempos and even the keys, but it was like being cast into sudden hell. The demo with just me and Willie [Green, drums] and Brian [Stoltz, guitar] had sounded effortless and it flowed smooth. Certainly, as DANNY [LANOIS] said, it didn't sound finished, but what recording ever does?'

So in the end, Dylan left it off the album, took it away from Daniel Lanois and in late 1994 gave it to that month's guru, Brendan O'Brien, then best-known as producer of Pearl Jam: and the first thing Brendan did was abolish its stand-out rhythm. Then he put all these silly 'modern' noises on. Then he pushed Dylan down in the mix so you hardly notice any piano at all and so that this long, immensely entertaining lyric, delivered with great panache by a Bob Dylan firing on something like all cylinders, is no longer accessible or ready to jump straight out of the radio at you but instead needs painful attending-to. O'Brien even made some small edits to Dylan's vocal, in his absence. Sometimes you wonder what it's gonna take . . .

That wasn't the last of it, either. Once they'd made sure it couldn't possibly be a hit, they released it on Greatest Hits Volume 3, in 1994—shortly before putting out another version, the limp live version on the MTV Unplugged™ album, in 1995. There, with Brendan O'Brien playing an organ that wouldn't have worked at all if it had been 'unplugged', and getting 'very special thanks' on the sleevenotes, the song emerges little better than the ruined studio version.

Three years later, the Brendan O'Brien version was dumped in favour of a mix of the original recording; weirdly, this was issued first on a compilation album for a TV series, 'Touched By an Angel', having apparently been heard fleetingly in the 100th episode of this inconsequential goo. After its inclusion on Touched By an Angel: The Album, this more dignified 'Dignity' was issued on the 2000 Dylan compilation The Best of Bob Dylan Vol. 2.

'Dignity' has never yet become a song Dylan cares to perform often in concert, though it isn't a rarity in his repertoire either; and when he does perform it, he's perfectly capable of turning it into dreary jobs-worthiness, like any other 'fast' song that he doesn't bother to know his own lyric for. Yet when he performs it feeling fully alive and happy with it as a vehicle of wide-ranging expressiveness, as he did in London in 1995, then it comes into its own again, leaving Brendan O'Brien light-years behind and re-attaining accessible eloquence, excitement and, yes, dignity.

(For more on the song itself, see also the entry 'Dignity'.)

[Bob Dylan: 'Dignity', New Orleans, prob. 13 Mar 1989. Dylan's comments on the song, Chronicles Volume One, pp.169, 189–90 & 191. The album sleeve credits for the Greatest Hits Vol. 3 mix of 'Dignity' are: Bob Dylan, vocals & piano; Brendan O'Brien, guitar, bass & keyboards; plus Steve Gorman on drums & Rick Taylor on banjo; production credit goes to O'Brien and Daniel Lanois (in that order). Touched By an Angel: The Album, 550 Music/Sony Music Soundtrax

BK 68971, US (Epic/550 Music/Sony Music Soundtrax 491828 2 (France/NL), 1998. Bob Dylan: 'Dignity', live in Brixton, London, 29 Mar 1995. 1st live performance was Bielefeld, Germany, 16 Mar 1995; after 10 performances that year, it wasn't rebooted till 2000.

Springsteen quotes seen online 15 Nov 2005 at www.brucespringsteen.net/news.]

Ochs, Phil [1940 - 1976] Philip David Ochs (older brother of the photographer and photo-archive owner Michael Ochs) was born December 19, 1940 in El Paso, Texas, lived in a number of places while growing up (including, for six months, in Scotland), became a fine classical clarinet player, graduated from the Staunton Military Academy, Virginia (high school), in 1958, majored in journalism at Kent State University in Ohio (later the scene of the slaughter of four unarmed students by the National Guard on May 4, 1970) and there discovered WOODY GUTHRIE's balladry and realised that he could use music to express his own ideas. He arrived in Greenwich Village in 1962. Always a political radical—such that his attendance at Kent State seemed almost prescient—he came to, and continued to write, 'protest songs' long after Bob Dylan, who once told him: 'You're not a folksinger, you're a journalist.'

Ochs' first album was the musically minimal All The News That's Fit to Sing (1964), and it was followed by I Ain't Marching Anymore (1965), which includes the dreadful 'Draft Dodger Rag' (sample line: 'I'm only eighteen, I got a ruptured spleen') but whose title track would become one of his signature songs, along with 'There But for Fortune', which became a hit for JOAN BAEZ. This was featured first, along with his much-covered and lovely ballad 'Changes', on Ochs' 1966 album Phil Ochs in Concert, an album of all-new material generally considered the high point of his recorded work, though given a close run by the following year's studio album Pleasures of the Harbor, recorded in California and orchestrated mostly by an outside arranger whose forté was working with Liza Minelli. This, the first album from a new record deal (A&M in place of Elektra), demonstrated Ochs' hopeless unsaleability: outselling his earlier records, it reached no.168 in the Billboard charts. Nonetheless, dated as it is, and created in response to hearing Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band and Pet Sounds, it is a poignant demonstration of Ochs' raw honesty and his determination to experiment.

By this point, most of his folkie contemporaries had become stars, in many cases major stars, and Ochs found it difficult to continue being so underregarded and unrewarded himself. He and Bob Dylan had always had an uneasy relationship, characterised by being ferociously acerbic with each other. ('You ought to find a new line of work,' Dylan once told him, and another time asked: 'Why don't you just become a stand-up comic?') The imbalance in this vitriolic discourse between the two came from Dylan's stratospheric rise in the world, exacerbated by the way that Dylan looked more and more beautiful and cool as time went by, while Ochs gradually exchanged the grace of youth for the pudginess of the drinker.

Early on, Dylan was nervous of Ochs' apparently burgeoning talent; later, Ochs was determinedly, heroically unsyncophantic about Dylan's mid-1960s success, famously telling him that compared to 'Positively 4th Street' Dylan's new single 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' wasn't particularly good—a verdict delivered while driving around with Dylan in a taxi, which Dylan, enraged, stopped and threw Ochs out of. Silly boys.

If Ochs and Dylan ever performed together in the Village, there is no record of it. They are known to have appeared together only once, at the Friends of Chile Benefit Concert that Ochs had organised at Madison Square Garden, New York, on May 4, 1974, at which Dylan sang 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue' and 'Blowin' in the Wind' with Ochs, DAVE VAN RONK, ARLO GUTHRIE, Melanie, PETE SEEGER and Larry Estridge behind him.

Ochs was far gone into schizophrenia and manic depression by this time. He had made a run of further albums in the period 1968–70—Tape from California, Rehearsals for Retirement, Phil Ochs' Greatest Hits (a sarcastically titled album of new material) and Gunfight at Carnegie Hall, which remained unreleased until 1974. In 1975, Ochs seemed to become swallowed up by a violent alter ego he named John Butler Train, and combined with his heavy drinking and a long-felt despair over the value of his own work, this damaging development left Ochs with few friends and little hope for the future. He desperately wanted to be included on Dylan's first Rolling Thunder Revue but Dylan wouldn't have him.

Their last encounter may have been at a birthday party for Gerde's Folk City owner Mike Porco on October 23, 1975, at which many of those being assembled for the Revue performed in front of HOWARD ALK's cameras. Late on, Ochs did a short set, which he concluded with a version of Dylan's largely ignored masterpiece 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune'. ROBERT SHELTON reported: 'Everyone at Dylan's table stood gaping at Phil' but 'Dylan praised Phil when he finished.'

Train insisted in an interview that he had murdered Phil Ochs—'he needed to be gotten rid of'—and on April 9, 1976, Ochs hanged himself in his sister Sonny's home in Far Rockaway, New York (also leaving a wife and small daughter). He was 35.

There have been two posthumous biographies: Marc Eliot's Death of a Rebel in 1979 and Michael Schumacher's There But for Fortune: The Life of Phil Ochs in 1996. Ochs' own works of prose include The War Is Over, a collections of articles published in 1968; the short essay 'The Art of Bob Dylan's "Hattie Carroll"', published in Broadside back in 1964; and his 'Open Letter from Phil Ochs to IRWIN SILBER, Paul Wolfe and Joseph E. Levine', again published in Broadside and again defending Dylan's art, in January 1965. He was acute too about the Dylan he saw live in White Plains, New York, on February 5, 1966, remarking: 'Dylan is like LSD on stage.'

Unlike many of his peers, Ochs himself has yet to be 'rediscovered'; thus lack of recognition the first time around remains compounded by neglect today. He isn't even mentioned in either Dylan's 2004 memoir Chronicles Volume One or in the great historic sweep of the No Direction Home film of 2005. It's almost adding insult to injury to note that he has been memorialised by Billy Bragg (the singing Neil Kinnock) in his song 'I Dreamed I Saw Phil Ochs Last Night'.

[Phil Ochs: All the News That's Fit to Sing, Elektra EKL-269, US, 1964; I Ain't Marching Anymore, Elektra EKL-287 & EKL-7287, US, 1965; In Concert, Elektra EKS-7310(S), US, 1966; Pleasures of the Harbor, A&M SP4133, US, 1967; Tape from California, A&M SP4148, US, 1968; Rehearsals for Retirement, A&M SP4181(S), US, 1969; Phil Ochs' Greatest Hits, A&M SP3125, US, 1970; Gunfight at Carnegie Hall, A&M, SP-9010, Canada, 1974.

Phil Ochs, The War Is Over, New York: Collier Books, 1968; 'The Art of Bob Dylan's "Hattie Carroll"', Broadside no. 48, NY, 20 Jul 1964, p.2; 'An Open Letter from Phil Ochs to Irwin Silber, Paul Wolfe and Joseph E. Levine', Broadside no. 54, 20 Jan 1965. Billy Bragg: 'I Dreamed I Saw Phil Ochs Last Night', nia, Internationale, nia.

Sources include Sandy Carter's fine piece 'The Legacy of Phil Ochs', seen online 5 Jan 2006 at www.zmag.org/zmag/articles/nov97carter.htm; the discography at www.warr.org/ochs.html & the bibliography at www.cs.pdx.edu/~trent/ochs/books.html, both online ditto; the anonymous profile on the Cosmic Baseball website seen online at www.cs.pdx.edu/~trent/ochs/books.html 14 Nov 2005 & the piece 'Phil Ochs 1940–1976', online ditto at http://folkfanlcb89.tripod.com/id53.html. Marc Eliot, Death of a Rebel, Garden City, NY: Anchor Press, 1979. Michael Schumacher, There But for Fortune: The Life of Phil Ochs, New York: Hyperion Press, 1996. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin 1987 edn., pp. 451–52.]

Odetta [1930 -] Odetta Holmes Felious Gordon was born on the last day of 1930, in Birmingham, Alabama, but she grew up from the age of six in LA with her mother and a sister, took singing lessons at 13 studying music at City College and became an actress, teacher and songwriter but more significantly a singer, at first hovering between musical shows and folksong but soon plumping for the folk. She had appeared in Finian's Rainbow through summer 1949, during which she first encountered the blues in the form of SONNY TERRY; in 1950 she was in San Francisco playing in Guys and Dolls, and there discovered the local folk scene. Her first concert, in San Francisco in 1952, co-produced by folksinger Rolf Kahn and the 18-year-old LYNN CASTNER (at whose Minneapolis apartment Dylan would first hear WOODY GUTHRIE's records) had people queuing round the block; her New York début, achieved only by taking time off from her work as an LA housekeeper, was in 1953 at the Blue Angel. Then came a short-lived duo, Odetta & Larry, yielding her début album, The Tin Angel (the name of a Philadelphia club), recorded in 1953 and '54, on which it's clear that the competent Larry Mohr, on banjo and vocals, was utterly superfluous. Less was Mohr, she must have decided. In 1956 came the solo Odetta Sings Ballads & Blues, and the next year At the Gate of Horn, recorded not live at the Chicago club but in the studio, and with BILL LEE on bass.

She was encouraged through the 1950s by many in the music business, especially HARRY BELAFONTE, on whose 1959 TV Special she appeared to great effect. This can be readily imagined by anyone who saw the vintage footage of Odetta performing 'Water Boy' shown within SCORSESE's No Direction Home in 2005, on which the stark, ferocious power of her field-holler delivery and explosive use of the sound-box on her guitar were matched only by her terrifying teeth. This all leapt out at the viewer across a 50-year divide to explain instantaneously why Bob Dylan had found her so revelatory and important to his early entrancement with folk—and when it was new, such a performance must have exploded into Eisenhower America's living rooms as the nightmare embodiment of the nation's oppressed ex-slaves rising up as if to start a slaughter of revenge.

But Odetta was no field-hand, as made clear when, appearing at Belafonte's Carnegie Hall concert of May 1960—billed above Miriam Makeba and the Chad Mitchell Trio—she followed a medley of 'I've Been Driving on Bald Mountain' and 'Water Boy' with a double act with Belafonte on that tiresome old LEADBELLY song 'There's a Hole in the Bucket', on which the timing and delivery of her spoken lines is that of a professional actress. To track back through her 1950s recordings is to recognise that despite the marvellous ferocity of 'Water Boy', the great majority are understandably invaded by the well-spoken gentility and concert-platform formality of musicianship that were prevalent in 1950s folk music, despite the way that both the blues and rock'n'roll had demonstrated the artistic glory to be had from abolishing these aspirations.

In Minneapolis at the start of the 1960s, JAHANARA ROMNEY (aka Bonnie Beecher) told The Telegraph 30 years later, 'Odetta was coming to town . . . so me and Cynthia Fisher were plotting as to how we could get Dylan to meet Odetta and play for her. . . . And in fact he did meet her. . . . Cynthia Fisher came running over to my house . . . saying

"She said that Dylan had real talent and he can make it!"'

This thrilled Dylan, keeping his determination fully charged, and encouraging his inclusion of Odetta repertoire items in his own. Years later, Dylan would specify that he had devoured Odetta Sings Ballads and Blues, her 1956 album: 'I learned all the songs on that record,' he said: '. . . "Mule Skinner", "Jack of Diamonds", "Water Boy", " 'Buked and Scorned".' He may also have learnt 'Devilish Mary', 'Ain't No More Cane' and 'No More Auction Block' from early Odetta recordings.

In 1960 she appeared at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, made a flurry of albums, including Odetta at Carnegie Hall, and was an acceptable guest on Ed Sullivan's TV show 'Toast of the Town' that Christmas Day—but was criticised for 1962's Odetta and the Blues because it was 'closer to jazz than folk', as Time put it. This LP featured a combo of jazz musicians, including pianist Dick Wellstood, who that year also played on a couple of The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan sessions. Switching labels again she made two albums for the heavyweight RCA (Belafonte's label), the second of which, Odetta Sings Folk Songs, in 1963, made the top 75 album charts. It included her 'Blowin' in the Wind'—and by 1965 she had recorded Odetta Sings Dylan.

BRUCE LANGHORNE plays guitar and tambourine, and the tracks are 'Baby, I'm in the Mood for You', 'Long Ago, Far Away', 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time', 'Masters of War', 'Walkin' Down the Line', 'The Times They Are a-Changing', 'With God on Our Side', 'Long Time Gone' and 'Mr. Tambourine Man': a mix of the obvious with the far from obvious, revealing that she had paid Dylan's work, including unreleased material, close attention.

Odetta has also written songs, appeared in films—including Tony Richardson's film of the William Faulkner novel Sanctuary in 1961 and, uncredited, in Paul Newman's extravagantly titled The Effects of Gamma Rays on Man-in-the-Moon Marigolds (1972). In late September 2005 she was one of the more effective performers at the London Royal Albert Hall's 'Talking Bob Dylan Blues: A Tribute Concert', no longer subduing the audience with 'Water Boy' but by taking 'Mr. Tambourine Man' at a punishingly funereal pace.

[Odetta: The Tin Angel, US, 1954; Odetta Sings Ballads and Blues, Tradition TLP1010, US, 1956; Odetta at the Gate of Horn, Tradition TLP1025, 1957; Odetta at Carnegie Hall, Amadeo Vanguard AVRS9027, US, 1960; Odetta and the Blues, Riverside RLP-9417, US, 1962; Odetta Sings Folk Songs, RCA LSP2643, 1963; Odetta Sings Dylan, RCA LSP3324, 1965. 'Talking Bob Dylan Blues: A Tribute Concert', London, 26 Sep 2005. Harry Belafonte: Returns to Carnegie Hall, NY, 2 May, 1960, RCA LOC-6007 (mono) & LSO-6007, US, 1962. Time, US, 23 Nov 1962, quoted from www.bobdylanroots.com/odetta.html; special thanks to Åke Holm's amazing discography at www.akh.se/odetta/index.htm; both seen online 10 Feb 2006.]

'Off the Top of My Head' [1965] See 'Horseman & the Twist-up Gang'.

Oh Mercy* [1989] A confident staunching of the flow, with an album that is accessible, authoritative and substantial. Attentively written, vocally distinctive, musically warm and produced with uncompromising professionalism, this cohesive whole is the nearest thing there is to a great Bob Dylan album of the 1980s. DANIEL LANOIS' determination to wrest such an album out of Dylan, and the plangent panache his production spreads across a variable collection of material, made for something overrated at the time (understandably, after what had gone before); but it remains a singular, welcome item in Dylan's huge back-catalogue. An honourable minor work, well-received by the public and reviewers, and marred only by the feeling that Dylan has one eye on that public approbation: that he is asking if this is the sort of album people want from him. It's all just a little too careful, guarded and stiff to be great Bob Dylan. Standout tracks: 'Where Teardrops Fall', 'Ring Them Bells', 'Most of the Time', 'What Was It You Wanted?' Tracks recorded but not selected: 'Dignity' and 'Series of Dreams'.

The making of the album is the subject of the fourth of the five main sections in Dylan's vivid memoirs, Chronicles Volume One, including thoughts on how the album turned out and on what he might have done differently if making the album again.

[Recorded New Orleans, Mar–Apr, 1989; released US as Columbia OC 45281 (LP) & CK 45281 (CD), and UK as CBS 465800 2 (CD), 12 or 22 Sep 1989. Chronicles Volume One, pp.143–221.]

Oldham, Spooner [1943 -] Dewey Lindon Oldham was born in Alabama on June 14, 1943. He rose to prominence as a keyboards session player, first at Rick Hall's Fame studios and then at the Muscle Shoals Sound studio in Sheffield, Alabama. He also formed a songwriting partnership with Dan Penn, yielding hits by Percy Sledge, Clarence Carter and James & Bobby Purify. Like almost every other session musician with any sort of 'name', in the madly extravagant music-biz milieu of the early 1970s, he got to make a disappointing solo album—in his case 1972's Pot Luck, on the Family Enterprises label (and with player support from Emory Gordy Jr., among others), on which Oldham sang and played organ and piano. The songs were mostly self-penned and fitted his profile as one of the creators of that particular 'soul country' R&B sound associated with Muscle Shoals. Ten years later, but in Japan only, came a truly solo album, Spare Change, on which he revisited some of the same material.

As a session man, his 1960s track record begins with Wilson Pickett and takes in Aretha Franklin, Etta James, the Purifys and Bobby Gross—and possibly ARTHUR ALEXANDER. (He claims to have played on the classic 'You Better Move On' but Alexander's biographer Richard Younger is not so sure.) In the 1970s he played on albums by RITA COOLIDGE, Duane Allman, ARLO GUTHRIE, MARIA MULDAUR, ROGER McGUINN, THE EVERLY BROTHERS, the Flying Burrito Brothers, NEIL YOUNG and more. Since then he has been on records by many of the same again, plus works by JOHN PRINE, J.J. Cale and definitely Arthur Alexander.

Spooner Oldham's unofficial website (detail below) claims that his first connection with Bob Dylan occurred at the sessions from which Columbia Records created the 1973 release Dylan and while no Dylan discographers list him, all concede that the session information for these dates is far from complete. Thus he may indeed have participated in the Nashville sessions of April 24–26, 1969, or even those in New York City in June 1970.

More certainly he was recruited to play keyboards (as was TERRY YOUNG) behind Dylan on the first gospel tour (San Francisco, November 1 to Tucson, December 9, 1979); on 'Saturday Night Live' that October 20; on the second gospel tour (Portland, Oregon, January 11 to Charleston, West Virginia, February 9, 1980); at the sessions for the Saved album back on Spooner's home turf at Muscle Shoals Sound Studio from February 11 to 15, 1980; at the Grammy Awards TV show that February 27; and on the third gospel tour (Toronto, April 17 through to Dayton, Ohio, May 21, 1980). He did not play on the subsequent, blazing tour of November–December 1980, in which secular material was re-introduced amid the evangelising songs. In total he played at 79 Bob Dylan concerts.

Now looking thin and frail, resembling in profile a cartoon poondog, Spooner Oldham lives around Rogersville, in north-west Alabama: a tiny town on the road east to Huntsville, on the other side of the big Wilson Lake from Muscle Shoals.

[Spooner Oldham: Pot Luck, Family Enterprises FPS-2703, US, 1972; Spare Change, AVI AVI-6120, Japan, 1982. www.geocities.jp/hideki_wtnb/spooneroldham.html gives discographical & other detail.]

'Omie Wise' [song] See 'Naomi Wise'.

omissions Time has naturally prevented the provision of an entry on many of those who have connected with Dylan in one way or another outside of those in categories deliberately excluded (background business people; album-cover designers; most photographers, journalists and editors; people whose only connection is having covered Dylan songs). Some of those who might have received an entry are rounded up here instead. No offence has been intended by this secondary listing:

Jerry Allison & Norman Petty, who with BUDDY HOLLY wrote 'That'll Be the Day'.

Joe Allison & Milton Estes, writers of '20/20 Vision', a nifty rock song Dylan has performed only once (more's the pity): in Austin, Texas, on October 25, 1991.

Emry Arthur (c.1900–1966), the rural Kentuckian who first popularised 'Man of Constant Sorrow' on record—a song included on Dylan's début album and deployed to immense effect in the film O Brother Where Art Thou? nearly 40 years later. Emry Arthur first recorded it in Chicago on January 18, 1928 for Vocalion and re-recorded it for Paramount in Grafton, Wisconsin, around September 1931 (on which it may be that the banjo is by Dock Boggs). Not only did he sign to Paramount as a recording artist but as a labourer in their factory.

Charles Aznavour, the French megastar chanteur, songwriter and film actor who wrote 'Les Bon Moments', which Dylan sang once in concert, on November 1, 1998 in New York City, in its English language version, 'The Times We've Known'; Aznavour is also the star of one of Dylan's favourite films, Shoot the Pianist (see film dialogue in Dylan's lyrics), and gets a namecheck in '11 Outlined Epitaphs' on the back sleeve of The Times They Are a-Changin'. In a 1987 interview in Rolling Stone, Dylan said: 'I like Charles Aznavour a lot. I saw him in 60-something at Carnegie Hall, and he just blew my brains out.'

Bill Monroe & the Blue Grass Boys, an influence on everyone remotely interested in country music, and an acknowledged influence on Dylan. But see Acuff, Roy. Monroe and Bessie Lee Maudlin co-wrote 'A Voice from on High', which Dylan performed as a concert opener six times in 2002, starting on August 15 in Hamburg, New York. Monroe also wrote 'Blue Moon of Kentucky', performed by Dylan in a version that segued out of 'I Walk the Line' as an encore duet with PAUL SIMON during 11 of their co-headlined concerts of summer 1999.

Bumps Blackwell, producer of LITTLE RICHARD's great 1950s records, dropped in on one of Dylan's Shot of Love sessions in April 1981 and gets a co-producer credit for the album's title track.

Otis Blackwell, composer of 'Don't Be Cruel' but also of 'Fever', which Dylan performed in San Francisco on November 22, 1980, in Seattle eight nights later and at Clarkston, Michigan, on June 12, 1981.

The Blue Sky Boys made a significant recording of the traditional 'Mary of the Wild Moor' (aka 'Mary from the Wild Moor') on February 5, 1940 for Victor Records; it's a song Dylan sang very beautifully at 16 concerts in late 1980 through to June 1981.

Michael Bolton, the multi-platinum-selling embodiment of plastic 1980s man with whom Dylan co-wrote 'Steel Bars', a song so numbingly mediocre that you can't imagine what Dylan contributed, and which probably earned him more than the whole of Oh Mercy; the recording, on Bolton's 1990 album Time Love & Tenderness, perfectly demonstrates how the death-grip of the music industry sounds.

Boudleaux Bryant, composer of 'Take Me as I Am (Or Let Me Go)', recorded by Dylan on Self Portrait, and co-writer with his wife Felice of many EVERLY BROTHERS hits: among them 'Take a Message to Mary', also on Self Portrait.

Richard Bullock & Richard Whiting, composers of 'When Did You Leave Heaven?' (see Broonzy, Big Bill), which Dylan included on Down in the Groove and performed live seven times in 1989, once in 1990 and twice in 1991.

Paul Cable, an early Dylan discographer, author of Bob Dylan: His Unreleased Recordings, UK: Scorpion/Dark Star, 1978. Sammy Cahn & Jimmy Van Heusen were responsible for the awful 'All My Tomorrows', performed by FRANK SINATRA in the 1959 film Hole in the Head and which Dylan performed very badly just once, in Clarkston, Michigan, on June 30, 1986. Leroy Carr, one of the great pre-war blues artists, a pianist partnered by guitarist Scrapper Blackwell, and writer of the classic 'In the Evening (When the Sun Goes Down)', recorded beautifully by the 20-year-old Bob Dylan in Minneapolis on December 22, 1961 (see Romney, Jahanara). Carlene Carter, on whose version of Dylan's song 'Trust Yourself', recorded in LA in early 1993, Dylan contributed backing vocals. Ry Cooder, who co-wrote (with John Hiatt and Jim Dickinson) the song 'Across the Borderline', which Dylan performed in concert in 1986 with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS and revisited at the Guitar Legends Festival in Seville on October 17, 1991 backed by RICHARD THOMPSON on guitar. Sam Coslow & Will Grosz, composers of 'Tomorrow Night', the LONNIE JOHNSON million-seller from 1948, recorded by ELVIS PRESLEY in 1954 and by Dylan on his first acoustic album of the 1990s, Good as I Been to You in 1992. Frances J. Crosby & William H. Doane, writer and composer of 'Pass Me Not, O Gentle Savior', which Dylan sang five times in 1999. OLIVER TRAGER writes that his version of this 19th century hymn was 'eerily reminiscent' of the way the creepy Robert Mitchum character sang it in Night of the Hunter. Co-editor of Broadsheet magazine Sis Cunningham, a strong early New York supporter of Dylan, who died in a nursing home on 27 June 2004, aged 95.

Danny Dill & Marijohn Wilkin, writers of 'Long Black Veil', which Dylan knew from way back when (see Frizzell, Lefty and The Band) but which he sang in concert once in 1997—at Wheeling, West Virginia, on April 27—and four times in 1990. Dill also co-wrote, with Mel Tillis, 'Detroit City', performed in nearby East Lansing, Michigan, by Dylan on November 12, 1990, as the opening number of his concert. Danny DiMinno & Carmen Lombardo, composers of 'Return to Me' (see 'The Sopranos'). Dion DiMucci, whose song 'Abraham, Martin and John' (the composer credit goes to the pseudonymous-sounding Dick Holler) Bob Dylan and CLYDIE KING performed together with fine felicity in concert in 1980–81 (a total of 23 times, with Dylan on piano, beginning in San Francisco on November 9, 1980 and last performing it in London on June 30, 1981), and for whose retrospective CD collection Dion: King of the New York Streets (2000) Dylan contributes eloquent sleevenotes. Dylan also sang the Dion hit 'The Wanderer' as an encore duet with Paul Simon 11 times in July and September 1999 (a song written by Ernie Maresca). In the UK Dion hit twice over with this record—in early 1962 and again in 1976. Don & Dewey, who wrote and had a big 1957 hit with 'Justine', which Dylan used as the murky opening number at ten concerts in 1986, starting on February 15 in Adelaide, Australia. Max Dyer, 1970s Christian folkie composer of the obscure 'I Will Sing', performed by Dylan in Akron, Ohio, on one of his gospel tours (May 18, 1980).

Steve Earle, the country singer who opened for Dylan at some 1989 concerts, and whose song 'Nothin' But You' Dylan performed a couple of times in his own set on the same tour leg. Tommy Edwards, 1950s hit recording artist of, and Carl Sigman & Charles Gates Dawes, composers of, 'It's All in the Game': see King, Clydie. (Sigman also co-wrote 'Answer Me', aka 'Answer Me My Love', which Dylan sang at seven 1991 concerts.) Rohusuke Ei & Hachidai Nakamura, composers of the pop hit 'Sukiyaki', which Dylan attempted to perform in March 1986 in Osaka, Nagoya and Tokyo.

Dorothy Fields & Jimmy McHugh, writers of 'I'm in the Mood for Love'; see Domino, Fats. Bill Flanagan, whose 1986 book Written in My Soul, a series of interviews with singer-songwriters, included a long and fascinating section on Dylan. John Fogerty, prominent as lead vocalist and front-man of Credence Clearwater Revival before going solo in 1973, behind whom Dylan played at a jam session in February 1987 (see Taj Mahal, below) and for whom at the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame inaugural concert in New York on January 20, 1988, Dylan played guitar as Fogerty performed the old Clearwater favourite 'Born on the Bayou'.

Robert Friemark, BOB NEUWIRTH's art teacher, who is supposed to have written 'Vincent Van Gogh?', performed by Dylan, Neuwirth & GUAM 18 times on the 1976 Rolling Thunder Revue.

Donnie Fritts & Troy Seals, composers of 'We Had It All', performed 32 times by Dylan on the 1986 US tour with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers. Seals also co-wrote, but with Dave Kirby, 'No More One More Time', which Dylan performed at four concerts in 1990 and one in 1994.

Joseph Gallo (1929–72), gangster, subject of Dylan's Desire song 'Joey'. Lowell George, late lamented star of 1970s southern rock band Little Feat and writer of the truck-driving anthem 'Wil-lin'', which Dylan has performed nine times in concert: in 1990 in Dallas, San Antonio and Austin, Texas, on September 6, 8 & 9 respectively; in Mesa, Arizona, that September 12; in Springfield, Massachusetts, exactly one month later; in New York City that October 17; in Wichita, Kansas, on Hallowe'en, 1991; in Sunrise, Florida, on November 13, 1992; and at Fort Lauderdale on September 23, 1995. Haven Gillespie & Beasley Smith, who wrote the instant classic 'That Lucky Old Sun' in 1949. (See Charles, Ray and Foster, Stephen.)

Bob and Sidsel Gleason, friends of Dylan at whose home in East Orange, New Jersey, he often stayed in the early New York period, and where he was recorded performing ten songs in February or March 1961, on a tape that has circulated but never seen official release and contains the only extant version we have by Dylan of the Scott Wiseman song 'Remember Me (When Candlelights Are Gleaming)', sung sweetly; the Gleasons also provide the location cited by Dylan in another private recording, 'The Story of East Orange, New Jersey', a creaking tall story about chess fanaticism, that was released retrospectively on the CD-Rom Highway 61 Interactive but had been a track, years beforehand, on one of the earliest Dylan bootleg LPs. The Gleasons were already middle-aged when Dylan first met them, which was when they organised excursions by WOODY GUTHRIE from the New Jersey State Hospital in Greystone Park to the Village during Guthrie's first years as an in-patient (1956–60).

Glen Glenn, writer of the rockabilly song 'Everybody's Movin'' which he recorded himself in 1958—it was a small hit—and which Dylan performed in concert twice in 1988, twice in 1989 and once in 1990. Ellie Greenwich, songwriting partner of Barry Mann in the early-1960s pop years, at whose New York City house Dylan played some guitar instrumentals in the summer of 1984, perhaps as they tried to write a song together. The Mann & Weill team, 'workhorses in the Brill Building. . . . cranked out the home-run hits', as Dylan puts it in Chronicles Volume One, bumping his metaphors together.

Tim Hardin, whose 'Lady Came from Baltimore' Dylan performed three times in concert in 1994, after recording it at the June 1992 Chicago sessions produced by DAVID BROMBERG. Wilbert Harrison, minor R&B star whose 'Let's Stick Together' Dylan included on Down in the Groove. Red Hayes & Jack Rhodes, composers of the gospel standard 'A Satisfied Mind', included on Dylan's Saved album of 1980. Freddie Hart, composer and hit performer of the 1970s country song 'Easy Lovin'', performed once by Dylan in 2003. Nat Hentoff, veteran jazz journalist who wrote the sleevenotes to Dylan's second album and with whom Dylan concocted the 1966 Playboy interview. Dallas Holm, fellow Minnesotan songwriter, whose signature song 'Rise Again' Dylan sang as a duet with CLYDIE KING at 11 concerts on the 'Musical Retrospective Tour' of late 1980, once, at Clarkston, MI, on June 12, 1981 and on the 1992 Chicago studio sessions. Jim 'Catfish' Hunter, baseball star hero of the Desire outtake 'Catfish', issued in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3.

Michael Jackson & Lionel Richie, composers of the USA for Africa single 'We Are the World', recorded by the world and his wife in 1985. Michael Kamen, long-term Pink Floyd collaborator and musical director of David Bowie's 'Diamond Dogs' tour, conducted the Tokyo New Philharmonic Orchestra at the Todaiji Temple, Nara, Japan, in 1994, backing Dylan on his 'Great Music Experience' performances of 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall, 'I Shall Be Released' and 'Ring Them Bells' on May 20–22, from the final performance of which came a single release of 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall'. Two years later he was diagnosed as having multiple sclerosis, and he died at the age of 55 on November 18, 2003. Pee Wee King, Redd Stewart and Chilton Price, who wrote 'You Belong to Me' (see Vincent, Gene).

Baker Knight, writer of 'Lonesome Town': see Nelson, Ricky. Jim Krueger, composer of 'We Just Disagree', a hit for Dave Mason in the 1970s which Dylan sang 16 times in concert between November 1980 and October 1981. Red Lane & Larry Henley, composers of ' 'Til I Get It Right', performed 27 times in concert by Dylan in 1981.

Greg Lake, ex-member of British psychedelia-to-prog rock band Emerson, Lake & Palmer and co-writer of 'Love You Too Much' with Dylan and HELENA SPRINGS. Leiber & Stoller, whose 'Kansas City' Dylan sang in Kansas City in concert with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers in 1986; their names are mentioned many times elsewhere in this book, since they wrote many of Elvis Presley's biggest hits. Murray Lerner, director of the film Festival, released in 1967, which included Dylan footage, some of which shows up in SCORSESE's No Direction Home in 2005. Noah Lewis, the great jug band harmonica player, who sometimes gets a composer credit for 'Viola Lee Blues', performed as a one-off by Dylan in Sapporo, Japan, on February 24, 1997, and who wrote 'Minglewood Blues', which Dylan sang live twice in Europe in 1996. (See blues, inequality of reward in.) George Lois, co-director of Dylan's 'Jokerman' promo video. Eric Lott, author of Love and Theft, the 1993 book whose title Dylan loved and thieved for his 2001 album.

Eve & Mac MacKenzie, patrons, supporters and friends of Dylan in his early days in New York at whose house on 28th Street he often stayed and where three known Dylan home recordings were made (14 songs on November 23, 1961: the day after he completed recording his début album); ten songs surmised to be on December 4, 1961; and six more in September 1962; of this total of 30 numbers, six are instrumentals and on several others Dylan only plays guitar. They are sketched in briefly in Chronicles Volume One, in which Dylan says that 'Mack' had been a Brooklyn waterfront union organiser and that Eve had been a Martha Graham dancer. They are survived by their son Peter, who has recently been selling Dylan artefacts, including an original reel-to-reel tape of some of these recordings, at Christie's auctions in New York.

The McPeake Family, the Northern Ireland singing group, on whom Dylan was keen and from whom he may have learnt 'Wild Mountain Thyme', which he sang way back on the May 1961 Minneapolis tape, again (and most beautifully) at the Isle of Wight in 1969, four times on the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue and four more on the 1976 (duetting with JOAN BAEZ), and again in the first month of the Never-Ending Tour, in Cincinnati on June 22, 1988. The McPeakes reunited for a one-off concert at the Opera House in their home city of Belfast in early April 2005.

Ray Marcum & Ray Pennington, composers of 'Stone Walls and Steel Bars', the STANLEY BROTHERS song. The great contemporary blues interpreter Taj Mahal, for whom Dylan played back-up guitar, as he did for GEORGE HARRISON and John Fogerty, at a long jam session at the Palomino Club in Hollywood on February 19, 1987. Henry Mancini & Johnny Mercer, co-writers of 'Moon River': see Vaughan, Stevie Ray and Carmichael, Hoagy. Moon Martin, writer of 'Paid the Price', a one-off from Dylan in his second set at Toad's Place, New Haven, CT, on January 12, 1990. William May & Lillian Bea Thompson, composers of 'Red Cadillac and a Black Mustache'; see Smith, Warren. John Cougar Mellencamp, who produced Dylan's video for 'Political World', an unsuccessful single taken from Oh Mercy. Dorinda Morgan, composer of 'Confidential to Me' (aka 'Confidential'), which Dylan first performs, fragmentarily, way back in 1956—when it was still a hot hit by Sonny Knight—playing piano and sharing vocals with his teenage friends LARRY KEGAN and HOWARD RUTMAN (see earliest extant recordings, Dylan's), and which he returns to over a third of a century later at the remarkable Toad's Place evening in New Haven, CT, in January 1990. James Meredith, the subject of Dylan's song 'Oxford Town'; see endnotes to Time Out of Mind. Joe Morris, composer of the R&B classic 'Shake a Hand', which Dylan performed 22 times on the US tour of 1986 with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers.

Cecil Null, writer of 'I Forgot More Than You'll Ever Know', which Dylan includes on Self Portrait in 1970 and sang in concert in 1986. Webb Pierce & Merle Kilgore, who wrote 'More and More', a 1954 hit for Pierce which Dylan sang in concert in Houston, TX, on August 26, 1989 and with VAN MORRISON on January 18, 1998 in New York City. Chuck Plotkin, co-producer with Dylan of the Shot of Love album. Teddy Powell & Bobby Sharp, composers of 'Unchain My Heart' (see Charles, Ray.)

Otis Redding & Steve Cropper, joint composers of Redding's great record 'Dock of the Bay', which Dylan sang as a one-off in George, Washington State, on August 18, 1990. Dylan offered Redding the Blonde on Blonde song 'Just Like a Woman', and it's said Redding was keen to record it, but died too soon—though in fact that was on December 10, 1967. That could have been a great record too.

Marty Robbins, huge country-pop star whose biggest international hit was 'El Paso', performed as an instrumental by Dylan at two 1990 concerts; see also 'Romance in Durango'. Dick Robertson, Nelson Cogane & Sammy Mysels, writers of the old Ink Spots hit 'We Three (My Echo, My Shadow and Me)', which Dylan performed many times in the 1980s, mostly on the US tour with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers in 1986. Don Robertson & Hal Blair, composers of 'Ninety Miles an Hour (Down a Dead End Street)': see Snow, Hank. Rodgers & Hart wrote 'Blue Moon', which Dylan sings on Self Portrait. Fred Rose, composer of 'Wait for the Light to Shine', sung as a concert opener 31 times by Dylan between October 2001 and May 2002.

Joseph Scott, writer of 'Never Let Me Go': see Ace, Johnny. Glen Spencer, writer of 'Blue Bonnet Girl', a 1936 song by the Sons of the Pioneers, which Dylan performed as a one-off in Bloomington, IN, on November 1, 2000. Janine Smith, a surprise onstage guest in the middle of Dylan's Munich concert on July 20, 1981, at which she sang 'You Light Up My Life'; Dylan introduced her with this explanation: 'We just met somebody in the last town who's a real good singer. She's gonna come on here. . . . She's a young girl 16 years old. Her name's Janine Smith. I think she'd gonna be a big star someday. I don't know for sure of that, but she might be. Right now she don't have a record contract, but if there's any record producers out there looking for somebody to sign she's be good to sign. . . . She lives in Holland now. Give her a nice hand.' Shirley & Lee, big R&B stars of the 1950s, and never better than on the sexy (Shirley) and joyous (Lee) 'Let the Good Times Roll', performed five times in concert by Dylan with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers in June–July 1986, in a version neither joyous nor sexy. Shel Silverstein & Dennis Locorriere wrote 'A Couple More Years', which Dylan sang at four 'Musical Retrospective Tour' concerts in fall 1980 and then reprised, singing it with great tenderness, for the Hearts of Fire film in 1987. Jesse Stone, aka Charles Calhoun, a man born in 1901 yet who wrote the nihilistic rock'n'roll classic 'Money Honey', which Dylan performed in Ithaca, New York, on November 15, 1999, six months after Stone died at the age of 97.

Tampa Red, one of the great pre-war blues artists, whose songs 'She's Love Crazy', 'Love With a Feeling' and 'But I Forgive You' Dylan sang in concert all through his 1978 World Tour (49 times and 31 times in the first two cases) and whose 'It Hurts Me Too' he includes on Self Portrait.

Elizabeth Taylor, whom Dylan mentions playfully in song in 1963 when he was a young would-be bohemian and she was a glamorous Hollywood film star (he envisages in jest that he might 'make love to Elizabeth Taylor . . . / Catch hell from Richard Burton!', in 'I Shall Be Free').

Emmett Till, the subject of an early Dylan 'protest' song, 'The Death of Emmett Till', and the 14-year-old Chicago victim of an especially repulsive race murder, which was followed by a 1955 charade of a trial, the transcript of which has now mysteriously gone missing, and at which Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam were acquitted by an all-white jury. Both are now dead, but the FBI finally reopened the case in 2004.

Charles A. Tindley, the composer of spirituals who was a formative influence on THOMAS A. DORSEY and who among much else wrote 'Stand By Me' (not the Ben E. King song), a song almost as big in gospel circles as Dorsey's 'Precious Lord, Take My Hand'. Dylan performed the Tindley song in Merrillville, Indiana, on August 28, 1990. Bill Trader, composer of 'A Fool Such as I'; see Presley, Elvis. Merle Travis, significant guitar picker, taught to thumb-pick by the Everly Brothers' father Ike, and author of the marvellous 'Dark as a Dungeon', which he first recorded on August 8, 1946 in Hollywood and which Dylan performed marvellously, duetting with Joan Baez, 14 times on the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue, and which he has revisited seven times since: twice in 1989, twice in 1990, once in 1998 and twice in 2000.

Townes Van Zandt, a figure who almost brushes the Dylan story a number of times, but who was, specifically, composer of 'Pancho & Lefty', a song Dylan has sung a number of times, with and without WILLIE NELSON.

Jerry Jeff Walker, the country rock singer (actually named Paul Crosby, and from New York State), composer of 'Mr. Bojangles', a crafty, dodgy song that Walker had a hit with in 1968 but to which, on the Dylan album of 1973, Bob Dylan affords the best possible treatment, full of rich humane sound, through which he makes the lyric not just palatable but appealing, freeing the song to be better than it was: softly gritty, smudged images on a grand canvas instead of a pinched sermon in a mean tract. Karen Wallace, at whose apartment in St. Paul, Minnesota, Bob Dylan was first recorded as a tyro folksinger, back in May 1960; it hasn't been possible to trace her. Jim Webb, singer-songwriter who wrote 'Let's Begin', a song on which Dylan and Clydie King duetted many times on the 1981 tour.

George Weiss, Hugo Peretti & Luigi Creatore (great name, Luigi's), writers of Elvis Presley's Blue Hawaii movie hit 'Can't Help Falling in Love', which Dylan performs so funnily, fondly and terrifically on the 1970s Dylan collection. Donald White, subject of a very early Dylan 'protest song'; see Turner, Gil. Jimmy Work, Roscoe Reid & Joe Hobson, composers of the mid-1950s country hit 'Making Believe', which Dylan sang as a one-off at his Istanbul concert of June 24, 1990. J.B.F. Wright, composer of 'Precious Memories', which Dylan included on Knocked Out Loaded in 1986 and performed live three times: twice in October 1989 and once at Toad's Place, New Haven, CT, in January 1990.

William Zantzinger [sic], real life villain of the factually inaccurate but socially truthful and artistically inspired Dylan song 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll'. Paul Zollo, who secured an illuminating interview with Dylan about songwriting, for Songtalk magazine in 1991, despite the disquieting circumstances in which, it turns out, it was conducted. (In 1992, when the interviewer became the interviewed, we learnt that Dylan's publicist, Elliot 'Chewy' Mintz, had not only sat in on the Dylan interview but had tried to proscribe it beforehand and censor it afterwards. Beforehand, Mintz told Zollo 'not to ask [Dylan] about songs that were so old that he would have to wrack his brain'. During the interview, Dylan made unexceptionable allusions to HENDRIX, the songs 'People' and 'Feelings' and NEIL YOUNG, and Chewy wanted them all cut out, in case they were 'offensive'. Zollo said: '. . . he was in control of the whole scene.' Do you often read anything quite so depressing? Does it occur to Chewy that his interventions and proprietism are 'offensive'? There ought to be a special hell for people like Mintz, who sanitise and demean the very personality of the artist they are supposed to look after. Eternal fire is too good for them. Eternal tape-loops of 'Feelings' and 'People', maybe.)

ZZ Top, men with Rip Van Winkle beards whose song 'My Head's in Mississippi' Dylan sang three times in 1990, the first time being in Mississippi, in Oxford Town (where he sang that song too, for the first time in three decades) but with whom he arrived at the ASCAP award ceremony in LA on March 31, 1986.

[Bob Dylan on Aznavour, Rolling Stone, US, Nov/Dec 1987; on Mann & Weill, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.227; on the MacKenzies, p.66. Paul Zollo interview, Beverly Hills, 14 Apr 1991, Songtalk vol. 2, no.16, US, 1991; Zollo interviewed The Telegraph no.42, UK, summer 1992. This entry has drawn more than a little, and gratefully, on Oliver Trager, Keys to the Rain: The Definitive Bob Dylan Encyclopedia, New York: Billboard, 2004.]

'On the Street Where You Live' [1956] Dylan has shown a penchant for this Broadway musical number, from Alan J. Lerner & Frederick Loewe's My Fair Lady, in at least three songs of his own, all written in the period 1969–74: 'Tonight I'll Be Staying Here with You', from Nashville Skyline, 'Hazel', from Planet Waves, and most especially 'The Man in Me', from New Morning. For the lesser resemblances in the first two cases, see Nashville Skyline; but within 'The Man in Me', Dylan comes so close to the show-tune that he quotes it almost exactly, in words and melody. This is Dylan: 'But oh! what a wonderful feelin' / Just to know that you are near.' These are the lines from 'On the Street Where You Live', sung to Eliza Doolittle by the chinless wannabe boyfriend (lines which, like Dylan's, are placed at the start of the 'bridge' or 'middle eight' of the song): 'And oh! the towering feeling / Just to know somehow you are near' (to which is paired 'The overpowering feeling / That any second you may suddenly appear').

Most parents of people of Bob Dylan's generation owned a copy of a My Fair Lady album: either the Original Cast Recording or the film soundtrack LP; and in 1958 'On the Street Where You Live' was also a huge pop hit, not least a no.1 in the UK, by crooner Vic Damone.

[John Michael King: 'On the Street Where You Live', Original Cast Recording LP My Fair Lady, Philips RBL 1000, London, 1958; the show had premiered 4 Feb 1956, New Haven, CT, and opened 15 Mar 1956, NY; the LP was issued to coincide with the show's London opening, 30 Apr 1958. Both productions starred Rex Harrison, Julie Andrews & Stanley Holloway. Vic Damone: Columbia 40654, NY (Philips PB 819, London), 1958.]

On the Tracks* [fanzine] For whatever reason, the most significant Dylan fanzines have always been British, though Talkin' Bob Zimmerman Blues (see Styble, Bryan) was an early US pioneer, as was Look Back, though this was always obscure and underwent more management changes than was good for it. Both were soon dwarfed by the long-term, serious British contenders The Telegraph (see Bauldie, John) and Isis (see Barker, Derek & Tracy). But in 1993 came a new US publication, On the Tracks, from an outfit calling itself Rolling Tomes, based in Grand Junction, Colorado.

The format of On the Tracks was slim, large-page, and with plenty of photographs: and it looked so glossy and slick that it needed the counter-balance of the legend THE UNAUTHORIZED BOB DYLAN MAGAZINE printed under the title on its front cover. Issue no.1 was dated 'Summer 1993', included interviews with ROGER McGUINN, CAROLYN HESTER and JAKOB DYLAN, and seemed to have signed up a posse of prominent 'Dylan writers', including Edna Gundersen, David Hinckley, PAUL WILLIAMS, BERT CARTWRIGHT and STEPHEN SCOBIE. It was edited by Mick McCuistion with crucial assistance from his wife Laurie.

This didn't come cheap. The cover price was $8.50 (and that's 13 years ago). Perhaps no-one would have minded this had the fanzine gone on to establish itself as driven by some editorial imperative, some strong individual take on Dylan, some genuine stance; but no such virtue ever came out from between the lines. Yes, it allowed various writers to publish interesting material; it provided an outlet for a large number of interviews with highly relevant people; and its large shiny pages accommodated much photography—but it was not alone in any of that, and unlike others it had no personality, and to pick it up and browse around it was always to feel that it was less a magazine than a merchandising catalogue. The editorial content always felt like the smoke and mirrors behind which lay the serious business of disseminating a vast For Sale list of overpriced items like t-shirts, singles, badges and general collectibles.

On the Tracks may or may not return—its editor has long been said to suffer from debilitating bad health, which might explain the long periods when its editorial staff is incommunicado (see the representative experience of Jonathan D. Lauer, detailed in the entry Cartwright, Bert). The quarterly magazine itself seems to have been in limbo for quite some time; the Rolling Tomes website is still up there, inviting people to send in their money.

'Open the Door, Homer' [1967] 'Open the door, Richard', a line Bob Dylan uses repeatedly in his Basement Tapes song 'Open the Door, Homer' (a phrase he never uses in the song) comes straight from an R&B novelty item first recorded in the 1940s, revived in the 1950s by Ernie Barton & BILLY LEE RILEY (one of Dylan's favourite rockabillies) and in the 1960s by Pigmeat Markham and Bill Doggett. Hence how Dylan completes that chorus line: 'Open the door, Richard—I've heard it said before.'

Based on the catchphrase of a Des Moines vaudeville act by Dusty Fletcher (who took it from 1920s comic John 'Spider Bruce' Mason, Mason's lawsuit later claimed), it was written by Jack McVea, first recorded by Jack McVea & His All-Stars in 1946 and became a huge R&B and pop charts hit of 1947, the catchphrase itself something of a national craze on the back of it. The record also has a niche in popular music history in being the first with a fade-out ending in its own right.

The record was covered by, and a huge hit on the same two charts for, Count Basie, black vocal group the Three Flames, Dusty Fletcher himself and the influential Louis Jordan & His Tympany Five (all 1947), engendering other pop chart hit versions, 'answer records' and more.

Dylan's Basement Tapes song was recorded at 'Big Pink' in West Saugherties, New York, in September or October 1967, first circulating as a music publishing demo from his UK music publishing outfit Big Ben Music, so becoming one of the first tracks floating around when bootleg records were new and thrilling. It was released on the official Basement Tapes album in 1975. He has never performed 'Open the Door, Homer' live.

Despite not singing 'Homer' in the song even in the studio, Dylan has always been keen on the name. Not only does he get a namecheck in this song title but he pops up as a character in Tarantula—'Homer, the slut': hence ANDREW MUIR's fanzine of that name—but he ends Dylan's prose poem 'Alternatives to College' too, and aptly:

'Homer on the gallows—his feet swollen & you wondering why there is no eternity & that you make your own eternity & why there is no music & that you make your own music & where there are no alternatives & that you make your own alternatives.'

[Bob Dylan: 'Alternatives to College', dating from 1965 but first published officially in Lyrics 1962–1985, in which is it copyrighted 1985. Recordings of 'Open the Door, Richard': Jack McVea & His All-Stars, Hollywood, Sep 1946, Black & White 792, LA, 1946; Count Basie, nia, RCA Victor nia, NY, 1947; the Three Flames, nia, Columbia nia, NY, 1947; Dusty Fletcher, nia, National nia, 1947; Louis Jordan & His Tympany Five, LA, 23 Jan 1947, Decca 23841, NY, 1947; Ernie Barton with Billy Riley, Memphis, 25 Feb 1959, nia; Pigmeat Markham, nia, Chess 1891, Chicago, 1964; Bill Doggett, nia, 1965. Detail from Jim Dawson & Steve Propes, What Was the First Rock'n'Roll Record?, Winchester, MD: Faber & Faber, 1992: but their source was 'Open the Door, Richard' by Tony Burke & Dave Penny, Blues & Rhythm no.17, Cheadle, UK, Mar 1985 & update in no.19, May 1986 & (by Jim O'Neill) no.21, Sep 1986.]

Orbison, Roy [1936 - 1988] Roy Orbison was born in Vernon, Texas, on April 23, 1936. He first recorded in 1956 ('Ooby Dooby') and wrote THE EVERLY BROTHERS hit 'Claudette'. He and his early group the Wink Westerners regarded one side of Texas as their terrain, enjoying a rivalry with BUDDY HOLLY & the Crickets from the other side. Orbison had his own local TV show sponsored by a local furniture store, on which an early guest was ELVIS PRESLEY. But it was after signing to Monument Records that Roy began to have his long run of huge hit singles, beginning with 'Only the Lonely' and taking in 'Blue Angel', 'Runnin' Scared', 'Cryin'', 'Blue Bayou', 'Pretty Woman', 'Dream Baby', 'In Dreams', 'It's Over' and 'The Crowd'.

When hip snobbery was rife in the late 1960s and 1970s, not one music paper or magazine would publish such a thing as a Roy Orbison interview, despite the fact that, uniquely, he had worked both at the Sun studio in Memphis and at Norman Petty's in Clovis, New Mexico, in the crucial mid-1950s. And despite the further credentials of his voice and those early-1960s singles, Orbison's mid-70s live appearances were perforce in cabaret clubs. No-one was listening or respectful of his artistry then. He was widely dismissed as a clapped-out, tawdry pop star, as passé as haircream and condoms, neither of which we thought we'd see again. When he died (of a heart attack in Hendersonville, TN, December 6, 1988), everyone said how they'd always loved him.

By then he had enjoyed a second wave of success, winning a Grammy for a duet with EMMYLOU HARRIS ('That Loving You Feeling Again'), his re-recording of 'In Dreams' becoming pivotal to David Lynch's 1986 film Blue Velvet, re-recording his masterpiece of soaring heartache, 'Cryin'', as a duet with k.d. lang, having an album of new material produced by ELVIS COSTELLO (which Orbison unfortunately died before the release of, and which gave him a posthumous hit single, 'You Got It' and became his highest-charting album), and standing alongside Dylan, GEORGE HARRISON, TOM PETTY and JEFF LYNNE as one of the TRAVELING WILBURYS (Lefty Wilbury, in fact).

He was the oldest Wilbury, with the best rock'n' roll credentials, and his lovely voice gave an invaluable counterweight to the gruff touch of the others. On the first Wilburys album it was the major track on which Orbison took lead vocals, 'Not Alone Anymore', that brought Bob Dylan back into the hit-singles chart for the first time in two decades.

Dylan paid him a less than fulsome tribute after his death (especially in contrast to how grandiloquent he waxed in tribute to JERRY GARCIA and JOHNNY CASH). Dylan said of Orbison only this: 'Roy was an opera singer. He had the greatest voice.' He made up for it in sheer garrulousness in his comments in Chronicles Volume One, where he takes a series of fumbled lunges towards pinning Orbison down. In the course of them he includes this: '[He] transcended all the genres. . . . His stuff mixed all the styles and some that hadn't been invented yet. . . . With Roy you didn't know if you were listening to mariachi or opera. He kept you on your toes. . . . He sounded like he was singing from some Olympian mountaintop and he meant business . . . singing his compositions in three or four octaves that made you want to drive your car over a cliff. He sang like a professional criminal.'

Perhaps Dylan had paid him a more proper tribute at his appearance at the second Isle of Wight Festival of Music on August 31, 1969—for the versions he sang that night of the traditional 'Wild Mountain Thyme' and his own 'To Ramona' and 'It Ain't Me Babe' were all strongly redolent of Roy Orbison's distinctive vocals—and all exquisite.

[Roy Orbison: 'Cryin'', Monument 447, 1961; Mystery Girl, nia, 1988, Virgin 791058 1, 1989. Roy Orbison & k.d. lang: 'Cryin'', nia, Bob Dylan: 'Wild Mountain Thyme', 'To Ramona' & 'It Ain't Me Babe', Isle of Wight, 31 Aug 1969, all unreleased and only ever circulated in particularly poor quality, despite many attempts to 'upgrade' them. Bob Dylan quoted from Chronicles Volume One, p.33.]

Østrem, Eyolf [1967 -] Born in Stavanger, Norway, on February 15, 1967, prolific Dylan-commentator and guitar tutor Eyolf Østrem first wondered about Dylan in 1980, bought Slow Train Coming (with no foreknowledge of its context or contents) in 1984 and became hooked in 1989.

Enjoying the wealth of tabs (tablature = the Renaissance-devised notation system for playing plucked instruments, showing which fingers press down on which strings where) and chord files available online, he decided to bring together some competent tabbers to put an authoritative chord & text representation of every Bob Dylan song online; not knowing who to contact, he started doing it himself. It has grown from that. But for Østrem, a vital part of www.dylanchords.com is the 'Self-Ordained Professors' section, a collection of writings (mostly his own) on Dylan's music, since this is so little written about compared to the words.

Owens, Frank [19?? -] Frank Owens is a widely respected jazz and popular music session man, and one of the pianists on Bringing It All Back Home and Highway 61 Revisited. He played on the June 15, 1965 session—the one that attempted, but did not clinch, 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', 'Sitting on a Barbed Wire Fence' and 'Like a Rolling Stone', but he was absent next day when 'Like a Rolling Stone' was achieved. The pianist on that second, fateful day was PAUL GRIFFIN. This is often disputed—but DEREK BARKER finally separated myth from fact 40 years later in his scrutiny of the sessions for ISIS no.120 in May 2005, in an incontestable analysis, helped crucially by a Don Hunstein photograph from the sessions which had emerged only in the booklet issued with the Bootleg Series Vol. 4: Bob Dylan Live 1966—The "Royal Albert Hall" Concert in 1998 (it's on page 19).

Owens was then the pianist on the afternoon session of July 29, replacing Griffin, who had played in the morning; he may have been the pianist at the July 30 session, while he and Griffin were both at the session on August 2nd. Therefore he can be heard, on official releases, on the versions of 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' and 'Sitting on a Barbed Wire Fence', plus a 'Like a Rolling Stone' fragment, on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991; on the Highway 61 Interactive CD-ROM of 1995; the version of 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh' on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack (2005), and possibly on the 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' on the same collection (though Paul Griffin is the one credited in the booklet). More importantly, Frank Owens is on Bringing It All Back Home and Highway 61 Revisited themselves, and on the hit single 'Positively 4th Street'.

Owens also earns this tribute from Paul Griffin himself. Here was a sideman, he said, so classy and so good that one time on stage at the Apollo in Harlem, he unwittingly stole the gig from the headliner. Who that was, he wouldn't say. On September 15, 2005, Frank Owens played at what would have been a celebration of Fats Waller's rhythm guitarist Al Casey's 90th birthday, at Saint Peter's Church in midtown Manhattan, alongside the Harlem Blues and Jazz Band and other pianists. Casey died four days too soon to be able to attend.

Pagel, Bill [1942 -] William Pagel was born in Chicago on May 15, 1942. He first became interested in Dylan's work back in 1962, after hearing Bob Dylan, his first album. A serious collector and archivist, Bill Pagel is the man behind the invaluable website BobLinks, which provides uncannily up-to-date information on Dylan's concert performances (and has concert archive pages going back to the fall 1995 leg of the Never-Ending Tour) as well as carrying a megalist of links to other Dylan-related web resources.

P

When Dylan is touring—as he so often is—you can go to BobLinks within hours of each concert and find, already posted, a reliable song-by-song set-list and running-order, plus the list of musicians who played that night. (You can often also find a punter's hopelessly over-enthusiastic 're-view' of the concert too.) All this information can also be accessed as lists of songs performed by year—including how many times each has been performed and on what dates, each date hyperlinked to that whole concert's set-list. Set-lists can also be accessed by date or by country, this last acting also, therefore, as a list of every country Dylan has performed in since 1995 (and when), from Argentina to Wales, each one broken down into towns played. Hence you can see at a glance, for instance, that Dylan played in 14 different Spanish locations in the years 1995–99, and in 21 Italians locations between 1996 and 2001.

The megalist of links is divided into three main sections: 'Pages Dedicated to Bob', 'Pages with Some Dylan Content' and 'Friends Along the Way'. As of September 2005 the first list has links to 119 Dylan-devoted sites, 17 sites with some Dylan material included, and 50 sites about people with Dylan connections. There are also listings of Dylan sites arranged by category—'Music & Writings', 'CDs, Records, Books, Tapes etc.', 'Images', 'News and Interviews', 'Miscellaneous Resources' and 'Market Place'.

Bill Pagel founded this site in 1995; within ten years it had been accessed over 11,000,000 times. Bill lives in the town of Dylan's birth, Duluth, Minnesota.

[BobLinks is at www.boblinks.org, or http://my.execpc.com/~billp61/boblink.html.]

Paley, Tom [1928 -] Thomas Paley was born in New York City on March 19, 1928. After undergraduate study he took a Master's degree in Mathematics and became a maths teacher before choosing a career as a musician (and photographer). He performed in a duo with WOODY GUTHRIE before co-founding the NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS, in which he played banjo, guitar and autoharp and sang. He left in 1962, formed the short-lived Old Reliable String Band but moved to Sweden from 1963 to 1965 before moving to England, which has remained his base. He has toured frequently in America and Europe, including as part of the New Deal String Band.

Bob Dylan's World Gone Wrong sleevenotes credit Tom Paley with having been the conduit for 'Jack-a-Roe' and 'Love Henry', but he doesn't specify (as he does re FRANK HUTCHISON and DOC WATSON) that he is referring to recordings. Nevertheless there are Paley recordings of both songs. (And, almost inevitably, a Paley recording of 'Little Maggie', which Dylan had singled out decades earlier but then recorded himself on Good as I Been to You in 1992.)

What Dylan says in the opening sentence of his liner-note on 'Love Henry' is that it is 'a "traditionalist" ballad. Tom Paley used to do it.' Not, that is, a traditional so much as a traditionalist ballad: one of those taken up by the traditionalist faction in the Great Folk Revival Wars of the 1950s and early 1960s.

'Folk music was a strict and rigid establishment,' Dylan says in the Biograph interview. 'If you sang Southern Mountain Blues, you didn't sing Southern Mountain Ballads and you didn't sing city blues. If you sang Texas cowboy songs, you didn't play English ballads. . . . You just didn't. If you sang folk songs from the thirties, you didn't do bluegrass tunes or Appalachian ballads. It was very strict.'

This gives the atmosphere but exaggerates the divisions. Apart from anything else, the songs cannot be divided that rigidly, since the same ones crop up inside different genres, as Sharp's very title English Folk Songs of the Southern Appalachians confirms. In the case of Tom Paley, while Dylan says that it is Paley from whom he took the traditional British ballad 'Love Henry' and the American broadside ballad 'Jack-a-Roe', Paley himself took 'Love Henry' from a book of folksongs field-recorded in Alabama, recorded it at the English home of EWAN MacCOLL and Peggy Seeger, and is also an enthusiast for music akin to the world of Frank Hutchison and pre-bluegrass.

What Karl Dallas calls 'the first and . . . most sensational folk-based pop music of the electric age, the American "hillbilly" string bands of the twenties whose records sold by the million', is, he says, regarded 'with peculiar reverence by American revivalists like MIKE SEEGER and Tom Paley', though he adds that they 'appear to treat it as a kind of musical fossil rather than as a fertile and creative source . . .' To which Dylan responds, in effect, in Chronicles Volume One, by saying this of Paley & Seeger's group the New Lost City Ramblers: 'I didn't know that they were replicating everything they did off of old 78 records, but what would it have mattered anyway? . . . For me, they had originality in spades, were men of mystery on all counts. I couldn't listen to them enough.'

Within the group itself, there developed a less roseate glow. Paley, a stickler for detail, didn't like starting a number until his guitar was precisely tuned. It came to be said that the group broke up because the others got tired of waiting. (In fact, Paley left the group in 1962, to be replaced by Tracy Schwarz. When they re-formed, made the album There Ain't No Way Out and in 1998 held a 40th Anniversary concert, Paley was not involved.) When writer Tony Russell found himself reuniting Paley and John Cohen some 20 years after the group's demise, he reports that instead of the warm embrace he'd expected between the two, Paley greeted his long-lost musical brother by asking for the return of a book of songs lent out to Cohen two decades beforehand.

Paley now lives in London in circumstances as modest as himself (he has never boasted of, nor cashed in on, his own credentials—which include having shared bills with LEADBELLY) and has done for very many years. He is a member of the Friends of American Old Time Music and Dance in England, and of the Swedish Fiddlers' Association (Sveriges Spelmans Riksförbund), having rejected violin lessons as a child but returned to the instrument and learnt it at the age of 47. His son, Ben Paley Gould, is a folk-circuit performer and plays with his father in the re-formed New Deal String Band.

[Tom Paley: 'Jack-a-Roe' & 'Little Maggie', NY, 1952, Folk Songs from the Southern Appalachian Mountains (10-inch LP), Elektra EKL12, NY, 1953; 'Love Henry', Beckenham, UK, 1964, on Peggy Seeger & Tom Paley: Who's Gonna Shoe Your Pretty Little Feet?, Topic 12T113, London, 1964. Information that Paley took 'Love Henry' from Folksongs of Alabama, & recorded it at the home of Ewan MacColl & Peggy Seeger, is from Paley (London, phone conversation with this writer, 22 Apr 1999).

Karl Dallas: 'The Roots of Tradition' in The Electric Muse: The Story of Folk into Rock, London: Methuen, 1975. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, p.238. Tony Russell, conversation with this writer, London, 1993.]

Pankake, Jon [1938 -] Jon Alan Pankake was born in Meeker County, Minnesota, on April 20, 1938. It was long assumed that one reason why Dylan did not have to rely upon LP reissues for hearing old blues in his early Minnesota years was that he had access to 78s owned by record-collectors like Jon Pankake. Yet when the CD box-set reissue of AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC emerged in 1997, it included Pankake's essay 'The Brotherhood of the Anthology', detailing his own discovery of this music: and stating that he was introduced to, and epiphanously excited by, the anthology itself in 1959 by his friend and University of Minnesota classmate PAUL NELSON—and that before this encounter their knowledge of folk music hardly ran further than a few records by PETE SEEGER and the other usual suspects (and that they couldn't even find GUTHRIE or LEADBELLY records locally).

Pankake's essay goes on to suggest that only after discovering SMITH (staying up 'late that night listening with astonishment to [its] strange music . . . so utterly unlike the "folk-music" we had heard') did he himself begin journeying into this 'music emotionally shattering yet culturally incomprehensible'. By inference, then, this must downplay the Pankake connection as a source for Dylan's Minnesota self-education in the mysteries of the pre-war blues, since it suggests that Pankake was hardly familiar with them much earlier than Dylan himself.

He and Nelson must have responded very fast. Pankake says that it was because they were unable to 'put aside the excitement of discovery' instilled in them by the anthology that they decided to found the small but fierce 'fanzine' The Little Sandy Review, 'devoted to discussing the difference between the "folk music" on the Anthology and the "folk music" represented by the artists and albums of the recording industry.'

Delving 'into a netherworld of collector's newsletters, record auction lists, jazz and blues scholarship, mimeographed ephemera and cranky antiquarian collectors', Jon Pankake must have responded fast too, to build up a collection of all kinds: fast enough that by some point in 1960 he could be, for Bob Dylan, a rich source of folk music on record, and of advice in person.

The music he played Dylan from his own collection included, according to ROBERT SHELTON, 'a Texas chain-gang song from an ALAN LOMAX album'. Asked, 40 years after the event, which record this was, Pankake could 'no longer recall exactly . . . I strongly suspect that the album in question was Alan Lomax's Texas Folk Songs. . . . It was a favorite of mine at the time and I would have been trying to introduce it to those who were interested in performing songs from the Library of Congress field-recordings. . . . I thought then—and still do—that Lomax was one of the best interpreters of the music he collected.'

Dylan 'borrowed' some of these records from Jon Pankake, and he showed great taste and shrewd judgement as to what was valuable in the items he took. The records included the début LP by ELIZABETH COTTEN (whose 'Oh Babe It Ain't No Lie' Dylan started to perform in concert over 30 years later, followed more recently still by a re-working of another of her songs, 'Shake Sugaree') and an important compilation LP titled Mountain Music—Bluegrass Style. The story of Pankake and Paul Nelson tracking Dylan down and recovering these records has been variously told, notably by Nelson in the MARTIN SCORSESE film No Direction Home, in which he's interviewed. Pankake, however, now denies that Nelson is referring to him at all: 'Dylan never mentions my name in the film. Paul Nelson never states a surname and describes his companion as a man of 6′ 4″. That's not me.'

In the film, Dylan comes close to still special-pleading a justification for his stealing of records, but in Chronicles Volume One he avoids the subject. He recalls, though, that it was Jon Pankake who 'had all the incredible records, ones you never saw and wouldn't know where to get . . . it was amazing that he had so many.'

As for advice, Dylan concedes in Chronicles that it was Pankake who derided his pressing on as a Woody Guthrie imitator, introduced him to the records of RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT to reinforce the point (these would duly be among the items Dylan lifted), and urged him to find his own voice and style. Dylan didn't want to hear this, at first: 'Pankake was no fun to be around'. Indeed Pankake is one of the very few people in Dylan's book to receive any adverse criticism. Much of Dylan's suspicion is based on the wrong assumption that Pankake was no musician (eventually, by his own account, he could play banjo, fiddle, harmonica, mandolin, autoharp and Hawaiian guitar, and has recorded with Uncle Willie & the Brandy Snifters). Hence Dylan fiercely resents Pankake being able to tell him anything much, and feels talked down to. Nonetheless, as he concedes, 'Pankake was right'.

Pankake now refutes Dylan's account. 'I regard Chronicles as largely a work of fiction.' He suggests that Dylan has 'confused' him with others. 'Dylan says I lived above McCosh's bookstore. I never did.'

Started in 1960, The Little Sandy Review was not only swift to scorn the kind of folk music offered by groups like the Weavers but was also first to break the news that Dylan had changed his name and given himself a fanciful biography. Yet it did so while running a very enthusiastic critique of his début album and a piece by Pankake on how radically Dylan had improved as a performer between leaving for New York City in the first place and returning to Minneapolis in late May 1961. What galled Dylan in particular was the description of how his appearance had changed from when he had first appeared in 1959 'well-groomed and neat in the standard campus costume of slacks, sweater, white oxford sneakers, poplin raincoat and dark glasses . . .' (How interesting to see from Chronicles Volume One the way that after all these years, Pankake's judgements continue to rankle with Bob Dylan.)

More generally Pankake and Nelson's magazine was a focus of debate about the value of traditional song versus social reform campaigning song—a debate Dylan joined on return visits to Minneapolis right through till 1963, when he visited TONY GLOVER and friends yet again. The Little Sandy Review folded after 30 issues in 1964, the year after Paul Nelson had moved to New York City and started writing for Sing Out! magazine.

Jon Pankake also contributed to Sing Out!, including, for example, a feature on TOM PALEY in an issue in July 1964. He has written sleevenotes for numerous albums and programme notes for concerts, and in recent years has written for The Old-Time Herald, notably a short piece about the value of reviewing, which included this paragraph:

> 'In my 38 years of writing reviews I have written some of the most negative reviews of folk music albums ever published. In them, I jeered the credibility of the performers, mocked their intentions, parodied their efforts, and questioned their integrity. What brought forth these torrents of bile? Two things: pretentiousness and ripoffs. In the days of The Little Sandy Review and the Great Folk Scare there was plenty of both in the market for recorded folk music, afloat as it was in major-label money and hustlers from every seedy corner of show business crowding onto the folk stage and snatching for their share of the loot.'

The Old-Time Herald also published Pankake's essay 'Dock Boggs: Memories & Appreciations' in 1998: the same year he won a Grammy for his essay in the Anthology of American Folk Music.

With Marcia Pankake (a professor and bibliographer at the University of Minnesota) he is author of The Prairie Home Companion Folk Song Book, 1988, republished two years later as Joe's Got a Head Like a Ping-Pong Ball. He remains a student advisor at the University of Minnesota, and for the year 1994–95 he won the John Tate Award for Excellence in Undergraduate Advising.

[Jon Pankake: 'The Brotherhood of the Anthology', Anthology of American Folk Music 6-CD box set (with copious notes by many hands and a CD-ROM of extras), Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997; feature on Tom Paley, Sing Out! vol.14, no.3, NY, Jul 1964; 'Dock Boggs: Memories & Appreciations', Old-Time Herald vol.6. no.6, Durham, NC, winter 1998–99; contributor to 'Issues in Old-Time Music—The Art of the Critique', Old-Time Herald vol.6, no.5, fall 1998; quote on Dylan on campus in The Little Sandy Review, in Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, Penguin edn., p.84; quote on Lomax & Texas Folk Songs, e-mail from Minneapolis to this writer, 17 May 1999; quotes re No Direction Home testimony & Chronicles Volume One, by phone to this writer, 24 Oct 2005. Minnesota Birth Index 1935–2002, file no. 1938-MN-015153.

Elizabeth Cotten: Negro Folk Songs and Tunes, Washington, D.C, 1957, Folkways FG3526, NY, 1957. Alan Lomax: Texas Folk Songs, Tradition TLP 1029, London, 1958 (CD-reissued Arion, France, 1991). Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, pp.248–49, 250–52, 253, 254.]

Parker, Christopher [1950 -] Christopher Parker was born in Chicago on November 23, 1950, into a family that moved around a lot, including to Mobile, Alabama, Seattle, Forth Worth and eventually

New York City. He played drums at age three and played his first professional gigs at age 11, backing strippers at Nino's Cocktail Lounge in Brookfield, Connecticut. Still in his teens he started recording and touring with PAUL BUTTERFIELD, and at 20 became a regular New York studio session drummer, including on film-score soundtracks and on the 'Saturday Night Live' TV series. He has played for everyone from Miles Davis to Cher and from Aretha Franklin to Michael Bolton (i.e. from the sublime to the ridiculous).

In 1988 Parker became the very first drummer on what would become known as the Never-Ending Tour, which was launched on June 7 in Concord, California (and launched with the first live version of 'Subterranean Homesick Blues', followed immediately by the first live version of 'Absolutely Sweet Marie'). Parker played all that year's concerts, and all the following year's, adjusting to the departure of fellow rhythm section player KENNY AARONSON and his replacement by TONY GARNIER on bass. Parker continued in the band until the end of the last concert of 1990, in Detroit that November 18th. He'd notched up a total of 263 Dylan concerts. He asked to leave because he had missed most of the first 19 months of his new baby's life, and 'it felt wrong'. Dylan was supportive and their parting was entirely amicable.

Parker's nickname Toph (toe-ff rather than toff), may account for why the group he formed in 2000 is named Toph-E & the Pussy Cats. He still plays sessions and television and tours Japan. He lives in Sherman, Connecticut. That baby is now a 17-year-old musician.

[Data from www.parkerdrum.com & phone interview with this writer, both 11 Feb 2006.]

Parking Meter Rainer Vesely and Burkhard Schleser co-founded the Austria-based Parking Meter ('the German-language Dylan magazine'), which operated from 1997 to 2001, publishing its first issue in May 1997 in Vienna and launching its website that August. This was an important, witty and rare continental European fanzine, founded with the straightforward aim of 'publishing thoughts on the work of Bob Dylan', which not only succeeded to a high standard but built up a lasting means of communication between some knowledgeable and intelligent writers, music-lovers and Dylan fans within the German-speaking countries and beyond.

Burkhard Schleser was born in Vienna on September 18, 1960. He first listened to Dylan's work in 1977 and attended his first Dylan concert when he was 17 years old (at Nuremberg, July 1, 1978). From the 1980s onwards he began subscribing to fanzines, beginning with The Telegraph and then Isis, Dignity and THE BRIDGE, and occasionally read the US publication ON THE TRACKS. Nowadays he checks various websites daily instead. His other work in the world is in 'quality and information management'.

Rainer Vesely was born in Vienna on February 8, 1956. His interest in Dylan began in 1972 and his first published work on him was a review of Empire Burlesque in Falter, the Vienna City magazine, in 1985. He holds a PhD, was a freelance journalist 1984–95, is the editor and/or author of several books in the fields of cultural studies, poetry and literature and now works as a librarian in Vienna. His best non-Dylan work is probably Querungen—Literarische Texte zu beiden Amerikas, co-edited with Bernhard Widder (Vienna: Ritter-Verlag, 2001).

Parking Meter closed down as a published magazine after issue no. 16, in July 2001, but it continues to function as an online enterprise, at www.parkingmeter.at.

Pasqua, Alan [1952 -] Alan Pasqua was born in Elizabeth, New Jersey, on June 28, 1952. He learnt the piano at age seven, studied the classics and jazz, attended Indiana University and then gained a BA in Jazz Studies from the New England Conservatory. In New York he struck up a life-long friendship with guitarist Allan Holdsworth, and both joined drummer Tony Williams in his New Tony Williams Lifetime. After two albums, he moved to the West Coast and started to play sessions and tour with rock and pop artists, starting in Eddie Money's band and then, at age 25, becoming the keyboards player on Bob Dylan's 1978 World Tour. He therefore played a total of 114 Dylan concerts, and appears on the Bob Dylan at Budokan album. He also plays organ and piano throughout Street Legal.

After that he rejoined the ordinary world and Santana. In the late 1980s he and guitarist Danny Huff were responsible for the rock band Giant, from whose début album Last of the Runaways came a popular single, 'I'll See You in My Dreams', which Pasqua composed. He has also played with RAY CHARLES, Aretha Franklin, the Temptations, PHIL SPECTOR, Tom Scott, Dionne Warwick, Rod Stewart, Graham Nash, Pat Benatar, Quincy Jones, Henry Mancini, Stan Kenton . . . the list could go down and down. He co-composed the theme music for CBS-TV's 'Evening News' programme, heard nightly since 1987; topped the jazz charts with CDs called Milagro and Dedications; and wrote the score for the 1998 film The Waterboy. These days he plays with the Pasqua/Erskine Trio, fronts the Alan Pasqua Jazz Collective, accepts private pupils for piano tuition and is Assistant Professor of Jazz Studies at the Thornton School of Music at UCLA in Los Angeles. No doubt it's all finger-snappingly good, but it's not like playing with the Bob Dylan of 1978.

[Alan Pasqua: Milangro, Postcards POST1002, US, 1993; Dedications, Postcards POST1012, 1995. Pasqua/

Erskine Trio: Live at Rocco, Fuzzy Music PEPCD007, 2000; Badlands, Fuzzy Music PEPCD011, US, 2002. Giant: Last of the Runaways, A&M 75021-5272-4 (CD) & A&M 5272 (LP), US, 1989. The Waterboy, dir. Frank Coraci; Touchstone, US (very US) 1998. Some biographical data from www.alanpasqua.com & from Alan Pasqua, e-mail to this writer, 11 Feb 2006.]

Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid* [album, 1973] Dylan's 12th album of new work, but his first since 1970, was 'only' a film-soundtrack album (though, in the way of these things, it isn't the same thing as the soundtrack you hear on the movie: one of SAM PECKINPAH's best). It is a largely instrumental album, with all the characteristic roughness and lack of polish that has kept Bob Dylan less palatable to mass easy-listening taste than infinitely less talented contemporaries such as PAUL SIMON or PAUL McCARTNEY. Though a very minor item in Dylan's catalogue, it is a finely atmospheric work, engaging in its own right and effective as a part of the movie it was written for. It also includes the original hit recording of the perennially popular 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'.

[Recorded Mexico City, 20 Jan 1973 and Burbank, CA, Feb 1973; released as stereo LP, Columbia KC 32460 (US) & CBS 69042 (UK), 13 Jul 1973.]

Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid* [film, 1973] By the time this film was made, in the last months of 1972, the genre of the western movie was almost extinct at the box office, hit by decades of safe films full of Alan Ladd and John Wayne and the same one-horse-town stage sets: decades in which white middle-class American life had become so prudish, sanitised and conformist that cowboy films easily satisfied a whimpering need to identify with a simpler, more manly life full of the great outdoors, goodies and baddies, cowboys and Indians, action and guns. By the mid-1960s the counter-culture was getting a hearing and the complexities and experiments of 'now', its tangle of new dress codes, music, openness and cultural excitation all made contemporary American life infinitely more interesting than all those uptight cowboys with their short hair and short fuses, their cornball campfire philosophising, sexual repression and racism. The western was almost wiped out. It was saved only by the exceptions of Butch Cassidy & the Sundance Kid (1969), for its genre-stretching modernist amorality, and The Wild Bunch (also 1969), for its trend-setting extravagance of modernist graphic violence.

In autumn 1972, therefore, SAM PECKINPAH, encouraged by the defiant success of The Wild Bunch, was ready to make another western: Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid. The screenwriter was Rudy Wurlitzer, author of three novels, one of which, Nog, had been a cult success. (In 1999, he and PATTI SMITH would share supplying the text to Lynn Davis' book of photographs, Monument.) The producer was Gordon Carroll, who would prove to be the one industry heavyweight to fight for Dylan's soundtrack against all those—from Peckinpah to music supervisor Jerry Fielding—who hoped to slick it up and smother it in 'professionalism'. KRIS KRISTOFFERSON was signed to co-star as Billy to James Coburn's Pat Garrett. Filming was to take place in the desert around Durango, Mexico.

Kristofferson's manager, Bert Block, who had handled business arrangements for Dylan's Isle of Wight Festival appearance back in 1969, enticed Dylan into the film: a casual mention that it was happening, and that Kristofferson was in it, was followed by a meeting between Dylan and Wurlitzer, and then a private screening of The Wild Bunch. Dylan, who had been mooching around doing very little all year, decided to go for it. A real film! Why not?! He moved down to Durango with his wife and five children on November 23, 1972.

Peckinpah didn't offer him a part till the second day Dylan was there. The part, when it came to it, was small but arguably crucial. Chris Whithouse noted that in the film as originally released 'we are left with 106 minutes of footage, in which there are only six scenes where Alias actually speaks. The part of Alias was always going to be relatively minor, even if Dylan's presence in the filming was major. Yet the first Alias appearance on screen implies, by recurrent cutting to him, that while he is only a spectator and takes no active part in the drama, he is to be significant nonetheless.' The rôle of Alias is indeed surely that of the human, humane everyman, the observer: the only male character of any import in the film who doesn't carry a gun. Film critic Gordon Gow wrote: 'To Alias, in fact, is assigned much of the film's neat recognition of fate. He broods silently, he worships and follows a hero but in time his left eye squints towards the camera, towards awareness of a hollow splendour.'

It's striking, too, that two key lines of film dialogue in the film, spoken in an exchange between the film's two main characters before the opening credits roll, come straight out of two crucial songs from Dylan's own history. Billy: 'How does it feel?' Garrett: 'It feels like times have changed.'

To achieve this Hollywood début, Dylan spent two months in the desert down in Mexico, either in the trailer he shared with Kristofferson on set or in a nearby rented house with SARA, the children and a dog called Rover. By the beginning of January, mostly thanks to technical problems, the film was two weeks behind schedule and $1 million over budget. It doesn't sound much now, but it was then—the total budget was meant to be $4m and went to $5m—and Peckinpah was continually harrassed by MGM executives. Dylan wanted to quit, but stayed on, making Kristofferson feel it was essentially for his sake. In the end, as a cost-cutting exercise, Peckinpah had to hand over the making of the final cut to the studio.

When the film came out, it was savaged by the New York Times and others. William S. Pechter dubbed it 'A rash adventure in inadvertent self-parody'; the great Stanley Kauffmann declared: 'Shows what Peckinpah can do when he doesn't put his mind to it.' The soundtrack album, too, was sniffily received. Nevertheless, Dylan came away from the experience wanting more: 'I want now to make movies,' he said. 'I've never been this close to movies before. I'll make a hell of a movie after this.' But he didn't.

Years later, the 'director's cut' of Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid was released. It was tremendous. This 'restored' film was first shown on US Cable TV in 1988, in UK cinemas in 1989 and on BBC-TV in January 1990. James Coburn had always said, 'Bobby Dylan's score too was cut up,' and the same proved true of film and music: that the restored version not only makes vastly more imaginative sense but, revealed after 15 years of familiarity with the MGM version, shows vividly just what mortifying butchery the corporation imposes upon its artists. That's no surprise, but Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid is a forceful demonstration of the process. There are, essentially, two versions of the film and so two versions of the music soundtrack, and without a doubt the restored version is in each case much superior.

[Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid, dir. Sam Peckinpah, written Rudy Wurlitzer; MGM, US, 1973; 'restored version', 1988; DVD 2-disc Special Edition, Warner Home Video, US, 2006. Butch Cassidy & the Sundance Kid, dir. George Roy Hill; TCF/Campanile, US, 1969. The Wild Bunch, dir. Sam Peckinpah; Warner Seven Arts/Phil Feldman, US, 1970. Rudy Wurlitzer: Nog, New York: Random House, 1968 (Pocket Books mass paperback, 1970). Gordon Gow, Films & Filming, UK, Aug 1973 & James Coburn, quoted in Chris Whithouse, 'Alias, Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid', revised from The Telegraph no.19, Bury, UK, autumn 1985 & collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987. William S. Pechter & Stanley Kauffmann quoted from John Walker, ed, Halliwell's Film Guide, 11th edition, London: HarperCollins, 1995.]

Patchen, Kenneth [1911 - 1972] Kenneth Patchen was born in Niles, Ohio, on December 13, 1911. He was absorbed by literature from the age of 12 and read widely.

To alight on his work is to move away from the kind of American poetry that is taught in schools to the kind of poetry that you find for yourself after you've left school. Patchen's work was done in the 1930s-50s and beyond, and he was, if such a thing is possible, typical of the jazz-influenced, jazz-culture-influenced generation of writers who ended up being called the Beat Generation.

In 1942 he collaborated with John Cage on a radio play, The City Wears a Slouch Hat, and ten years later was pioneering a combination of poetry recitation with jazz accompaniment. Charles Mingus was one of his co-pioneers in this work.

For Folkways Records, MOSES ASCH recorded Patchen reading some of his poetry, and recorded him (in Patchen's own home) reading excerpts from his novel The Journal of Albion Moonlight, 1941 (a title in turn acknowledging BLAKE).

Patchen's influence on Dylan is first of all evident throughout Dylan's novel Tarantula. The first person to note this was Gabrielle Goodchild, in her essay 'Tarantula: Tangled Up in a Web', 1979—in which she argues the specific relevance of The Journal of Albion Moonlight to Dylan's novel.

But Dylan is inspired by more of Patchen than that one work, as we can see even within Tarantula. This, for example, from Patchen's 'I Don't Want to Startle You' (1939), would fit well anywhere inside it, and typifies one of the tones of voice Dylan adopts in the sections styled as personal letters and messages from various self-regarding, belligerent, callow people to their friends or enemies:

'I knew the General only by name of course. / I said Wartface what have you done with her? / I said You Dirtylouse tell me where is she now? / His duck-eyes shifted to the guard. All right, Sam. / . . . Who is that fat turd I said—he hit me with his jewelled fist. / While his man held me he put a lighted cigarette on my eyelid. / I smelt the burning flesh through his excellent perfume. On the wall it said "Democracy must be saved at all costs." / The floor was littered with letters of endorsement from liberals.' (There's even that direct cigarette-eyelid connection, which Dylan resuscitates in 'Memphis Blues Again'.)

This, too, would pass for Dylan's work in Tarantula: 'When they fitted the black cap over his head / He knew that he'd never have another chance to be president.' It is from Patchen's 'All The Bright Foam Of Talk', 1939.

Then there is the Patchen influence upon Dylan's songs. A phrase of Patchen's, 'Cathedral evening', which opens his 1950s poem 'Beautiful You Are', is used unaltered in Dylan's 'Chimes of Freedom'. Patchen's title 'Nice Day for a Lynching', 1939, echoes behind Dylan's line from 'Talking World War III Blues': 'Good car to drive, after a war.' Perhaps another Patchen title, 'Red Wine and Yellow Hair', 1949, resonates under Dylan's line from 'Angelina': 'Blood dryin' in my yellow hair . . .' More surely the poem '23rd Street Runs into Heaven', 1939, brushes Patchen's wings across Dylan's 'Three Angels'. Patchen's lines include '. . . lights wink / On along the street. Somewhere a trolley, taking / Shop-girls and clerks home, clatters through / This before-supper Sabbath. An alley cat cries / To find the garbage cans sealed; newsboys / Begin . . .'; Dylan's narrator observes 'The Tenth Avenue bus going west. / The dogs and pigeons fly up and they flutter around, / A man with a badge skips by, / Three fellas crawlin' on their way back to work / . . . The bakery truck stops . . .' (In fact both sets of lines also resemble a short but striking passage from JEAN GENET's Our Lady of the Flowers.)

Dylan inherits ideas from Patchen too—or at least from the milieu that Patchen helped to create. The poem 'The Rites of Darkness' (1942) encompasses a lot of Dylan's oft-expressed Gemini-schizoid feelings about the glamour of urban wickedness and decadence felt contemporaneously with the ever-visible presence of God, and about the nature of truth and beauty. When Patchen writes: 'But no one sees the giant horse / That climbs the steps which stretch forth / Between the calling lights and that hill / Straight up to the throne of God', he offers a notion that becomes a second layer of input into Dylan's 'Three Angels', in which 'The angels play on their horns all day . . . / But does anyone hear the music they play?' And this, from the same Patchen poem—'We can't believe in anything / Because nothing is pure enough. / Because nothing will ever happen / To make us good in our own sight'—encapsulates succinctly attitudes Dylan has veered towards in many works, from the poem about JOAN BAEZ through to 'Dirge' and from 'Shelter from the Storm' to 'Highlands', in 1997, in which 'Well, my heart's in the highlands: / I'm gonna go there / When I feel good enough to go.'

As it claims on the dust-jacket of The Selected Poems of Kenneth Patchen, his work focuses on 'his direct and passionate concern with the most essential elements in the tragic, comic, blundering and at rare moments glorious world around us. He wrote about the things we can feel with our whole being—the senselessness of war, the need for love among men on earth, the presence of God in man, the love for a beloved woman, social injustice, and the continual resurgence of the beautiful in life.' Which is what you might reasonably say (though you might not choose to express it quite like that) about the recurrent concerns of Dylan's work.

All the above can be—has been—adduced from the work, rather than from biographical information. But then ROBERT SHELTON's Dylan biography, No Direction Home, published in 1986, revealed that Patchen was a favourite writer of TONY GLOVER, Dylan's close and influential friend from his Dinkytown Minneapolis period—the period when he first left home and attended, briefly, the University of Minnesota; and then in 1989, in BOB SPITZ's repellent Bob Dylan: A Biography, Dylan's other intimate of the period, DAVE WHITAKER, stated specifically that in the winter of 1960 he introduced Dylan to Kenneth Patchen's 'experimental verse'.

Patchen died of a heart-attack in Palo Alto, California, on January 8, 1972.

[Kenneth Patchen: The Selected Poems of Kenneth Patchen, 1957. Patchen recordings: Kenneth Patchen Reads with Jazz in Canada, Folkways 1959; Selected Poems of Kenneth Patchen, Folkways, 1960; Kenneth Patchen Reads His Love Poems, Folkways, 1961; and From Albion Moonlight, Folkways, 1972.

Gabrielle Goodchild: 'Tarantula: Tangled Up in a Web', unpublished essay, 1979, available for reference in the Robert Shelton Collection at the Experience Music Project archive, Seattle. An extract was published under the title (not the author's) 'Tarantula: The Web Untangled', in Conclusions on the Wall, ed. Elizabeth M. Thomson, 1980. The essay was originally commissioned by Shelton as background material for his Dylan biography.]

Patton, Charley [1891 - 1934] Charles or Charlie Patton (the spelling Charley derives from his record labels, and has recently been moved away from by some blues devotees) was born at Edwards, Mississippi, probably in April 1891. As the writer and critic Tony Russell puts it, with his usual elegant succinctness: 'Among Mississippi singers of the first blues generation . . . Patton was far and away the most celebrated in his own community. Perhaps as a reaction to the idolatry surrounding ROBERT JOHNSON, he has inspired a uniquely fierce devotion in many blues-lovers. His singing—gruff, barking, extraordinarily resonant—and his richly accented, percussive guitar-playing put him among the most influential blues artists . . .'

While Bob Dylan was entranced early on by Johnson (who was still a boy when Patton first entered a studio), he has come more and more to find solace in, as well as admiration for, Charley Patton's recordings: most of which were made for Paramount and are therefore as scratchy and aurally inhospitable as possible—a factor that of itself means that only the determinedly devoted ever really arrive at the creative rich heart of this powerful figure's music. Even his vocal delivery makes him harder than almost any other figure to decipher—much easier to pick up the urgency, the evocation of the geographically rooted hard life, the 'voice as thick as molasses' and the boisterous, rebarbative showmanship of the guitar-work, and catch the words when you can.

His first session was in Richmond, Indiana, on June 14, 1929–he laid down 14 sides, and Paramount made them into seven singles: not a take wasted. One single, 'Prayer of Death—Part 1' and 'Part 2', was released as by Elder J.J. Hadley; another, 'Mississippi Boweavil Blues' c/w 'Screamin' and Hollerin' the Blues', as by the Masked Marauder (on most but not all copies). When HARRY SMITH issued 'Mississippi Boweavil Blues' on vinyl in his AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC collection of 1952, such was the mysteriousness of Patton's life that Smith did not know that the Masked Marauder was Patton. Even today, only one photograph of him exists. Very recently, a full-length version of the same shot may have emerged: but people have dug deep to find more, and entirely failed.

Patton had three further sessions for Paramount, all 1929–30, playing behind Henry Sims on two sides and cutting 28 more sides of his own. Again not a single one went unissued. Then in early 1934 the indefatigable H.C. Speir got him out of jail in Belzoni and took him to New York City by train to record for Vocalion, for whom, at three sessions on three consecutive days, he played behind Bertha Lee (his last wife) and cut another 26 sides of his own; but this time 16 of them went unissued. His last session was on the first day of February 1934. He died from a general combination of poverty, drink and congenital heart disease on the Heathman plantation near Indianola, Mississippi, on April 28, 1934.

The world he describes in his blues is localised and particular—he names individual policemen, trains, flood effects ('Backwater at Blytheville done struck Joiner town / It was 50 families and their children . . .'), but he was the decisive influence on other musicians who heard him, Tommy Johnson included, and in a number of cases he was a literal tutor as well. People from HOWLIN' WOLF to Pops Roebuck of THE STAPLE SINGERS learnt to play guitar from Patton (as well as picking up, especially in Wolf's case, much repertoire). Most of his own life was lived on the Dockery plantation near Ruleville, Mississippi. His impact, like a meteor hitting earth in one spot, was immensely wide. Russell again: 'Apart from "Pony Blues", the songs of Patton's time and place that have become standards belong rather to Tommy Johnson or to BIG JOE WILLIAMS. His music survived less as a repertoire than as a grandiose sound effect, echoing through the years not only in the South but in the new Chicago blues of the post-war Mississippi migrants.'

In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan writes that he first heard Patton on Arhoolie blues compilation LPs owned by SPIDER JOHN KOERNER. That unreliable testimony aside, the book doesn't mention Patton—yet not only does Dylan follow the implicit homage of his Street Legal song 'New Pony' in 1978 with the explicit homage of the "Love and Theft" song 'High Water (For Charley Patton)', but he has also said in interview in recent years both that the guitar riff underneath his great 'Highlands' on Time Out of Mind is taken from an old Charley Patton record—he doesn't say which and it's hard to pin down, though the likely contender is 'Dry Well Blues'—and more sweepingly that if it were up to him, he wouldn't write songs at all any more: he'd just record songs by Patton. This would surely only be worthwhile if he could in some way match the originals—not by duplication, but rather by imaginative re-creation—and to try to do that would be to set himself an impossible task. Up to the end of 2005, Dylan had performed 'High Water (For Charley Patton)' 165 times in concert, starting in LA on October 19, 2001 and steaming through to Dublin on November 27, 2005. Many of his April 2006 US concerts have continued to feature the song.

See also the lowlands.

[Charley Patton: 'Pony Blues', Richmond, IN, 14 Jun 1929; 'High Water Everywhere', Grafton, WI, c.Oct 1929; 'Dry Well Blues', Grafton, c.28 May 1930; 'Stone Pony Blues', NY, 30 Jan 1934. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.239. Tony Russell, The Blues from Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Aurum Press, 1997, pp.42–43. Birth date & death information from Dick Spottswood, Patton entry in The Encyclopedia of the Blues, New York: Routledge, 2006, 2 vols., pp.748–50.]

'Peace in the Valley' See Dorsey, Thomas A.

Peckinpah, Sam [1925 - 1984] David Samuel Peckinpah was born on February 21, 1925 in Fresno, California, growing up there when it was, in Walter Melnyk's phrase, 'still a sleepy town surrounded by pine forests.' He was strongly influenced by an uncle who was a judge, congressman and excellent shot. He enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1943, was sent to China in 1945 to disarm Japanese soldiers and send them home. He never saw combat and returned to the US at the end of 1946. He earned a Drama BA at Fresno State College in 1949 and an MA at the University of Southern California in 1950. Early jobs in the entertainment industry included floor sweeping for 'The Liberace Show' in 1952; two years later he got a job as gopher and dialogue coach to Don Siegel, and in 1956 had a small part in Siegel's Invasion of the Body-Snatchers. Via Siegel he came to write episodes of the TV series 'Gunsmoke'; other series followed, his first work as director being a 1958 episode of 'Broken Arrow' titled 'The Knife Fighter'. Further work directing TV western series led to a first film chance; he was assigned the 1961 Maureen O'Hara vehicle Deadly Companions, about a dance hall hostess. He was happier about his second film, Ride the High Country (1962), which won a series of international film prizes but was more or less killed off at the box office by MGM's lack of enthusiasm. Filming Major Dundee with Charlton Heston (1965) involved much location time in the Mexican desert, and ended up with Peckinpah losing control of an over-long film that was then cut by the studio before its release. In these ways prefiguring Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid, it was also the film that established Peckinpah's image as an erratic and dangerous man, and always at odds with both his stars and his studio.

As a result, the director spent three years unable to work, except on a quietly acclaimed ABC-TV Special, 'Noon Wine' (1966): but after the huge success of The Wild Bunch in 1969 came a flurry of films in quick succession—The Ballad of Cable Hogue, Straw Dogs, Junior Bonner and The Getaway (all 1970–72). And then Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid.

Peckinpah and Dylan didn't meet until they were already on location around Durango, Mexico, in late November 1972—and Peckinpah had only the vaguest idea of who Bob Dylan was. Costar James Coburn describes how they came together:

'Sam says, "Who's Bob Dylan? Oh yeah, the kids used to listen to his stuff." And we all said, "What!! You gotta see Dylan." He said, "Okay, bring Dylan down." And Dylan had been in hiding . . . and he came down with his tall Indian hat and his little moustache. Very strange cat. Wonderful guy. He was like quicksilver. You could never put your finger on Bobby. So the night we were over at Sam's house and we were all drinking tequila and carrying on and halfway through dinner, Sam says, "Okay kid, see what you got. You bring your guitar with you?" They went in this little alcove. Sam had a rocking chair. Bobby sat down on a stool in front of this rocking chair. There was just the two of them in there. And Bobby played three or four tunes. And Sam came out with his handkerchief in his eye. "Goddamn kid! Who the hell is he? Who is that kid? Sign him up!" He was very moved.'

He didn't stay moved. As others saw it, he became increasingly jealous of Dylan's implacable charisma and the pull it gave him, despite the small size of his part in Peckinpah's film, and in the end the two of them were clearly locked in competitive struggle. When Dylan had a recording session at Columbia's Mexico City studio, on January 20, 1973, Peckinpah tried to stop everyone flying off there by announcing a special screening of The Getaway. Everyone got away to the recording session instead.

Dylan nonetheless felt that Peckinpah still wanted him around. As he told CAMERON CROWE in the Biograph interview:

'Actually, I was just one of Peckinpah's pawns. There wasn't a part for me and Sam just liked me around. . . . Rudy Wurlitzer . . . invented a part for me but there wasn't any dimension to it and I was very uncomfortable in this non-rôle. . . . there I was trapped deep in the heart of Mexico with some madman, ordering people around like a little king. You had to play the dummy all day. . . . It was crazy, all these generals making you jump into hot ants, setting up turkey shoots and whatever . . . I was too beat to take it personal . . . I was sleep-walking most of the time and had no real reason to be there. I'd gotten my family out of New York, that was the important thing, there was a lot of pressure back there. But even so, my wife got fed up almost immediately. She'd say to me, "What the hell are we doing here?" It was not an easy question to answer.'

There is one terrible-quality circulating copy of a recording made of Dylan singing at that 'audition' at Peckinpah's Durango house: a single solo performance of 'Billy'. (The whole of the Mexico City session has circulated, and it includes the 'Billy 4' released on the soundtrack album, the rest of which was recorded in Burbank the following month.)

Altogether Peckinpah directed 14 films, and his reputation has not yet settled. He's not exactly a feminist favourite; but at their best, his films, even the much-stressed violence of his films, bring an elegiac quality, a largeness of vision—a poetry—to the screen. Peckinpah died of heart failure in California, aged 59, three days after Christmas, 1984.

[Sources: Gabrielle Murray, 'Sam Peckinpah', at www.sensesofcinema.com/contents/directors/02/peckinpah.html; Walter Melnyk from the IMDb at http://us.imdb.com/name/nm0001603/bio; James Coburn quoted from http://frontpage.simnet.is/bobdylan/friends.htm; all online 2 Oct 2005; Chris Whithouse, 'Alias, Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid', revised from The Telegraph no.19, Bury, UK, autumn 1985 & collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.]

Pelto, Gretel [1940 -] Gretel Hoffman was born in Minneapolis on May 6, 1940, into a left-wing intellectual Jewish family; her mother was a photographer and her father a sociologist. She left high school a year early and enrolled in Bennington College, Vermont, in September 1957 to study dance and choreography. Here she met East Coast arts students who played folk music, hung out in Greenwich Village and 'adored ODETTA'. But she dropped out in January 1960, at the end of the winter holiday, full of doubt about her dancing, got a part-time job and started hanging out in Dinkytown. 'This was very familiar territory because I had gone to high school on the University of Minnesota campus,' she told TERRY KELLY.

She and the bohemian DAVE WHITAKER met Bob Dylan in January 1960. She has no memory of any specific first encounter but she liked him enormously, straight away. 'He was obviously highly intelligent and had a wonderful sense of humor; he had a great smile. . . . Of all the folks who hung around the Scholar, he was by far the most interesting.' Right from their first meeting with Dylan, she and Dave knew him well, getting together with him every day at the 10 O'Clock Scholar for those first three months.

That June, she married Dave; she had just turned 20. Outside the Scholar soon afterwards, when she and Dylan bumped into each other, he didn't return her greeting but shouted back across the street, 'When you get divorced, come and let me know!' For a while Gretel and Dave lived in the boarding house above McCosh's bookstore along with another of Bob's friends, HARVEY ABRAMS. She said of Dylan's own accommodation at the time: 'He was living in a horrible green room that had a bed, a chair, a desk, a refrigerator with moldy food in it, some beer. . . . I was struck by his being just a sweet guy. There was something very gentle about him, something a little bit sad too. He used to say frequently that he would be dead before he was twenty-one. . . . It was clear that he wouldn't do it, that he wasn't suicidal, but he just felt that was the way his life was mapped out.'

It was at a party for Gretel in May 1960 that TONY GLOVER first met Dylan, and a year on, Gretel was generally around but doesn't remember being there when the Dylan tapes were made in BONNIE BEECHER's apartment in May and December 1961 (she was a close friend of Bonnie's). She always felt that Minneapolis was a very good place for someone to develop in music. She also confirmed that it was Dave Whitaker—'David' as she preferred to call him—who had 'turned Bob on to Bound for Glory'. Bob was living in the small back room of their apartment at the time.

Gretel thinks it 'very likely' that it was she who introduced Dylan to Odetta's work. She had bought the first album in fall 1959, 'virtually memorized the songs' and since she doesn't think she lent him the record, 'more likely I sang them for him'.

She continued to know Dylan, when he was around, until some time in 1963. She and Dave split up that November, 'a couple of days before the Kennedy assassination', as she puts it. She remarried, becoming Gretel Pelto, in July 1967, left Minneapolis in 1969, moved to Connecticut and completed her PhD in Medical Anthropology in 1970. From then till 1992 she was on the faculty at the University of Connecticut, where her primary appointment was in the Department of Nutritional Sciences but with joint appointments in the Medical School and the Department of Anthropology. In 1992 she moved to Switzerland to head up a behavioural research programme at Geneva, in the Division of Child Health within the World Health Organisation. She returned to the US in 1999 where she is now a professor in the Division of Nutritional Sciences at Cornell. She has taken, in other words, a very different route through the world from that of her ex-husband Dave.

She has had little contact with Bob Dylan since 1963. The last performance of his that she remembers is from his brief appearance on the annual Sing Out! Hootenanny at Carnegie Hall, on September 22, 1962. He performed 'Sally Gal', 'Highway 51' and a version of his 'Talkin' John Birch Paranoid Blues' but then finished with two major new songs, both as-yet unrecorded, 'Ballad of Hollis Brown' and 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall'. For Gretel, the entire experience was moving and numinous. 'It was an extraordinary evening,' she told Terry Kelly. 'When Bob was introduced, a huge roar went through the hall. We couldn't believe our ears. Bobby? Earlier in the day we thought he was just playing games when he said he didn't want to eat in a restaurant because he would be accosted by fans and he wore sunglasses. . . . His singing was superb. It was a moment of truth. It was wonderful.'

She'd no longer be able to say that of a Dylan concert today—but while Gretel Pelto hasn't read Chronicles Volume One, she was pleasantly surprised by the near-contemporary Bob seen in the interview sections in SCORSESE's No Direction Home: 'The fundamental honesty and straightness, his humor, his basic artist integrity all came through fully.' There was much else she liked about the film too; but she didn't care for its implicit claim—Dylan's implicit claim—that his artistic life began in, and was only formed by, New York City. As she knows, that's simply not the case.

[Gretel Pelto quoted in: Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., pp.72, 75; e-mail to this writer 13 Nov 2005; & written answers to Terry Kelly, for feature, The Bridge no. 24, Gateshead, UK, spring 2006.]

Pennebaker, D.A. [1925 -] Donn Alan Pennebaker was born in Evanston, Illinois, on July 15, 1925. A designer of power stations and owner of an electronics company, he worked through films for the YMCA and the Boy Scouts, and shorts like Daybreak Express (1953) to become a pioneer of cinéma vérité and 'direct cinema', making films that characteristically avoid voice-overs and interviews but merely 'watch' their subjects—in Pennebaker's case mostly musicians—with a hand-held camera and available light. In other words, he pioneered the kind of fly-on-the-wall documentary now so commonplace on television.

When Robert Drew, another pioneer, founded Drew Associates in 1960, Pennebaker and Richard Leacock were among his select group of filmmakers, but in 1963 they left to form their own film production company, Leacock Pennebaker Inc. Accounts vary greatly as to how Pennebaker came to be commissioned to film Bob Dylan's 1965 tour of Britain (see Don't Look Back and Alk, Howard) but film it he did, in black and white, and achieving an unprecedented intimacy of access to an artist who has always maintained his mystery. Pennebaker was almost 40 when he was filming, and Dylan was just turning 24; there must have been some misalignment of communication, but this may have kept everyone on their toes and helped to make Pennebaker's film the great achievement it is. He was not so lucky the following year when, no longer the auteur director but clearly the hired hand, he filmed in colour footage of Dylan's 1966 UK tour, and then had to hand it over to Dylan and Howard Alk, who had been an assistant on Don't Look Back, in whose hands the film turned into Eat the Document.

Pennebaker never worked with Dylan again, but moved on to make other films, including what turned out to be the historically invaluable Monterey Pop (filmed in 1967 and released in 1968), Sweet Toronto (filmed 1969, released 1971) and the 26-minute documentary Keep on Rockin' (released 1972), which featured performances by LITTLE RICHARD, CHUCK BERRY, BO DIDDLEY, JERRY LEE LEWIS, JIMI HENDRIX and Janis Joplin (and would have featured JOHN LENNON and Yoko Ono had their scenes not been deleted), and Ziggy Stardust and the Spiders from Mars (1973).

From 1977 onwards, Pennebaker has worked with the much younger Chris Hegedus, whom he married in 1982 (and who calls him Penny). Their collaboration began with a five-hour, three-part documentary, The Energy War (1977) and then with her discovering his old discarded 1971 footage of a stormy evening's confrontation that April between Norman Mailer and various eminent feminists at a public meeting in New York. She reworked this material into Town Bloody Hall, 1979, by which time it already seemed to document a bygone age and, for some commentators, in an equally dated style. Subsequent Pennebaker Hegedus Films' documentaries have included 1993's The War Room, following two of Bill Clinton's advisors around during his first presidential campaign, and Down from the Mountain (2000), about the musicians who performed in the film O Brother Where Art Thou?. Co-directed by Pennebaker, Hegedus and Nick Doob, this documentary is co-produced by BOB NEUWIRTH—whom Pennebaker first came across as Dylan's 1965 sidekick (but who had also helped with lighting, filming and even editing on Don't Look Back)—and Donn's son Frazer Pennebaker.

D.A. Pennebaker, now 80 years old, still lives in New York City.

'People Get Ready' Dylan has recorded 'People Get Ready' three times, always obscurely: at the Basement Tapes sessions in Woodstock in June 1967, unreleased; in New York City in late 1975, not released officially but present on the Renaldo & Clara film soundtrack, 1978; and at New Bloomington, Indiana, in late 1989, for use on the soundtrack of the film Catchfire, directed by and starring Dennis Hopper, in which Dylan makes a brief appearance as a 'chainsaw artist'. (This film is also known as Backtrack, and has often been confused in accounts of Dylan's work with the different film Flashback, which also stars Hopper.) Dylan has performed 'People Get Ready' live only once—and, naturally, at a concert it's particularly difficult to find a recording of: in Buenos Aires, Argentina, on August 8, 1991.

THE STAPLE SINGERS may have popularised 'People Get Ready' but only Pops (Roebuck) Staples seems to have recorded it. His version, along with a revival of Dylan's 'Gotta Serve Somebody' is on his 1994 album Father, Father. But the song was first a hit by the Impressions, fronted by Curtis Mayfield, its composer, in 1965. We know that Dylan was familiar with this more or less immediately after its release, for the Impressions album containing it, The Big Sixteen, is pictured on the cover of his own album Bringing It All Back Home, which was issued in March 1965. Mayfield rerecorded the song on Curtis Live, for his own label, in 1971.

Dylan was probably familiar, too, with the rough, bluesy version cut by the Chambers Brothers as title track of their 1966 début album. They were a hit at 1965's NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL; Dylan brought them in on backing vocals on a rejected take of 'Tombstone Blues' in 1965; and he praises them in the 1985 Biograph box-set interview.

'People Get Ready', based in part on the gospel stalwart 'THIS TRAIN', remains one of the most potent songs inspired by the sufferings and hopes of black Americans in the civil rights era (Mayfield is said to have been moved to compose it by the March on Washington of August 1963).

[Bob Dylan: 'People Get Ready': Woodstock, Jun 1967; NY, c.28 Oct 1975; and New Bloomington, IN, 20 Nov 1989. Film: Catchfire, aka Backtrack, dir. Dennis Hopper, Vestron Pictures, US, 1989; soundtrack CD, Backtrack, WTG Records 46042, USA, 1990. Flashback, dir. Franco Amurri, Paramount, US, 1990.

Pops (Roebuck) Staples: 'People Get Ready' & 'Gotta Serve Somebody', LA, c.1994, Father, Father, Point Blank VPBCD 19, LA (Point Blank 7243 8 39638, London), 1994. The Impressions: 'People Get Ready', Chicago, 26 Oct 1964, ABC-Paramount 10622, Hollywood (HMV POP 1408, London), 1965; and The Big Sixteen, ABC-Paramount, Hollywood (HMV CLP 1935, London), 1965. Curtis Mayfield: 'People Get Ready', Curtis Live, NYC 1970–71, Curtom CRS 8008, Chicago, 1971. The Chambers Brothers: 'People Get Ready', People Get Ready, LA, 1966, Vault 9003, LA (Vocalion SVAL 8058, London), 1966.]

Perkins, Carl [1932 - 1998] Carl Perkins was born in Lake County, Tennessee, on April 9, 1932. Hearing ELVIS PRESLEY for the first time at the age of 22 meant recognising the same mad amalgam of styles he was already fooling with himself. 'When I heard Elvis singing "Blue Moon of Kentucky",' said Perkins, 'I knew I had a future in music. It was the same sound my band was making.'

The band comprised Carl on electric guitar and vocals, and his brothers Jay (on acoustic guitar) and Clayton (stand-up bass). They'd grown up in a largely black community, in which the division wasn't black or white but rich or poor. 'You either worked the dirt or you owned it,' said Carl, 'and we worked it.' Thus he was raised on country music and the blues, and as it happened the man who taught him guitar was black. 'He wasn't no great guitarist, but he could play these little blues licks, bending the notes like I hadn't heard them doing on the Grand Ole Opry.'

Like so many, Perkins was drawn to Sam Phillips' Sun Studios in Memphis, and Phillips signed him up. In late 1955 he was a support act to Presley on the Western Swing Jamboree Tour, and subsequently one of the so-called Million Dollar Quartet.

Unlike Presley, Perkins was as much lead-guitarist as singer, and composed his own material (though often by the brazen refashioning of older songs). He made only seven singles before being lured away from the Sun 'family' to the corporate graveyard of Columbia Records, Nashville, and alcoholism. Yet these few early recordings established Perkins as an influential guitarist—influential on how rock'n'roll guitar-work would be—whose playing was distinctive, creative, often exploratory and always interesting. These sessions yielded three Perkins songs that immediately became rock'n' roll standards: 'Matchbox', 'Honey Don't!' and, pre-eminently, 'Blue Suede Shoes', the first, and possibly only, rockabilly million-seller, and the perfect expression of a restless generation's innocent embrace of the new 1950s boom economy, the escape from post-war drear, and the fresh discovery of clothes, music, language and leisure-habits distinct from parental ones. Recorded and released in January 1956, it immediately became Sun Records' biggest single, outselling all their Elvis records just as Elvis had moved to RCA Victor, where the A&R men were set to wondering if they'd 'signed the wrong one'. But in March 1956 Carl and brother Jay were badly injured (Jay died two years later) when their driver fell asleep at the wheel en route to New York where they were to perform their smash hit on Perry Como's nationwide TV show. Carl lay in hospital while his big-time moment passed.

Myth had Perkins feeling that if it hadn't been for that accident, he might have become the hot phenomenon of rock in place of Elvis. He never suffered this delusion, which would have meant misunderstanding completely the importance of sex in music. On the contrary, he summed up the situation with self-deprecation and wit: 'Elvis,' he said, 'was the only one of us who didn't look like Mister Ed.'

If Carl would never have broken out of the world that fed his inspiration, this was as much his strength as his limitation. 'Put Your Cat Clothes On' was another call to sartorial Saturday night action, while his unusually tough 'Dixie Fried' gave a glimpse of how wild that action could be in the roadhouses Perkins and his band had started out playing. The genial Perkins word-play was strangely at odds with his voice, which only erratically carried authenticating energy, and was, when not fired up, as lacking in sharpness as in sexiness. Perhaps the essential dullness of his voice is what kept him the perfect rockabilly icon: he never stopped sounding candidly hick.

In 1964 Carl toured Britain as support to CHUCK BERRY, and found himself revered, not least by THE BEATLES, who recorded several of his songs. But with little tangible career left, he joined JOHNNY CASH's live show. He claimed that he helped Cash off drugs while Cash got him off booze. He stayed with him for over ten years.

That's how he came to play guitar on the 1969 Dylan-Cash duet of 'Girl of the North Country' on Dylan's Nashville Skyline—and on the many other Dylan-Cash duets recorded at the same day's session. Around 14 takes from this session have circulated, including an attractive version of the Jack Clement song 'Guess Things Happen That Way', but none has been released. The song 'Champaign, Illinois', jointly written by Dylan and Perkins, and which Perkins duly recorded and released, comes from 1970.

Splitting with Cash in 1976, Perkins tried to restart his own career, using his sons as his rhythm section, but though he held the respect of other musicians for his place in rock history, he had nothing but a handful of ever-tamer oldies to offer. Back in Britain in the late 1970s, he was easily upstaged by BO DIDDLEY, as he was by JERRY LEE LEWIS at 1981's Wembley Country Festival. His decision to wear powder-blue Elvis-in-Vegas stage clothes, bouffanty hair and a fake tan did not help.

Late in life he composed a no.1 country hit by the Judds, 'Let Me Tell You About Love', and 'Restless'. In 1986 came a TV Special filmed in London, 'A Rockabilly Session—Carl Perkins and Friends', the friends including GEORGE and RINGO, the inevitable ERIC CLAPTON and others. After ROY ORBISON's death, Perkins was mooted as his replacement in THE TRAVELING WILBURYS, but it never happened.

In Jackson, Tennessee, however, on November 10, 1994, he was brought on stage at the end of a Dylan concert, and sang his classic, 'Matchbox', backed by Dylan and the Never-Ending Tour band plus his own guitar. (Dylan had also played around with a version of 'Matchbox' during his studio session with George Harrison in New York City on May 1, 1970.)

Carl Perkins was the only rockabilly hero to write a song as big-selling and as famous as those of the seminal giants like LITTLE RICHARD or Chuck Berry. That's why, within the rockabilly genre, he has no equal in stature. But that is another way of saying that when rockabilly grew into rock'n'roll, and later into rock, Perkins stayed behind.

Despite the suicide of his brother Clayton in the 1970s, and his own throat cancer some years later, he continued to perform and record right up till his own death, which was on January 19, 1998 in Jackson, Tennessee. He was 65.

Two days after his death, at one of those shared-bill concerts by Dylan and VAN MORRISON, the two of them sang 'Blue Suede Shoes' in tribute at Madison Square Garden, during Morrison's set. They repeated this tribute three nights later in Boston. At Perkins' funeral that same day—at which George Harrison played an early Perkins song on guitar—Bob Dylan sent a note, which was read out. 'He really stood for freedom. That whole sound stood for all the degrees of freedom. It would just jump right off the turntable. We wanted to go where that was happening.'

And it was true that Dylan had wanted to go there very early on. One of the bits of song on the recently discovered 1956 recording of Dylan and his friends singing was of another Carl Perkins record from that very year: his minor hit 'Boppin' the Blues'.

[Carl Perkins: 'Blue Suede Shoes' c/w 'Honey Don't!', Memphis, TN, Jan 1956, Sun 234, Memphis, 1956; 'Matchbox', Memphis, 30 Jan 1957, Sun 261, Memphis, 1957 (an earlier cut, Memphis, 4 Dec 1956, remained unissued until the box set Carl Perkins: The Sun Years, Charley, London, c.1980); 'Champaign, Illinois', nia, 1970; 'Boppin' the Blues', Memphis, 1956, Sun 243, Memphis, 1956. Perkins on the Dylan-Cash duets, Nashville, 18 Feb 1969.]

Peter, Paul & Mary Commercially packaged 'folk' trio created and managed by shrewd bruiser ALBERT GROSSMAN, who also became Dylan's manager. When Dylan first went east and arrived in New York, at the start of the 1960s, the repertoire and styles of delivery he developed provided a culture-shock not only to SINATRA-tuned popular-music audiences but also to many of the patrons (and bookers) in the Greenwich Village 'folk clubs'. As he recalls the latter's reaction, it ran as follows: 'You sound like a hillbilly: we want folk-singers here . . .' The point, made here with a characteristic lightness of irony, is of course that Dylan was a folk singer; and to learn how variably his early work was received is to understand the various misconceptions that obtained in New York at that time and which, from New York, spread (though not back into the Appalachians) via college circuits and out across the Atlantic.

One version of how to sound like a 'folk singer' was to be smoothly ingenuous, angry and above all, sensitive. Peter, Paul & Mary fitted the bill. With a name like that how could they fail? They were ideal—pale white, middle-class and clean to the point of cultivated preciousness.

Even when the protest phase was rampant, most of its fans preferred the sweeter version of the 'Blowin' in the Wind' kind of song, as by Peter, Paul & Mary. See and hear archive footage of them and the level of sanctimonious earnestness, the tone of self-important, hushed preaching, is preposterous, and made worse by those overly careful harmonies they're clearly so pleased with. And what could be more repulsively cutesy than the chart hit still current when their version of 'Blowin' in the Wind' was released, 'Puff the Magic Dragon'?

Yet Dylan was not averse to the smoothie sounds of groups like the Kingston Trio, and when it came to Peter, Paul & Mary, he didn't spurn writing the sleevenote poem 'In the Wind' for their album of that name (Warner Bros. WS1507, 1963), especially since they were bringing him much success. He also sang 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'We Shall Overcome' with them at the end of the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL on July 26, 1963 (the latter included on Evening Concerts at Newport Vol. 1, Vanguard VRS9148, 1964)—and, 23 years later, he sang 'Blowin' in the Wind' with them again at the Martin Luther King Birthday celebration in Washington, D.C., on January 20, 1986.

One of them, Pete Yarrow, had also pleaded with the crowd on Dylan's behalf at the end of his defiant electric set at Newport 1965, explaining later: 'I gave him my guitar, and I said "Go back on," which he did.' He gives a variant explanation in the interview with him in the movie No Direction Home in 2005.

Mary Travers comes back into the Dylan story in the 1970s. She fronted a radio series back then, Mary and Friend, and on March 10, 1975 in Oakland, California, she recorded an interview with Dylan, a 20-minute version of which was broadcast by KNX-FM on April 26, 1975, and syndicated to other stations the following month. It is from this interview that Dylan's much-quoted remark about Blood on the Tracks derives: 'A lot of people tell me they enjoyed that album. It's hard for me to relate to that: I mean, people enjoying that type of pain.'

As for Noel (Paul) Stookey, in Chronicles Volume One, in 2004, Dylan recalls a side of his personality that you would never suspect from Peter, Paul & Mary's image: 'He could imitate just about anything. . . . He could imitate singers imitating other singers. He was very funny. One of his more outrageous imitations was Dean Martin imitating LITTLE RICHARD.'

[Peter Yarrow, b. 31 May 1938, NY. Noel ('Paul') Stookey, b. 30 Dec 1937 (other commonly given dates are wrong), Baltimore, Maryland. Mary Allin Travers, b. 9 Nov 1936, Louisville, Kentucky. There is an excellent history of the group by William Ruhlman, Goldmine, 12 Apr 1996, excerpted at length on www.peterpaulmary.com. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, p.259. Mary Travers is currently fighting leukemia and underwent a 'bone marrow transplant procedure' in 2005.]

Petty, Tom [1950 -] Thomas Earl Petty was born on October 20, 1950 in Gainesville, Florida. His earliest groups were the Sundowners, the Epics and Mudcrunch. This last also contained BENMONT TENCH and MIKE CAMPBELL. They formed TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS in 1975. Petty always felt free, as did the others in the band, to pursue other projects too, and in 1981 one of these, a collaboration with Stevie Nicks (of Fleetwood Mac) on the single 'Stop Draggin' My Heart Around' proved especially fruitful commercially.

While the band toured with Dylan in 1986 and 1987, Petty's involvement with Dylan extended to sharing vocals with him on several songs performed nightly on the 1986 tour, producing Dylan's single 'Band of the Hand (It's Hell Time Man!)' for the film of the same name, co-writing a track on the Knocked Out Loaded album, 'Got My Mind Made Up', co-writing with Dylan and Mike Campbell the song 'Jammin' Me', which became one in a long line of Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers hit singles (in 1987), and then becoming, in 1988, one of THE TRAVELING WILBURYS.

From 1987 onwards, Petty also started making occasional appearances in episodes of the US TV series 'The Garry Shandling Show'; in 1989 he released a solo album, Full Moon Fever, augmented by several Heartbreakers and all the other Wilburys but Dylan, which went triple platinum and yielded several hit singles; five years later came a second, Wildflowers, which managed to include five hit singles including the especially successful 'You Don't Know How It Feels'; in summer 2001 he re-married, wedding a long-term girlfriend whose child from a former marriage is named Dylan. The ceremony was conducted by LITTLE RICHARD!

In 2002 Tom Petty appeared in the 'Simpsons' episode 'What I Did in My Strummer Vacation', and collected a Distinguished Achievement Award from the University of Florida; in 2004 he provided the voice for the character Lucky in the TV animation series 'King of the Hill'; and in 2005 he started hosting his own radio series on XM, 'Buried Treasure'.

Reportedly, Petty has said that his interest in music was first created at age 11 by the visit of ELVIS PRESLEY to his hometown: which is odd, really, since Presley never did play a concert in Gainesville, Florida, and played no concerts at all in 1961–62. But Petty has also said, asked about Dylan's influence: 'Bob Dylan influenced absolutely everything'.

[Tom Petty quote on Italian Dylan website www.maggiesfarm.it, 30 Aug 2005.]

Pichaske, David [1943 -] David Richard Pichaske, an academic in a backwoods check shirt, was born in Kenmore, New York, on September 2, 1943. He has a PhD in medieval literature and some of his early publications were on Spenser and Chaucer. Since then he has refocussed his scholarship onto contemporary Midwest American writers, especially rural writers, with a special interest in how place shapes thought, language and writing, and most of his own work examines these relationships. His newest book, Rooted: Seven Midwest Writers of Place, incorporates most of what he's wanted to say about the literature of the Midwest. His interest in Bob Dylan, which was first aroused in the mid-1960s, fits with all this.

He has taught at universities since 1965, and for the past quarter-century has been based in Dylan's home state of Minnesota. Currently he teaches in the English Department at Southwest Minnesota State University out at Marshall, MN, in the extreme flatness (or 'horizontal grandeur') of that part of the state where the great prairies begin. He has also had senior Fulbright lectureships in Poland, Latvia and Mongolia and has frequently revisited these places. His other published works include chapbooks, books of poetry, a novel, short stories and further non-fiction.

There has not been one semester in the last 35 years when a Pichaske book has not been used as a textbook in a university other than his own. These books have included A Generation In Motion: Popular Music and Culture in the Sixties (1979) and the earlier (but now out of print) Beowulf to BEATLES: Approaches to Poetry, which was his first published work involving Dylan, back in 1972. The same year came his first article bringing in Dylan, 'Towards an Aesthetics of Rock' in the Illinois English Journal, and a year later 'Rock and the Literary Mainstream' in the Connecticut English Journal. His book The Poetry of Rock—including an extended scrutiny of the John Wesley Harding album—was published in 1981, as was an update of Beowulf to Beatles.

His articles specifically on Dylan have been 'Bob Dylan and the Search for a Usable Past', in a 1983 Telegraph (collected in All Across the Telegraph, 1987); 'Bob Dylan's North Country: A Twenty-Five Year Report' in Endless Road in 1984; 'Bob Dylan's Publications in Broadside Magazine, 1962–65', Telegraph, 1985; the excellent 'The Prophet and the Prisoner: Bob Dylan and the American Dream', Telegraph, 1987; 'Bob Dylan' in the collection American Popular Music: Annotated Readings in Popular Music from Colonial America to Kent State, 1994; 'Poetry, Pedagogy and Popular Music: Renegade Reflections' in Popular Music and Society in 1999; and the two-parter 'Bob Dylan "And the Language That He Used"' in Judas! in 2003.

[David Pichaske, Beowulf to Beatles: Approaches to Poetry, New York: Free Press, 1972, revised as Beowulf to Beatles and Beyond: The Varieties of Poetry, New York: Macmillan, 1981; A Generation in Motion: Popular Music and Culture in the Sixties, New York: Schirmer Press, 1979 and Ellis Press, 1988; The Poetry of Rock, New York: Ellis Press, 1981; Rooted: Seven Midwest Writers of Place, Iowa City, IA: University of Iowa Press, 2006; and 'Bob Dylan' in Anderson, ed., American Popular Music: Annotated Readings in Popular Music from Colonial America to Kent State, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994. 'Bob Dylan and the Search for a Usable Past, Telegraph no.14, UK, Nov 1983; 'Bob Dylan's North Country: A Twenty-Five Year Report', Endless Road no.6, Hull, UK, fall 1984; 'Bob Dylan's Publications in Broadside Magazine, 1962–65', Telegraph no.20, summer 1985; 'The Prophet and the Prisoner: Bob Dylan and the American Dream', Telegraph no.26, spring 1987; 'Poetry, Pedagogy and Popular Music: Renegade Reflections' Popular Music and Society no.23.4, US, winter 1999; and 'Bob Dylan "And the Language That He Used"', Judas!, Huntingdon, UK, nos.5 & 6, Apr & Jul 2003.]

Pickering, Stephen [19?? -] Chofetz Chaim ben-Avraham, aka Stephen Pickering, is the author and editor of (now highly collectible) early self-published Dylan booklets, the large-format Dylan: A Commemoration, 1969, and the more substantial

Praxis: One, 1972. The latter contains an exemplary selected listing of articles about Dylan published 1961–71 as well as articles by a number of writers but mostly by Pickering; both booklets are largely ill-written and always unpleasant about other Dylan authors—it's typical of both traits that he writes of TOBY THOMPSON that his 'purpose is to edify himself' and that 'he is neither genuinely interested in Dylan's work, nor is his book any kind of unbiased or useful reference.'

However, these large booklets offer generous numbers of fine and rare Dylan photographs, mostly freely donated to Pickering from the collection of the Swiss underground figure Urban Gwerder, founder of the FRANK ZAPPA fanzine Hot Ratz Times.

In 1975 came Pickering's Bob Dylan Approximately: A Portrait of the Jewish Poet in Search of God—A Midrash, which looked at the 1974 tour and Dylan as Jewish mystic.

Pickering was the first to assert, not always convincingly but with an aggressive torrent of opaque argument, the centrality of the Jewish faith and Jewish teachings to Dylan's work—a stance he had already developed by the time of Praxis: One. He wrote from what he called the Center for the Study of Bob Dylan & Torah Judaism.

[Stephen Pickering, Dylan: A Commemoration, 1969, Santa Cruz, CA: 2nd edn., 1971. Praxis: One, Santa Cruz: No Limit, 1972 (it is often dated as 1971 but since it lists published articles up to Dec 1971, this is unlikely). Stephen Pickering, aka Chofetz Chaim ben-Avraham, Bob Dylan Approximately: A Portrait of the Jewish Poet in Search of God—A Midrash, New York: David McKay/Acorn Books, 1975. Urban Gwerder: Hot Ratz Times, Zurich, 11 issues, 1973–1975. An A4-sized reproduction of Dylan: A Commemoration was published by Desolation Row Promotions, UK, 1995; ditto Praxis: One, 1996.]

Planet Waves* [1974] For the first ten minutes after it came out, this 14th Dylan album was hailed—as New Morning had been—as 'the best thing he's done since Blonde on Blonde'. Like New Morning, it then suffered a disappointment backlash from which it never fully recovered. Put in the long back-projection of Dylan's recording career it now seems a potent, open album. Warm, musically sumptuous yet tense, and emotionally rich, it points down no new road; asserting the artist's right to prefer minor work on old canvasses to doing no work at all, it is drawn from the inner resources of memory and a determination to record faithfully the artist's current state of mind in spite of tiredness, an unpopular grown-upness and some lack of self-confidence.

It is demonstrably a Dylan album of the 1970s in managing to bind together elements of the city-surreal-intellectual world from which Blonde on Blonde's language derived, with a new willingness to re-embrace older, folksier, rural strengths. 'Going, Going, Gone' shows this binding together admirably. Here is the city language: 'I bin livin' on the edge . . .' and here is the urging of an older, simpler wisdom: 'Grandma said "Boy, go follow your heart / I know you'll be fine at the end of the line / All that's gold doesn't shine / Don't you and your one true love ever part."' Back on 'Memphis Blues Again' (on Blonde on Blonde), grandpa was just a joke; in 'Going, Going, Gone', grandma has insights to offer. She represents something stable, reliable and, by the implication of her age, something resilient. Through the rest of the song, Dylan presses this alliance of the two different worlds he'd previously walked through separately. He brings in an echo of his old folksinger days with a near-quote from 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right'—'I bin walkin' the road'—and he binds a rural image with vaguer, mid-60s-Dylan language in the opening verse: 'I've just reached a place / Where the willow don't bend . . . / It's the top of the end / I'm going, I'm going, I'm gone.'

The whole album devotes itself to revisiting, as the adult with the mid-60s surreal achievement behind him, the Minnesota landscapes and feelings from which he had emerged in the first place—and recalls these Minnesota years largely for the first time (except for 'Winterlude' and 'Went to See the Gypsy' on New Morning). There is a strange tension created by the contrast between recollected childhood and adolescence and current father-figure weariness. The result is nostalgia-soaked but genuinely beautiful, with an eerie, compelling quality that marks this album as unique in Dylan's output.

'Hazel' deals with a girlfriend he'd had long before he first set out for New York City; and in 'Something There Is About You' he says it carefully and clearly: 'Thought I'd shaken the wonder / And the phantoms of my youth / Rainy days on the Great Lakes / Walkin' the hills of old Duluth . . . / Somethin' there is about you / That brings back a long-forgotten truth . . . / I was in a whirlwind / Now I'm in some better place.'

This same theme, of the inexorable tug of the past and the struggle to wed it to the present, runs throughout. It is there in 'Wedding Song', and, coming at the end of the album, these lines, with their chilling full-stop, emphasize the desperation the whole song examines: 'I love you more than ever / Now that the past is gone.'

An earlier image in the same song echoes across the years from 1965's 'Farewell Angelina': 'I've said goodbye to haunted rooms / And faces in the street / To the courtyard of the jester / Which is hidden from the sun . . .', and 'Dirge' similarly says goodbye to old haunts—to the old folk days of Greenwich Village, such that the song acts as a re-write of 'Positively 4th Street': 'Heard your songs of freedom / And man forever stripped / Acting out his folly / While his back is being whipped . . . / I can't recall a useful thing / You ever did for me /

'Cept pat me on the back one time / While I was on my knees . . . / No use to apologize / What difference would it make?'

All the tension explored here stems from the contradictory ways in which the past reacts upon the present. The chill desperation of 'Wedding Song' and the distanced vitriol of 'Dirge' show one side of the process; the enriching feelings of revisiting on 'Something There Is About You', 'Hazel' and 'Never Say Goodbye' show the other side.

As well as these stand-out tracks, there are also two versions of what became a perennial concert anthem, 'Forever Young'. And like New Morning, the album sounds far better now than then. The musicians were THE BAND.

See also Planet Waves*, disappearing sleevenotes, the, and grandma and Walpole's cat.

[Recorded Santa Monica, CA, 2, 5–6, 8, 10 & 14 Nov 1973; released as stereo LP, Asylum 7E 1003 (US) & Island ILPS 9261 (UK), 17 Jan 1974.]

Planet Waves*, disappearing sleevenotes, the Sleevenotes in the form of a (roughly 300-word) prose poem by Dylan, which appeared, reproduced in his handwriting, on the back covers of the original Asylum Records (Island Records in the UK) issues of the Planet Waves LP, disappeared from the subsequent Columbia Records (and CBS) reissues, on vinyl and CD. Nor were they included in the book Lyrics 1962–1985. This is a pity, because despite some uncharacteristic coarseness (see '4th Time Around') they amount to an inspired and vivid evocation of the 1950s, and how it felt to live through the Eisenhower years.

[Ex-General Dwight D. (David) Eisenhower (1890–1969) was US President 1953–1960.]

Plugz, the Rumoured at the time to have been the name of the band backing Dylan on his March 1984 David Letterman TV show appearance, they seemed to shift from being the Plugz to being the Cruzados at some weird undetectable moment in the middle of working with Dylan. They had been the Plugz, when they formed on the US West Coast in 1978 as perhaps the first Latino punk band—with Tito Larriva on guitar and vocals, the not very Latino-sounding Barry McBride on bass and vocals, then replaced by Tony Marsico, and with Chalo (aka CHARLIE) QUINTANA on drums. They made a three-track vinyl single, 'Move', 'Let Go' and 'Mindless Contentment' on Slash Records in 1978, an album called Electrify Me in 1979, and then in 1981 another single, 'Achin'' c/w their superfast version of RITCHIE VALENS' 'La Bamba', and another album, Better Luck, both on their own label, Fatima Records. In 1983 they featured on the compilation album Los Angelinos and in 1984 managed to get themselves on the soundtrack (and soundtrack album) of the movie Repo Man, performing 'El Clavo y la Cruz', 'Hombre Secreto' (aka 'Secret Agent Man') and 'Reel Ten'. By this time they had a fourth member, Steve Hufsteter.

In late 1983, before Repo Man was released, Bob Dylan played harmonica for them on their studio track 'Rising Sun' at Cherokee Studios, Hollywood (exact date unknown). This was unreleased at the time, and then came out on a catalogue-numberless cassette issued by the group in spring 2000, by which time they were calling themselves the Cruzados, and their guitarist was calling himself Justin Jesting. In 2003 the track with Dylan's harp on it was included on the German compilation May Your Song Always Be Sung: The Songs of Bob Dylan Vol. 3 (which was, this track aside, a set of covers of Dylan songs by various artists) and in 2005 reissued on the CD The Cruzados: Unreleased Early Recordings, though this too is a home-made record and only available from their website (www.thecruzados.com). In the meantime they had released two official albums, Cruzados and After Dark, the first of which included a version of 'Rising Sun' without Bob Dylan on it.

More interestingly, soon afterwards the group—by this time Jesting, Marsico and Quintana—rehearsed with Dylan at his Malibu garage studio for a remarkable appearance on the NBC-TV show 'Late Night with David Letterman' on March 22, 1984. They had rehearsed dozens of songs, but in the usual Dylan way: that is, he had played through dozens of songs once or twice and then passed on to some more. At the TV-studio rehearsal, the video shows them performing 'I Once Knew a Man', 'Jokerman', 'License to Kill', 'Treat Her Right' and 'My Guy'. When it came to the performance itself, Letterman waved the cover of Dylan's new album Infidels in front of the camera, giving it a patronising but enthusiastic introductory spiel—and at the last minute Dylan sprang on them a gloriously grungy version of a 1955 SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON II song 'Don't Start Me to Talkin''. Dylan revelled in the punk sound of the band—and was dressed accordingly, not in Latino mode but in the hip thin dark suit and superthin tie of UK punks like the members of, say, the Jam or ELVIS COSTELLO à la 1980. Then came 'License to Kill' (not as good as at the TV-studio rehearsal, as it happened) and then a furiously fast, wondrous version of 'Jokerman', in the middle of which Dylan spent quite some time searching for a particular harmonica.

No-one else in the world would treat coast-to-coast high-ratings TV that way, and as a sampler of the album it was splendidly misleading. The version of 'Jokerman' on Infidels is magnificent—by far the album's best work—but this live version with the Plugz re-created it as an impassioned, howling anthem on the very edge of chaos, yet knowing and lither, as snarlingly fey and postmodern, as Television's album Marquee Moon—which was Tom Verlaine updating, via the Velvet Underground, the city-hipster-in-the-storm figure Dylan had first invented for himself back in 1966. Thanks more or less equally to the Plugz/Cruzados and Dylan, it was a transcendent mainstream television moment—made the more gloriously surreal when Letterman came on, looking like a lost Bible salesman at the end of the first number, clasping his hands and telling the musicians it had been 'very nice'. Very nice!

The Cruzados heyday began that same year. According to bass player Tony Marsico (not Marisco, as on a number of Dylan listings):

> 'From 1984 to 1988 the Cruzados toured non-stop throughout Europe and the US playing everywhere from your local dive bar to your over-the-top stadium show. Countless memories stick in my mind. . . . Praises from Bob Dylan, John Fogerty, David Byrne, Brian Setzer and Billy Joel hailing us as the "next big thing". Sorry if we let you down. We had fun trying! . . . Fleetwood Mac inviting us to play with them on a three-month incredible tour. Sitting on a bed at three in the morning in Florida with STEVIE RAY VAUGHAN showing us the right way to play "Tightrope". Playing to a hundred thousand plus crowd at Farm Aid and standing between NEIL YOUNG and ARLO GUTHRIE singing "This Land Is Your Land" while the sun set. Wow! Did I dream that?'

Apparently not. And perhaps all that activity explains why when Dylan himself embarked on a big European tour later in 1984, instead of using the Cruzados and delivering more of that alive and exciting stripped-down punkish music, he hired instead the usual bunch of seasoned players, including MICK TAYLOR, very possibly the world's most boring lead guitarist.

[The Cruzados: Cruzados, Arista, US, 1985, CD-reissued as Arista 8383, US, nia. Various Artists: Repo Man, San Andreas SAR 39019, US, 1984. Various Artists: May Your Song Always Be Sung: The Songs of Bob Dylan Vol. 3 (2-CD set), BMG 82876 50567-2, Germany, 2003. Television: Marquee Moon, NY, fall 1976, Elektra 7E-1098, US, 1977.]

'Pneumonia Ceilings' [1966] See McCartney, Paul.

Poe, Edgar Allan [1809 - 1849] Edgar Allan Poe, born to actor parents, had little success in his own lifetime but gained posthumous recognition as a major figure in 19th century American literature. Critic, short-story (including ghost-story) writer and poet, he was also a promising athlete in his youth, impressing his teachers in Richmond, VA, 'by swimming six miles against the tide in a river during a heatwave'. His best-known works are the story 'The Fall of the House of Usher' (1839), 'The Murders in the Rue Morgue' (1841)—sometimes claimed to be the first detective story—and the poems 'The Raven' (1845) and 'The Bells' (1849). One of those who made Greenwich Village into Bohemia a century and more before Dylan arrived in it, Poe died in Baltimore, October 7, 1849.

Christopher Rollason has suggested Poe as the prompt for Dylan's wild 1960s book Tarantula being so-called. He points out that Poe's story 'The Gold-Bug' is prefaced by the epigraph 'What ho! what ho! this fellow is dancing mad! He hath been bitten by the Tarantula.' Poe credits these lines to All in the Wrong, a play of 1761 by Arthur Murphy, but Poe editor Thomas Ollive Mabbott says this is untrue; Poe may have made them up. Either way, as Mabbott comments: 'The bite of the tarantula spider was held responsible for a wild hysterical impulse to dance—tarantism—that affected great numbers of people, especially in Italy, during the later Middle Ages. In Frederick Reynolds' play The Dramatist (1789) . . . a character . . . says, "I'm afraid you have been bitten by a tarantula—you'll excuse me, but the symptoms are wonderfully alarming. There is a blazing fury in your eye—a wild emotion in your countenance."' The point being that the protagonist appears to be mad but eventually his actions are revealed as based on a hidden chain of logical reasoning. Rollason adds: 'the theme of Hamlet-like apparent madness would seem to make sense in the general context of Tarantula, a tragi-comic voyage across a world that refuses to make sense, a crazy extension of the carnival on Desolation Row.' This seems somewhat less speculative when we note that Poe himself features inside Tarantula: in the section 'The Horse Race', 'edgar allan poe steps out from beside a burning bush', while in 'Al Aaraaf & the Forcing Committee', Dylan writes of 'New York neath spells of Poe'. The phrase 'Al Aaraaf', which refers to a passage in the Koran about a kind of limbo poised between heaven and hell, is itself the title poem of a volume published by Poe in 1829.

These mid-1960s allusions to Poe follow those from the Dylan songs of 1965, in which 'some raven' appears in 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', 'rue Morgue Avenue' is part of the geography of 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' and Captain Kidd, having appeared in Poe's 'The Gold-Bug', reappears in 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream'.

Poe's literary spirit also loiters behind some of Dylan's 1970s work, for good and ill. Poe's short poem 'To Helen', of which everyone knows two lines, usually without knowing where or whom they come from, removes the puzzle of all those embarrassingly florid pseudo-classical phrases of Dylan's that sit so uneasily in the choruses of 'Sara', on Desire. Where Helen is addressed in terms of 'Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face / Thy Naiad airs . . .', which Poe says have brought him home 'To the glory that was Greece / And the grandeur that was Rome' (the lines everyone knows, of course), and adds: 'How statue-like I see thee stand . . . / Ah, Psyche, from the regions which / Are Holy Land!', so 'Sara' is bombarded with: 'Sweet Virgin Angel. . . . Radiant jewel, mystical wife / . . . Scorpio

Sphinx in a calico dress' and 'Glamorous nymph with an arrow and bow.'

Poe's influence has also been to the good. Dylan inherits the heart of Poe's quirky confidence with rhymes, and particularly internal rhymes. The tour-de-force example of Dylan's 'No Time to Think' (1978): 'I've seen all these decoys through a set of deep turquoise / Eyes and I feel so depressed . . . / The bridge that you travel on goes to the Babylon / Girl with the rose in her hair . . . / Stripped of all virtue as you crawl through the dirt / You can give but you cannot receive' is prefigured by that of Poe's scintillating 'The Raven' (1845): 'And the silken sad uncertain rustling of each purple curtain / Thrilled me—filled me with fantastic terrors never felt before / So that now, to still the beating of my heart, I stood repeating / 'Tis some visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door'.

In December 2004, interviewed on US TV by Ed Bradley, when Dylan says that the burden of being perceived as a 'prophet' in the late 1960s made him feel like an imposter, he elaborates: 'It was like being in an Edgar Allan Poe story and you're just not that person everybody thinks you are, though they call you that all the time.'

[The Complete Poems and Stories of Edgar Allan Poe, 2 vols, ed. A.H. Quinn & E.H. O'Neill, first published 1946, has been reprinted through to at least the 1970s. The quote re Poe's swimming prowess comes from Martin Wainwright, The Guardian, London, 25 May 2005, p.4, while reporting Sylvester Stallone's intention to direct a Poe film bio. Thomas Ollive Mabbott, Collected Works of Edgar Allan Poe, Vol. 3, Tales and Sketches 1843–1849, Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1978, pp.844–845. Dylan, Tarantula, New York: St. Martin's Press reprint, 1994, p.39 & 136. Christopher Rollason's comments posted on the online discussion group http://rec.music.dylan, 5 May 2001. Dylan to Ed Bradley: '60 Minutes', CBS-TV, 5 Dec 2004.]

poems on Bob Dylan Poems about Dylan, or inspired by him, probably remain the rarest form of tribute: or at least, published, professional ones probably are. They are also, as A.J. Iríarte notes, 'harder to keep track of than most other writings on Dylan', partly because 'poetry by its very nature [is] elusive'. However, published poems about Bob Dylan do include these (all cited by Iríarte in a short piece in 2003):

A number of poems by ALLEN GINSBERG (see separate entry); the 1978 poem 'Dog Dream' by PATTI SMITH; the 1999 collection by critic, academic and poet STEPHEN SCOBIE, And Forget My Name: A Speculative Biography of Bob Dylan; the excellent Irish poet Paul Muldoon's 'Bob Dylan at Princeton, November 2000'—eight couplets centered around comparing two Dylan visits to Princeton 30 years apart, the first being to receive his Honorary Degree and the second to play a concert—from the poet who had earlier written a poem he said had been inspired by Dylan's 1989 album Oh Mercy; the American Norbert Krapf's 'Song for Bob Dylan (1971)'—in a collection titled after a Dylan line, The Country I Come From: Poems; a poem called 'Bob Dylan's Harmonica Sound' (is there but one?) by Scottish poet, literary reviewer and school teacher Lachlan Mackinnon, in his third verse collection, The Jupiter Collisions (2003); and the Spanish poet and novelist Benjamín Prado's poem 'Mi vida se llama Bob Dylan' ('My life's name is Bob Dylan'), from his 2002 collection Iceberg. An earlier Prado book of poems, from 1995, translates Dylan's song title 'Shelter from the Storm' into Spanish to provide its own title, Cobijo contra la tormenta.

A less wholly professional but far larger collection of Dylan poems (including the Lachlan Mackinnon) can be found—or rather, could be when still in print—in the 1993 book Jewels and Binoculars—Fifty Poets Celebrate Bob Dylan, edited by Phil Bowen, who has also written the short play A Handful of Rain, centered upon an imagined meeting between Bob Dylan and Dylan Thomas. And going back to 1975, Michael McClure includes 'For Bob Dylan' in his collection Jaguar Skies.

[A.J. Iriarte, 'I Could Write You Poems', The Bridge no.16, Gateshead, UK, summer 2003. Patti Smith, 'Dog Dream', Babel, New York: G.P. Putnam & Sons, 1978; re-collected in Early Work 1970–1979, New York: W.W. Norton, 1994. Stephen Scobie, And Forget My Name: A Speculative Biography of Bob Dylan, Victoria, B.C., Canada: Ekstasis Editions, 1999. Paul Muldoon, 'Bob Dylan at Princeton, November 2000' in Neil Corcoran, ed., Do You, Mr. Jones: Bob Dylan with the Poets and Professors, London: Chatto & Windus, 2002. Norbert Krapf: The Country I Come From: Poems, Santa Maria, CA: Archer Books, 2002. Lachlan Mackinnon, The Jupiter Collisions, London: Faber & Faber, 2003. Benjamín Prado, Iceberg, Madrid: Visor Libros, 2002. Phil Bowen & John Cornelius, Jewels and Binoculars—Fifty Poets celebrate Bob Dylan, Exeter, UK: Stride Books, 1993. Michael McClure, Jaguar Skies, New York: New Directions, 1975.]

poetry, American, pre-20th century There are two difficulties in looking at the influence of pre-20th century US poetry on Dylan's work. The first is that so much of it echoes English literature anyway. Edward Taylor, often regarded as America's first great poet, was born in England. Emerson didn't begin writing poetry until after he had travelled abroad, touring Italy and meeting Coleridge, Carlyle and Wordsworth in England. Longfellow was a professor of modern languages and literature, spent a lot of time in foreign travel and pursuing an absorption with European literature, and as a poet offers obvious resemblances to Tennyson. EDGAR ALLAN POE went to school in England and worked outside the sphere of the reigning Boston-New York literati of his day. It was among British poets and critics that WHITMAN found his first admirers, and after the long period of disfavour into which his work fell after his death, it was in response to D.H. Lawrence's marvellous book Studies in Classic American Literature (1923) that Whitman was readmitted to the American Poetic pantheon of greats. After Whitman, it is true, there is a large amount of truly American poetry, but then come POUND and ELIOT and the Lost Generation, all trying to be unAmerican in Europe.

The other difficulty is that the balladry of American poetry is so close to the traditions of folksong as to make it impossible to say where Dylan derives from the one or from the other.

Let's begin where the echo is clearer—with Emerson. The English automatically link the pantheism of Dylan's 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' with Wordsworth; but looking at the equivalent 19th century poetry written by Americans and today learnt by American middle-class children in schools, it is the pantheism of Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882) that shines out just as brightly—revealing at once a source of inspiration and tradition for that excellent Dylan song. This is Emerson's 'Each and All', first published 1839: 'I inhaled the violet's breath, / Around me stood the oaks and firs / . . . Again I say, again I heard, / The rolling river, the morning bird; / Beauty through my senses stole; / I yielded myself to the perfect whole.' And here is Dylan: 'I stood unwound beneath the skies / And clouds unbound by laws . . . / I gazed into the river's mirror / And watched its winding strum . . . / The last of leaves fell from the trees / And clung to a new love's breast.' (A separate entry treats the song in more detail.)

A keen correspondence occurs between Emerson's 'Goodbye', written in 1823 and published sixteen years later: 'Goodbye to Flattery's fawning face . . . / To crowded halls, to court and street / To frozen hearts and hasting feet', and Dylan's 'Wedding Song', 1974: 'I've said goodbye to haunted rooms / And faces in the street / To the courtyards of the Jester / Which are hidden from the sun.'

Then there is Emerson's contemporary, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1807–1882), and his reputation's millstone, 'Hiawatha' (1855), which jingles in the memory as rhythm: the rhythm that is the basis of so much American song. It is a rhythm that suggests the music-and-words art; it does not stubbornly insist on its words-on-the-page lineage. Not only 'Hiawatha'. Poems like 'Hymn to the Night', 'The Day Is Done', 'My Lost Youth', 'The Fire of Driftwood', 'The Bells of San Blas', 'The Arrow and the Song', 'The Ropewalk'—all have their primacy in jingling rhythms that wield assured, consistent drum-beats. Drummed into the memory from school days, this tradition of words as parts of song—of words as music—must act as a momentum of inspiration, however unconscious it may be, for Dylan. Longfellow's is the literary voice that murmurs underneath, just as, from the oral tradition, the old folksong patterns do.

It isn't odd, therefore, that specific snatches of Longfellow can be read in Dylan's voice, nor that it is less conscious technique that matches than ease of tone (derived from the rhythmic familiarity) and ease of vocabulary (derived from the familiarity of the voice that Longfellow gave to American writing). Here is such a snatch, from Longfellow's 'The Day Is Done' (collected 1906): 'I see the lights of the village / Gleam through the rain and the mist / And a feeling of sadness comes o'er me / That my soul cannot resist.' That ease of tone and of vocabulary match so strongly the same qualities in Dylan's writing that no-one would be surprised if Dylan had himself written those lines anywhere on New Morning, Planet Waves, Blood on the Tracks, Oh Mercy or Time Out of Mind.

It is the same milieu—the same operation of ease of tone and vocabulary upon the careful straightforwardness of what is being said—that Dylan gives us in the better parts of 'Sara', on Desire: 'Now the beach is deserted except for some kelp / And the wreck of an old ship that lies on the shore / You always responded when I needed your help / You gave me a map and a key to your door.' The rhythmic melody of that song, moreover, is itself an exact echo of Longfellow's 'Curfew' (1870): 'No voice in the chambers / No sound in the hall! / Sleep and oblivion / Reign over all! / The book is completed / And closed, like the day / And the hand that has written it / Lays it away.'

Of all this material it would be plausible to ask, well, what could be more quintessentially Dylanesque?

What of Walt Whitman (1819–1892)? His influence, like that of balladry, seems so deeply woven inside the body of modern American poetry as to be unmeasurable. It is his use of workaday experience and colloquial expression that represents the fundamental turning-point in American poetry from the drawing-room towards the street. And certainly it is Whitman's voice that makes possible ALLEN GINSBERG's Howl, itself a major influence on Dylan's mid-60s work as on so much that came after it.

Perhaps Whitman's insistence on the interminable-list-as-poetry even made possible Dylan's 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', 'Chimes of Freedom' and the whole idea of the 12-minute rock song, which seems suddenly to arrive out of nowhere (or out of the longer old folk-ballads) in the world of the two-and-a-half-minute pop song. Alongside a conventional poem, Leaves of Grass (a collection that grew and grew, from 12 poems in the self-published first edition of 1855 to 293 poems in the 1881 edition and more yet in the so-called 'Deathbed edition') parallels 'Desolation Row' or 'Highlands' alongside a normal popular song.

[The work of Emerson and Longfellow is well represented in The Penguin Book of American Verse, ed. Geoffrey Moore, 1979, and The Mentor Book of Major poets on Bob Dylan Poets tend to be more circumspect than critics, and far more so than people in the music business, when it comes to expressing opinions on Dylan's work. When they do say something, it's usually been provoked by being asked outright whether they think his work is poetry. Not always, though. The British poet Philip Larkin, a pre-bebop jazz fan, wrote in a Jazz Review of late 1965 (so that he wasn't late coming to this at all):

American Poets, ed. Oscar Williams & Edwin Honig, 1962. For Walt Whitman there is The Complete Poems, 1977.]

> 'I'm afraid I poached Bob Dylan's Highway 61 Revisited out of curiosity and found myself well rewarded. Dylan's cawing, derisive voice is probably well suited to his material—I say probably, because much of it was unintelligible to me—and his guitar adapts itself to rock ("Highway 61") and ballad ("Queen Jane") admirably. There is a marathon "Desolation Row", which has an enchanting tune and mysterious, possibly half-baked words.'

Robert Lowell, writing in an issue of The Review in summer 1971, managed to touch on a number of points rather compressedly in asserting that 'Bob Dylan is alloy; he is true folk and fake folk, and has the Caruso voice. He has lines, but I doubt if he has written whole poems. He leans on the crutch of his guitar.'

Less interestingly, but representing, in his view, the feelings of many in the generation immediately preceding the post-WWII babyboomers, here's John Berryman in an exchange quoted from the authorised biography by John Haffenden:

> '"I can never forgive that young upstart for stealing my friend Dylan's name," he roared about Bob Dylan. "Yes, but don't you agree he's a poet?" "Yes, if only he'd learn to sing!"'

[Philip Larkin: Jazz Review, London, 10 Nov 1985. John Berryman quoted in John Haffenden, The Life of John Berryman, Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1982. Robert Lowell, The Review, nia, summer 1971. These comments were collected in 'Three Other Poets on Bob Dylan' in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across The Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: Futura Paperbacks edn., p.177 (though here Haffenden was given as Hoffenden).]

Pomarède, Michel [1952 -] Michel Pomarède runs the invaluable website 'Come Writers and Critics', which offers the most comprehensive listing of books about Dylan (including, of course, those by Dylan) with scans of the front covers of as many editions from around the world as possible, plus scans of large numbers of magazine covers featuring Dylan, songbook covers, tour programmes and more. Pomarède was born in Paris on March 24, 1952 and took an interest in Dylan's work from 1966 onwards. He decided to create his website after discovering computers and the internet in 1995. In his other life he is a pharmacist and owns a pharmacy near Paris.

['Come Writers and Critics', http://perso.wanadoo.fr/michel.pomarede/CW&C/.]

Pomus, Doc [1925 - 1991] Jerome Solon Felder was born in Brooklyn on June 27, 1925, and in childhood was struck down by polio, learnt the saxophone and was turned on to the blues by hearing Joe Turner on the radio. He performed, standing on crutches, as a white blues singer from the late 1940s to the mid-1950s before concentrating on songwriting. He wrote the words and with pianist Mort Shuman writing the music they became, from 1958–65, one of the greatest of all the songwriting partnerships of the era. If you thought 'Leiber & Stoller' first, you certainly thought 'Pomus & Shuman' second, and that went for ELVIS songs and songs in general.

By the time of this partnership Pomus had already written 'Boogie Woogie Country Girl' for Joe Turner, RAY CHARLES' smash hit 'Lonely Avenue' and the Coasters' 'Youngblood' with Leiber & Stoller (a song revived to gothic effect by LEON RUSSELL and performed by him at the Concert for Bangla Desh in 1971). With Shuman, Pomus wrote 'A Mess of Blues', 'Surrender', 'Little Sister', 'His Latest Flame', 'Viva Las Vegas', 'Suspicion' and others for Presley, and for others 'Teenager in Love' (Dion & the Belmonts), 'I'm a Tiger' (Fabian), 'Go, Jimmy, Go' (Jimmy Clanton), and for the Drifters 'Sweets for My Sweet', 'I Count the Tears' and the much-covered 'Save the Last Dance for Me'.

The two of them visited England in 1964; Shuman started composing with other people, and Pomus, back home in 1965, had a serious fall that confined him to a wheelchair for the rest of his days. There's something especially poignant about a man crippled by polio writing 'Save the Last Dance for Me'.

He stopped writing altogether, and spent ten years as a professional gambler until squeezed out by the mob, who sent two masked gunmen round to his 72nd Street apartment. He returned to songwriting, collaborating mostly with Dr. John on songs for B.B. King and many others.

At Pomus' posthumous induction into the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame, the distinguished blues folklorist Dick Waterman said this of him: 'He never felt that he was creating High Art. It was his gig. He got up in the morning and went to work writing songs just as if he was delivering mail, driving a cab or practicing medicine.'

His son, Geoffrey J. Felder, e-mailed a Dylan discussion group in 1997 to say that he remembered 'the time Dylan came over to my dad's apartment to discuss life, songwriting, etc. My dad was very impressed with Dylan and always thought highly of him.'

It was mutual, and for the 1995 tribute album Till the Night Is Gone, a compilation of specially made recordings by Roseanne Cash, John Hiatt, LOU REED and others of 14 Doc Pomus songs, mostly co-written with Shuman, Bob Dylan went right back to the start of the story and recorded a version of 'Boogie Woogie Country Girl', in Memphis in May 1994, backed by his touring band of the day. It wasn't, of course, a patch on the great Joe Turner version, but it was meant well.

Doc Pomus died of lung cancer in New York on March 14, 1991.

[Bob Dylan: 'Boogie Woogie Country Girl', 9–11 May, 1994, Till the Night Is Gone: A Tribute to Doc Pomus, Rhino R2 71878, US, 1995. Geoffrey J. Felder e-mail, 22 May 1997, quoted from www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/who.html, online 13 Oct 2005.]

pop 1960–62: not all hopeless The myth has been created that 1960 was an all-time low in pop, which would suggest that there was nothing much for Dylan to gather from it; this is untrue. 1960 wasn't the best year ever but it introduced some beautiful sounds—a situation that held all through 1961–62 as well. The only thing missing was a genuine trend. All the good things were disconnected: separate end-products of the earlier rock years. This very disconnectedness made for unprecedented variety. What were the things that invalidate the myth of pre-BEATLES infertility?

The first thing to say is that this was actually a time when some rock came back: GENE VINCENT with 'Pistol Packin' Mama'; Eddie Cochran with 'Cut Across Shorty'; and Brenda Lee with 'Sweet Nuthins'. RICKY NELSON tried it, with blaring saxes, on 'I Got My Eyes on You (And I Like What I See)'. The Piltdown Men arrived; Gary US Bonds came along with 'New Orleans' and 'Quarter to Three'; and Freddie Cannon did 'The Urge'. THE EVERLY BROTHERS did 'Lucille'; JERRY LEE LEWIS came back with a classic version of 'What'd I Say'; PRESLEY himself made 'A Mess of Blues', 'I Feel So Bad' and 'Little Sister', and they issued a great but doctored BUDDY HOLLY rocker, 'Baby I Don't Care'. (Part of what was happening was that while rock'n'roll heroes Vincent, Cochran, Lewis and Holly all enjoyed short-lived popularity in the US, they all attained great longevity in Britain.)

Apart from this unchristened rock revival, on came a super-abundance of sounds that were newer, maybe cleverer, and which certainly stick in the mind. Blues singer Billy Bland made it with 'Let the Little Girl Dance'. Floyd Cramer started something with 'On the Rebound'—something Dylan's Nashville Skyline track 'Tell Me That It Isn't True' acknowledges. Clarence Frogman Henry was around, making delightful concert appearances as well as the records 'But I Do', 'You Always Hurt the One You Love', 'Ain't Got No Home', 'Lonely Street' and a great, great flop called 'A Little Too Much'. ROY ORBISON arrived, with grace, elegance of style and a voice that could not fail—the prototype voice for Dylan's Isle of Wight Festival 'Wild Mountain Thyme', for 'I Forgot More' on Self Portrait and part at least of 'Lay Lady Lay'. RAY CHARLES balanced nicely between soul and country. The Marcels did 'Blue Moon' and Ernie K. Doe did 'Mother-in-Law'. Dion found his 'Runaround Sue' sound and Neil Sedaka found 'Breakin' Up Is Hard to Do'. The Everly Brothers were better than ever, with 'Cathy's Clown', 'Nashville Blues', 'Stick With Me Baby' and 'Temptation'.

Tamla-Motown was young enough to be refreshing, as on 'Please Mr. Postman' by the Marvelettes and 'Shop Around' by the Miracles. (See also Robinson, Smokey.) PHIL SPECTOR came along like Armageddon with the Crystals, Bob B. Soxx & the Blue Jeans and later the Ronettes. The Tokens did 'The Lion Sleeps Tonight', and 'B'Wa Nina' and Bruce Channel made 'Hey! Baby'. Presley made his beautiful 'Surrender', and SAM COOKE sang 'Nothing Can Change This Love'. There was 'Monster Mash' by Bobby Boris Pickett & the Crypt-Kickers. Add to all that the Shirelles' 'Will You Love Me Tomorrow' and 'Tell Him' by the Exciters. Then add 'I Sold My Heart to the Junkman' by the Blue-Belles, and 'I'm Blue' by the Ikettes. 'Letter Full of Tears' by Gladys Knight & the Pips. 'Snap Your Fingers' by (the American) Joe Henderson. The Contours' 'Do You Love Me' and the Isleys' 'Twist and Shout'. Ketty Lester's 'Love Letters' and Claude King's wonderful 'Wolverton Mountain'. 'What's a Matter Baby?' by a resplendently vengeful Timi Yuro; and perhaps the very greatest of the lot, one minute twenty-eight seconds' worth of 'Stay', by Maurice Williams & the Zodiacs.

Far from being bad years, 1960–62 were very rich, and very diversified. The dominant influence, if there was one, was the search for a new bi-racial R&B, but there was a corresponding country strength. Altogether there was plenty happening for Dylan to notice, react to, pick up on: his pop education didn't need to have finished—couldn't have finished—in the 1950s.

[Gene Vincent (musical arrangement by Eddie Cochran): 'Pistol Packin' Mama', London, 11 May 1960, Capitol F4442, LA (and Capitol CL 15136, London), 1960; this reached the UK top 20 in Jun 1960. Eddie Cochran: 'Cut Across Shorty' [B-side of British top 3 hit 'Three Steps to Heaven'], LA, Jan 1960, Liberty 55242, Hollywood (London American HLG 9115, London), 1960.Jerry Lee Lewis: 'What'd I Say', Nashville, 9 Feb 1961; Sun 356, Memphis (London American HLS 9335, London), 1961: a British top 10 hit in May 1961; the original version by its composer, Ray Charles ('What'd I Say Part 1' c/w 'What'd I Say Part 2)', NY, 18 Feb 1959, Atlantic 2031, NY, 1959, was not released in the UK at the time. Lewis also scored minor UK top 40 hits with rock'n'roll records in 1962—'Sweet Little 16', Memphis, 5 Jun 1962, Sun 379, Memphis (London American HLS 9584, London) and 1963—'Good Golly Miss Molly', Nashville, 11 Sep 1962, Sun 382 (London American HLS9688). Dylan performed 'What'd I Say' at Farm Aid rehearsals, LA, 19 Sep 1985.

Elvis Presley: 'A Mess of Blues', Nashville, 20–21 Mar 1960, RCA Victor, NY, 1960; 'I Feel So Bad', Nashville, 12–13 Mar 1961, RCA Victor, 1961; 'Little Sister', Nashville, 25–6 Jun 1961, RCA Victor, 1961. 'I Feel So Bad' revived what had been a 1954 R&B hit for its composer, Chuck Willis ('I Feel So Bad', NY, 17 Sep 1953, OKeh 7029, NY); other Willis hits included 'It's Too Late' (NY, 13 Apr 1956, Atlantic 1098, NY, 1956): a song Dylan might also have known from the recording of it by Buddy Holly (the Crickets: 'It's Too Late', Clovis, NM, May–Jul 1957, issued on their first LP, The Chirping Crickets, Brunswick 54038, NY, 1957 and Coral LVA 9081, London, 1958). Dylan performed 'It's Too Late' live in Buenos Aires, 10 Aug 1991 and at the 'free rehearsal' in Fort Lauderdale, 23 Sep 1995.

Buddy Holly: '(You're So Square) Baby I Don't Care', Clovis, NM, Dec 1957, Coral Q 72432, London, 1961 (not issued as a USA single). Holly had further British posthumous chart successes with rock'n'roll records in this period as follows: 'Midnight Shift', Nashville, 26 Jan 1956 c/w 'Rock Around with Ollie Vee', Nashville, 22 Jul 1956, Brunswick O 5800, London, 1959 (top 30); 'Brown-Eyed Handsome Man' (a Chuck Berry song), Clovis, 1956 (overdubs by the Fireballs, Clovis, 1962), Coral C 62369, NY (Q 72459, London: different B-side), 1963 (top 3); and 'Bo Diddley' (a BO DIDDLEY song), Clovis, 1956 (overdubs Fireballs, Clovis, 1962), Coral C 62352, NY (Coral Q 72463, London: different B-side), 1963 (top 10).

Clarence Frogman Henry: 'Ain't Got No Home', New Orleans, Sep 1956; Argo 5259, Chicago, 1956. 'But I Do' c/w 'Just My Baby and Me', New Orleans, c.Aug 1960; Argo 5378 (Pye International 7N 25078, London), 1961. 'You Always Hurt the One You Love', New Orleans, c.Mar 1961; Argo 5388 (Pye Intnl 7N 25089), 1961. 'Lonely Street' c/w 'Why Can't You', New Orleans, c.Mar 1961; Argo 5395 (Pye Intnl 7N 25108), 1961. 'On Bended Knees' c/w 'Standing in the Need of Love' (a secular re-write of gospel song 'Standing in the Need of Prayer'), Memphis, c.Jul 1961; Argo 5401 (Pye Intnl 7N 25115), 1961. 'A Little Too Much' c/w 'I Wish I Could Say the Same', Memphis, c.Jul 1961; Argo 5408, (Pye Intnl 7N 25123), 1962. Excepting 'On Bended Knees' and 'I Wish I Could Say the Same', all these are on the CD The Best of Clarence Frogman Henry, MCA 19226, London, 1993 (unissued USA). Beware cheap re-recordings on cheap re-releases.

Re Clarence Henry, see also Charles, Bobby.

Everly Brothers: 'Cathy's Clown', Nashville, 18 Mar 1960, Warner Brothers 5151, NY (Warner Brothers WB 1, London), 1960; 'Temptation', Nashville, 1 Nov 1960 c/w 'Stick With Me Baby', Nashville, 27 Jul 1960, Warner Bros. 5220 (WB 42), 1961.]

post-war blues, Dylan's ways of accessing In general, Dylan's routes of access to the postwar electric blues and R&B were much the same as those of anyone else growing up in the 1950s a long way from any cities with sizeable black populations; but two specific sources are worth a mention.

Fifteen miles from Hibbing, in the small town of Virginia, MN, there was a DJ on station WHLB called Jim Dandy (real name James Reese), and in the summer of 1957 Dylan and his friend John Bucklen went over to find 'the man behind the voice', as ROBERT SHELTON puts it. Bucklen told Shelton that after they found him, they visited him often. 'He was a Negro, involved with the blues. He had a lot of records we like.' Dandy's was the only black family in town, and on radio he used a 'white' voice, which he dropped when he saw that Dylan and Bucklen were keen on black music. They spent many visits listening to R&B and blues records. As Shelton comments: 'Through Jim Dandy, Bob discovered a new Iron Range that his family scarcely knew. That is why Dylan could say: "Where I lived . . . there's no poor section and there's no rich section. . . . There's no wrong side of the tracks . . ."'

The other source for the music was the far more powerful, big-time radio stations you could pick up even in the North Country. Dylan's early girlfriend ECHO HELSTROM remembers listening to DJ Gatemouth Page, beamed up from Shreveport, Louisiana, in 1957, and Dylan was buying blues and post-war R&B records he'd heard on the radio from the age of 13, according to Stan Lewis, the legendary Shreveport record-store owner, plugger and radio-show packager, recollecting this in 1996:

'DJs like Wolfman Jack . . . had shows on other independent stations willing to work R&B into their formats. One of those clear-channel stations had a 250,000-watt transmitter in Mexico. On certain nights its signal could be heard all over the country, even in Europe and South America. I couldn't believe some of the places I started getting orders from.' One place was Hibbing, Minnesota. 'He used to call me at night, to order the records he'd just heard on the air. I thought to myself, Who is this rich kid, calling long-distance from the Midwest to order records? We'd chat and talk about the blues . . .'

See also pre-war blues, Dylan's ways of accessing.

[Echo Helstrom in Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, Penguin edn., p.48. Stan Lewis: 'With the Record Man: A Half Century of Stan Lewis Memories', Willard Manus, Blues Access no.26, Boulder, CO, summer 1996.]

Pound, Ezra [1885 - 1972] American poet, musician and critic Ezra Weston Loomis Pound (October 30, 1885–November 1, 1972) was, with T. S. ELIOT, a major figure of the modernist movement in early 20th century poetry and was central to Imagism and Vorticism (the latter a termed he devised). He also edited Eliot's The Wasteland and wrote the important 1920 poem 'Hugh Selwyn Moberley'.

He is given a namecheck in 'Desolation Row', where he and Eliot are envisaged as 'fighting in the captain's tower / While calypso singers laugh at them / And fishermen hold flowers', and another namecheck in the interviews for the sleeve-notes to Biograph two decades later.

Additionally, Pound's major work, The Cantos, a long never-finished poem mostly written between 1915 and 1962, was an influence on much modern poetry, especially for its pioneering use of the collage form. The British poet Lee Harwood explains this influence upon himself in terms that hint at what many of THE BEATS (and, via them, Dylan) might have gained from Pound: 'The collage technique seems to provide a so much more accurate picture of how the world works—a weave of conversations and ideas and history and all the interruptions and half-said bits . . .'—which is, perhaps as proof of the Pound-Dylan pudding, a description that seems to apply readily to "Love and Theft". However, in Chronicles Volume One Dylan says bluntly: 'Pound . . . was a Nazi sympathiser in World War II and did anti-American broadcasts from Italy. I never did read him.'

Pound heard Dylan, though: ALLEN GINSBERG met the 81-year-old Pound in Italy, and in Venice sat him down and made him listen to THE BEATLES' 'Eleanor Rigby' and 'Yellow Submarine', followed by Dylan's 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands' and 'Gates of Eden'. Pound said nothing.

[The first US Collected Poems of Ezra Pound was published in New York: New Directions, 1926. Lee Harwood, Collected Poems, 2004; quoted in a review of this by August Kleinzahler, 'Toss the monkey wrench', London Review of Books vol. 27, no.10, p.29. Dylan quote from Chronicles Volume One, p.110. Pound in Venice story from Barry Miles, Ginsberg: A Biography, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989, p.401.]

'Precious Angel' See angels and Artes, Mary Alice.

Presley, Elvis [1935 - 1977] 'When I first heard Elvis' voice I just knew that I wasn't going to work for anybody; and nobody was going to be my boss. . . . Hearing him for the first time was like busting out of jail': Bob Dylan.

As everyone must know, Presley came from Tupelo, Mississippi, where he was born poor in the 1930s (January 8, 1935), and moved to Memphis with his mother and unemployed father at age 13; later he got a job driving a truck. (There's a neat Dylan allusion to this, delivered in a tough, Presley voice, on the Basement Tapes song 'Lo and Behold': 'Goin' down t' Tennessee! get me a truck or somethin''.) Very much a southerner, Presley said Yes Ma'am, No Sir to hostile press reporters, was inward with a simple gospelly religion (via the First Assembly Church of God) and loved the voice of Mahalia Jackson.

Presley had the formula for rock'n'roll within him: a natural upbringing on blues and country music in its living environment. Through his extraordinary fusion of hillbilly, country, blues and rhythm & blues, he changed everything. He gave youth its separate presence; he gave white adolescence its sexual freedom; he gave black music its rightful place at the forefront of American consciousness.

All this with the direct help of four other people and a recording less than two minutes long, in the summer of 1954. That first record, issued by Sun for distribution only in the South, was ARTHUR 'Big Boy' CRUDUP's blues 'That's All Right', sung with a kind of subdued freneticism that sounds hillbilly, amateurish and absolutely genuine. Elvis neither prettied up nor replicated a hot blues record that day. What he started into with his restless but sensitive rhythm guitar and his gloriously fluid, expressive voice was an astonishing and complete re-working of a blues record of no particular distinction released back in 1946, when Elvis Presley was an 11-year-old school boy still living in a home-made shack in East Tupelo.

When Elvis lit into the song, Sam Phillips knew it but was amazed that Elvis did, and taken aback at how freely he was refashioning it. Scotty Moore and Bill Black (lead guitarist and bass player with the Starlite Wranglers) didn't know the song—they'd never heard anything like this from one of their contemporaries—but they joined in readily with a perfect musical match. They'd never have dreamt of it yet it made sense to them at once. Whole generations soon responded the same way.

How inward, how fundamental a strength, his understanding of the blues. He went into that studio already knowing lots of blues: 'We talked about the Crudup records I knew—"Cool Disposition", "Rock Me Mama", "Hey Mama", "Everything's All Right" and others, but settled for "That's All Right", one of my top favorites', he said in a 1957 interview. Blues came to him naturally. 'A Mess of Blues'; 'One Night'; 'That's All Right'; 'Reconsider Baby' (the Lowell Fulson classic); 'Blueberry Hill'; 'Anyplace Is Paradise'; 'Lawdy Miss Clawdy'; 'It Feels So Right'; 'Heartbreak Hotel'; listen to any of these today and the claim that Presley is a great white blues singer is hard to deny. Listen to Sun 209 now and it still shimmers and bounces off the walls with the sheer delight the musicians and singer are feeling at having found themselves and at the cathartic release this brings. You're hearing the tingling air in the room at the moment of bold, inspired creation.

He makes it his own. As he does with the bluegrass classic on the other side, Bill Monroe's 'Blue Moon of Kentucky', a parallel re-invention. His later 'Shake Rattle & Roll' makes Big Joe Turner's a different animal without compromising its animal nature, disproving the charge of making a cleaned-up product for whites. Elvis doesn't flinch from the sexual raunch of 'I bin over the hill and way down underneath / You make me roll my eyes and then you make me grit my teeth.' In other words, Presley trusts himself absolutely to stick to lyrics that are low-down and dirty and, equally, to abandon verses that do nothing for him, often substituting lines from elsewhere or of his own invention. All his Sun sides do this. So much for Presley being 'just' a singer of other people's songs.

He makes this then under-attended music his own, and in doing so makes it everybody's: most especially letting it speak straight to the souls of the young. For the truth is, when we were that young, we couldn't identify sexually with these older black singers: not because of their colour but because we thought they sounded, well, elderly. At the very least they were clearly grown-ups. Even when they were exuding innuendo, they sounded like comfortable uncles. To young ears, Wynonie Harris makes 'Meet me in the alley' sound sedate, and Arthur Gunter sings 'Baby Let's Play House' as if they'll be choosing the curtains. Elvis transforms its mood, reclaiming gleefully the forbidden thrill of its suggestive propositioning for teenagers still trapped in their parents' houses.

With an artistic self-knowledge beyond his years, he seized a music that thrilled him and made perfect sense to him as a vehicle for expressing his own vision, in such a way that it liberated millions. The upshot is a 'copy' or a 'cover' more original than the original.

Of course 'originality' wasn't the point of the blues. It began as a communal music, and the great body of blues lyric poetry mainly comprises moveable stanzas shared between everybody from the city street-corner guitarist to the men in their 40s before ever they recorded, who then found, like BLIND LEMON JEFFERSON, that banjo-picking Appalachian hillbillies were hearing them too.

Elvis' fusion was therefore the inspired articulation of something long in the air. His originality lay partly in coming out with it, and partly in his brilliant perception that the mysterious music of middle-aged black men, sung in a patois largely shared by crackers like the Presleys, could be the perfect expressive form for pent-up white youth.

There need be no divides, he realised. And he changed the world when he opened his mouth and let out that uniquely yearning voice—that voice in which inner nobility is as audible as the need to bust free of a stultifying, gentility-filled future.

From 1956 to 1960, his music was golden and he was the untouchable and inaccessible prototype superstar. What, after that, went out of Presley's world? All the sex; all that curious amalgam of insinuation and bluntness he had introduced; all the radiant and thrilling charisma that had more than compensated for the false posturing of everything in the pre-Dylan years; all the therapeutic, rôle-distancing humour; an impeccable control in a strong voice that understood (rare thing then) nuance; and an avowing, ever-present nobility.

When he started, the two striking things in his music were lack of inhibition, and sex. Adolescents admired him because he could be socially unacceptable and get away with it, on stage and on record and in the mind, even if not more than once on the Ed Sullivan TV show. Sullivan was right, by his own lights, to take Presley's hips out of camera-range: they were being rude. And certainly a lot of teen-singers who came after him were to discover that getting up on stage and yelling Waaaaahhhh!!! is like exposing yourself in public without being stigmatized.

Sexually, Presley offered a new world, at any rate to whites, and offered it with a blunt statement of interests. There was none of the sycophantic 'dating' appeal that was the context of the most of the 50s stars' records. 'At the Hop', 'Teenager in Love', 'Lonely Boy': these were the typical titles of the time—but not for Elvis. His titles suited the black labels that announced them. Presley's titles were 'Trouble', 'I Got Stung', 'Jailhouse Rock', 'Paralysed', 'King Creole'—these all fitted the various significant elements that made Presley a unique, thrusting and ominous force. He embodied an untapped violence (it lurks in that prophetic, pre-Pete Townshend line 'He don't stop playin' till his guitar breaks') that a song like 'Trouble' made explicit and the kind of hard bravado that 'Jailhouse Rock' merged with ecstasy. 'Jailhouse Rock' is a direct descendant of 'Hound Dog', where the voice seems to rage like King Kong in chains.

Most rock'n'roll stars tried to be aggressive and masculine, and made love to the stage microphone (GENE VINCENT most endearingly): but only Elvis Presley projected himself so well that he seemed often to be bearing down sexually on the listener. In the love songs he offered to the young and virginal a constant implication of prior sexual experience and a corresponding cynicism others could never bring off: 'Hey baby—I ain't askin' much o' you / No n-no n-no n-no no baby—ain't askin' much o' you: / Just a big-uh big-uh big-uh hunk of love will do.' In 1959 that came across as freshly candid, its message the forerunner of that line from Dylan's 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', 'It's not that I'm askin' for anything you never gave before'. The two share the same ambiguity, the same ostensible politeness.

It was a unique stance at the time: unique, at least, in reaching the mass of white middle-class adolescents. Elvis was having sex with you while RICKY NELSON was singing 'I hate to face your dad / Too bad / I know he's gonna be mad / It's late . . . / Hope this won't be our last date' and in the mournful, sexless world of Eddie Cochran (despite his macho posturing), 'Six hot-dogs oughta be just right / After such a wonderful night.' Presley, in contrast, got down to the eternal verities of passion underlying the middle-class Saturday night: 'If you wanna be loved, baby you gotta love me too / Cos I ain't for no one-sided love affair: / Well a fair exchange ain't no robbery / An' the whole world knows that it's true'. And 'Why make me plead / For something you need?'

Presley's cynicism had such pungency that it provided, over the years, a sharp, concerted attack on the two-faced conventions imposed on the children of the 50s. His delivery gave a stylishness and authority to these open, soliciting songs that was utterly lacking in the other rock artists. Not just by sneers but by his pent-up tremble in the bass notes, the sudden, full-throated rasps and the almost confessional, mellow country moans. Presley was saying 'Let's fuck' years before John and Paul were wanting to hold your hand. Millions of eager teenagers, weary of the pudge next door, could respond a good deal more honestly when Elvis sang 'Stuck on You', 'Treat Me Nice' and 'Baby Let's Play House'. Even at his most melodic (which he was never afraid to be, and which he always carried off without false delicacy) there was a saving power.

A final point on Presley's sexuality. It is true that the pre-rock chart-toppers and radio-favourites, the night-club stars whose idea of perfection was a Cole Porter song and the Nelson Riddle Orchestra, dealt with sex too—but never, never with passion. Physical contact, desire, sexual aspiration always come across From SINATRA, Tormé, Tony Bennett and the rest as a kind of world-weary joke that goes with old age. The standard it's-one-in-the-morning-and-we're-pretty-smooth treatments of 'I've Got You Under My Skin', 'Night and Day', etc, could as easily be addressed to the bottle as to the babe.

Against this lifeless background, Presley's initial impact coast-to-coast in America, and in Britain also, was cataclysmic. Yet lack of inhibition, sex and the voice to carry it was not all that he offered. He also gave out a fair share of the vital humour that goes with the best hard-line rock and that FATS DOMINO, CHUCK BERRY and LITTLE RICHARD all used very well: as humour that shows itself aware of outside values and of the inextricable mixture of the important and the trivial, the real and the stylised in the pop medium. And if you go back now to the original Presley recordings, the pungency and freshness of this humour can still hit home.

Where to begin, on how Presley influenced Dylan? It's almost too all-embracing to bear delineation. But in the first place, Dylan would have heard at least part of his old blues material second-hand through Presley—to whom it seemed an entirely natural, fluid medium in which to express, well, everything. Elvis was a living demonstration of how this could be done. When we acknowledge that Dylan has worked the blues so strongly and resourcefully that he has given it something back, the nearest comparison must be to Presley.

You can see the extent of Dylan's drawing on the poetry of pre-war blues in a song as 'new' as 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' (and in a couple of earlier songs), from looking at just one such old blues, Leroy Carr's 'Alabama Woman Blues': 'Did you ever go down on the Mobile and K.C. Line / I just want to ask you, did you ever see that girl of mine / I rode the central and I hustled the L&N / The Alabama women, they live like section men . . . / Don't the clouds look lonesome across the deep blue sea / Don't my gal look good when she's coming after me.' But additionally, though by the nature of the process inseparably, Dylan's lines draw in the couplet Presley sings so beautifully in the cathartic, lulled middle of his stormy Sun recording of 'Milk Cow Blues Boogie': 'Don't that sun look good goin' down / Well don't that old moon look lonesome when your baby's not around?'

Here, in one revelatory musical moment, we glimpse how electrifyingly such stuff passes along. To hear Presley sing these lines is to hear it all: to hear the graceful, rueing heart of the old country blues—never better voiced than in the brilliant ellipse of the opening line of BLIND BLAKE's 'One Time Blues' in 1927: 'Ah the rising sun going down'—yet to hear at the same moment the liberation of the soul that Elvis found in the blues almost 30 years later, a liberation he passed on to all of us whiteys when he first sang out—and in that same moment to hear too a sound that travels forward another 30-odd years to illuminate what Dylan has swirling around him when, on 1990's Under the Red Sky song '10,000 Men', he comes to sing its second line not as a full repeat of the first ('Ten thousand men on a hill', which might be thought abrupt and spare enough) but honed to the absolute minimalism of 'Ten thousand men, hill,' so that Dylan, sounding old as the hills himself (and pronouncing 'he-yi-ull' exactly as Elvis always did), stands shoulder to shoulder across the 60-year gap with Blind Blake. Sure has been a long hard climb; yet it has been a shared journey, and the terrain is constantly replenished.

(When Dylan recorded 'Milk Cow Blues' in 1962, he used part of Kokomo Arnold's lyric, part of Presley's, part of ROBERT JOHNSON's 'Milkcow's Calf Blues' and part of LEADBELLY's 'Good Morning Blues', shuffling these elements around in the course of two still-unreleased takes.)

Yet Dylan's debt to Presley reaches beyond the blues. We find Elvis in many corners of Dylan's canon. Perhaps it was even hearing Elvis' belatedly issued version of LONNIE JOHNSON's hit 'Tomorrow Night' that reminded Dylan of the song, and prompted its inclusion on his 1992 album Good as I Been to You. More certainly, Dylan's lyric and tune on 'One More Night', on Nashville Skyline, are heavily reminiscent of Elvis' 'Blue Moon of Kentucky'. 'That's All Right' is down there in the Bob Dylan songbook. The clear allusion to Floyd Cramer's piano style on the end of 'Tell Me That It Isn't True' is an allusion to a style much associated with Elvis and his RCA Victor studios at Nashville. The opening lines of 'Lay Lady Lay' do what Presley did all along—it's the same kind of ennobled overture that comes across in a hundred Elvis songs—while the immaculate soulfulness of 'I Threw It All Away' is like Presley's great 'Is It So Strange?'. Elvis' 'Milk Cow Blues Boogie' and 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream' both begin and then stop and start again. Elvis says 'Hold it fellas!' and Dylan's producer echoes this with 'Hey, wait a minute fellas!' It may have been Dylan who, recognising the parallel, insisted on retaining it on the released version of the track. If so, it is not the only Dylan amendment of a Presley line. In the much later Elvis song 'Cotton Candy Land' there is the line 'We'll ride upon a big white swan'; Dylan's knowingly gauche 'Country Pie' amends it to 'Saddle me up a big white goose!' And it is impossible, when Dylan was recording his countrified version of 'Blue Moon' for the 1970 album Self Portrait, that he could have forgotten the eerie cowboy version—complete with the clip-clop of horses' hooves—that Elvis had recorded in the 1950s.

There are also many take-offs of Elvis slipped into Dylan's work—but they are never so much take-offs as tributes. Presley is melodramatic, and Dylan mocks that, mocks the exaggeration; but always he does it with a smile that confesses he can't help falling for Presley, that he notices the good things just as keenly. These take-offs/tributes include the end, musically, of 'Peggy Day'. Elvis' songs often end like this, right from his very early 'I Got a Woman' through to 'Beach Boy Blues', 'Steppin' Out of Line' and 'Rock-a-Hula Baby'. On the Basement Tapes version of 'Quinn the Eskimo (The Mighty Quinn)', Dylan's voice is deliberately near to the Presley voice of 'Trouble'. And two versions of 'Nothing Was Delivered' from those sessions evoke the Presley world. The one with the heavy piano backing is a finely measured acknowledgement of Elvis' handling of Domino's 'Blueberry Hill'; the version with Dylan's monologue is a wide-open laugh at Presley's posturing monologues on 'That's When Your Heartaches Begin', 'I'm Yours', 'Are You Lonesome Tonight?' and, again, 'Trouble'. On the last of these especially, Elvis 'talks tough', like a youg Lee Marvin; Dylan simply makes the hollowness transparent by using the same bravado on weaker lines. Elvis stands there as if all-powerful, delivering the goods; Dylan comes on like a swindled consumer to talk from positions of weakness in the same posturing voice: 'Now you must, you must provide some answers / For what you sell has not bin received / And the sooner you come up with those answers / You know the sooner you can leave.' On the Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid soundtrack album, Dylan does three versions of a song called 'Billy', the last of which, 'Billy 7', is actually a beautiful imitation of how that Lee Marvin imitator James Coburn would sound if he were singing it. And the effect of this—as he sings with an astonishingly deep voice set against sleazy, smoky guitar lines and even sound effects of ominous thunder—is to give us a Dylan parodying exactly the kind of toughness that belongs to Presley.

Dylan also began to come clean, at the end of the 1960s, in acknowledging the special place Elvis Presley occupies in his canon of influences. First, when Rolling Stone asked whether there were any particular artists he liked to have record his songs, he replied (and was widely assumed to be joking at the time), 'Yeah, Elvis Presley. I liked Elvis Presley. Elvis Presley recorded a song of mine. That's the one recording I treasure the most . . . it was called "Tomorrow Is a Long Time".'

The New Morning song 'Went to See the Gypsy' seems to be about going to see Presley, and when Dylan's record company issued their ragbag album of warm-ups and reject tracks, Dylan (1973), it contained Bob Dylan versions of two Presley hits. Just as Elvis made versions of Dylan's 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right' and 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time' (and, it was eventually revealed, a 'Blowin' in the Wind'), so Dylan had recorded Elvis' 'A Fool Such as I' (on the Basement Tapes and then again at the first of the Self Portrait sessions) and a most lovely, fond, humourous version of 'Can't Help Falling in Love' (a warm-up for an early New Morning session), plus, on the Basement Tapes, a version of another song much associated with Elvis' Sun recording of it, 'I Forgot to Remember to Forget'. Two decades later, accepting an American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers Founders Award in a Los Angeles restaurant, Dylan even reached for the cornier side of Elvis, saying: 'I would like to quote, like Elvis Presley, when he accepted some award, and he said: "Without a song, the day would never end / Without a song, the road would never bend / When things go wrong, man ain't got a friend / Without a song."' (Presley had never recorded 'Without a Song', but had, as Dylan suggests, read out part of the lyrics during his acceptance speech when presented with an award as one of the Ten Outstanding Young Men of America by the Jaycees in 1971, the day after this 'young man' turned 36.)

The spirit of Presley's last year as a great artist, 1960, glides around the edges of Dylan's Oh Mercy album and then on the next album, 1990's Under the Red Sky, Dylan gives Presley a sympathetic namecheck, in 'TV Talkin' Song', when a snarl against the intrusiveness of television ends with 'sometimes you gotta do like Elvis did and shoot the damn thing out'. (Elvis had done this in Asheville, NC, while watching TV after a concert, July 22, 1975.) And after Dylan's recovery from illness in 1997, Dylan commented: 'I really thought I'd be seeing Elvis soon.'

On September 30, 1994, Dylan went into a New York City studio and recorded multiple takes of three songs associated with Elvis, 'Lawdy Miss Clawdy', 'Money Honey' and the glorious 'Any Way You Want Me (That's How I Will Be)'. None has been released, and only a take of the third song has circulated—and it's the sort of performance only a Dylan fan would appreciate, but it's a lovely thing. The opening electric guitar noise replicates 1957 so beautifully it's heartstopping; then Dylan's voice comes in weakly on the very phrase 'I'll be strong', but while he can't throw his head back and let out those orgasmic sobbing moans like Elvis, he finds a way to sing it that is at once a truly touching tribute and a re-invention: a way of translating those moans into his own expressive cadences, calling back across time to convey the numinousness of the 1950s moment anew. It's absurd that this recording remains unreleased.

In June 1972 Bob Dylan was 'spotted' attending one of Presley's four concerts at Madison Square Garden, NYC. The idea, suggested by 'Went to See the Gypsy', that Dylan might have met Presley in Minnesota (a) when both were famous, (b) after a Presley Las Vegas stint and (c) ahead of the New Morning songs being recorded, is impossible, though they might have met elsewhere. That Dylan might have seen Presley in concert in Minnesota is another matter: Presley first performed in Minnesota in St. Paul, May 13, 1956; next, 15 years later, was Minneapolis, November 5, 1971; then St. Paul, October 2 & 3, 1974; Duluth, October 16, 1976 and Minneapolis the following night; Duluth, April 29, 1977; and lastly St. Paul, April 30, 1977.

Presley also recorded a very foreshortened version of one further Dylan song, 'I Shall Be Released': he sings the chorus twice, unaccompanied, and then stops, adding the single word 'Dylan!', as if to identify the composer for the benefit of others in the studio. It is impossible to interpret Presley's attitude to Dylan from the tone of voice with which he speaks his name. On stage, however, in one of the 1970 Las Vegas concerts, he suggests an attitude towards Dylan's voice when he says to the audience: 'My mouth is so dry it feels like Bob Dylan spent the night in it.'

Elvis didn't need to listen to Dylan himself to pick up his material. As Peter Guralnick writes, about an Elvis session of April 1966: '. . . before going to the studio, they listened to Peter, Paul & Mary in Concert or the trio's latest, See What Tomorrow Brings, and Odetta Sings Dylan was never far from the turntable. Elvis showed a keen interest in IAN & SYLVIA as well, along with his usual gospel, blues and rhythm and blues favourites, and when they all got together to sing, he was as likely to suggest Bob Dylan's "Blowin' in the Wind" as a Statesmen number . . .' (Odetta Sings Dylan included 'Don't Think Twice It's All Right' and 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time', and Peter, Paul & Mary in Concert unsurprisingly included 'Blowin' in the Wind'. 'I Shall Be Released', of course, came later.)

Years ago, when Dylan was held to be the absolute opposite, the antithesis, of Presley, it would have been, if not actually heretical, at least controversial to argue that Dylan could owe Elvis anything. Now, recognition has grown for what Presley has achieved, even though the clichés and artifice that are a discountable part of it for those of us who heard his early work when it was new, must surely be too obtrusive for new listeners except on a few early classic tracks. But Dylan grew up with it, and would have grown up a different person, and a different artist—perhaps not an artist at all—if not for Elvis.

[Elvis Presley: 'That's All Right', Memphis, 5–6 Jul, 1954, Sun 209, Memphis, 1954; 'A Mess of Blues', Nashville, 20–21 Mar 1960, RCA Victor, NY, 1960; 'One Night', Hollywood, 23 Feb 1957, RCA Victor 47-7410, 1958 (RCA 1100, London, 1959); 'Reconsider Baby', Nashville, 3–4 Apr 1960, issued Elvis Is Back, RCA Victor LPM/LSP 2231 (RCA RD27171 & SF 5060—mono & stereo—London), 1960; 'Blueberry Hill', Hollywood, 19 Jan 1957, Just For You (EP), RCA Victor EPA 4041 (Elvis Presley, RCX 104, London), 1957; 'Anyplace Is Paradise', Hollywood, 2 Sep 1956, Elvis, RCA Victor LPM 1382, 1956 (Elvis (Rock 'N' Roll no. 2), HMV CLP 1105, London, 1957); 'Lawdy Miss Clawdy', NY, 3 Feb 1956, RCA Victor 20/47-6642, 1956 (HMV POP 408, 1957: B-side of different single); 'It Feels So Right', 20–21 Mar 1960, Elvis Is Back; 'Heartbreak Hotel', Nashville, 10–11 Jan 1956, RCA Victor 20-6420 & 47-6420 (78rpm & 45rpm), NY (HMV Records POP 182, London), 1956; 'Tomorrow Night', Memphis, 10 Sep 1954, first on Elvis For Everyone, RCA Victor LPM-3450, 1965, but first issued properly on Reconsider Baby, RCA Victor AFL1-5418, 1985 & CD-reissued on the essential The King of Rock'n'Roll—The Complete 50s Masters, BMG/RCA PD90689(5), 1992. 'Blue Moon of Kentucky', as 'That's All Right'; 'Shake Rattle & Roll'; 'Baby Let's Play House', Memphis, 5 Feb 1955, Sun 217, Memphis, 1955 (HMV POP 305, 1957). 'Trouble', Hollywood, 15 Jan 1958, & 'King Creole', Hollywood, 23 Jan 1958, were both written and recorded for the film King Creole, Paramount Studios, US, directed Michael Curtiz, 1958 (based on Harold Robbins' novel A Stone for Danny Fisher, 1952); King Creole, RCA Victor LPM 1884, NY (RCA Victor RD 27088, London), 1958. 'I Got Stung', Nashville, 11 Jun 1958, RCA Victor 47-7410, 1958 (RCA 1100, London, 1959). 'Jailhouse Rock', Hollywood, 30 Apr 1957 (title song from the MGM film, US, directed Richard Thorpe, 1957), RCA Victor 20/47-7035 (RCA 1028), 1957: a no.1 hit single USA & UK, and also title-track of a no.1 EP, RCA Victor EPA 4114, 1957 (RCX 106, 1958). 'Paralyzed', Hollywood, 2 Sep 1956, on Elvis, 1956 and EP Elvis Vol. 1, EPA 992, 1956 (UK single on HMV POP 378, 1957); 'Hound Dog', NY, 2 Jul 1956, RCA Victor 20/47-6604 (HMV POP 249), 1956; 'A Big Hunk o' Love', Nashville, 10 Jun 1958, RCA Victor 47-7600, (RCA 1136), 1959;

'One Sided Love Affair', NY, 30 Jan 1956, on Elvis Presley, RCA Victor LPM 1254 (Elvis Presley (Rock 'N' Roll), HMV CLP 1093), 1956 (his first LP, & a US no.1); 'Give Me the Right', Nashville, 12–13 Mar 1961, Something for Everybody, RCA Victor LPM/LSP-2370 (RD-27224 / SF 5106, London), 1961; 'Stuck on You', Nashville, 20–21 Mar 1960, RCA Victor (RCA 1187), 1960; 'Treat Me Nice', Hollywood, 5 Sep 1957, B-side of 'Jailhouse Rock'; 'Milkcow Blues Boogie', Memphis, prob. 15 Nov or 20 Dec 1954; Sun 215, Memphis, 1955 (1st issued UK on EP Good Rockin' Tonight, HMV 7EG8256, 1957); 'Is It So Strange?', Hollywood, 19 Jan 1957, on the EP Just for You (Presley had earlier sung the song at the legendary 'million dollar quartet' jam-session at Sun Studios with Carl Perkins, Jerry Lee Lewis and, briefly, Johnny Cash: Memphis, 4 or 11 Dec 1956); 'Cotton Candy Land', Hollywood, Aug 1962, It Happened at the World's Fair, RCA Victor LPM/LSP-2697 (RD/SF 7565, London), 1963; 'Blue Moon', Memphis, 19 Aug 1954, RCA Victor 20/47-6640, NY, 1956; 'I Got a Woman', Nashville, 10 Jan 1956, Elvis Presley; 'Beach Boy Blues' & 'Rock-a-Hula Baby', Hollywood, 23 Mar 1961, Blue Hawaii, RCA Victor LPM/LSP-2426 (RCA RD27238 / SF 5115), 1961 ('Rock-a-Hula Baby' was also a single); 'Steppin' Out of Line', Hollywood, 22 Mar 1961, Pot Luck, LPM/LSP-2523 (RD 27265 / SF 5135), 1962; 'That's When Your Heartaches Begin', Hollywood, 13 Jan 1957, B-side of 'All Shook Up', RCA 20-6870 (78rpm) & 47-6870 (45rpm), March 1957; 'I'm Yours', Nashville, 25–26 Jun 1961, Pot Luck; 'Are You Lonesome Tonight?', Nashville, 3–4 Apr 1960, RCA Victor 47-7810 ('living stereo' version 61-7810), (RCA 1216, London), 1960; 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time', Nashville, 25–28 May 1966 (the sessions include musicians Floyd Cramer, Pete Drake & Charlie McCoy), Spinout, RCA Victor LPM/LSP-3702 (California Holiday, RCA SF 7820, London), 1966; 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', Nashville, 16–17 May 1971, Elvis (nb. not 2nd LP, which had same title, 1956), RCA Victor APL1-0283 (SF 8378, London), 1973; 'Blowin' in the Wind', Feb 1966—early 1967, Hollywood, Platinum: A Life in Music, RCA/BMG 07863 67469-2, 1997; 'I Shall Be Released', Nashville, May 20, 1971, Elvis—Walk a Mile in My Shoes—The Essential 70's Masters, RCA/BMG 7432130331-2, 1995. NB: The great first post-Army album, Elvis Is Back, has been reissued complete with many outtakes and the singles recorded at the same sessions, plus outtakes from these, as a highly praised 2-CD set, Elvis Is Back!, Follow That Dream 8287 667968-2, US 2005.

The 1957 interview quoted from Charlie Gillett: Sound of the City, 1971. The 1970 Las Vegas quote, and details re Elvis shooting the TV, from The Elvis Atlas: A Journey Through Elvis Presley's America, Michael Gray & Roger Osborne, New York: Henry Holt, 1996. Presley's Madison Square Garden concerts, one of which Dylan attended, 9–11 Jun 1972. Dylan quoted from Rolling Stone no.47, San Francisco, Jun 1969. Peter Guralnick, Careless Love: The Unmaking of Elvis Presley, New York: Little Brown, 1999, p.223.

Arthur Crudup: 'That's All Right', Chicago, 6 Sep 1946, known by Elvis Presley from its issue on 78rpm on Victor 20-2205 (c/w 'Crudup's After Hours'), NY, 1946–47; 'Cool Disposition' & 'Rock Me Mama', Chicago, 15 Dec 1944, Bluebird 34-0738, NY, 1945;'Hey Mama, Everything's All Right', Chicago 7 Oct 1947, Victor 20-3261, 1947–48; 'If I Get Lucky', Chicago, 11 Sep 1941, Bluebird B8858, NY, 1941.

Arthur Gunter (1926–1976) cut 'Baby Let's Play House' at his first session, Nashville, 1954, Excello 2047, Nashville, 1955; Bob Dylan: 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', live NY, 31 Oct 1964, Bootleg Series Vol. 6; 'Milk Cow Blues', NY, 25 Apr 1962, unreleased; Ricky Nelson: 'It's Late', Hollywood, 21 Oct 1958, Imperial 5565, LA (London American HLP 8817, London), 1959; Eddie Cochran: 'Drive-In Show', LA, 1957, Liberty Records 55087, Hollywood, 1957; Leroy Carr: 'Alabama Women Blues', Chicago, 9 Sep 1930; Kokomo Arnold: 'Milk Cow Blues', Chicago, 10 Sep 1934; Robert Johnson: 'Milkcow's Calf Blues', Dallas, 20 Jun 1937, 2 takes; Leadbelly: 'Good Morning Blues', NY, 15 Jun 1940 or summer 1943. Blind Lemon Jefferson: 'That Black Snake Moan', Chicago, c.Nov 1926; 'Black Snake Moan', Atlanta, 14 Mar 1927; Ishman Bracey: 'The 'Fore Day Blues' (alternate take), Memphis, 31 Aug 1928; Lonnie Johnson: 'Tomorrow Night', Cincinatti, 10 Dec 1947. Fats Domino: 'Blueberry Hill', LA, Jul 1956, Imperial 5407, 1956. Odetta: Odetta Sings Dylan, nia, RCA LSP-3324, NY, 1965 (the CD reissue of which does include 'Blowin' in the Wind', plus 'Paths of Victory', each taken from earlier Odetta albums); Peter, Paul & Mary in Concert, Warner Bros. 1555, NY, 1964.]

pre-war blues & post-structuralism See 'Call Letter Blues' & 'the shock of recognition'.

pre-war blues, Dylan's use of, an introduction Because it's so crackly on record, so lo-fi, so immured behind a white-noise wall, the black noise that is the pre-war blues can seem inaccessible, unreachable. To be put off by this would be to lose great riches. Sometimes it's best to play it really loud (and maybe go into the next room): then you'll hear all the joys and mysteries of esoteric vocals, guitar magic, sheer moody weirdnesses: all the synapse-crinkling giddy-hop that rock'n'roll gave you when you were 13.

Garfield Akers' 'Cottonfield Blues', especially the transcendent 'Part 2', comes across as the birth of rock'n'roll . . . from 1929! It's also as incantatory as buddhist chanting or as VAN MORRISON's 'Madame George'. (Yet Garfield Akers recorded only four tracks.) Or there's BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON's 'Motherless Children Have a Hard Time': a record from 1927 that you hear and say of the guitar—if this was achieved then, how come it took 30 years to get to rock'n'roll (or 40 years to get to ERIC CLAPTON)?

Yet it isn't that the pre-war blues is proto-rock'n'roll that makes it so uplifting, exciting and vivid. The experience of the encounter is comparable; and the music may hold some of the main ingredients that rock'n'roll returned us to using—but the pre-war blues is a liberation and an enrichment because it's different, not merely more of the same. These old blues are at once thrillingly exotic and our common heritage.

Garfield Akers—a deeply obscure but compelling, intense and distinctive artist who reputedly played around Memphis in the 1920s–30s and again in the 1950s—should have been a tremendous star. His shockingly small number of recordings, or, say, Furry Lewis' 'I Will Turn Your Money Green', are whole new rich seams of their own, a fresh and revelatory 3D world, as glorious as ever LITTLE RICHARD and BUDDY HOLLY were. This blues world burns with its own heroic energy and vision, and across a musical spectrum of concentrated emotional expression from the utmost in delicacy and finesse to the most searing invocations of cacophonous rapture and pain, while the language of the blues—blues lyric poetry—is one of the great streams of consciousness of 20th century America: a rich and alertly resourceful African-American fusion and reinvention of the language of the Bible and the dirt road, plantation and medicine show, of the Deep South countryside and the city streets, of 19th century children's games, folktales and family lore and African folk-memory: above all the language of the oppressed community and the individual human heart.

For Bob Dylan then, as listener and as writer-composer, the specifics of an old record by JIM JACKSON, BLIND BLAKE or MEMPHIS MINNIE yield far richer pleasures than a Johnny Winters or an Eric Clapton performance.

This is not a matter of being politically correct about authenticity. The whole question of 'authenticity' in black music is highly complex and contentious, and involves matters far more consequential than whether Eric Clapton plays the blues. Paul Gilroy's riveting, if sometimes barely penetrable, essay 'Sounds Authentic' cites a number of these issues, across which white-boy debates about authenticity in the blues are bound to stumble rather clumsily, and from which, as Gilroy writes, authenticity 'emerges as a highly charged and bitterly contested issue.' It's an issue too large to detail here.

Rather than argue, therefore, as to whether the blues can really be called the blues when purveyed by the Claptons who speed 'black cultural creation on its passage into international pop commodification', it seems more useful to suggest, as Bob Dylan probably would, that that sort of blues is simply no longer interesting. It can't be: such is its shopping-mall forgetfulness that it's no longer interest*ed*—in either the specifics of where it's come from or of what it's thrown away.

Dylan stands in a very different relation to the blues from that of the white frontmen of the trans-global blues industry. He occupies a position as near to that of the poet or composer (even to the critic) as to the rock'n'roll performer. This difference arises from how he feels about the potency and the eloquence of the old blues records and the expressive vernacular of the world they inhabit. This is why what Dylan wants to do with this immense, rich body of work is experiment in how he might utilise its poetry, its codes and its integrity—to see how these may stand up as building blocks for new creative work—just as he (and just as the blues) uses the language and lore of the King James Bible. He is not concerned with translating a few lowest-common-denominator dynamics of the blues into some MTVable product.

First, he claims no blues-singer specialism like a JOHN HAMMOND JR.: it isn't, for him, his trademark. His stance does not downgrade blackness per se, therefore: does not carry the inherent subtext that blues is essentially a matter of 'style'. It's telling that on those rare occasions when Dylan performed to specifically black audiences, as in GREENWOOD, Mississippi, in 1963 and at the women's penitentiary in New Jersey during the Rolling Thunder Revue of 1975, he didn't hesitate to sing about racial politics but chose to do so via his white 'protest' songs—'Only a Pawn in Their Game' and 'Hurricane' respectively—rather than via blues songs. In contrast, witness the spectacle of John Hammond Jr. imposing his fussy impersonation of an old blues-singer upon the embarrassed black occupants of a Mississippi bar-room for his TV documentary 'In Search of Robert Johnson'.

Second, Bob Dylan's interest and special dexterity is in exploring the innards of the blues, taking from the blues the strengths of its vernacular language (to some extent musically as well as lyrically) and building them into the core of his own work—into the machinery of his own creative intelligence. As, in this spirit, he raids the Bible, traditional white folksong and nursery rhyme, so he raids the poetry of the pre-war blues.

To do this to such creative profit would be impossible without a mix of curiosity towards and respect for the original contexts from which these things are seized and reworked. This guarantees that, unlike many of those in the global blues industry, Dylan has no interest in seeing the blues 'deprived of its historical base' (to quote a Living Blues magazine editorial condemning 'white blues' as 'not blues').

Then there's a question folklorist Peter Narváez raises when he contends that 'While historically many forms of downhome blues were played by soloists, and urban blues have always featured individual entertainers . . . blues fans today recognise blues as a collective activity, that is, a music played by groups who interact among themselves and with audiences.'

We can at once picture Bob Dylan's response. On the one hand, he too interacts with groups and with audiences. More than ever before, in fact, live audiences seem indispensable to him. Yet he has always believed in the power of the artist with the lone guitar and a point of view. As he said in 1985:

'I always like to think that there's a real person talking to me, just one voice you know, that's all I can handle—Cliff Carlisle . . . ROBERT JOHNSON. For me this is a deep reality: someone who's telling me where he's been that I haven't, and what it's like there—somebody whose life I can feel.'

At the same time, he knows that the music and the poetry of the blues, its fundamental assumptions, are founded in an Africanness that is itself characterised by 'groups who interact among themselves and with audiences'—a theme that the great blues field-recordist and collector ALAN LOMAX, for instance, repeatedly stresses in his 1993 book The Land Where the Blues Began.

In other words, the lone blues guitarist would have a different point of view, a different way of expressing him or herself, if the culture from which the blues arose had not been a communal, democratically interactive one—one in which there is almost no hierarchical Artist Up Here and Audience Down There, but, rather, a collaborative performance in which the singer/musician takes cues moment by moment from the dancers/spectators and mingles physically among them, his or her repertoire as much a reaction as an imposition.

This is a very different kind of participation from mass-marketed blues performances in which big-name entertainers and high-energy tyro groups please hyper crowds with the most easily magnified clichés of the genre transmitted through flashy guitar solos and greatest-hits repertoire.

Dylan himself talks about the crucialness of old blues couplets (though if he hadn't, we would know their importance to him from the vast extent to which he has drawn from their wells of material and added to them) in 1985:

> 'You can't say things any better than that, really. You can say it in a different way, you can say it with more words, but you can't say anything better than what they said. And they covered everything.'

That the young Bob Dylan could insinuate his creative imagination into the world of the older white and black folk artists to enrich even very early songs of his own is not in doubt. What is still more interesting is to look far beyond his very early work to the period from 1964 onwards, when increasingly he freed himself from writing within borrowed folk formats: and to see the huge extent to which, having found the blues powerful and real, and having come to know it so intimately and inwardly, Dylan has drawn deeply from its poetry in creating his own.

In the end, it isn't the main point whether Bob Dylan discovered these people in or around Dinkytown or Greenwich Village, on the radio or via the incredible diverse riches of the blues records avalanching onto vinyl in the 1950s and 60s. Engaging though it is to retrace his routes to these discoveries (see pre-war blues, Dylan's ways of accessing), in the end, the point is that he made them.

And he uses, so singularly, the huge amount he learnt, in the construction of his own extraordinary work. No-one else has used the blues in anything like the way Bob Dylan has. Most people who are 'into' the blues take a few standard numbers and riffs from it, and run with them in ever more amplified, clichéd, unrooted ways, or else, at the other extreme, bore us to death with their pedantic archival reproductions of obscurer-than-thou acoustic repertoire. The far smaller number of people whose work is genuinely enriched by the blues are usually musicians, rather than singer-songwriter musicians.

But Dylan takes myriad complex treasures from the pre-war country blues, both passionately and quietly, paying them at least as much loving attention as he pays to the vibrant strengths of those 1940s-to-50s electric blues that made possible, more than we knew at the time, all the taken-as-givens of rock'n'roll. And he draws all this cultural richness, the music and the lyric poetry of it, into the very core of his own work. Dylan has worked the blues so strongly and resourcefully that he has given it something back.

He inhabits the blues as the best of the old bluesmen themselves did, fusing traditional and personal material into fresh, expressive work of their own, layered with the resonance of familiarity, the subconscious edits of memory and the pleasures of unexpected recognition, sharing the energy that flows between the old and the new, and between the individual and the common culture. He has used the blues with such insistent individuality, yet never in bad faith to the gravitas he found within it, or to the world in which its people had moved.

Interviewed in San Diego in autumn 1993, Dylan said:

> 'The people who played that music were still around . . . [in the early 1960s], and so there was a bunch of us, me included, who got to see all these people close up—people like SON HOUSE, REVEREND GARY DAVIS or SLEEPY JOHN ESTES. Just to sit there and be up close and watch them play, you could study what they were doing, plus a bit of their lives rubbed off on you. Those vibes will carry into you forever, really, so it's like those people, they're still here to me. They're not ghosts of the past or anything, they're continually here.'

It should be no surprise, therefore, to find that blues lyric poetry is everywhere in Dylan's work: in amongst the New York City hip culture of Dylan 1965 and the radical acid-rock of Blonde on Blonde, in the evangelism at the start of the 1980s and work of more modest, mellowed knowingness right on through to the darkness of Time Out of Mind and the teeming good cheer of "Love and Theft".

Blues lyric poetry runs into the mainstream of Dylan's work, while he in turn makes a clear creative contribution to this major form of American music. It follows, then, that the more you know of the blues corpus, the more you'll appreciate Bob Dylan's extraordinary regenerative use of it; and the better you know Dylan's output, the better placed you'll be to hear the blues coursing through it.

(See also 'Call Letter Blues' & 'the shock of recognition'.)

[Garfield Akers (c.1900–c.1960): 'Cottonfield Blues—Part 1' & 'Cottonfield Blues—Part 2', Memphis, c.23 Sep 1929, 'Dough Roller Blues' & 'Jumpin' and Shoutin' Blues', Memphis, c.21 Feb 1930, all CD-reissued on Son House and the Great Delta Blues Singers (1928–1930), Document DOCD-5002, Vienna, 1990. Van Morrison: 'Madame George', NY, 1968, Astral Weeks, Warner Bros WS1768, US (K46024, UK), 1968. Blind Willie Johnson: 'Mother's Children Have a Hard Time' (sic: a mistranscription), Dallas, 3 Dec 1927, Blind Willie Johnson, RBF Records RF-10, NY, 1965. Furry Lewis: 'I Will Turn Your Money Green' (2 takes), Memphis, 28 Aug 1928; take 1 issued In His Prime 1927–1928, Yazoo L1050, NY, c.1973; take 2 (the version originally issued on 78) issued Frank Stokes' Dream . . . 1927–1931, Yazoo L1008, NY, 1968.

Paul Gilroy, 'Sounds Authentic: Black Music, Ethnicity and the Challenge of a Changing Same'; London: unpublished, 1991, later incorporated into Gilroy's The Black Atlantic: Modernity and Double Consciousness, London: Verso, 1993.

Bob Dylan: 'Only a Pawn in Their Game', Greenwood, MS (civil rights rally), 6 Jul 1963 & 'Hurricane', Clinton, NJ, 7 Dec 1975. John Hammond Jr.: 'In Search of Robert Johnson'; Iambic Production for Channel Four TV, London, 1991. (Greenwood is where Robert Johnson played his last gig, and died.) Paul Garon, 'Editorial', Living Blues, nia, & Peter Narváez: both quoted from Narváez's essay 'Living Blues Journal: The Paradoxical Aesthetics of the Blues Revival', collected in Transforming Tradition: Folk Music Revivals Examined, ed. Neil V. Rosenberg, Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press 1993. Dylan 1st quote, Biograph notes, 1985; 2nd quote in Bill Flanagan: Written in My Soul: Rock's Great Songwriters Talk About Creating Their Music, Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1986; 3rd quote, interview by Gary Hill, San Diego, c.3 Oct 1993 for Reuters, wired to US newspapers 13 Oct 1993.]

pre-war blues, Dylan's ways of accessing

Back in Hibbing, at the High School graduation party thrown by his parents, Robert Zimmerman was given a number of LEADBELLY 78s—and found them revelatory. Thrilled as he was by rock'n'roll, he rang up his friend John Bucklen and yelled down the phone: 'This is the real thing! You gotta hear this!'

Soon afterwards he was in the Twin Cities, where his bohemian friend DAVE WHITAKER claims to have had a large collection of blues records that he and Dylan used to listen to all the time; and HARVEY ABRAMS, a student who knew Dylan then, says that by that point Dylan was already keen on the pre-war blues, and busy trying to get at it: that he was one of those who 'had to get the oldest record and, if possible, the Library of Congress record, or go find the original people who knew the original song.'

Perhaps Harvey Abrams was that way inclined too, because Bonnie Beecher, an important Minnesota friend of Dylan's later known as JAHANARA ROMNEY, recalls that she first met the two of them when they sat around in the 10 O'Clock Scholar in Dinkytown dropping obscure singers' names, and got talking to them because, to their surprise, she was able to join in. She used to go to Sam Goodys in New York to buy records, choosing 'any old record that looked like it had some kind of funky singer or blues singer . . .' Those she mentioned included the great RICHARD RABBIT BROWN, a deeply obscure figure to anyone not seeped in the pre-war blues. Very unusually for a young Minnesotan, she had a large blues record collection, and Dylan listened to it and borrowed from it.

As this suggests, some of these old, elusive recordings were being reissued on vinyl for the first time—and two crucial releases happened well before Dylan left Minnesota: the AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC anthology in 1952 and The Country Blues, the album that accompanied SAMUEL B. CHARTERS' ground-breaking book of the same name, in 1959. (See separate entries for these albums' contents.)

At the same time, we know that in Minnesota Dylan did not have to rely upon LP reissues for hearing old blues: he had access to 78s owned by record collectors like JON PANKAKE, co-founder with PAUL NELSON of the small but fierce magazine Little Sandy Review. (See entry on Pankake for detail.) There were also the Minnesota-based revivalist performers, like Dylan's friend TONY GLOVER and DAVE RAY, dedicated to performances that amounted to a lively advocacy of the old blues.

At some point in summer 1959 or 1960, Dylan the nascent folksinger also went to Colorado, possibly played piano in a strip club called 'The Gilded Garter' in Central City and then certainly hung around 20 miles east of there in Denver (particularly at 'The Exodus' coffee-house), where he had access to at least three live performers, plus the record collection of one of them. One was JUDY COLLINS, but another was the unique JESSE FULLER, who was temporarily on the Denver folk scene when Dylan dropped into it.

The third Denver performer, who let Dylan stay at his house, and from whom Dylan stole some records (just as he did from Jon Pankake in Minneapolis) was the black folksinger WALT CONLEY, 'founder of the Denver folk scene', as he was dubbed by locals.

When Dylan reached Greenwich Village, at the very beginning of 1961, he had access to a whole slew of revivalist performers, 'an urban school of musicians dedicated to re-creating the country blues', as Dave Laing put it—amongst whom was the man Dylan expends so many words on praising in Chronicles Volume One, DAVE VAN RONK, 'a walking museum of the blues', plus the resources of IZZY YOUNG's Folklore Center, plus the record collections of more blues collectors than ever before, plus the priceless additional presence as live performers of a number of the great pre-war blues artists themselves: the ones who had been 'rediscovered'.

Van Ronk was at one time roommates with Sam Charters, a serious collector who had been a field-recorder of blues singers all over the South since 1955. Dylan also got on well with Len Kunstadt, a major collector of 78s, whom he knew through VICTORIA SPIVEY, whose record label Kunstadt helped manage and who would turn out to be the last of her husbands. (A sweetly youthful Dylan of this period is pictured with Spivey on the back cover of New Morning, and the original art-print photograph was owned by Kunstadt.) In March 1962 Dylan recorded with Spivey and BIG JOE WILLIAMS, whose three-week stint at Folk City in February 1962 was attended by Dylan many nights, while of Spivey herself Dylan said: '. . . oh man, I loved her . . . I learned so much from her I could never put into words.'

The other old blues performers who were around to have their repertoires, and in most cases guitar styles, mopped up by the sponge-like young Bob Dylan included BROTHER JOHN SELLERS, REV. GARY DAVIS, JOHN LEE HOOKER, LIGHTNIN' HOPKINS, ELIZABETH COTTEN, MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT, BUKKA WHITE, SON HOUSE, Roosevelt Sykes, SONNY TERRY & BROWNIE McGHEE, SLEEPY JOHN ESTES, Furry Lewis, Mississippi Fred McDowell, Gus Cannon, SKIP JAMES, Tampa Red and LONNIE JOHNSON. Indeed there were so many of these people that the whole folk audience became highly knowledgeable about country blues.

[For the Hibbing, Harvey Abrams & Jon Pankake information, and quote re Van Ronk as 'museum' see Robert Shelton's No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986. For Dave Whittaker's testimony see Bob Spitz's Dylan: A Biography, 1989. Jahanara Romney, see 'The Wanted Man Interview: Jahanara Romney', by Markus Wittman, Telegraph no. 36, Romford, UK, summer 1990. Dave Laing quoted from 'Troubadours & Stars', in Laing, D., Dallas, K., Denselow, R. & Shelton, R., The Electric Muse: The Story of Folk Into Rock, London: Methuen, 1975. Kunstadt photo ownership: VAL WILMER, photographer, to this writer, phone call c.1994. Dylan on Spivey: interview published in Biograph box set, 1985. Dylan on old bluesmen seen in person: interview San Diego c.3 Oct 1993, by Gary Hill, for Reuters News Agency, wired to US newspapers 13 Oct 1993.]

Price, Alan [1941 -] Alan Price was born in the delightfully named Fatfield, on Tyneside in the north-east of England, on April 19, 1941. He was in various local Newcastle-based groups before personnel from several mutated into THE ANIMALS. Price was the organist on, and the credited arranger for, their second single, a fine electric version of 'House of the Rising Sun'. The credit 'Traditional, arranged Price' was the source of much discontentment in the group, since they felt that the arrangement had been collaboratively arrived at. Nonetheless, Alan Price has always taken 100 per cent of the writing royalties on this international no.1 record.

Price quit the Animals in 1965, reportedly because of his fear of flying, and became a hanger-on during Dylan's visit to Britain that year, filmed by D.A. PENNEBAKER as Don't Look Back. He therefore appears in the film. Indeed he disappears in the film too: we see Dylan at his least appealing, shouting and throwing his weight around in his hotel because someone had dropped a wine glass out of the window and into the street; and when a drunken Price finally confesses, Dylan kicks him out.

Price made an immediately successful solo career, beginning by copying an American record, as UK artists were still wont to do even in the mid-1960s. In this case Price took Randy Newman's savagely sarcastic 'Simon Smith and his Amazing Dancing Bear' and made a jolly hit single out of it, renouncing his marvellously grungy organ sound for a twinkling piano and clinching his image as a professional Geordie.

Prine, John [1946 -] John Prine, born in Maywood, Illinois, on October 10, 1946, a singer-songwriter guitarist who emerged from local fame in Chicago at the beginning of the 1970s (as did his friend STEVE GOODMAN, though to lesser effect). Immediately saddled with the 'new Bob Dylan' label, partly for a strikingly similar—but also strikingly different—generic vocal gruffness, he was a compelling singer and a beguiling live performer of stripped-down simplicity and a backwoods charm that was intriguing, after a Chicago upbringing: you might more readily have guessed Kentucky.

The extra factor, though, was a perfectly matched major talent for songwriting: and at a time when Dylan's subject matter had long been other-worldly or somewhat generalised, Prine burst through with a début album full of detail and specificity. John Prine contained a song about the Vietnam War and its spill-over into US domestic life, 'Sam Stone'; a song about the environment, 'Paradise'; about patriotism and religion, 'Your Flag Decal Won't Get You into Heaven Anymore'; but most of all, he sang about small detail and ordinary people—people like 'Donald and Lydia', with names not the least bit counter-culturally cool, and people stuck in domestic drudgery and dead-end jobs in places like Montgomery, Alabama.

The point, however, was not the subject matter of Prine's songs per se, but the fact that they were such fine songs, not at all preachy (though 'Sam Stone' comes close) and suffused with their matured creator's refreshing personality, so that what most had in common was a quirky minimalism, a trusting of the listener to pick up from the tiniest detail a whole world portrayed. With a warm, shrewd voice and subtle delivery, John Prine sang from a perspective almost akin to gallows humour, but nobler, and owing something to a WOODY GUTHRIE defiance: as if the world were so bleak you could only cheer up and find solace where you might, but that no solace was possible without a clear-sighted compassion that seemed to come naturally to Prine, and which he seemed to expect of the rest of us too.

He was influenced by Dylan, and there was that superficial similarity of voice, but Prine was never Dylanesque: he was his own man and his own artist, and his second album, Diamonds in the Rough, was masterly. For those who bought it, it often became more of a soundtrack to the 1970s than his first had ever been; and it's no belittlement to say that sometimes when you want something less demanding than Blood on the Tracks but just as acoustic and somehow winding through similar terrain, John Prine's Diamonds in the Rough, with tracks like 'Clocks and Spoons', 'Rocky Mountain Time' and 'The Late John Garfield Blues', is the perfect album to play.

The third, Sweet Revenge, found him appearing to struggle to keep up the song quality, and perhaps in danger of imitating himself, but 'Mexican Home' was a churning, DOUG SAHMish delight. It was a signal, though, that Prine was not going to become, like SPRINGSTEEN, a megastar, but would settle down in time to a large, quiet constituency, and that if he was lucky and survived, he would serve it well down the decades. And he has.

Bob Dylan's direct connection with Prine came in 1972, when Dylan was scuffing around avoiding doing anything much in his own right. Prine was playing a solo gig at the Bitter End in the Village that September 9th and Dylan came quietly on stage, unannounced—and from Prine's point of view, somewhat disconcertingly, perhaps—and played harmonica and sang back-up vocals on three numbers. There is no circulating tape (perhaps none extant) of this performance, and the first song Dylan augmented remains unidentified; then came 'Donald and Lydia' and finally 'Sam Stone'. What a gig to have caught.

[John Prine: John Prine, Atlantic 8296, US, 1971; Diamonds in the Rough, Atlantic 7240, 1972; Sweet Revenge, Atlantic 7274, 1973.]

pseudonyms used by Dylan These include the following: Justin Case, Jack Frost, Blind Boy Grunt, Elston Gunnn [sic], Elmer Johnson, Bob Landy, Jim Nasium, Egg O'Schmillson, Sergei Petrov, Tedham Porterhouse and Robert Milkwood Thomas. He has never used Roosevelt Gook (see Kooper, Al).

Elston Gunnn was the name he gave to BOBBY VEE's brother Bill when he asked to join Vee's band as a pianist. As Vee recalls: 'He was in the Fargo/Moorhead area. He was working as a busboy at a place called the Red Apple Cafe. We didn't know that at the time. Bill was in a record shop in Fargo, Sam's Record Land, and this guy came up to him and introduced himself as Elston Gunnn—with three n's, G-U-N-N-N.'

Blind Boy Grunt was used on the album Broadside Ballads, released in September 1963, on which Dylan performs 'Talkin' Devil', 'Only a Hobo' and 'John Brown' and plays guitar behind HAPPY TRAUM on 'I Will Not Go Down Under the Ground' (later re-titled by Dylan 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps'), recorded in New York City that January and February. Dylan also recorded 'Farewell' and 'Masters of War' at these sessions but these remained unreleased. At a further session in March, he cut 'I Shall Be Free', 'Train-a-Travelin'' and 'Cuban Missile Crisis'; only the second of these was released, on the somewhat laggardly follow-up album Broadside Reunion in 1971, and also contained 'I'd Hate to Be You on That Dreadful Day', cut for Broadside magazine in November 1962, and 'The Death of Emmett Till' and 'The Ballad of Donald White', both from 'The Broadside Show' on WBAI-FM radio, NYC, in May 1962. Again, Dylan was billed as Blind Boy Grunt—as he was too, on the album DICK FARIÑA and ERIC VON SCHMIDT, recorded in London in January 1963 and in the UK later that year, on which Dylan played harmonica and contributed backing vocals on 'Glory, Glory', 'Xmas Island', 'Cocaine', 'You Can Always Tell', 'Overseas Stomp' & 'London Waltz'.

Tedham Porterhouse was used on the RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT album Jack Elliott, released in 1964, to credit Dylan's harmonica playing behind Ramblin' Jack's guitar and vocals on 'Will the Circle Be Unbroken?'; this was recorded in summer 1963 in New York City, during Elliott's sessions for a new album.

Bob Landy was Dylan's credit on the various artists album The Blues Project in 1964, on which he and Eric Von Schmidt played piano behind GEOFF MULDAUR on 'Downtown Blues'.

Elmer Johnson was the name under which Dylan stayed while in Edwardsville, Illinois, where he performed with THE BAND during their set on July 14, 1969, singing 'I Ain't Got No Home', 'Slippin' and Slidin' and 'In the Pines'. (This material has not circulated.) Egg O'Schmillson was the pseudonym planned for Dylan for the mooted but abandoned Apple Records release of ALLEN GINSBERG recordings from November 1971 to which Dylan donated shared vocals, guitar, piano and organ.

Robert Milkwood Thomas was Dylan's billing as backing musician on the title track of the album Somebody Else's Troubles, by STEVE GOODMAN, recorded in New York in September 1972, when it was released on Buddah in 1973 (an album Dylan co-produced).

Jack Frost was first used for the co-producer credit on the 1990 album Under the Red Sky (and was apt, given that this is an album full of nursery rhyme); and was used again as co-producer of Time Out of Mind in 1997 and for the sole producer credit on "Love and Theft".

Lucky Wilbury was Dylan's name on the first TRAVELING WILBURYS album, Boo Wilbury on the second. Sergei Petrov was the name Dylan hid behind as co-writer of the 2003 film Masked & Anonymous (with LARRY CHARLES, billed as Rene Fontaine), when the project was first announced.

Justin Case and Jim Nasium are among the names Dylan has used when checking into hotels.

[Bobby Vee quote from interview in Goldmine, nia, 1999, quoted from 'The Bob Dylan Who's Who', seen online 9 Jan 2006 at www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/who.html. Blind Boy Grunt: 'Talkin' Devil', NY, 19 Jan, 'I Will Not Go Down Under the Ground' (with Happy Traum), 24 Jan, 'Only a Hobo' & 'John Brown', Feb 1963, all on Broadside Ballads, Broadside BR301, NY, Sep 1963; 'The Death of Emmett Till' & 'The Ballad of Donald White', NY, May 1962, 'I'd Hate to Be You on That Dreadful Day', Nov 1962 & 'Train-a-Travelin'', Mar 1963, all on Broadside Reunion, Folkways FR 5315, NY, Nov 1971. 'Glory, Glory', 'Xmas Island', 'Cocaine', 'You Can Always Tell', 'Overseas Stomp' & 'London Waltz', London, Jan 14–15, 1963, Dick Fariña and Eric Von Schmidt, Folklore F-LEUT-7, UK, 1964. Tedham Porterhouse: 'Will the Circle Be Unbroken', on Jack Elliott, Vanguard VSD 79151, NY, 1964. Bob Landy: 'Downtown Blues', NY, early 1964, The Blues Project, Elektra EKL 264, NY, Jun 1964. Robert Milkwood Thomas: on 'Somebody Else's Troubles', on Steve Goodman's Somebody Else's Troubles, NY, Sep 1972, Buddah BDS-5121, US, 1973.]

Quebec, Madelyn [1935 -] Madelyn R. Quebec was born June 12, 1935. She served as one of the Raelettes until the early 1980s, along with Estella Yarbrough, Trudy Cohran-Hunter, Pat Peterson and Avis Harrell, before starting to work with Dylan. She was still in the Raelettes when a RAY CHARLES concert using the Edmonton Symphony Orchestra was filmed in Canada on January 27, 1981 (so she can now be glimpsed in the DVD reissue of this rather short concert), yet her first collaboration with Dylan was in the studios in Santa Monica three months later, for the last couple of sessions for Shot of Love, starting on April 29, 1981, when she joined her daughter CAROLYN DENNIS among the backing singers.

The first time Quebec toured with Dylan was in June 1981, when he began another semi-secular tour, this time warming up with four US dates before traveling round Europe, beginning in Toulouse, France, on June 21 and finishing in Avignon on July 25. Mother and daughter were both back-up singers, along with CLYDIE KING and REGINA McCRARY. When Dylan finished his summer break and resumed concerts in the States that fall, Quebec stayed with the tour though Carolyn Dennis dropped out.

In the course of that tour, the back-up group sang (without Dylan) a song called 'The Rose' at two concerts in October, and from October 18 onwards they sang 'Gamblin' Man' at every concert. The live 'Heart of Mine' issued later on Biograph was recorded at the New Orleans concert of November 10.

Dylan didn't tour again till 1984, and used no back-up singers then. But that July, in New York, when Dylan was back in the studios, recording tracks that would end up on both Empire Burlesque and Knocked Out Loaded, Quebec, Dennis and other back-up singers were participants again, though when overdub sessions were done in early 1985, Madelyn Quebec was not involved.

She was brought back in for the Farm Aid rehearsals, beginning on September 19, 1985 in LA, and duly performed behind Dylan on 'Clean-Cut Kid', 'Shake', 'Trust Yourself', 'That Lucky Old Sun' and 'Maggie's Farm' on the night itself, September 22 in Champaign, Illinois. She sang back-up in a Hollywood studio that Hallowe'en (though nothing from this session has circulated, or even been named), and when Dylan began to tour in 1986, with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, beginning in New Zealand of February 5, Madelyn Quebec was amongst the backing singers, who were now being billed as the Queens of Rhythm. She therefore appears in the officially released video Hard to Handle, first broadcast by HBO in the US on June 20, 1986. And while they were all in New Zealand in February, they went into a studio in Wellington and recorded the song 'Band of the Hand', for the movie of the same name, so Quebec is on that too.

She remained in the group for the whole of the long second leg of the tour, which ran from June 9 in San Diego through to August 6 in Paso Robles, California. And when Dylan went back into the studios in March 1987, to begin cobbling together tracks for Down in the Groove, Quebec was back—and this time, not only did she contribute back-up vocals, but on 'When Did You Leave Heaven?' and 'Ninety Miles an Hour (Down a Dead-End Street)' she both duetted with Dylan (she's mixed low, but is not inaudible, on the finished release) and played keyboards. It was their last professional collaboration.

Being Carolyn Dennis' mother, Madelyn Quebec was also Dylan's mother-in-law from 1986 to 1992, and is the grandmother of Desiree Gabrielle Dennis-Dylan. On June 12, 1986, eight days after marrying her daughter, Dylan sang 'Happy Birthday' to her in the encore of the concert in Sacramento.

[Quebec, King & McCrary: 'The Rose', Milwaukee, WI, 16 & 17 Oct 1981; 'Gamblin' Man', Madison, WI, 18 Oct, Lakeland, FL, 21 Nov 1981. Madelyn Quebec duet vocals & keyboards: 'When Did You Leave Heaven?', Hollywoods, prob. Jun 1987; 'Ninety Miles an Hour (Down a Dead-End Street)', Hollywood, Apr & Jun 1987.]

Queens of Rhythm, the 'The Queens of Rhythm' was the collective name given by Dylan to the group of backing singers on his 1986 and 1987 tours with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS. For the first 1986 tour, from February 5 to March 10, they were MADELYN QUEBEC, Debra Byrd, Elisecia Wright and Queen Esther Marrow; for the second 1986, from June 9 to August 6, Debra Byrd and Elisecia Wright were replaced by Louise Bethune and CAROLYN DENNIS. For the 1987 European tour, from September 5 to October 17, the Queens of Rhythm were Madelyn Quebec, Carolyn Dennis and Queen Esther Marrow.

Quintana, Charlie Charles Edward ('Chalo') Quintana was born in the Tex-Mex border town of El Paso on March 25, 1963 and raised there in some poverty. He grew up drumming and in 1977, aged only 14, moved to LA to join THE PLUGZ (later the Cruzados), a pioneering early West Coast punk band. He stuck at it right through till the mid-1980s. He also started up the Havalinas, which made one album (on Elektra).

For Quintana's main 1983–84 Dylan connections (Dylan playing harmonica on one group track, and then the 'Late Night with David Letterman' TV show) see the entry Plugz, the; but he worked with Dylan individually too, both in that period and again almost a decade later.

First he featured in Dylan's promo video for the Infidels track 'Sweetheart Like You', filmed in LA in October 1983, in which he's glimpsed behind the drums, though he hadn't played on the recording itself. And then in 1992, when the Never-Ending Tour came back from Australia, New Zealand and Hawaii, and opened a mainland US West Coast leg in Seattle on April 27, Charlie Quintana played as second drummer in the band (second to IAN WALLACE). He stayed in the band through the June 26 to July 12 European leg and then through most of the August-September North American leg, up to and including September 5 in Omaha, Nebraska. Quintana left, replaced for the last six September dates by WINSTON WATSON.

Aside from this Dylan work, his post-Cruzados, post-Havalinas work has drawn him in an arc through playing with Izzy Stradlin and the Ju Ju Hounds, Cracker, Joan Osborne, Soul Asylum and then in 2000 a tour that punk band Social Distortion's front man Mike Ness was doing to promote a solo album (Cheating at Solitaire). At the end, he was asked to join the band. It was a full circle. Quintana said yes.

'Quit Your Low-Down Ways' [1962] Copyrighted in 1963 and 1964 as a Dylan song, 'Quit Your Low-Down Ways' may derive ultimately from an old gospel song; Dylan's verse 'You can read out your Bible / You can fall down on your knees / Pretty mama and pray to the Lord / But it ain't gonna do no good' is lifted directly from the great Kokomo Arnold's recording of his own 'Milk Cow Blues', made in Chicago on September 10, 1934.

Dylan cut 'Quit Your Low-Down Ways' at the Freewheelin' Bob Dylan session of July 9, 1962 and as a Witmark demo that December 1962 (both in New York City). A week before first recording it he performed it at the Finjan Club, Montreal, introducing it with 'Here's a funny one . . .'. It was introduced to a far wider audience when PETER, PAUL & MARY included it, along with 'Blowin' in the Wind', on their In the Wind album of 1963, for which Dylan wrote the sleevenote piece 'In the Wind'.

The Freewheelin' outtake version was released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 box set in 1991.

Rabbit Brown See Brown, Richard Rabbit.

radical political activity in 1960s–70s US, the strange disappearance of The history of radical political activity in the 1960s–70s in the USA (in Amerika, as we styled it then, taking the 'k' from the initials of the Ku Klux Klan, to suggest its political complexion) seems to have fallen from sight as from the 1990s. When Soledad Brother: The Prison Letters of George Jackson was published in 1970, the British Sunday Times called GEORGE JACKSON 'one of the great voices of the American Left'. Now you look him up in vain in almost all the major encyclopedias and in the reference works on who's who in recent political and public life. He's become an unperson. Even on Google he's the hardest George Jackson to find. (The information on him given in the present volume is taken mostly from Edmund White's book Jean Genet, 1992. GENET had written the Introduction to Jackson's book.)

R

Yet at the time of Jackson's death, Amerika, waging war in Vietnam and Cambodia, was hugely in turmoil, and the Left was a real presence, with 'revolutionary action' called for among whites as well as within the Black Power movement. Malcolm X, the first modern black revolutionary leader, was assassinated January 21, 1965; Martin Luther King was shot in Memphis, April 4, 1968, provoking riots in 22 city ghettoes. 1968 also saw the Presidio Mutiny, San Francisco; a bloody conflict with students at Columbia University in April; and mayhem during the Democratic Party National Convention in Chicago (including a Yippie plot to dump LSD in a reservoir). One student was shot dead at 'People's Park', May 20, 1969, as 2000 National Guardsmen occupied Berkeley, California, in order to regain an empty parking-lot; protesters invaded Fort Dix, New Jersey, in October 1969; there was a student occupation of Harvard in 1969 and a strike at Berkeley in May 1970; four students were shot dead at Kent State University in Ohio on May 4, 1970; the Santa Barbara branch of Bank of America was firebombed by the Left in 1970; the Atlanta office of the South's biggest underground newspaper, The Great Speckled Bird, was firebombed in 1972 by the Right. Governor Ronald Reagan of California was quoted as saying 'If it takes a bloodbath, let's get it over with. No more appeasement.'

Even rock concerts were considered to constitute political defiance in Amerika, as in the Soviet Bloc. Over 100 people were badly injured at THE ROLLING STONES' first Iron Curtain concert, April 3, 1967, as police used tear-gas and batons against 2,000 fans storming the Warsaw Palace of Culture, Poland; likewise Jethro Tull and their audience were tear-gassed by police in Denver, Colorado, June 10, 1971, putting 25 grown-ups and three babies into hospital.

Dylan's 'George Jackson' suggests his tacit acknowledgement, at the time, of this violent struggle between revolutionary and reactionary activists. A good contemporary account of the period is Roger Lewis' Outlaws of America, 1972. The chapter 'Gimme Some of That Rock and Roll Music' includes what was at the time the best short summary of Bob Dylan's social significance in the 1960s. The best recent work on this subject is MIKE MARQUSEE's Chimes of Freedom: The Politics of Bob Dylan's Art, 2003.

[Sources: Shots: Photographs from the Underground Press, ed. David Fenton, 1971; Michael Horowitz (not the British poet) & Dana Reemes: 'Historic Sites of Psychedelic Culture and Research', 1977, in High Times Encyclopedia of Recreational Drugs, ed. Andrew Kowl, 1978; and Michael Gray: 'The Let It Rot Calendar of Death', Let It Rock no.28, London, Apr 1975 (republished Creem no.10, Birmingham, MI, Jul 1976 & Record Mirror, London, 29 Oct 1977).]

Raeben, Norman [1901 - 1978] Norman Raeben was the youngest son of Shalom Aleichem (1859–1916), the Ukrainian-born author and humorist known as 'the Mark Twain of Yiddish literature' and creator of the character Tvye (around whom the musical Fiddler on the Roof is centered), whose real name was Shalom Rabinovitz.

Norman was born in Russia on March 21, 1901 and emigrated to the USA as a teenager. He became Dylan's art teacher in the spring of 1974, when Dylan started attending group art-classes at his 11th-floor studio in Carnegie Hall, New York City, after hearing of his clear-sighted ability to define 'truth and love and beauty and all these words I had heard for years' from friends of his wife SARA DYLAN. 'Five days a week I used to go up there,' Dylan recalled later, 'and I'd just think about it the other two days of the week. I used to be up there from eight o'clock to four. That's all I did for two months . . .'

Raeben had studied with the artists George Luks, Robert Henri and John Sloan. He conducted his own classes for over 40 years, and over the same period lived with another painter, Viki Lipper.

Raeben's habitual exclamatory use of the word 'idiot' prompted Dylan's use of it in the Blood on the Tracks song 'Idiot Wind'. More generally, Raeben was, as Dylan himself testified in a series of interviews, a strong, perhaps profound, influence on that whole album and on how Dylan approached his work in this period of creative renewal.

'He put my mind and my hand and my eye together, in a way that allowed me to do consciously what I unconsciously felt . . . Blood on the Tracks did consciously what I used to do unconsciously. I didn't perform it well. I didn't have the power to perform it well. But I did write the songs . . . the ones that have the break-up of time, where there is no time, trying to make the focus as strong as a magnifying glass under the sun. To do that consciously is a trick, and I did it on Blood on the Tracks for the first time. I knew how to do it because of the technique I learned—I actually had a teacher for it . . .'

Norman Raeben is believed to have died in December 1978.

[Dylan quotes taken from 'The Mysterious Norman Raeben' by BERT CARTWRIGHT, online 7 Jun 2005 at www.geocities.com/Athens/Forum/2667/raeben.htm.]

railroads, a classic theme The use of the railroad theme, as of the highway theme, is the province very largely of the folk artist. Dylan is more than a folk artist—his social class, its literacy and education and his own creative insight and integrity all set him beyond that sphere—but his work has been gorged on the folk culture of America. It has literally been fundamental. In both senses, folk music is behind him. His wide-ranging, flexible, recurrent treatment of the classic railroad theme is an ample case in point. It's also a huge instance in Dylan's work where the fusion of black and white folk strengths shows vividly as a creative force.

Just as the heroic-outlaw-of-the-West myth was, despite its European antecedents, significantly the product of the frontier social situation, so too the railroadmen, the hobo and the railroad itself became folk heroes as a result of environmental circumstances. The railroad meant, or was at least seen to mean, freedom, opportunity, rebirth. It became, as in WOODY GUTHRIE's autobiography Bound for Glory, 1943, a duo-racial symbol and experience. It is only natural and appropriate that a duo-racial consciousness is required to deal with such a theme in modern folk art. Dylan applies just such a consciousness to this focus.

If it is a standard American symbol of freedom, the railroad also represents 'home' for the professional tramp of the dust-bowl years. The railroad symbolises other things too, from the real as well as from the dream world. 'When a woman blue, she hang her little head an' cry, / When a man get blue, he grab that train an' ride': the traditional black folk song that includes these lines makes the railroad a symbol of masculine social virility. Dylan, singing in the 1960s, emancipates contemporary woman. In 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry': 'Don't the moon look good, mama, shinin' through the trees? / Don't the brakeman look good, mama, flagging down the double-E's! / Don't the sun look good goin' down over the sea / Don't my gal look fine when she's comin' after me! . . .' These lines are an adaptation of several things, including parts of PRESLEY's version of 'Milk Cow Blues Boogie' and from an older blues song that runs: 'Don't the clouds look lonesome 'cross the deep blue sea / Don't the clouds look lonesome 'cross the deep blue sea / Don't my gal look good when she's comin' after me?' (Dylan had already used them once, in his unissued recording of the traditional song 'Rocks and Gravel'. And ten years after 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh', Dylan gives us another variant on those same lines, in 'Meet Me in the Morning', from Blood on the Tracks.)

It is, paradoxically, the repetitive framework that helps a notable economy in the evocation of railroad feeling in the original studio issue of 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' (on Highway 61 Revisited). In the music—of which the vocal tone and phrasing are parts—the drums and piano suggest not only the rattle of the train, and, as such, a measure of its speed and mechanic vitality, but also the elation of the traveller who identifies with the locomotive's performance. The lyric's economy on adjectives and its emphasis of nouns—the moon, the sun, the brakeman, the trees, the sea, 'my gal'—makes for an exciting balance between the romantic and the concrete. Symbol and reality are fused.

This fusion, in context, recalls a passage from one of those autobiographical Dylan poems that got into print from time to time on the back of LP covers and in old underground magazines (in this case the sleevenote poem for JOAN BAEZ in Concert Part 2): 'An' my first idol was HANK WILLIAMS / For he sang about the railroad lines / An' the iron bars an' rattlin' wheels / Left no doubt that they were real . . . / An' I'll walk my road somewhere between / The unseen green an' the jet black train.' Dylan can not only give the railroad the importance a hard-travelin' hobo might give it but can also use it as an axis round which to spin ideas of what is real and so pursue his quest for the concrete.

The railroad appears in many other early songs—'Freight Train Blues' among them—and in several an essential ingredient is the railroad's importance where some fundamental choice is involved, related to the real or the true. In the poem just quoted from, the 'iron bars an' rattlin' wheels' provide a yardstick, albeit simplistic, of reality, against which are contrasted smoother kinds of beauty—the nightingale sound of Joan Baez's voice is an instance he gives—and against which is balanced Dylan's consciousness of 'the unseen green'. In Nashville Skyline's 'Tonight I'll Be Staying Here with You' the choice is between two lifestyles, with the railroad as the symbol of the one Dylan at last renounces. It calls to him on behalf of the 'keep traveling' spirit and it loses to new-found love: 'I find it so difficult to leave / I can hear that whistle blowin' / I see that station-master too . . . / . . .

tonight I'll be staying here with you.' He hears, but this time, at last, he doesn't follow.

In direct contrast is Dylan's first-album adaptation of the traditional 'Man of Constant Sorrow', which equally relates to this particular choice. In this song, he wants the girl but cannot have her. He has traveled a long way to make the attempt to win her, and so the railroad becomes the symbol of a nomadic no-man's-land: 'Through this open world I'm bound to ramble / Through ice and snow, sleet and rain / I'm bound to ride that mornin' railroad / P'raps I'll die on that train.'

Here Dylan has come away from the concrete—despite the 'realism' of that wintry weather—and into the realms of romance. What could be more splendid, granted the imagined death-wish, than dying on that train? Even though 'Bob Dylan's Dream', with all its ponderous nostalgia, is launched with the lines 'While riding on a train goin' west / I fell asleep for to take my rest / I dreamed a dream . . .' Dylan never quite returns to the dream mood given us by the 'Man of Constant Sorrow' railroad.

There is a parallel of sorts on Blonde on Blonde, in the surrealistic symbolism of 'Absolutely Sweet Marie', but the mood is very different. The solemnity is replaced by a good-natured if double-edged mockery: 'Well your railroad gate, you know I just can't jump it / Sometimes it gets so hard, you see / I'm just sitting here beating on my trumpet / With all these promises you left for me / But where are you tonight, sweet Marie? / . . . And now I stand here lookin' at your yellow railroad / In the ruins of your balcony . . .' but the symbol there, though used at both the beginning and the end of the song, is incidental. It is not a song that has much to do with trains.

The romance returns, but more respectably than in 'Bob Dylan's Dream', or even 'Man of Constant Sorrow', in another part of 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', where the narrator grows lyrically expansive: 'Well I ride on the mail-train baby; can't buy a thrill / Well I've been up all night, leanin' on the windowsill / Well if I die on top of the hill / Well if I don't make it, you know my baby will.' That last line provides the ballast, taking the railroad romance away from narcissism and into a wider context, that of a more selfless and universal celebration of life. The goal here is to 'make it', to survive, not to die in glory on the train (although paradoxically, that conjectured dying 'on top of the hill' brings in by allusion a picture of history's most celebrated martyrdom, that of Christ on the cross on Calvary).

Guthrie's autobiography itself takes its title from a song that uses this train-as-salvation symbol: the phrase 'Bound for Glory' comes from the song 'This Train', the chorus of which declares that 'This train is bound for glory, this train'. And of course it is precisely this use of the train symbol that Dylan finally comes to on the Slow Train Coming album, and in a couple of instances just prior to it—he sings Curtis Mayfield's 'People Get Ready' on the Renaldo & Clara soundtrack, and the glory-train image runs through that, while the last track on the album leading up to Slow Train Coming, Street Legal, opens by forewarning us: 'There's a long-distance train rolling through the rain', and has Dylan riding that train to his own new-found salvation.

[Joan Baez in Concert Part 2, Vanguard VRS-9113, New York, 1964 (on which Baez sings the traditional 'Jackaroe' with the same set of lyrics Dylan uses 30 years later for the version on World Gone Wrong). Dylan's sleevenote poem appeared in Circuit magazine no.6, London, c.1967, one of the small arts journals inspired by Michael Horovitz's pioneering poetry magazine New Departures, founded South Hinksey, nr. Oxford, summer 1959. With no other title than 'Joan Baez in Concert, Part 2', the poem was collected in Bob Dylan: Writings & Drawings, 1972, and is also in Lyrics 1962–85 where, improbably, it is copyrighted 1973: almost a decade after its publication on the back of the Baez album.

Elvis Presley: 'Milk Cow Blues Boogie', Memphis, probably 15 Nov or 20 Dec 1954; Sun 215, Memphis, 1955 (1st issued UK on the EP Good Rockin' Tonight, HMV Records 7EG8256, London, 1957). Bob Dylan: 'Rocks and Gravel (Solid Road)', Cynthia Gooding's apartment, NY, probably Mar 1962. 'Rocks and Gravel (Solid Road)', Finjan Club, Montreal, 2 Jul 1962. 'Rocks and Gravel (Solid Road)': NY, 9 Jul and 13 Nov 1962 (outtakes from The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan). 'Rocks and Gravel (Solid Road)': Gaslight Café, NY, Oct 1962. 'Freight Train Blues' is on Bob Dylan.

'People Get Ready' probably recorded Quebec City, 28 Nov 1975; released only on a 12-inch 4-track promotional EP, 4 Songs From Renaldo & Clara, CBS XSM 164035, 25 Jan 1978.]

Raney, Wayne [1921 - 1993] Bob Dylan told CAMERON CROWE, for the Biograph notes in 1985, that as far as influences on his harmonica playing went, '. . . well, I'd always liked Wayne Raney and JIMMY REED, SONNY TERRY . . . Li'l JUNIOR PARKER . . .'

Wayne Raney is the obscure name here (and the only white man), and he was not a part of the folk-revival scene. He was born in the luridly named Wolf Bayou, Arkansas, on August 17, 1921, avoided agricultural labour by having a crippled foot, and was already determined to be a harmonica player by the time he met fellow player Lonnie Glosson at Radio Station KMOX in St. Louis, with whom he formed a double act on radio stations in Little Rock, several Mexican border towns and then in Cincinnati. You could send off for their harmonicas by mail order, and at one time they claimed to be selling a million a year.

Raney signed a record deal with the Cincinnati label King in the mid-1940s, and Raney-Glosson was the composing team behind Raney's hit 'Why Don't You Haul Off and Love Me', a song revived by Johnny Burnette (a post-rockabilly side: lots of strings, but real vocal energy). On Raney's version, he says he's '43'; Burnette amends this to '17'.

Most of Raney's songs, co-written with a number of different people, are demure love songs with an old-fashioned 'good-humoured' novelty element, in melody and lyrics. He has a penchant for terrible, occasionally repulsive, rhymes, such as '. . . sloggin' / . . . on my noggin'; on his more guitar-based rockabilly items you can hear exactly why he influenced Johnny and Dorsey Burnette. 'Jack and Jill Boogie' is one of his best, and with a more prominent harmonica than usual, and 'Gone with the Wind This Morning' is, to put it the wrong way round, another Burnetteish track.

Raney also played on post-war Delmore Brothers records (such as 'Blues Stay Away from Me', a song he co-wrote, which Dylan recorded with DOUG SAHM & his band in 1972) and on various suitably obscure rockabilly sides. He toured with LEFTY FRIZZELL and spent one year as a Grand Ole Opry regular, went back to tiny Concord, Arkansas, in 1960, where he set up a chicken farm and a record label, Rimrock, which included a custom studio and a pressing plant.

He is also remembered for a dreadful single of his own called 'We Need a Whole Lot More of Jesus and a Lot Less Rock'n'Roll'. And while Sun Records supremo Sam Phillips is often quoted as having said of blues music 'This is where the soul of man never dies', it's less well-known that this poetic turn of phrase is itself a quote from a song title, 'Where the Soul of Man Never Dies', recorded pre-war by the Anglin Brothers and Jack & Leslie, and post-war by HANK WILLIAMS . . . and composed by our Mr. Raney. In 1990 he published a very short autobiography, more booklet than book, with the delightfully scratchety, peckerwoods title Life Has Not Been a Bed of Roses.

The funny thing about Dylan's citing of Raney as a harp player who influenced him is that his harmonica playing never really resembles Raney's at all. Still alive and living in Arkansas when Dylan's tribute was published, Wayne Raney sold Rimrock, lost his voicebox, retired five miles down the road to Drasco, Arkansas, and died there on January 23, 1993.

[Wayne Raney: 'Why Don't You Haul Off and Love Me', Cincinnati, OH, 6 May 1949; Wayne Raney: Songs from the Hills, King LP 588, Cincinnati, reissued Dearborn, MI, 1987; 'sloggin . . . noggin' is on 'I Was There', Cincinnati, Mar–Apr 1955; 'Jack and Jill Boogie', prob. Cincinnati, prob. late 1948 & 'Gone with the Wind This Morning', Cincinnati, Mar–Apr 1955; all on Songs from the Hills; 'We Need a Whole Lot More of Jesus and a Lot Less Rock'n'Roll', nia, 16 Radio Gospel Favorites, Starday SLP-124, Madison, TN, 1961.

Bob Dylan and others: 'Blues Stay Away from Me', NY, Oct 1972, on Doug Sahm & Band, Atlantic SD-7254, NY, 1972. Delmore Brothers: 'Blues Stay Away from Me', Cincinnati, 6 May 1949. (A selection of Delmore Brothers material, though excluding 'Blues Stay Away from Me', is CD-reissued on Delmore Brothers & Wayne Raney: When They Let the Hammer Down, Bear Family BFX 15167, Vollersode, Germany, c.1990.) Johnny Burnette: 'Why Don't You Haul Off and Love Me'', nia, Dreaming, Liberty nia, LA, 1960, reissued Johnny Burnette Tenth Anniversary Album, Sunset SLS 50413, UK, 1974. Hank Williams: 'Where the Soul of Man Never Dies', Nashville, Oct 1949; Hank Williams On Stage!, MGM B3999, LA (MGM-C-893, London), 1962.]

Ray, Dave [1943 - 2002] David Ray was born on August 17, 1943 in Minneapolis, MN. He was a keen white blues singer and guitarist before he even left school, and he continued to be one, and to be anchored in Minnesota, throughout his life.

In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan remembers him as part of the Dinkytown scene. 'As far as other singers around town, there were some but not many. There was Dave Ray, a high school kid who sang LEADBELLY and BO DIDDLEY songs on a 12-string guitar, probably the only twelve-string guitar in the entire Midwest . . .' He could have added that they moved in the same circles, and that he used to listen to records at Ray's place.

Ray started playing 'professionally' with SPIDER JOHN KOERNER and TONY GLOVER. Koerner, Ray & Glover—that was the name of their outfit—made many albums, starting with Blues, Rags & Hollers, issued first on the small Audiophile label in June 1963 but picked up by Elektra, who signed them, bought the rights, reissued the LP that November (with four tracks missing) and then several further albums.

Dave Ray was one of the artists on the 1964 compilation album The Blues Project, on which Bob Dylan appeared on side 2, track 4 of the original LP, billed as Bob Landy, playing a piano duet with ERIC VON SCHMIDT behind GEOFF MULDAUR on the latter's song 'Downtown Blues'. Dave Ray was featured artist on the next track, his own composition 'Leavin' Here Blues' and on the last track, 'Slappin' on My Black Cat Bone'. Side 1 of the album began with Ray performing a song Dylan had put on his own début album, 'Fixin' go Die'. Soon after this compilation LP was issued, Koerner, Ray & Glover were fellow performers at the 1964 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL.

In 1967 he released a well-regarded solo album, Fine Soft Land, that showed more of his range than do the Koerner, Ray & Glover albums. Thirty years later, he made the equally well-regarded Snake Eyes. (He performs 'One-Room Country Shack' on both, making for an absorbing comparison.) Among his other achievements, Dave Ray helped engineer, with his first wife Sylvia, the 1971 album that launched Bonnie Raitt's career.

It's said that Dylan and Dave Ray remained friends. In September 1992, when Dylan played the Orpheum Theater in Minneapolis, the support band was Ray and Glover. He reunited with Koerner and Glover in 1996 for One Foot in the Groove, the trio's first recording together in 30 years. Later, Dave Ray was one of the Back Porch Rockers, along with Glover, Camile Baudoin and Reggie Scanlan (they issued a live album in 1999). Dave Ray died of cancer on Thanksgiving 2002, aged 59.

[Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.256. Koerner, Ray & Glover: Blues Rags and Hollers, Audiophile AP-78, 1963; One Foot in the Groove, Tim/Kerr T/K 96CD137, US, 1996. Dave Ray: 'Fixin' to Die', 'Leavin' Here Blues' & 'Slappin' on My Black Cat Bone', NY, Mar 1964, Blues Project, Elektra EKL 264, NY, Jun 1964. Dave Ray: Fine Soft Landing, 1966, Elektra EKL 319 (mono) / EKS 7319 (stereo), NY, 1967; Snake Eyes, MN, 1997, Tim/Kerr T/K 172–2, US, 1998.]

Reagon, Bernice Johnson [1942 -] Bernice Johnson, daughter of a Baptist minister, was born in the south-west Georgia town of Albany—50 miles east of the Alabama border and 60 miles north of Florida—on October 4, 1942. At age 16 she entered Albany State College, where she studied music and first became involved in the political activities for which the college expelled her. She became a civil rights activist and in 1961 a founder member of the vocal quartet THE FREEDOM SINGERS (originally created by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee as the SNCC Freedom Singers), along with three others, one of whom, Cordell Hull Reagon, she later married.

In 1962 she and the rest of the group met Dylan through a leading SNCC activist whom Dylan already knew, James Forman. ROBERT SHELTON says this initiated a period in which Dylan 'began to think their topical songs were more relevant than Broadside: "They are singing about themselves and the kind of lives they're leading."' Shelton goes on to say: 'The New Yorkers embraced Bernice Johnson as a young ODETTA. At eighteen [actually she'd be 20 in October 1962], she had a gentle demeanor, yet could uncork a huge, beautiful voice.' In contrast, she told Shelton later that Dylan at this point seemed 'embarrassed' at his own voice: 'He seemed to think then that it was really bad. When he came up with a new song he always said that I should sing it, or GIL TURNER, because we had better voices.' She added: 'We all thought, those of us in the movement and those of us in the Freedom Singers, that Dylan was fantastic as a songwriter and as a person.' When Dylan started exploring more personal subject matter, Bernice Johnson was, perhaps surprisingly, disinclined to join the criticism, and made a point not much discussed or even acknowledged in all the retrospective scrutiny of his history:

'I felt he was going through some fantastic emotional things and I didn't want to make any judgment. . . . When he simply drifted away from the movement, it was the whites in SNICK [i.e. SNCC] who were resentful. The blacks in SNICK didn't think that, or say that. We only heard the phrase "sell-out" from the whites, not from the blacks.' She added: 'I've always just regarded Bob as a friend. He's never been a star to me, just a friend.'

Soon after the August 1963 March on Washington, at which Martin Luther King delivered his 'I Have a Dream' speech, the Freedom Singers disbanded. Dylan and his cohorts visited the Reagons in Atlanta a day or two after they'd dropped in on CARL SANDBURG in February 1964. As late as 1976 Dylan was telling Shelton: 'I love Cordell. He's a madman. He's the only faithful madman . . . that can wipe you out with pure strength who I could trust to go anywhere with.'

That wouldn't have stopped him pursuing or at least harbouring a romantic interest in Bernice—and it has always been rumoured (though no-one seems to know on what authority) that she was the addressee of the lovely song 'To Ramona': the young woman whose 'cracked country lips' he still wished to kiss, 'as to be by the strength of [her] skin.'

Johnson Reagon went back to college in the late 1960s, gained a BA in History from Spellman College in 1970 and a doctorate in History from Howard University in 1975. She joined the Smithsonian Institution in 1974, founded its Program in Black American Culture (later re-named the Program in African American Culture) and was appointed a curator specialising in the National Museum of American History, where she created, among much else, the National Public Radio series 'Wade in the Water: African American Sacred Music Traditions'. In 1992 she published We'll Understand It Better By and By: African American Pioneering Gospel Composers, and in 2001 If You Don't Go, Don't Hinder Me: The African American Sacred Song Tradition.

In 1973, while busy in academia and at the same time Vocal Director for the Washington, D.C., Black Repertory Theatre, she formed a new a cappella singing group, Sweet Honey in the Rock, whose members included herself. Sixteen years later, on the album A Vision Shared: A Tribute to WOODY GUTHRIE and LEADBELLY (on which Dylan offers a solo version of Guthrie's 'Pretty Boy Floyd'), the group's tracks—'Sylvie' and 'Gray Goose'—are almost the only ones tipping a hat to Leadbelly rather than Guthrie. The dull but worthy group's history is written up from the inside in her lengthily titled 1993 book We Who Believe in Freedom: Sweet Honey in the Rock . . . Still on the Journey.

Johnson Reagon retired from the group in 2004; she still lives in Washington, D.C., where she remains Distinguished Professor of History at the American University and Curator Emeritus at the Smithsonian. Bob Dylan still sings 'To Ramona'.

[Bernice Johnson Reagon, We'll Understand It Better By and By: African American Pioneering Gospel Composers,

Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Press, 1992; We Who Believe in Freedom: Sweet Honey in the Rock . . . Still on the Journey, New York: Doubleday, 1993; If You Don't Go, Don't Hinder Me: The African American Sacred Song Tradition, Lincoln, NE: University of Nebraska Press, 2001. Various Artists: A Vision Shared: A Tribute to Woody Guthrie and Leadbelly, Columbia OC44034, NY (CBS 460905, UK), 1988. Sources include Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, pp.149–50 & 359, &, seen online 23 Jan 2006: Green Left Weekly online edn., www.greenleft.org.au/back/1992/65/65p21.htm, Rita Neubauer journal extract at www.voicesofcivilrights.org/bus tour/journal_entry33.html & Eve M. Ferguson's profile of & interview with Reagon, Washington Examiner, Washington, D.C., online at http://dcexaminer.com/articles/2006/01/11/features/profiles/35profile1reagon.]

Real Live* [1984] Dylan's fourth live album—all four having been made in the foregoing decade. Quite apart from the overload (especially granted that what everyone really wanted, the incomparable live 1966 Dylan, remained glaringly withheld), how was it that such poor stuff could be chosen, time and again, from among such riches? You could easily compile a better live album from the Rolling Thunder Revue than Hard Rain and a much better one from the 1978 tour than Bob Dylan at Budokan. And you could hardly offer a worse live album from Dylan's 1984 tour of Europe than this. The choice of songs is hopeless, the choice of performances injudicious, the production inexcusably murky. How did the supposed ace-producer Glyn Johns manage this? At the very least, Dylan's expensive, classy guitar should have a good sound. Dylan's major re-write of 'Tangled Up in Blue', featured prominently and exclusively on this tour, is included—but represented by a swaggering, mannered, unfelt performance. There were far finer moments than this. The Barcelona concert is generally judged outstanding. The album waywardly misrepresents this tour in particular and the whole glory of Bob Dylan in live performance generally.

[Recorded Newcastle, 5 Jul, London, Wembley, 7 Jul and (God help us) Slane, Ireland, 8 Jul (though at least narrowly avoiding Bono's inept intrusion into an encore performance of 'Blowin' in the Wind'); released as stereo LP, Columbia FC 39944 (US) & CBS 26334 (UK), 29 or 30 Nov or 3 Dec 1984.]

Receli, George [19?? -] George Receli, born in New Orleans but now living in Hartford, Connecticut, is currently the drummer in Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band. He is a multi-instrumentalist, singer, songwriter and producer who has also played with HOWLIN' WOLF's great guitarist Hubert Sumlin (along with LEVON HELM and KEITH RICHARDS), with MAVIS STAPLES, James Brown, Etta James, and a number of the less venerable.

He began working with Dylan on January 31, 2002, that year's first concert, in Orlando, Florida, but by that April he was having problems with one arm, and after JIM KELTNER played the first half the April 21 concert for him in Zurich, he dropped out temporarily, replaced by Keltner for the rest of that leg of the tour. Receli returned at the start of the next, on August 2 in Worcester, Massachusetts, and has remained in place ever since. This means he has also played on Dylan's re-make of 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking', made with Mavis Staples; on Dylan's Divine Secrets of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood soundtrack song 'Waitin' on You', on his Gods and Generals soundtrack song ''Cross the Green Mountain', on the film Masked & Anonymous, on the North Country soundtrack song 'Tell Ol' Bill' and, it is assumed, on the new studio album Dylan was reportedly recording in New York in February 2006.

[Receli, Helm & Richards all play on Hubert Sumlin's 2003 CD About Them Shoes, nia, 2003.]

recording quality and cynicism The 1980s was a hard period to get through, and Dylan managed it without turning into one of the Stepford Wives of the American entertainment industry like so many other public figures. Not for him the renouncing of the bohemian hard rains of the 60s; not for him any joining of the Cher-style born again body worshippers (Look at us! We came through all that counter-cultural nonsense unscathed!, and great is our reward in the garden of showbiz: we have cleaned up in both senses). Bob Dylan, the old spoilsport, showed no interest in aerobics, looked his age, was liable to sing about what will happen when we die, and generally made himself far from the ideal guest on glitzy chat shows or for opening that new shopping mall; you couldn't even trust him not to mention the rôle of American banks at a charity event for the starving of the third world. Not for him the making of music that sounds like a Pepsi ad even before it got turned into one.

Yet Dylan has grown a more cynical outer shell, from which part of the cynicism, in the corrosive form of some kind of self-contempt, some denigration of his own artistry, has seeped inside. It damages the very integrity it was meant to protect. It makes for a whole series of ways in which he appears to give less, care less and respect his own talent less, and it delivers him into demeaning situations and tawdry dullnesses his best self would avoid. Indeed it was by his avoidance of shabbiness and ennui that his best self taught us in the beginning what unfaltering nimble grace was possible for the popular artist in the marketplace.

Among the ways this decline manifests itself most damagingly for his art is in the matter of the sheer technical quality of his recordings. Bob Dylan tells Bill Flanagan (in Written in My Soul) that 'When I hear my old stuff I just think of how badly it was recorded.' Yet this is the opposite of the truth. Almost without exception, the work Dylan has recorded since the start of the 1980s is markedly inferior, technically, not only to what is and should be possible but to what was achieved on his own earliest work.

The deleterious effect applies all round but especially in what happens to his vocals. Listen to the way the voice is recorded on any track on the first four albums, and it's right there: you hear the detail of the voice vividly, as it chisels out each crystalline syllable; you hear every intake of breath, and you hear how each exhalation is distributed along the lines he sings. You register every nuance, feel every surface, receive all that close-up intelligence of communication, the infinitely variable, fluid expressiveness of it. This is how it should be. This is how to bring out the genius of his singing, in which these intakes of breath, these chiselled inflections that change moment by moment, these almost silent sighs, are all integral: all alive, interdependent dynamics in his uniquely intensive vocal detailing. He wasn't joking when he famously described his songs as 'exercises in tonal breath control'. There's an equivalence here to what's meant in a remark about blues guitar playing that Stanley Booth recounts in Rythm Oil: 'An old black Memphis musician stood one night in an alley beside a young white guitarist, pointed to the stars, and said, "You don't plays de notes—you plays de molecules."' This is how Dylan's voice is when it gives you goosebumps. To capture it demands close attention from the vocal mike, like a diamond under a magnifying glass: and on the early albums it gets it. It more or less gets it too on the solo 'Spanish Is the Loving Tongue', the Folkways: A Vision Shared track 'Pretty Boy Floyd', on Oh Mercy tracks like 'Ring Them Bells' ('we've recaptured some of the quality that the early records had; you can really hear him in the foreground', said LANOIS) and some of "Love and Theft"; but on the whole it's absent and there's no such care and attention on the work of the 1980s onwards. Listen to the 3-D vividness, the shining, buoyant (pre-transistorised?) presence of the voice either in the studio on, say, 'To Ramona' or 'North Country Blues' (to cite two vocals that are in other ways stylistically quite different) or in concert on 1963's 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time'. And then listen to the dry, flattened out, wrong-end-of-a-megaphone recording the vocals get (incompetently tricked out with phony echo) on Empire Burlesque.

Or listen to 'Maybe Someday', a song that would be terrific if the voice weren't half-way to sounding like a Chipmunks parody of Dylan recorded from the far side of a football field. The difference in recording quality between the vocal on a track like this (recorded in 1986) and on, say, 'Black Crow Blues' (1964) is simply pathetic. Or listen to the disparity between the recording quality of ARTHUR ALEXANDER's 1959, one-track-tape-deck cut of 'Sally Sue Brown' and Bob Dylan's 1987, 24-or-48-track cut of the same song. Alexander's voice is, as Dylan's once was, right there; Dylan's seems to be flailing around inside the dishwasher.

Dylan elsewhere acknowledges this deterioration himself, according to U2's axeman the Edge: 'Talking to Dylan, he was saying that the technology has improved but the recordings were still better in the Sixties, when they had more of whatever they had; and whatever they had is essential.' And interviewed by Bono, Dylan elaborated:

> 'You know the studios in the old days were all much better, and the equipment so much better, there's no question about it in my mind. . . . they were just big rooms, you just sang, you know, you just made records; and they sounded like the way they sounded there. . . . You go into a studio now and they got rugs on the floor, settees and pinball machines and videos and sandwiches coming every ten minutes. It's a big expensive party and you're lucky if you come out with anything that sounds decent.'

Even the tape used in the 1950s and early 1960s was better. In 1992 Q magazine quoted Rhino Records re-mastering engineer Bill Inglot as saying that modern tape deteriorates more in storage than older tape: 'Most things from 1954 are in better condition than masters from 1974.'

Then there's the shift to digital recording, which swiftly dominated the marketplace and proved a disappointment. NEIL YOUNG says we're living in the dark ages of audio because of CDs and digital recordings. He told Bob Colbourn's 'Rock Line' listeners on the Global Network Satellite that digital recording meant

> 'people started hearing much less of the original sound, and all of . . . the universe of sounds available to the ear and to the brain to analyse and to feel were all gone. . . . and those are the very things that stimulate the . . . body into reacting and feeling and enjoying music and . . . its therapeutic effects. . . . it's all reduced, it's a surface sham, it's not the real thing. It's like . . . digital cameras, when you take a picture of a field full of cows. . . . you take the same picture with a Kodachrome camera with a film in it and you look at the film picture . . . take a magnifying glass and . . . go way in and you look at the cows and it still looks like a cow. . . . and you go to the digital picture and you go in with a magnifying glass and all you see is like three or four little black squares where the cow was. And that's what's happening to your ears and your heart and your brain when you listen to digital music.'

There are those who feel we had a loss imposed upon us long before digitalisation, when transistors took over from valves. When Jackie Wilson's dazzlingly sung 1957 hit 'Reet Petite' was a hit all over again in the UK in the 1980s, one generation bought it on 12-inch; another already owned it on 78rpm. Playing the reissue on modern equipment and then playing the 78 on an old electric valve-driven radiogram, there was no doubting the extra warmth and beefiness of the older system. In the early 1980s valve-driven recording consoles started to be resuscitated, to cater for those who've felt there is this difference. A number of top quality hi-fi companies make valve-driven amps. Bob Dylan could afford to check into all this.

There are only occasional signs that he's interested. The main studio used on Under the Red Sky was Oceanway, which was dedicated to achieving an old ambient warmth and recognised the need to strive for one to compensate for digital, transistorised coldness—but the resulting production on Under the Red Sky was as criticised as any other Dylan album of recent decades; then again, "Love and Theft" stands out as a production that does pay the closest of attention to the minutiae of Dylan's voice—to hear 'Mississippi' is to feel returned to a model demonstration of how that voice should be recorded: and the producer was Dylan himself.

This seems the exception, and certainly you can't blame all the deficiencies of recordings like 'Maybe Someday' or 'Sally Sue Brown' on tape-storage, transistors or digits: they're inept productions by the standards of any audio regime.

In any case Dylan is never going to become an equipment-expert; and granted his capacity for shooting himself in the foot from boredom, it seems hard to expect that if we stand on the threshold of a new recording era, Dylan will step across it. Look at the cheapness of his equipment for touring through most of the 1990s; his not seeming to care that he was paying a technical crew uninterested in the new generation of mikes, DAT recorders and so on: uninterested even in keeping the heads clean on the cassette machine on the mixing desk. As Paul D. Lehrman wrote of a 1996 concert, in the recording-sound magazine Mix: '. . . he was only playing medium-size theaters, with a small band. How could the sound be bad there? . . . The guy at the mixing board, even though he had a clear path to the aisles, never moved, never walked away to see what it sounded like anywhere else.'

It doesn't have to be like this. It's all of a piece with Dylan telling the Never-Ending Tour's fine original bass player KENNY AARONSON 'I don't give a shit who plays bass' when Aaronson, recovered from illness, asked in vain for his job back. It's all of a piece with Dylan referring, in the Biograph interview, to 'my little voice'. With him telling AL KOOPER with a shrug that Knocked Out Loaded didn't turn out right because it got handed over to producers and what can you do? With his saying something about how any one album is only an album, and there'll always be another one: a dispiriting way of replacing the previously held Dylan view, which was that each album was a unique step along an unknown road: a deliberate creation under the control of the artist, however much the chaos of the moment was allowed to feed into it. (Blonde on Blonde is exemplary in this respect, as in so many others.)

Dylan seems usually to have given up fighting to maintain that control—perhaps given up on that responsibility to his art. It may be a sign of this that even his judgement about the running-order of the tracks seems to have slipped. It would be absurd to say that the running-order of any of the albums of the 1960s or 1970s was 'wrong' or ill-judged; yet even without going into such perversities as Shot of Love's including 'Trouble' and excluding 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' (now 'restored'), or Oh Mercy's choosing 'Political World' as an opener instead of 'Dignity', it seems self-evidently wrong that on the second side of Knocked Out Loaded the running-order does its best to minimise the impact of 'Brownsville Girl' by putting it before the humdrum 'Got My Mind Made Up' and the superfluous 'Under Your Spell', instead of allowing 'Brownsville Girl' to be the long, impressive conclusion to the record, as 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands' and 'Every Grain of Sand' had been on earlier collections.

Even the album cover-art seemed to get given up on in the 1980s. It hardly matters what's on the cover of a CD, of course: it's such a squitty little artefact it can't possibly hold any power; but the big bold covers of Dylan LPs used to give a clear, imaginative signal as to what sort of world was within. What a surprise it was to find that the five inner-sleeve photos on the vinyl version of the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, and the front cover photograph of Good as I Been to You, reverted to this skilled panache, this intelligent accuracy of signalling. It was a surprise because of the opportunities flabbily squandered with such covers as Shot of Love, Real Live and Down in the Groove, and more recently on Time Out of Mind and "Love and Theft".

Not caring to secure a decent vocal sound; accepting crepuscular artwork; excluding the best tracks; minimising the impact of the best of the rest—these are part of the new defensiveness, the 1980s-onwards posture of 'if I don't really try I don't really fail' that may seem inoffensively low-key, even charmingly fallible, but surely signals an aggressive distrust of the audience and of himself. A parallel stance has become more and more commonplace in concerts latterly too; by 2004 it was possible to be in the front row at one of these and still feel that Bob Dylan was a long way away, since he couldn't be bothered to project any further than to the front of the electric piano he was standing behind and playing so inconsequentially.

In personal terms, this encrusted defensiveness can't be criticised: if it's how he feels, it's how he feels—but in terms of his work, it is damaging, regrettable, self-destructive, 'and if you can't speak out against this kind of thing . . .'

[Stanley Booth: Rythm Oil, London: Cape, 1991. 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time', live NY, 12 Apr 1963, Bob Dylan Greatest Hits Vol. II & Masterpieces. Arthur Alexander: 'Sally Sue Brown', Sheffield, AL, 1959; Judd 1020, US, 1960: his début single. Jackie Wilson: 'Reet Petite', NY, Jul 1957, Brunswick 55024, NY (Coral Q 72290, London), 1957; SMP SKM 3, UK, 1986. The Edge quote, Melody Maker Dylan supplement, London, 3 Feb 1990; Bono interview with Dylan, Slane, Ireland, 8 Jul 1984, Hot Press no.26, Dublin, 1984. Bill Inglot, Q no.70, UK, Jul 1992. Neil Young, quoted Broken Arrow no.46, Bridgend, Wales, nia. Paul D. Lehrman: 'Sounding Off: What Happened to the FOH Mix?', Mix, Emeryville, CA, May 1996.]

Reed, Jimmy [1925 - 1976] Jimmy Reed was born on September 6, 1925 on a plantation at Dunleith, Mississippi. He was a hugely influential, popular artist. His hits, on which he played guitar and harmonica and sang, began in 1955 with 'You Don't Have to Go' and 'Ain't That Lovin' You Baby'; his many others include 'Baby What You Want Me to Do' (1960), 'Big Boss Man', 'Bright Lights, Big City' and his biggest US crossover (into pop) hit, 'Honest I Do' (1955), all made for Vee Jay Records. His only scrape into the British charts was with 'Shame Shame Shame', which peaked at no.45 in 1964. THE ROLLING STONES revived 'Honest I Do' on their first album, The Rolling Stones, the same year.

Dylan's Basement Tapes rock song 'Odds and Ends' is the title of a prominent 1957 JIMMY REED record—prominent for the splendidly named Remo Biondi 'playing the electric violin', and for Jimmy Reed's harp. Indeed his relentless, pulsating, slow harmonica-work on this moody alligator of an instrumental record is surely the model for Bob Dylan's on that masterly Blonde on Blonde blues, 'Pledging My Time'.

The figures Reed relied on more than Remo Biondi were his long-time guitarist partner Eddie Taylor, whose distinctive riffs often 'make' Reed's records, and his wife, Mary Lee Mama Reed, who wrote much of his material. An epileptic with an alcohol problem, Jimmy Reed died from respiratory failure on August 29, 1976 in Oakland, California. He was 50.

[Jimmy Reed: 'Odds and Ends', Chicago, 3/4/57, Vee Jay 298, Chicago, 1957. 'Shame Shame Shame', Stateside SS 330, London, 1964. The Rolling Stones, 'Honest I Do', London, Feb 1964, The Rolling Stones, Decca LK 4605, London (London PS 375, NY), 1964.]

Reed, Lou [1942 -] Lewis Allen Reed was born on March 2, 1942 in Brooklyn, New York, and became with John Cale (with whom he had played in the Primitives) a founder member of the iconic WARHOL-patronised group the Velvet Underground in 1965, in which he was guitarist, singer and principal songwriter, responsible equally for grunge classics like 'Waiting for the Man' and those eerily pretty songs like 'All Tomorrow's Parties'. The group was the prototype for all US punk music, and Reed the formative influence behind the group. He quit in 1970 to pursue a solo career that peaked early, in commercial terms, with 1972's 'Walk on the Wild Side'.

Dylan told interviewer Bill Flanagan that his own 'Brownsville Girl' was written partly in response to a song by Lou Reed, 'Doin' the Thing That We Want To', which starts by referring to going to see a play—the SAM SHEPARD play Fool for Love—and describing its impact on the singer. Reed presents this in the most vague and lackadaisical terms, and the song is of no great complexity or depth. 'Brownsville Girl' owes it nothing at all in structure, complexity of concept or use of language. But Reed's song advances a simple message, which might be said to be a rather obvious assumption underlying the Dylan song: that certain films and plays are 'very inspirational'.

Reed shocked many in the 1980s when he made TV ads for that most wretched of corporate banking brands, American Express; it was bizarre, but essentially disappointing, to see the Godfather of Punk earnestly recommending this symbol of the Fat Suit Universe. The soundtrack might have been, but for some reason wasn't, 'I'm waiting for my man / American Express card in my hand.'

Lou Reed was, almost as surprisingly—considering his absolute lack of career connection with Dylan—one of those who appeared at the 30th Anniversary Celebration Concert for Dylan in New York City on October 16, 1992—and chose very creditably not to perform some obvious 1960s anthem but a particularly difficult song that was an outtake from the Infidels sessions of 1983, the lengthy and fairly incomprehensible 'Foot of Pride'. Reed needed an autocue, but still, he did it.

[Lou Reed: 'Doin' the Thing That We Want To', NY, Dec 1983–Jan 1984, New Sensations, RCA PL84998, NY, 1984. Referred to by Dylan in his Mar 1985 interview for Bill Flanagan, Written in My Soul, Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1986. Sam Shepard: Fool for Love, the play, premiered San Francisco, 8 Feb 1983, dir. Shepard & NY, May 1983, again dir. Shepard.]

Regan, Ken [1950s -] Ken Regan was born in the Bronx in the 1950s, grew up there, studied journalism at Columbia and then attended New York University's Film School. His first photography work was in sports, selling a wide range of pictures including of tennis, boxing, athletics, basketball, auto racing, hockey and football to the usual heavyweight suspects: Time, Life, Newsweek and Sports Illustrated.

In the 1970s, he founded the Camera 5 photo agency, to represent himself and 14 others. Since then he has specialised in politics and hard news all over the world—riots, demonstrations, wars, Vietnam vets, gold mining in Brazil, famine in Ethiopia, the Kennedy family—but also in stills for Hollywood movies. In 1971 he was the principal official photographer at GEORGE HARRISON's Concert for Bangla Desh and, 14 years on, at LIVE AID.

All Regan's work in music, he says, came from promoter Bill Graham having taken him under his wing, including meeting Dylan. The two first met informally at JOHNNY CASH's house in 1972–73, but the meeting that clinched his work with Dylan came during the 1974 comeback tour with THE BAND.

It was a fruitful meeting—for it was Regan's photographs of the 1970s Bob Dylan that have, more than anyone else's, created the quintessential image most people have of him in that decade. All those utterly beautiful shots of him from the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue and on the sets, therefore, of Renaldo & Clara: the shot with BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN, the shots with ALLEN GINSBERG, with JONI MITCHELL, with MUHAMMAD ALI, the covers of the Desire and Hard Rain albums, almost all the generous sweep of pictures in SAM SHEPARD's Rolling Thunder Logbook, every picture in the lavish booklet with the Bootleg Series Vol. 5: Bob Dylan Live 1975 (2002) . . . all Ken Regan's. And you can buy a gelatin print of any one of them for an average of only $1,700.

re-interpretation and renewal in Dylan's work The main cliché of Dylanology from the 1980s onwards lies in insisting that Dylan's constant 're-interpretation' of his work in performance shows—and itself argues—that there is no finished text of any individual song. This has become so orthodox a mantra that you cannot demur without coming under attack. Dylan does indeed re-interpret his songs in performance—but the notion that therefore there is no finished text seems rather too convenient for the Bob Dylan who might have writer's block or lost his way. How much nicer to go round saying that the song is a text in permanent revision, like Trotsky's revolution, than to say that yes, this important song was actually written in 1964 or 1965, and so was this one and this one and this one . . . It's no small irony that while the never-ending-text theory is radical and post-modern and now, it's also a great one to cling to for those who have lost the muse and written comparatively little since back then. Where are the new songs the Bob Dylan of the future might want to keep on re-interpreting?

In any case, if all these live concerts are authentically about the high-minded quest for 're-interpretation', how come the unfinished texts Dylan revisits the most are so often the easy rockist numbers, like 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'—which by the end of 2003 had received nearly 800 performances. That's not re-interpretation, it's settling for the lowest-common-denominator easy option.

It is equally clear to all but the most blinkered that in around 95 per cent of cases, the best interpretation of the work, if you had to choose just one, would turn out to be the original Dylan recording. Listen to the syllable-by-syllable care and precision and on-the-ball acuteness of his delivery on almost every studio recording—not just the early ones but on, say, Time Out of Mind and "Love and Theft" too—and then hear how much these qualities are purposelessly lacking in every rough and careless live 're-interpretation'.

Yet of course you don't have to choose just one interpretation, and there have been many instances when a particular live performance—or even a whole particular year's or tour's re-invention—has offered invaluable, revelatory re-interpretation that no-one would wish to be without. On top of which, while the Bob Dylan of the 1980s onwards is no longer, measured by his own earlier standards, prolific, and often loses sight of the meticulous standards he himself laid down as writer and performer, his artistic struggle to survive and to be renewed has given us new work that, at its best, still offers unparalleled variety, an admirable insistence on exploration, and a continued authentic uniqueness.

He might fail more often than he succeeds over these decades, and he might seem marooned inside an 'entertainment industry' that has lost, in this period, its last shreds of tolerance for unformatted openness—the very condition that once allowed such major creative leaps as PRESLEY's fusion of hillbilly music with rhythm'n'blues or Dylan's own fusion of poetry with rock'n'roll. Yet he has continued to strive to explore, and has mostly refused, to his great credit, the easier option of being Dylanesque.

Renaldo & Clara* [film, 1978] A film based around Dylan's first Rolling Thunder Revue tour of 1975, which began as a series of surprise concerts in small towns and small halls, with a bright gyspy band of other performers including ROGER McGUINN, JOAN BAEZ, RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT, MICK RONSON, RONEE BLAKLEY and ALLEN GINSBERG. To help make the film, Dylan also brought in SAM SHEPARD, who was supposed to script non-concert scenes in and around the hotels and quirky places alighted upon en route. This didn't work out, and the scenes ended up mostly as improvisations, but Shepard stayed to act in some of them—there's an embarrassingly awkward scene between him and Dylan's wife SARA—and afterwards wrote the underrated Rolling Thunder Logbook, which is blessed by a rich supply of beautiful photographs taken on the tour, mostly by KEN REGAN.

Ginsberg witnessed Dylan's editing and organisational method for the film:

> '. . . he shot about 110 hours of film, or more, and he looked at it all. Then he put it all on index cards, according to some preconceptions he had when he was directing and shooting.

Namely, themes: God, rock & roll, art, poetry, marriage, women, sex, Bob Dylan, poets, death—maybe eighteen or twenty thematic preoccupations. Then he also put on index cards all the different characters, all the scenes. He also marked on index cards the dominant color—blue or red . . . and certain other images that go through the movie, like the rose and the hat, and Indians—American Indian—so that he finally had an index of all that. And then he went through it all again and began composing it, thematically, weaving in and out of those specific compositional references. So it's compositional, and the idea was not to have a plot, but to have a composition of those themes.'

The result, cut down to four hours, was over-long, self-indulgent, ego-centric and to watch it is to alternate between being riveted and bored rigid. Like the 1966 documentary film that followed Dylan's tour around, Eat the Document, here is a film that could have given us sustained concert footage of marvellous intensity, joy and high-flying creative foment but that gives, instead, cruelly foreshortened concert performance glimpses and tantalising backstage glimpses and concentrates, wrong-headedly, on the tiresome amateur improvised dramas devised by Dylan and some of his cohorts. As in Eat the Document, these flaccid scenes are what interest Dylan and therefore what he gives us.

Nevertheless, there are riches within the film beyond the shaking wonder of the concert footage. There is the clever way that Dylan somehow manages to use the downtown Montréal of the mid-1970s as a kind of stand-in for the Greenwich Village of the early 1960s; this is never spelt out but you get a strong sense that the one is observed so as to reminisce about the other. More straightforwardly, and almost certainly thanks to HOWARD ALK, there's the long sequence of wonderfully vivid, plainly observed interviews with randomly encountered people in the litter-blown, hard streets of Harlem, which let the disenfranchised speak for themselves: even the mad ones. This is all of a piece with the film's general insistence on keeping one eye open for the non-WASP North America.

In the end, Renaldo & Clara is a failure, but it's a grand failure. You might argue for it, as did a commentator to the IMDb online movie database, that what 'makes it such a valuable cinematic document is that it bridges the gap in American cultural history between the "Beat Generation" and the emerging post-modern movement.' And alongside Masked and Anonymous it's a radical masterpiece.

The credits give Dylan as director, Dylan and Alk as editors, and Alk, David Mayers and Paul Goldsmith as cinematographers. It has never been officially released on video or DVD.

[Renaldo & Clara, directed Bob Dylan, Circuit Films, US, 1978. Allen Ginsberg quoted from a transcript by John Hinchey of discussion between Ginsberg and students at Swarthmore College, PA, 4 Nov 1978, Telegraph no.12, Bury, UK, Jun 1983 (a transcript re-used almost word for word but uncredited in Clinton Heylin: Bob Dylan: Behind the Shades. Take Two, Penguin Books edn., p.460.) Quote from movie database seen online 14 Aug 2005 at http://us.imdb.com/title/tt0078151/.]

repertoire, Dylan's early, unsuited to commercial radio In Chronicles Volume One Dylan offers this list of topics occupying the songs of his early repertoire, noting that these songs 'weren't for radiophiles': 'debauched bootleggers, mothers that drowned their own children, Cadillacs that got only five miles to the gallon, floods, union hall fires, darkness and cadavers at the bottom of rivers' (p.34).

Ribakove, Sy [1928 -] & Barbara [1932 -] Sy Ribakove and Barbara Joan Mayer, now Barbara Ribakove Gordon, were born in New York on February 28, 1928 and November 21, 1932 respectively. They wrote the first book on Bob Dylan, the 'quickie' Folk Rock: The Bob Dylan Story, in 1966.

It may seem odd now that 1966 was the first year to see such a thing in print, but this was an era in which neither publishers nor the mainstream media were much concerned with 'pop music'. In 1964 Douglas R. Gilbert's photographs of a fresh-faced young Dylan, looking, in retrospect, rather neat and short-haired, were rejected by the heavyweight New York magazine Look, which had commissioned them, on the grounds that Dylan was 'too scruffy for a family magazine'.

Barbara recalls: 'Sy and I were given . . . four weeks in which to write the Bob Dylan book. We had never heard of him, but immediately bought all his records and played them night and day while researching and writing the book. Sy's musicianship was very important to this work; he holds two degrees from Juilliard. We made the deadline.' Sy adds: 'We were forbidden to contact Bob Dylan or quote his lyrics . . . [and] couldn't have done the book without the generous material in . . . the daybook provided us by IZZY YOUNG.'

The book was published by Dell as a small-size 124-page paperback with 16 pages of photographs; it mixed biography with a rudimentary discography and a semi-musicological description of the transitional albums from folk to rock. A Japanese translation continued to sell in Japan for some years.

The Ribakoves, who enjoyed a 23-year marriage and collaboration on writing magazine articles, and in 1974 wrote one other 'quickie' book (Sy's own term), The Nifty Fifties: The Happy Years, went their separate ways in the late 1970s.

Sy, now aged 78 and long retired, has played and taught piano professionally, been President of the Rockland Music Teachers Guild and President of the Hospice of Rockland in New City, NY.

Barbara was Senior Editor of the now-defunct Health Magazine and won an award for journalistic writing on hypertension in 1985. In 1981 she went to Ethiopia with the first American mission to Jewish villages, defying the Ethiopian government's order not to make contacts with villagers; in 1982 she co-founded the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry and in 1991, during a temporary armistice between warring factions, she took part in Operation Solomon, airlifting over 14,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

[Sy & Barbara Ribakove, Folk Rock: The Bob Dylan Story, New York: Dell, 1966; The Nifty Fifties: The Happy Years, New York: Award Books, 1974. Quotes, e-mails to this writer from Barbara Ribakove Gordon and from Sy Ribakove, 1 Feb 2006.]

Richards, Keith [1943 -] Keith Richards was born in Dartford, Kent, on December 18, 1943 and grew up to be one of THE ROLLING STONES, co-writer with MICK JAGGER of the Stones' self-penned hits (credited on record labels, early on, to Nanker-Phelge, a sort of obtuse riposte to the formula 'LENNON-McCARTNEY'), a great guitarist and inventor of riffs, and over time shifting from an amiable-looking mod with the street-cred cool of a bewildered pet rabbit, through the long heroin-happy years as Britain's licenced bad boy, to the extraordinary figure he cuts today as everybody's favourite cadaver.

What's remarkable is how long his dark, hip makeover took him. Look at any photograph right up to 1975—right on past the time when RON WOOD joined the group—and Keith is still nowhere close to Jagger, as a persona. Mick's right in your face with his cold green eyes and his drain-unblocker lips, pouting away with consummate ease: and Keith's there with his spiky hairdresser's hair gone all tufty and uncertain, and underneath it the ill-advised eyeliner and the stance of a provincial adolescent trying to look tough, as if he's just been caught smoking in school.

Their early manager, Andrew Loog Oldham, had made Keith change his surname to the singular Richard (though it wasn't, of course, singular at all, and merely made Britons wonder if perhaps he were related to Cliff: not an ideal image for a Rolling Stone)—and he didn't assert himself and change it back until the early 1980s.

He and Bob Dylan have had, aside from Dylan-Stones conjunctions, two memorable professional encounters: using the word 'professional' loosely, especially in the case of LIVE AID, the first of the two—except that though you wouldn't know it, they had rehearsed beforehand, on July 10–12, 1985, at Ron Wood's New York home, with Keith and Bob sharing vocals on 'Girl of the North Country' and Keith playing guitar throughout.

They reconvened at the Guitar Legends Festival in Seville, Spain, on October 17, 1991. After Dylan had played with others—primarily RICHARD THOMPSON—on 'All Along the Watchtower', 'Boots of Spanish Leather', 'Across the Borderline' and 'Answer Me (My Love)', then he and Keith, backed by a posse of musicians, performed the early R&B/rock'n'roll classic 'Shake, Rattle & Roll', sharing vocals.

It was a gift to Dylan: he went into one of his classic guesting-on-stage routines, a masterly piece of theatre that can be savoured on the film footage, on which he mimes faultlessly the high comedy of making out that he's woken to find himself on stage with certifiable lunatics it might be best to humour (Keith & co.) and has never heard anything as mystifying as 'Shake, Rattle & Roll' in his life.

Ricks, Christopher [1933 -] Christopher Bruce Ricks was born in Beckenham, Kent ('the Garden of England'), on September 18, 1933. His parents divorced (unusually for the time) when he was three. He was sent to King Alfred's School, Wantage, where he 'discovered Milton', and in 1952 served briefly in Egypt as a junior officer in the British Army's Green Howards regiment. He graduated from Balliol College, Oxford, in 1956, became an academic and eventually Professor of English at Bristol (1968–75) and then at Cambridge (UK) from 1975 to 1986. By the end of his time at Bristol he had already established his reputation as one of the great literary critics of the day. His first book was Milton's Grand Style, 1963; among others there has also been Keats and Embarrassment, 1974; T.S. Eliot and Prejudice, 1988; Tennyson, 1989; and in 1996 Inventions of the March Hare: Poems 1909–1917, described by the New Yorker as 'the best book ever written on T.S. ELIOT'.

Ricks never visited the United States until 1964, and then came only to look at the Tennyson manuscripts, but being entranced, wanted to live and work there, and duly became a visiting professor at Berkeley, Stanford, Smith College, Harvard, Wesleyan and Brandeis, and in 1986 left England to become Professor of English at Boston University. There, the Boston Magazine dubbed him 'the greatest teacher in the post-Socrates era', though he generally felt less appreciated than that would suggest, regarding himself as 'the lone champion of dead white male European writers' in an 'anglophobic English Department'. He once said: 'I sometimes think there is a specific prejudice against English people in English Departments.' Nevertheless, asked if he envisaged a return to England, he replied, 'Yes, but perhaps only in a coffin.' Despite that, he was elected Professor of Poetry at Oxford in 2004 and now lectures there several times a year.

He also feels, in old age, vindicated in having been, on the whole, an enemy of the virulent literary theorists whose ideas were for many years far more modish than his own. He told The Guardian in 2005 that 'a lot of people who were looking for a certain sort of salvation from literary theory—political and perhaps personal salvation—have been a little bit disappointed. There have been quite a lot of defections from the theory ranks and a lot of people have found out, to their mild surprise, that they were really liberal humanists all along. One shouldn't be complacent that fashions are sure to disappear without doing much harm. But it does seem to me that a great deal of good sense has prevailed and almost everyone now teaches, at least at undergraduate level, in a rather valuably old-fashioned way.'

Christopher Ricks was an early academic advocate of the idea of Bob Dylan as a serious artist. He delivered talks on Dylan at least from the mid-1970s, including on radio in Australia (and his occasional lectures on Dylan have always been exhilarating performances); he first published his fine Dylan essay 'Clichés That Come to Pass' in an early issue of the fanzine The Telegraph (later revising the material for publication within his book The Force of Poetry) and his 'What He Can Do for You' was written specially for The Telegraph. That he was contracted to write a book on Dylan was first rumoured in the early 1980s. At long last, and after almost as many delays as with ROBERT SHELTON's Dylan biography No Direction Home, the 69-year-old Christopher Ricks finally published Dylan's Visions of Sin in 2003.

The surprise was that this is Ricks' fattest critical work. A slimmer volume than he had accorded Tennyson, Milton or T.S.Eliot had been expected. Yet the book's amplitude is not entirely a blessing. Ricks indulges as never before in his remorseless, grinding word-play. You can hardly read beyond the first two pages without wishing he'd ease up on the compulsive punning: and after an hour's immersion you find yourself having to resist the same bad habit of mind. In this sense it's like reading Oscar Wilde: before long you find yourself reaching for aphorisms every time you open your mouth. The difference being that Oscar's aphorisms beguile and last, and Ricks' puns tend to besmirch and aggravate:

'"True Love Tends to Forget", aware that rhyming depends on memory, has "forget" begin in the arms of regret, and end, far out, in "Tibet". The Dylai Lama.' Later, Bob is 'Dyligent'. Discussing whether Dylan's songs end, as Bob once claimed, by wishing you good luck, Ricks writes of 'Positively 4th Street' that it does not end 'with "Good Luck" to its interluckitor.' On 'Lay Lady Lay' word-play on OED definitions of 'lalia' runs via 'erotolalia' into 'Try erotolayladylaylia. The chatter might be just the thing for a chatter-up of someone.' Not.

There is much else similarly ill-judged. Quoting another's adverse comment on him, Ricks retorts: 'I bridle slightly at that "fetishizing-a-recording" bit. (What, me? All the world knows that it is women's shoes that I am into.)' Another bad ego moment, followed by a particularly wearisome bout of punning, consumes 'Country Pie'. Where is the restraint with words that Ricks so admires in Dylan?

In the middle of discussing, brilliantly, 'Like a Rolling Stone', Ricks can't resist snatching 'pawn' from the lyric and, regurgitating its use in another song, writing 'That word "pawn" may hold a grudge, yes, but then if you were a grudge, wouldn't you like to be held?' Or, using 'Highlands' as his platform: 'if you fail to recognize that you are in Robert Burns country you must be a sad-eared laddy of the lowlands.'

It's also easy to tire of prose about Dylan that reprocesses his own lines and phrases. Anyone can resort to it, yet what could be more subject to the law of diminishing returns? In Dylan's Visions of Sin it has already become wearying by the time you reach, not far in: 'Nor do I think of myself as at all denying Dylan's license to expand his songs. (Who's going to take away his license to expand?)' Certainly no Penguin editor took away Ricks'.

Further, there is the false note sounded sometimes when Ricks aims to express in prose what he believes is the thrust of a Dylan lyric. Here is Ricks' imaginary blokeish chat, supposedly relaying the sentiments of 'All the Tired Horses': '. . . the second line . . . is nothing but a fatigued remonstration. "How'm I s'posed to get any riding done". I ask you. Not that you need take the trouble to answer. It is in vain for any of us to kick against the pricks—and anyway kicking would be more of an effort than I'm prepared to make, I don't mind telling you. Forget it. But don't forget the song, even though Lyrics does.'

Claiming to echo the lyric's meaning, he wholly misrepresents its tone—and since we know from another eminent professor that style is inseparable from content, this is to misrepresent the song's meaning too. Yet this is offered as the culminating flash bang wallop of four pages of this most catherine-wheel-minded critic's radiant rap about two and a half lines of lyric. At times like these, and there are many, you feel that here is a book about an English critic and his compulsive brainy word-games, and while it vividly evokes his distinguished yet intellectually playful milieu—Cambridge, Boston, Eng. Lit. student precocity—it barely seems to be looking at Bob Dylan at all.

All this is trebly wasteful. First, Ricks is better qualified than most to know how valuable—how economical and revealing—an alert, apposite pun can be; he knows, similarly, how serious, useful and concentrating can be the sparing use of word-play. In writing about Dylan, the same goes for throwing in reprocessed quotes from the songs. Second, Ricks pins down his own ailment. In the section on 'Like a Rolling Stone' he refers to 'the vacuum that is flippancy' and later gives his own verdict on extravagance of self-regard: 'This is like kissing yourself in the mirror, full on the lips, the only place you can kiss yourself in the mirror, and yet somehow not as satisfying as one had hoped, don't you find?' Since he asks, you might find yourself remembering what F.R. Leavis said of C.P. Snow's lecture on 'the Two Cultures': 'The peculiar quality of [his] assurance expresses itself in a pervasive tone: a tone of which one can say that, while only genius could justify it, one cannot readily think of genius adopting it.'

But the most provoking, the most damaging, upshot of Ricks' self-indulgence is that it so gets in the way of the incomparable light his gifts can and sometimes still do shine on the work of the incomparable Bob Dylan.

How bright a light can he shine, and on what aspects of Dylan's work? It has been suggested, in several quarters, that Ricks concentrates too exclusively on the lyrics and says virtually nothing about music, performance, politics or the times Dylan has been writing about. This is untrue. Early on, he contributes cogently to the weighing of 'straight' literary criticism as against 'say, music criticism or art criticism', and of the artist and how conscious he is of 'all the subtle effects of wording and timing'; the citing of Philip Larkin's feelings about the merits of reading poetry on the page and the inherent faults with reading it aloud leads into a fine discussion of Dylan's re-performances and what is gained and lost.

Similarly a very attentive critique of Larkin's poem 'Love Songs in Age' returns us, over several pages, to the discussion of print v. performance. Ricks often mentions the effects achieved by the voice; he mentions, if not regularly, effects too made by specifics on guitar or harmonica. (Anyhow, isn't it refreshing to find for once that songs from Oh Mercy and Time Out of Mind can be discussed without mention of DANIEL LANOIS or his atmospherics?) In any case, the book ends not with some summation of the literary side of life but with rumination on Dylan's dilemmas as a performer.

Ricks also has the courage and curiosity to raise the rarely discussed but significant question of 'Faith in Dylan. . . . Was that weird wording of his a slip of the lip or was it his speaking in tongues? Did he make a dexterous move, or am I—when I exclaim at how intriguing some turn of phrase is—just going through the critical motions? The choice can be stark.'

But it is the words that Ricks can best illuminate, and there is plenty here to stimulate and to teach. There's some terrific scrutiny of 'Blind Willie McTell', delivered with direct enthusiasm, and within which allusions are real bricks on the path, not distractions or confessions of distractedness: perhaps especially in the discussion of blindness that takes us from McTell, via Dylan Thomas, and ends up illuminating specifics in 'Under the Red Sky' and 'High Water (For CHARLEY PATTON)'.

He's good on putting 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' and 'Mr. Tambourine Man' alongside each other, and at his most alert best in pinning down, here, what we may never quite have noticed for ourselves but immediately recognise that we have felt: that the 'Yes,' in 'Yes, to dance beneath the diamond sky . . .' is in itself exultant. Similarly, he's very acute on 'Boots of Spanish Leather', and never more so than showing how Dylan's repeated 'No' is affirmative—is hanging on to the ideals of love—while only at the end, when he sings that 'yes' ('And yes, there's something you can send back to me') is he being negative, negating something larger.

Ricks on 'The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll' remains wondrously good—this may be the single finest piece of critical writing on Dylan, and raises itself above the rest much as Ricks argues that Dylan's song itself does. He's riveting, unbeatable, on 'Seven Curses' (where the pun about the judge's eyes, 'Bed-rheumy eyes', works—there's a point to it—and where it is almost the only pun in the essay, which is all the better for its plain speaking).

He achieves elegant, thoughtful writing about songs to God, the eye and the ear, the achievement of humility without falsity or archness, while scrutinising 'Saving Grace', starting with a most rewarding scrutiny of the phrase 'saving grace' itself. There's a fine, very different piece on the darkness of 'What Was It You Wanted?' and, ironically, he's very human, within it, on the power of wordlessness, as against Dylan's getting in, with this song, 'the first word, the last word, and every word along the way.' He's excellent too on 'One Too Many Mornings' and (when he gets down to it) on 'Only a Pawn in Their Game'.

He's better still on 'Like a Rolling Stone': a major piece to fit a major song, from micro to macro comment. Giving us a savvy observation in a pungent phrase, he quotes 'Threw the bums a dime, in your prime' and notes 'its evocation of small-minded largesse', while in dealing with the song's whole sweep he argues adeptly that it is the lyric's 'misgivings' that save it from being '—in all its vituperative exhilaration—even more damnably proud than the person it damns.' And his exposition of why it is exultant, not gloating, and how it carries, by its end, greater recognition of 'her' feelings than it seemed aware of at its outset, its recognition that there are mixed feelings as well as more feelings at stake: all this is great critical work.

It is, too, attractive that Ricks seems so at ease with the entire Dylan oeuvre, not least by bringing in frequently (surprisingly so for a critic so insistent on the artist being unbeholden to the man) many interview answers from Dylan from across the whole stretch of decades, from 2001 as well as 1966, quotes from 1963 and 1997 alike, and a healthy drawing upon Tarantula.

Equally attractive is the readiness to bring in Gerard Manley Hopkins, Tennyson, Eliot, Milton, Matthew Arnold, Keats and Larkin (à la Ricks, there's an awful lot of Larkin about), and his capacious readiness to do so is one of his great strengths when writing about Dylan. Not because it elevates Dylan when he's put in their company—for the truth is that he puts himself there, by his work—but because their proximity recurrently rubs the reader up against pithy, rigorous-minded comment and eloquence (pertinently, too: his quoting of Eliot on Goldsmith, allowing another's critical light to shine on Bob, helps say something of what's fine about 'One Too Many Mornings'). This rigour, this assemblage of great minds, does Dylan more favours than he usually gets within the narrow walls of rock writing, where perspectives on his work rarely roam further than from WOODY GUTHRIE to THE ROLLING STONES.

It's a further attraction of the book that he rarely makes those value-judgements most of us so easily slip into as to how great an artist A is, or how much better than B. So there's no 'Dylan is better than BROWNING' (nor any 'Browning is better than Dylan'). There's only the playful Ricksian reference to Shakespeare as Dylanesque.

[Quote re Boston, interview by A.M. Chambers, 2000, seen online 17 May 2005 at www.britishinamerica.com/cricks.html; quote re theorists, interview by Nicholas Wroe, The Guardian, London, 29 Jan 2005; some background material from both; more, and most Dylan-oriented material, revised from Michael Gray: 'Christopher Ricks: Dylan's Visions of Sin', Judas! no. 7, Bluntisham, UK, Oct 2003, pp.56–60.]

ridin' the blinds without Robert Johnson 'I Was Young When I Left Home' is an early Dylan song, recorded in a Minneapolis apartment in 1961 but only released officially 44 years later, on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack. In writing about it in the interim, CLINTON HEYLIN conceded that though deriving its tune and some lyric phrases from the traditional '900 Miles', some 'aspects of the lyrics seem wholly Dylanesque'. He quoted these lines: 'Used to tell my ma sometimes / When I'd see them ridin' blinds / Gonna make me a home out in the wind', but then backtracked that 'even here, the second line hints of [sic] ROBERT JOHNSON's "Walkin' Blues": "Leavin' this morning, I have to ride the blinds".'

The 'Dylanesque' lines are acutely chosen, but Heylin's conclusions mislead. First, the opening line, not derivative of any specific body of song, is the least individual of the three. Secondly, what makes the last line 'Dylanesque', his taking a common-stock phrase and tweaking it into something fresh—in this case taking the western folkloric 'gonna make me a home out in the west', and fusing it with the anonymous 'in the wind'—is also what's Dylanesque about the middle line. And we can recognise this by seeing that the point about that middle line is not that it echoes a Robert Johnson song but that it doesn't.

Johnson's song contains 'ride the blinds', but so do many, many other pre-war blues songs which, like Johnson's, were subsequently collected onto the re-issue albums that largely determined which of the pre-war blues-singers became known to the enthusiasts and revivalists Dylan moved among when he was young and when he left home. Indeed at least 16 other such artists used 'Robert Johnson's' phrase on record before Johnson ever entered a studio. A 1929 harmonica instrumental record by Eddie Mapp, offering one of the great virtuoso train-imitating harmonica performances, was titled 'Ridin' the Blinds'. The phrase was so widespread by 1935—still before Robert Johnson recorded—that two singers could be found using it in different recordings cut in the same town on the same day: Chasey Collins (a 'Walking Blues' too) and Otto Virgial, in Chicago on Hallowe'en. And among those who had already put the expression on record before Johnson were a number of other artists Dylan has cited or sung songs by (in one case even worked with) down the years: THE MEMPHIS JUG BAND, MEMPHIS MINNIE, BLIND WILLIE McTELL, SLEEPY JOHN ESTES and BIG JOE WILLIAMS (with whom Dylan was to record three months later).

Dylan would certainly have heard the phrase on the Jenny Clayton & the Memphis Jug Band's 1927 track, 'Bob Lee Junior Blues': because this was one of the tracks reissued on HARRY SMITH's extraordinary anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC, which came out back in 1952—and what indicates that Dylan already knew the collection by the time he put 'I Was Young When I Left Home' on tape is that the same tape and even earlier tapes by Dylan contain his versions of eight of the songs on the set. (Detailed in earliest blues & gospel recordings, Dylan's.)

Dylan, then, may just possibly have first heard the phrase 'ride the blinds' from Robert Johnson, but the strong likelihood is that he heard it elsewhere first. Either way, he had certainly heard enough pre-war blues by the end of 1961 to know that the phrase was recurrent—to know that he was quoting a common-stock phrase from the great body of pre-war blues lyric poetry. (See also pre-war blues, Dylan's ways of accessing.)

In any case, Robert Johnson's 'Walking Blues' recycles 'My Black Mama' by SON HOUSE, who was calling it 'Walking Blues' in the 1930s before Robert Johnson used the title for his own song; House's 1942 field-recorded 'Walking Blues' re-emphasises this lineage. And then, decades later, in one of those magic moments in music history, an unreleased test acetate was discovered, of House performing 'Walkin' Blues' itself, recorded at his début 1930 session. Clearly the song had been central to his repertoire in that period, when Robert Johnson had been hanging around him listening and learning.

It does not undervalue Robert Johnson's importance as a giant figure in the history of the blues, or as an influence on Dylan, to remember that he was still a boy when Son House, CHARLEY PATTON and their contemporaries first recorded—his own recordings were all made in Texas in five days in 1936–37—or to stress that the phrase being traced does not originate with that great originator. On the contrary, the danger is that since we've had Dylan's word, several times over, that Johnson was a such a key figure, we may see him in Dylan's work where he does not belong—which does no service to either artist, or to understanding the blues.

Dylan touches on this himself in the 1963 poem 'My Life in a Stolen Moment': 'WOODY GUTHRIE, sure / Big Joe Williams, yeah / It's easy to remember those names / . . . What about the records you hear but one time . . . ?'

If we know, therefore, as Dylan knew, how commonplace a formulation is the phrase 'ride the blinds', we are then (only then) in a position to appreciate that what he does with it is the most original thing in the whole three-line sequence quoted from 'I Was Young When I Left Home'.

The blinds were the spaces behind the tender and between baggage-cars on the train, where, if you could jump on undetected, you could travel free. Even if you evaded assault by the railroadman's club, it was dangerous: even more so under the carriages where, in essence, if you rolled over you killed yourself. This is why, immediately after 'Leaving this morning, I have to ride the blinds', the other half of Robert Johnson's couplet is 'Babe I been mistreated, baby and I don't mind dying.'

The very young Bob Dylan understood this, especially since the two themes in the blues that appealed to him most were death and travel, the two things that come together in 'riding the blinds'.

What's certain is that while the blues yields a score of 'ride the blinds' and 'riding the blinds', there is no occurrence of 'them ridin' blinds'. Dylan has invented this designation. It is not a small thing. His phrase compresses their lethal promise of opportunity, and the desperation of those needing to travel in such a way. To refer to 'them ridin' blinds' is to express foreboding anew. And in being a different formulation, in standing out, it confesses the young man's later-generation outsiderism (which Dylan makes explicit in the even earlier 'Song to Woody', concluding with 'The very last thing that I'd want to do / Is to say I been hittin' some hard travelin' too.') On 'I Was Young When I Left Home', that 'When I'd see them' adds the confirming touch: he'd see them but he'd not say he'd 'ride the blinds' himself.

[Bob Dylan: 'I Was Young When I Left Home', Minneapolis, 22 Dec 1961, the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, Columbia Legacy 520358 2, NY, 2005.

Eddie Mapp & His Harmonica: 'Riding the Blinds', Long Island City, NY, c.May 1929. Memphis Jug Band: 'Bob Lee Junior Blues', Atlanta, 19 Oct 1927, American Folk Music, Folkways FP 251-3, NY, 1952. Sleepy John Estes: 'Broken-Hearted, Ragged and Dirty Too', Memphis, 26 Sep 1929, The Memphis Area, 1927–1932, Roots RL-307, Vienna, c.1968. Blind Willie McTell: 'Travelin' Blues' & 'Come On Around To My House Mama', Atlanta, 30 Oct 1929. Son House: 'My Black Mama Part 1', 'My Black Mama Part 2' & 'Walking Blues', Grafton, WI, 28 May 1930; 'Walking Blues', Robinsonville, Mississippi, 17 Jul 1942, CD-reissued Son House: The Complete Library of Congress Sessions 1941–1942, Travelin' Man TM CD 02, Crawley, UK, 1990. Memphis Minnie: 'Chickasaw Train Blues', Chicago, 24 Aug 1934, Out Came the Blues, Coral CP-58, London, 1970. Big Joe Williams: 'Little Leg Woman', Chicago, 25 Feb 1935, Lonesome Road Blues: 15 Years in the Mississippi Delta, Yazoo L-1038, NY, 1973. Chasey Collins: 'Walking Blues', Chicago, 31 Oct 1935, The Country Fiddlers, Roots RL-316, Vienna, c.1968; Otto Virgial: 'Little Girl in Rome', Chicago, 31 Oct 1935, Mississippi Bottom Blues, Mamlish Records S-3802, NY, c.1973.

Then comes Robert Johnson: 'Walking Blues', San Antonio, 27 Nov 1936, Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers, Columbia Records CL-1654, NY, 1961.

After him, among many others, come Tampa Red: 'Seminole Blues': Aurora, IL, 11 Oct 1937, Tampa Red: Bottleneck Guitar, 1928–1937, Yazoo L-1039, NY, 1973. Blind Boy Fuller: 'Step It Up and Go', NY, 5 Mar 1940, Blind Boy Fuller with Sonny Terry and Bull City Red, Blues Classics BC-11, Berkeley, CA, 1966.

(NB. The first to record these hard travel blues had been women: Trixie Smith: 'Freight Train Blues', NY, c.May 1924, Trixie Smith: Masters of the Blues, Vol. 5, Collectors Classics CC-29, Copenhagen, c.1971, & Clara Smith: 'Freight Train Blues', NY, 30 Sep 1924, Clara Smith: Volume Three, VJM VLP-17, London, 1969.)

Clinton Heylin: 'Them Ridin' Blinds', Telegraph no. 27, Romford, UK, summer 1987.]

Riley, Billy Lee [1933 -] William Lee Riley was born into a family of sharecroppers in Pocohontas, Arkansas, on October 5, 1933. He was a country singer who wanted to be a blues singer but ended up in Memphis doing rockabilly for Sam Phillips at Sun from late 1956 until he left to form his own label, Rita, in 1960. He was a session-man and multi-instrumentalist (quite good on bluesy harmonica); JERRY LEE LEWIS and Charlie Rich played piano on Riley's records, the best-known being his 1957 titles 'Red Hot' and (as by Billy Lee Riley and his Little Green Men) 'Flyin' Saucers Rock'n'Roll'. He also revived the 1940s hit 'Open the Door, Richard', a title Dylan makes into the refrain of his own 1967 song 'Open the Door, Homer' (see separate entry).

More importantly, Riley is the man who had the gumption to turn on the tape recorder when Sam Phillips and fundamentalist Bible-study boy Jerry Lee were discussing the evils of secular music at the Sun session that later yielded Lewis' 'Great Balls of Fire' (a discussion first issued on a Dutch bootleg in the 1970s), and more than a decade later he was a guest performer at ELVIS and Priscilla Presley's New Year's Eve Party at the Thunderbird Lounge, Memphis, in 1968.

In the end he was able to cut records in every genre he liked: as one rock historian catalogued it, he 'recorded country for Sun, Mojo, Pen, Hip, Sun International, Entrance, backwoods blues for Rita, R&B for Dodge, Checker and Hip, rock for Brunswick and Home of the Blues, and soul for Smash, Fire, Fury, Mojo and Myrl.' He cut many of his blues sides, including 'Repossession Blues', under the pseudonym Lightnin' Leon. In the 1960s he moved to LA and did session-work and in the 1970s-80s toured Europe many times.

Bob Dylan sang 'Repossession Blues' at a rehearsal for the 1978 World Tour in Santa Monica (February 1, 1978) and subsequently twice in concert (in Osaka, February 24 and Tokyo four nights later), and he performed Riley's 'Rock with Me Baby' at six US concerts in 1986.

On September 8, 1992, when Dylan's Never-Ending Tour hit Riley's home patch of Little Rock, Arkansas, Bob brought Billy on stage as a guest. He was introduced fulsomely by Dylan, who stayed on stage to play back-up guitar as Riley sang 'Red Hot'. Riley went on from this heartening evening's encounter to re-activate his own performing career. The Smithsonian interviewed him for their archives and he released his first all-blues CD, Blue Collar Blues, that same year. Now based in Newport, Arkansas, he gives combination lecture-concerts about the blues, the Mississippi Delta and his childhood as a sharecropper. He disappoints everyone who admired his work by revealing that he regards working with Sammy Davis Jr. in the 1960s as a high point of his career.

[Billy Lee Riley: 'Flyin' Saucers Rock'n'Roll', Memphis, TN, 11 Dec 1956 (w Jerry Lee Lewis), Sun 260, Memphis, 1957, reissued The Sun Story 1952–1968, Sun 6641 180, London, 1974; 'Red Hot', Memphis, 1957, Sun 277, Memphis, 1957; 2-CD set Classic Recordings 1956–1960, Including the Complete Sun Recordings, Bear Family BCD 15444-BH, Vollersode, Germany, c.1990; Blue Collar Blues, Hightone HCD 8040, US, 1992; 'Repossession Blues', nia, Rita 1005, US, 1960. Lewis-Phillips discussion 1st issued Good Rocking Tonight, Bopcat LP-100, Holland, 1970s.]

Rimbaud, Arthur [1854 - 1891] Jean-Nicholas-Arthur Rimbaud, the most original French symbolist poet and a romantic tragic hero, was born in Charleville, in the Ardennes, France, on October 20, 1854. He became 'the bad boy of 19th century poetry', lured PAUL VERLAINE away from his wife and baby at the age of 16, published groundbreaking poetry, lived a life of alcoholic and druggy excess, got shot in the hand by Verlaine and by the age of 21 had given up literature to explore the world and go gun-running.

The year he initiated meeting Verlaine, 1871, he published his best-known single poem, 'Le Bâteau Ivre' ('The Drunken Boat'), and after running away from their wild and stormy relationship he assembled a collection of poetry and prose pieces, Une Saison en Enfer (A Season in Hell), in 1873. Later, in England, he completed the prose-poems collections Illuminations before burning his remaining manuscripts and abandoning writing.

It was, touchingly, Verlaine who kept trying to bring Rimbaud's poetry to the world's attention. In 1884 he included a Rimbaud selection plus an essay about the younger poet in his collection Les Poètes Maudits (The Accursed Poets); in 1886 he published Rimbaud's Illuminations; and in 1895 it was Verlaine who published the posthumous Poésies Complètes. This was selfless not only because Rimbaud had ended their personal relationship (granted, Verlaine shot and injured the teenage Rimbaud during their quarrels) but because Rimbaud's work was the more original of the two, and for Verlaine to publish it was to make his own poetry seem old-fashioned and pedestrian.

Dylan mentions the relationship between Rimbaud and Verlaine in the Blood on the Tracks song 'You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go'. Perhaps there's a glancing allusion to Rimbaud's 'Le Bâteau Ivre' in Dylan's line from 'Dignity', 'I'm on the rollin' river in a jerkin' boat', and perhaps a similar echo discernible behind those quietly great two lines from 1978's Street Legal song 'True Love Tends to Forget', where he sings that 'This weekend in hell / Is makin' me sweat'. In his liner notes to the Desire album, Dylan writes: 'Where do I begin . . . on the heels of Rimbaud . . .' and Rimbaud gets a 'thanks' on the credits of the 'Hard Rain' TV film. He even called one of his guitars Rimbaud (a white National electric).

Dylan has famously quoted Rimbaud's motto 'I is another'—'It's like Rimbaud said, "I is another"'—and in Chronicles Volume One he refers to first encountering this early in his New York years, courtesy of SUZE ROTOLO: '. . . someplace along the line Suze had also introduced me to the poetry of French symbolist poet Arthur Rimbaud. That was a big deal . . . I came across one of his letters called "Je est un autre," which translates into "I is someone else." When I read those words the bells went off. It made perfect sense.'

More fundamentally, Rimbaud can be said to have created the very idea of the modern poet—personifying the kind of poet that all THE BEATS, and following on from them, Dylan, wanted to be. Rimbaud's stance includes a recognisably modern insistence on the validity of low culture, of subcultures, as well as high. Rimbaud wrote this, and it's easy to see how readily it is taken forward into the consciousness of the Bob Dylan of both Tarantula and of "Love and Theft":

> 'For a long time I found the celebrities of modern painting and poetry ridiculous. I loved absurd pictures, fanlights, stage scenery, mountebanks backcloths, inn-signs, cheap colored prints; unfashionable literature, church Latin, pornographic books badly spelt, grandmothers novels, fairy stories, little books for children, old operas, empty refrains, simple rhythms.'

Other contemporary figures on the rock/poetry edge who have declared their allegiance to Rimbaud include Jim Morrison, PATTI SMITH and VAN MORRISON (who namechecks him in the splendid 'Tore Down à la Rimbaud'). Less interestingly, Christopher Hampton's play Total Eclipse, first produced in 1968, became the panting Hollywood movie of the same name in 1995—tagline 'Touched by Genius. Cursed by Madness. Blinded by Love.'—starring David Thewlis as Verlaine and Leonardo di Caprio as Rimbaud.

At first, having abandoned literature, Rimbaud became, rather unromatically, a teacher in Germany, but after that he worked on the docks in Marseilles, joined the Dutch army but deserted in Sumatra, traveled through Java, today's Yemen, Ethiopia, Egypt and elsewhere, becoming the first European to enter part of what is now Somalia, and leading traders' caravans trekking through dangerous places. Mostly he was working for French import-export companies, trading in everything from household objects to guns and ammunition. It's quite possible that he was dealing in slaves, too.

Rimbaud had a cancerous leg amputated in early 1891 and died in Marseilles that November 10. He was barely 37.

(See also French symbolist poets, the.)

[Arthur Rimbaud, Complete Works, 1976; Rimbaud Complete Works: Selected Letters, 1987. The 'bad boy' quote is from Judy Stone, San Francisco Chronicle, nia, seen online 12 Sep 2005 at www.rimbaud.freeserve.co.uk/page14.htm. Van Morrison, 'Tore Down à la Rimbaud', A Sense of Wonder, 1984. Total Eclipse, dir. Agnieszka Holland, US, 1995. Bob Dylan, quote from Biograph box set interview, 1985; Chronicles Volume One, p.288. Rimbaud guitar name, Joel Bernstein interviewed by John Bauldie, The Telegraph no.35, Romford, UK, spring 1995.]

Ringwald, Molly [1968 -] Molly Ringwald was born on February 18, 1968 in Roseville, California. A Hollywood actor who appeared on stage at age five as the dormouse in Alice in Wonderland, she made an album at six, came to fame as one of the so-called Brat-Pack via her starring rôle in Pretty in Pink and turned down the lead rôle in Pretty Woman.

In 1990 she played the female romantic lead—and Dylan had the grace not to try to play the male romantic lead—in the ludicrous piece of froth that was the promo video for the doomed single 'Unbelievable', taken from the album Under the Red Sky. The video was filmed in the Mojave Desert on June 24, 1990, with Molly looking pale and uninteresting; co-stars were Rob Bogue (now a regular on soap opera Guiding Light) and SALLY KIRKLAND.

['Unbelievable', dir. Paris Barclay, US, 1990.]

Rinzler, Alan [1938 -] Alan Rinzler was born in New York City on October 26, 1938, a cousin of the great folklorist RALPH RINZLER. Alan went into publishing and has been a book editor since 1962, the year he first took an interest in Dylan's work. One of his earliest projects was to edit the Young Folk Song Book, which came out in 1963 and which he believes marked Dylan's first appearance in any book. The book had sections on JOAN BAEZ, Dylan, RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT, THE GREENBRIAR BOYS, THE NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS and Peggy Seeger. There was also 'An Appreciation' by Rinzler's cousin Ralph and an 'Introduction' by PETE SEEGER. Curiously, the book was copyrighted to 'The Society for Traditional Music, Inc., friends of old time music'. The book gave lyrics and musical notation (all arrangements by Earl Robinson) to a handful of songs by each of the artists, plus a short prose introduction. In Dylan's case the intro was by ROBERT SHELTON and the songs were 'Song to Woody', 'Fare Thee Well', 'The Ballad of Hollis Brown', 'Boots of Spanish Leather' and 'Masters of War'.

Rinzler has also published books by WOODY GUTHRIE, Pete Seeger, ANDY WARHOL, HUNTER S. THOMPSON, Toni Morrison, Robert Ludlum and many others. In 1978 he wrote and published the large-format paperback Bob Dylan: The Illustrated Record, which was indeed lavishly illustrated. The text was scissors-and-paste, and its song analysis brutish, but the idea was highly appealing and simple: to tell the Dylan career story album by album, reproducing not only the front cover of every LP—up to and including 1978's Street Legal—but augmenting it with beautifully chosen and in some cases previously unseen photographs of what was going on in the artist's life at the time. Spread across glossy pages that were 11 inches by 11, the book was a visual feast that must have been extremely expensive to publish. An Italian hardback was published in 1980, with a translated text, but the English-language edition has never been reissued. Not to be confused with the similarly titled Bob Dylan: An Illustrated History by Michael Gross.

[Alan Rinzler, Young Folk Song Book, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1963; Bob Dylan: The Illustrated Record, New York: Harmony Books, 1978. Italian hardback edition Bob Dylan: Profeta, poeta, musicista e mito, trans. Massimo Villa, Milan: Sonzogno, 1980.]

Rinzler, Ralph [1934 - 1994] Ralph Carter Rinzler was born in New York City on July 20, 1934. By the age of seven he was listening to Library of Congress field recordings and as a Swarthmore

College freshman he was inspired to teach himself the banjo after hearing PETE SEEGER play. Like many others in the folk revival movement, he leaned for some of his own early repertoire on HARRY SMITH's AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC anthology, and later catalogued the 1,500 items in the Harry Smith collection of recordings, which was held by the New York City Public Library.

Rinzler became a significant North American folklorist who made important field recordings of DOC WATSON, CLARENCE ASHLEY, Bill Monroe and others, was instrumental in bringing Ashley's traditional musicians, including Watson, into the folk revival scene as live performers in 1961, and ran their management from his base on West 3rd Street in Greenwich Village. He became the man who interpreted bluegrass for college intellectual types. He was also a field collector for Folkways Records and eventually the founding director of the Office of Folklife Programs at the Smithsonian Institution, where he co-founded its annual summer Festival of American Folklife on the Mall in Washington, D.C.

He was also a musician in his own right, and a well-known figure around the Village when Dylan first arrived there in the very early 1960s. Though for some time he retained his day-job handling complaints at Pan American, he was a member, with JOHN HERALD and BOB YELLIN, of THE GREENBRIAR BOYS, in which he played mandolin, when Dylan was their support act at Gerde's Folk City in September 1961. There is a widely used, slightly blurry photograph by JOHN COHEN, taken at the Gaslight in 1962, that shows Rinzler, Dylan and Herald on stage together. Rinzler looks like a Depression-era Texas store-owner, while Dylan is doing his Huck Finn act and Herald looks like a Buster Keaton imitator in a 1920s minstrel show.

Dylan liked the Greenbriar Boys but he singles out Ralph Rinzler as having been the source of the song 'Roll on John', which he performs in early 1962 for radio station WBAI in New York. Within a performance of 11 songs, plus much talk in between them, most of which has Dylan mythologizing himself with good-humoured chutzpah, his respectful citing of Rinzler is unusually straightforward.

In 1961 Rinzler was, with JOHN COHEN and IZZY YOUNG, a founder of the Friends of Old Time Music, formed to bring traditional performers to New York audiences. Rinzler was also one of the directors of the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL Foundation, and hence one of the team selecting the artists for the festival—including the 1965 festival (for which, with ROBERT SHELTON, he co-edited the Festival Program book that featured Dylan's prose-poem 'Off the Top of My Head'), though as its Director of Field Research Programs he was mainly responsible for the traditional music side of things; he was funded by the Foundation to make field recording trips, and often brought back tapes he'd made of unknown performers to play to the rest of the selection board.

Rinzler was not, however, against electric music, and that same year appeared as a musician on JOAN BAEZ's album Farewell Angelina alongside BRUCE LANGHORNE and RUSS SAVAKUS, who each played on Dylan's pioneering electric albums that year too (Langhorne on Bringing It All Back Home and Savakus on Highway 61 Revisited).

Nor was his Washington Festival of Folk Life free from adverse criticism in the second half of the 1960s, but BERNICE REAGON JOHNSON pays him this tribute, while explaining that festival's raison d'être:

> 'He was a brilliant organizer. . . . The Smithsonian Festival of American Folklife, actually, was an effort to put something on the Mall in Washington so American tourists could walk through America, and in their minds everything on the mall would be American. No matter what it looked like, no matter what the language was, you would walk from this area to that area, to the other area . . . and everywhere you went, everybody was from America. . . . You could go back to your all-white neighborhood, and you would not be taking all of these different kind of people. But maybe, you would actually remember you had a good time. . . . Some white people are so anxiety-ridden when faced with the truth about this country as a home to many cultures and races and ethnic groups. They cling to a mythology of a white America. . . . Rinzler tried to combat that mentality . . .
>
> 'On the other hand, this festival was considered "artificial" by some people. The folklorists at that time (and we are talking about the late sixties), were saying: "festivals that you study should come up out of the culture." They didn't like academically-trained people creating "artificial" festivals.'

(Johnson and Rinzler both ended up as heads of department at the Smithsonian.)

Ralph Rinzler died in Washington, D.C., on July 2, 1994, aged 59. At the time of his death he was still working with MIKE SEEGER on the project to reissue the Harry Smith anthology. This came to fruition later. In his memory, the Smithsonian created the vast Ralph Rinzler Folklife Archives and Collections at the Center for Folklife and Cultural Heritage.

[Bob Dylan: 'Roll on, John', NY, prob. 13 Jan 1962, broadcast WBAI, NY, 11 Mar 1962. Bernice Reagon Johnson, interview in Radical History Review no.68, NY, date not given, seen online 25 Sep 2005 at http://chnm.gmu.edu/rhr/interview.htm.]

Ripley, Steve [1950 -] Paul Steven Ripley was born in Boise, Idaho, on January 1, 1950, but went to high school in Glencoe, Oklahoma. His group the Tractors' website claims him as an 'Oklahoma native', and that he grew up on the family farm before studio-engineering for LEON RUSSELL.

Also a singer, songwriter and self-proclaimed inventor as well as a guitarist, he has produced records for Freddy Fender, Johnny Lee Wills and Gatemouth Brown, and played with J.J. Cale. Though he often plays a 1954 Martin guitar himself, he has designed a range of custom-made instruments for other people—including Ry Cooder and John Hiatt.

Introduced to Dylan by drummer JIM KELTNER, a friend, he first played guitar with Dylan as a session musician for what became the Shot of Love album (starting in Santa Monica on March 11, 1981—at which Dylan performed early versions of 'Shot of Love' and 'You Changed My Life': versions that have not circulated). He plays on the recordings of 'Angelina' and 'You Changed My Life' issued on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991 (but probably not on that collection's 'Need a Woman'), on the circulated outtake of 'Caribbean Wind' from March 31 and the version issued on Biograph in 1985, on the circulated but unreleased tracks cut in April and May 1981 (plus more uncirculated tracks from these sessions), on the 'Let It Be Me' single recorded on May 1 and released only in Europe, on 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' and on some but not all of the issued album tracks.

He then joined Dylan's 1981 tour band, playing second guitar to FRED TACKETT (who'd been with Dylan's earlier gospel bands) from the year's first concert, in Chicago on June 10, right through to the last, on November 21 in Lakeland, Florida: and on October 16, in Milwaukee, he sang 'Gypsy Blood', backed by Dylan & the rest of the band.

Nine years later he reappeared, joining the band when G.E. SMITH was in the process of leaving it, and played four 1990 concerts: Oklahoma City on September 4, two nights later in Dallas, two nights later in San Antonio, Texas, and finally the concert on September 9 in Austin. (The first two of these four opened with instrumental performances of 'Old MacDonald Had a Farm' and the last two with instrumental versions of the 'Marine Hymn'.) The following year he was back again, augmenting the band at Dylan's Tulsa, Oklahoma, concert on October 30, 1991.

[www.thetractors.com; birthplace & birthdate from www.wikipedia.com.]

Rivera, Scarlet [19?? -] Bob Dylan picked Scarlet Rivera up on 13th Street, in New York City. He stopped his car to speak to her, because she was so striking. Manhattan is full of determined-looking, skinny-limbed young women striding along carrying violins or saxophones, but they don't usually have hair three foot long swinging down behind them. Dylan asked if she could play her fiddle, and she proved she could, auditioning on the spot and later that evening. She was working in a salsa band in the city, but she'd come from Chicago. Next day she was plunged into the early chaotic sessions for Desire. It was her first time in a studio.

Scarlet stayed the course, not only playing on Desire but on both the Rolling Thunder Revue tours, and adding, live and in the studio, tremendous texture to the sound. She was capable of duetting with Dylan's harmonica as few other players of any instrument have, so that these two thin, vibrant, scrapey sounds sparked spontaneous dancing lines off each other, mimicked each other, flirting in quick flashes, to a degree that is all too utterly absent from any Dylan on stage performance in the 21st century. By virtue of her mid-1970s sessions and touring with him, she also appears on tracks on the Biograph box set of 1985, the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 (1991) and the Bootleg Series Vol. 5: Bob Dylan Live 1975 (2002), on the Hard Rain album and the Renaldo & Clara film, not least when she's running down the ghastly brick-work hallways backstage somewhere, like a whippet in a little black dress, trying to find the stage, anxious that she's going to be late on.

Scarlet was also one of the smaller group with Dylan for the 'Tribute to JOHN HAMMOND' TV Special at WTTW's National Educational Television Studios in Chicago on September 10, 1975 (for transmission that December 13), at which, ROBERT SHELTON reports, 'Observers were fascinated with the violinist in a long dress, with dark gypsy eyes and flowing hair. Some believed her to be a real gypsy Dylan had discovered walking along Second Avenue with her violin case. Some Chicagoans recognized her as Donna Shea, who had been on their local rock scene in the late 1960s.'

RONNIE HAWKINS used to claim that Rivera 'ran off with Darlin' Doug [DAVID MANSFIELD].' He must have meant temporarily, in the course of the Rolling Thunder Revues; Mansfield stayed on with Dylan through the entire 1978 World Tour, and Rivera wasn't around then.

In 1978, following up her eponymously titled 1977 début solo album, she released a second, Scarlet Fever, on Warner Brothers. In due course she played on TRACY CHAPMAN's Crossroads, Keb Mo's The Door and Stanley Clarke's Just Family, among others. In 1993, by now married to the Sheffield-born British keyboards session player Tommy Eyre, whom she'd met at the Montreux Festival in 1988, they both played on the Melanie Harrold & Olly Blanchflower album Instinctive behaviour. Scarlet's own album Magical Christmas, produced by Eyre, came out in 1997, followed by the New Age music of Behind the Crimson Veil, 1998, credited to Eyre & Rivera, and played by the two of them plus percussionist BOBBYE HALL. The same year saw two more double-billed CDs, Celtic Myst, with Lesa MacEwan on vocals, and Celtic Dreams, with Richard Cook on uilean pipes. Two further Christmas albums followed. In November 1999 Scarlet Rivera was among the performers at the Baked Potato 1999 Angel Award ceremony for Miles Davis and Santana lead vocalist Alex Ligertwood.

Tommy Eyre, diagnosed with cancer, died on May 23, 2001. In 2002 the following was posted as part of an event in Malibu on August 30: 'go-vegan-for-the-environment all-star band—featuring—scarlet rivera [yes, the scarlet rivera playing violin on the bob dylan albums . . . touring . . . with the indigo girls, and the duke ellington orchestra . . . and headlining the 50th anniversary of the un in geneva].'

In 2006 Scarlet Rivera appeared as a 'special guest' on the Dylan tribute band Highway 61 Revisited's misleadingly titled CD Bob Dylan 1975–1981, Rolling Thunder and the Gospel Years—which contains neither Bob Dylan nor any of his songs.

[Scarlet Rivera: Scarlet Rivera, US, 1977; Scarlet Fever, Warner Bros BSK 3174, US, 1978; Magical Christmas, BCI, 1997. Scarlet Rivera & Tommy Eyre: Behind the Crimson Veil, BCI, 1998; Celtic Myst, BCI, 1998; Celtic Dreams, BCI, 1998. Highway 61 Revisited, Highway 61 Entertainment BD0503, US, 2006. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, p.449. Ronnie Hawkins quote from interview by this writer, St. Johns, Newfoundland, fall 1985, collected as '1976 & Other Times: Ronnie Hawkins, Rock'n'Roller' in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.]

Rix, Luther [1942 -] Luther Rix was born in Lansing, Michigan, on February 11, 1942, took Music Business Studies at Indiana University, a post-graduate degree at the Jordan Conservatory of Music (renamed the Jordan College of Fine Arts in 1978) at Butler University, Indiana, and then worked as a percussionist and timpanist first for the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra and then the Winter Consort in New York City. He broke into session-work as a drummer and composer, and has played with everyone from ELVIS COSTELLO to Manhattan Transfer and from Lonnie Mack to BETTE MIDLER.

Rix was the percussionist and conga player on the first Rolling Thunder Revue, in 1975. SAM SHEPARD noted in his Rolling Thunder Logbook that Rix meditated before every set, and seemed very much a 'jazz soul'. He was unavailable for the 1976 Rolling Thunder Revue because of a prior booking to play with LEONARD COHEN in Europe.

[Source re prior engagement: Gary Burke, e-mail to this writer, 12 Jan 2006.]

Robbins, Hargus 'Pig' [1938 -] Hargus Melvin Robbins was born on January 18, 1938 at Spring City, Tennessee, in a house without electricity. At age two or three, he stabbed himself in the eye with a pocket knife and despite specialist treatment in Chattanooga, not only was that eye removed but he became blind in the other by the age of four. He has said that he remembers only the colour green, the colour of his parents' car. He took piano lessons at the Tennessee School for the Blind in Nashville from the age of seven, abandoning his lessons at 15 to play clubs instead, breaking into recording in 1959 with country star George Jones and in time becoming one of that city's top session players. He's made a number of albums under his own name too, starting with A Bit of Country Piano in 1963. His list of credits is absurdly long and really does cover everyone, including JOAN BAEZ (Any Day Now, 1968), Country Joe MacDonald (Thinking of WOODY GUTHRIE, 1969) and THE EVERLY BROTHERS (Pass the Chicken, 1973), and in the mid-1980s he toured with NEIL YOUNG—but his career really kicked off when Bob Dylan descended on Nashville in 1966.

Robbins is the pianist on the Nashville sessions for Blonde on Blonde, recorded that February and March. AL KOOPER writes in the booklet inside the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack (2005) that Dylan had to speak to him through an intermediary—Kooper, generally—saying: 'You do it. I can't call that guy "pig".'

[Main source: 'Century of Country: the Definitive Country Music Encyclopedia', seen online 4 Jun 2005 at www.countryworks.com/artist_full.asp?KEY=ROBBINS.]

Robertson, Robbie [1943 -] Jaime Robert Robertson was born on July 5, 1943 in Toronto, but since his mother was a Mohawk Indian, he also spent time south of the city at the Six Nations Reservation, where she had grown up. He learnt guitar as a child, attracted first to country music. He quit school to try for a career in music, and is supposed to have joined RONNIE HAWKINS & THE HAWKS in 1958, aged only 15.

Soon he was the prolific writer of the group, and remained so as LEVON & the Hawks, freed from Hawkins' narrow track, made their own records and kept working. The main story of how this talented but undistinguished unit turned into THE BAND is told in the main entry on the group. But Robertson's was a special rôle: his was the ambition, the facility on guitar, the heart-throb good looks, the manipulative capacity, the songwriter's gift. At first these were all placed in the service of a band that was the exemplar of the co-operative unit, and the results were spectacular.

They were also spectacular when Robertson's talents as a guitarist, and as a sort of vice-captain, were put to work for Bob Dylan, whom he and the rest of the Hawks met in 1965. A few weeks after Dylan had 'gone electric' at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, Robertson was on stage with him (along with AL KOOPER, Harvey Brooks (aka HARVEY GOLDSTEIN) and Levon Helm) for the first of the half-acoustic-solo, half-electric concerts Dylan undertook, at Forest Hills on August 28. It's uncertain how many such concerts took place in this initial period, but it's known that after rehearsals with them in Woodstock, NY, in September, Dylan's group became all five of the Hawks from September 24, in Austin, Texas, till November 28 in Washington, D.C. After that night, Levon Helm quit: quit Dylan and the group, and went back home to Arkansas. He was replaced by BOBBY GREGG at the next gig, which was right across the other side of the country in Seattle, Washington, at the beginning of December.

By this time, Robertson and the others had also been in the studio with Dylan, beginning with a session in New York City on October 5th. This session produced nothing that was released at the time, but retrospectively they have yielded 'I Wanna Be Your Lover' and the tiny 'Jet Pilot' on Biograph (1985) and 'Medicine Sunday', issued on the still relatively obscure Highway 61 Interactive CD-Rom (1995). They returned to the studios (minus Helm) on November 30 and cut the single 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' (and, almost 40 years later, the version of 'Visions of Johanna' released on Bootleg Series Vol. 7: No Direction Home).

Robertson had already gained a relationship to Dylan that none of the other Hawks enjoyed (and that not all would have wanted). He had become the right-hand man, assuming the rôle BOBBY NEUWIRTH had filled on Dylan's tour of Britain earlier that year (captured in D.A. PENNEBAKER's film Don't Look Back). So it is that it is Robbie standing with Dylan, Michael McClure and ALLEN GINSBERG in Larry Keenan's telling shot taken in the alley behind City Lights Books in San Francisco when Dylan is there for his press-conference that December 3.

So it is too that in January 1966 Robertson is back in the studio with Dylan even when the other Hawks aren't. DANKO, MANUEL and HUDSON are there too on January 21–22, recording the great 'She's Your Lover Now' (issued on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, 1991); but on January 25–26, when the Blonde on Blonde track 'Sooner or Later (One of Us Must Know)' is recorded, along with the early outtake of 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' that surfaces on Bootleg Series Vol. 7 in 2005, the Hawks present are down to Robertson and Danko, and it's the same on January 27–28.

Robertson has not been included in the names listed for the next Blonde on Blonde sessions (February 12–17), but Al Kooper, who was there, says he was present and so does CLINTON HEYLIN (who wasn't there but always has firm opinions). Thus the lead guitarist on the album version of 'Visions of Johanna' is Robbie Robertson, as he is on 'Obviously 5 Believers'; and despite what it said on the original album, the lead guitarist on 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat'—meaning the one who takes the guitar solo—is Robertson again. Dylan plays only the opening notes at the start of the track (Band guest book, June 16, 2000).

Then comes Dylan's 1966 tour, and while all the Hawks except Levon Helm are on stage, the rest of the time, as we see in the elusive movie covering the European leg of this tour, Eat the Document, it's Robbie Robertson who is the crony at Dylan's side as they walk around the world throwing their weight about. And in March, when Dylan is in Nashville, Tennessee, for further Blonde on Blonde sessions, Robertson is, like Al Kooper but unlike any of the rest of the Hawks, in there amongst the Nashville session musicians, contributing to the laying down of 'Absolutely Sweet Marie' on the 7th, 'Pledging My Time' and 'Just Like a Woman' on the 8th, and six further tracks on the 9th-to-10th: 'Most Likely You Go Your Way (And I'll Go Mine)', 'Temporary Like Achilles', 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' and 'I Want You'. According to Kooper, Dylan had insisted that if he were to go down to Nashville to record (which was producer BOB JOHNSTON's idea), Robertson and Kooper had to come too.

A couple of days later, running into the early hours of March 13, ROBERT SHELTON tape-records Dylan and Robertson in a Denver hotel room, going through songs together and working out guitar arrangements; and though one of the songs, 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands', had already been recorded for Blonde on Blonde in the middle of the previous month (without Robertson), here Dylan seems to be teaching Robertson the song.

On stage, through the wild last months of this most out-on-the-edge, unprecedented tour, the Helmless Hawks plus drummer MICKEY JONES makes for a magnificent cohesive unit, yet there's no doubting that Robbie Robertson's lead electric guitar lines set a blazing high standard, catching and matching all Dylan's demands.

In the contrasting backwoods calm of Woodstock in 1967, when, with and without Dylan, the Basement Tapes were being laid down, Robertson was both solidifying his guitar-work (often bringing much to a track without trying to attract any particular attention) and maturing as a songwriter at the same time as the group was turning inexorably into The Band. Songs composed by Robertson and tried out at this time included 'Caledonia Mission' and 'Ferdinand the Imposter'—but there were also joint compositions with Richard Manuel, 'Ruben Remus' and 'Katie's Been Gone', and back then it looked as if the group's great strength as a co-operative unit was going to include its songwriting too. At the time of the first sessions for The Band's début album, Music from Big Pink, it still looked as if Robertson's greater facility for turning out songs might have been something cyclical, something that came and went, and that maybe in a few months' time, Manuel or even Danko and Helm might be just as strongly onstream as writers. It also seemed, perhaps, as though if Robertson's writing was a particular strength of his, singing was a corresponding weakness, so that things still seemed well-balanced all round between the five members of this ultra-talented group.

And all-round balance did indeed characterise the first two—the great—Band albums. The songs on Big Pink included a Dylan song, a Dylan-Manuel song, a Dylan-Danko song, an outsider song (the wonderful 'Long Black Veil'), three songs by Manuel alone and four by Robertson: 'To Kingdom Come', 'Caledonia Mission', 'The Weight' and 'Chest Fever'. For the second album, The Band, Robertson as writer was more omni-present—seven songs were composed by him alone, and they included the superb 'The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down'—but the co-operative spirit still seemed intact: he had also co-written several songs with Richard Manuel and one with Levon Helm, while as a musician his contribution seemed counterbalancingly modest; he was the only one to stick to a single instrument, and his voice wasn't on the album at all.

Yet something was happening here: as The Band became a mega-successful group, Robbie Robertson's ambition was setting him apart; his business sense did the same, and the more he came to dominate the group, especially in becoming its prime, virtually its sole, songwriter, the less democratic the ethos became—and the more his royalties exceeded those of the other musicians. Levon Helm's book This Wheel's on Fire, 1993, expresses vast amounts of pain and unforgiving anger on this whole subject: a subject that is inextricably linked with the demise of the group's ability to keep on making crucial albums. From the third album, in 1970, it's downhill. Stage Fright disappoints everyone; and from Stage Fright onwards, more or less every song recorded by The Band is a J.R. Robertson composition.

Despite the ego and ambition, Robertson remains willing to return to a back-up rôle when Dylan calls. Thus the Hawks are there at the WOODY GUTHRIE Memorial Concert in January 1968, and they're there at the Isle of Wight Festival in August 1969 (two weeks after starring in their own right at Woodstock). More significantly, they go back into the studios with Dylan in November 1973 to give him the music, the sound, on his underrated album Planet Waves, a bright strength of which is Robbie Robertson's never-faltering, intelligent, beguiling guitar-work, a unique noise yet still retaining his gutsy homage to the 1950s work of Hubert Sumlin behind HOWLIN' WOLF. And to listen to the shimmering, edgy, perfectly attuned duet between Dylan's piano and Robertson's guitar, out there alone on an aural high-wire on 'Dirge' is to hear what long-term musical togetherness can yield between two engaged musicians.

After the album, the tour: the huge Dylan & The Band comeback tour of 1974 through North America, and the double-LP that came from it, Before the Flood. Then in 1975 we get the release of the official double-LP version of The Basement Tapes, an unhappy mixing up of tracks with and without Dylan that reveals (though only later) an almost compulsive, and a slightly shocking, lack of respect on Robbie Robertson's part for the truth about how things had been. For it is Robertson who makes the track selection, apparently, and Robertson who insinuates onto the album tracks by the group that are not from the Basement Tapes sessions at all! One of these, 'Bessie Smith', is in the end admitted to be an outtake from the fourth Band album, Cahoots!

As Band expert Peter Viney comments: 'Robbie Robertson is notoriously untruthful about dates and times. . . . The remaster of Cahoots finally admits that "Bessie Smith" was a 1971 outtake . . . and we now know that much of Live at Watkins Glen, remastered by Robertson and released in 1994, isn't from Watkins Glen at all.'

At year's end, on the last date of the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue, at Madison Square Garden, NYC, Robbie Robertson joins Dylan to play guitar on the fifth number of his set, 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry'. Three months later, in Dylan's studio in Malibu, Bob and Robbie find themselves re-united by ERIC CLAPTON, on the track 'Sign Language', later released on Clapton's album No Reason to Cry. Recorded in March 1976, Robertson plays guitar while Clapton and Dylan share vocals.

After that, it's back to The Band on its own again, and it's Robertson who calls a halt. He gets together with MARTIN SCORSESE and orchestrates The Band's last concert as a drama on a grand scale; Winterland, San Francisco, November 25, 1976 becomes an always-extant great rock movie, 1978's The Last Waltz. Again, it's Robertson separated from the rest: Robertson the Scorsese crony, Robertson the producer of the 3-LP set, Robertson the composer of all the extra material in the so-called 'Last Waltz Suite' and Robertson the sole composer of every featured Band song but one. More, Robertson was also, alone amongst the members of The Band, co-producer of the movie. Levon complains that after playing to the cameras instead of the audience all through the live event, Robbie then 'placed himself and director Martin Scorsese, and all their flunkies and yes men, on huge salaries. And so began their year and a half love story of buying houses and apartments on both coasts, taping up all the windows with aluminum foil (like ELVIS did) and spending all night and all day "cutting" the movie.'

When The Last Waltz was reissued digitally, years later on DVD, Robertson had re-mastered the music, made all the choices about what extras went in and what didn't, added a scene-by-scene commentary by himself and Scorsese, and written the eight-page accompanying booklet.

After the demise of The Band, and the release of The Last Waltz in 1978, Robbie Robertson appears to have concentrated on film rather than music. Perhaps, as Colonel Parker seemed to feel about Elvis Presley, movies were a safer bet than rock'n' roll. Instead of producing the solo album most people expected, he developed his affiliation with Scorsese and tried to become a film star. In 1980 he composed the music for Scorsese's great film Raging Bull, and both produced and took a lead rôle in the rather less great Carny, directed by Robert Kaylor (making his first film since a documentary nine years earlier) and co-starring Jodie Foster and Gary Busey. The posters for the movie show Robertson exuding every possible morsel of his rather self-aware good looks, glamorous hat on head and cigarette in side of mouth, shirt unbuttoned half-way to navel, insouciant slouch, insolent stare to camera, Foster's arm round his shoulder—all under the strap-line 'When you're young and going nowhere, the Carny looks like a good way out.' Robertson was 37 years old at the time. That sounds like his line, though. It has the same sententious self-pity and special pleading, the same style of bullshit, as his famous Last Waltz line, offered on camera to Scorsese to explain the termination of The Band, 'The road. . . . It's a goddam impossible way of life.'

It wasn't only Levon or the other Hawks who demurred at this. Stephen Thomas Erlewine, appraising The Last Waltz on the All Music Guide website, tackles Robertson head on:

> 'Perhaps Robbie Robertson's greatest gift is how he can spin a myth, making the mundane into majestic fables. Outside of his songs, his greatest achievement in myth-making was The Last Waltz . . . the people who sound the best here—Dylan, Van Morrison, Dr. John, Levon Helm himself—are the ones who didn't treat the road as a goddam impossible way of life, but as what a working musician does. The Last Waltz teeters between these two schools of thought, wanting to celebrate the end while blithely ignoring that musicians make music for a living . . .'

But Robertson was making a living from his corpus of songs, and from Hollywood. He was music producer on The King of Comedy (1983) and was involved with The Color of Money (1986). He was 'creative consultant' on 1987's lovely Chuck Berry: Hail! Hail! Rock 'n' Roll!, music consultant on Casino (1995), executive soundtrack producer on Phenomenon (1996) and Gangs of New York (2002) and executive producer of Jenifa (2004), acted in The Crossing Guard (1995), acted as 'host' for the video The Allman Brothers Band: Live at Great Woods (1992) and as narrator on Dakota Exile (1996) and Wolves (1999). And so on.

Not until 1987 did he release his first, and eponymously titled, solo album. Using DANIEL LANOIS as producer, bringing in guests like U2, Peter Gabriel and jazzman Gil Evans—but also Danko and Hudson—this was so far removed from the sound of The Band as to seem like a brutal rejection of the past. Some people found that its sound painting and ghostliness, interwoven with Robertson's small voice and experimental drum programmes, amounted to an impressively ultra-modern success; others found in it only self-conscious artifice and a tiresome excess of dweedling.

The concept album Storyville followed, to much the same responses, three years later. In 1994 Robertson composed a song collection for a TV documentary series titled (patronisingly, you might think) Music for the Native Americans, on which he performed with Native American group the Red Road Ensemble. It was a kind of homecoming for the son of the Mohawk. He followed it up in 1998 with Contact from the Underworld of Redboy, and in 2002 a compilation album of solo tracks, remastered and in some cases remixed.

In 2004 he wrote and recorded music for the movie Ladder 49 and appeared in an advert for the clothing company GAP, sitting with a woolly jumper on and a guitar across his knee, looking like a creepy Perry Como or Val Doonican. In June 2005 he accepted an Honorary Law degree from York University, Toronto, two years after receiving one from Queen's University in nearby London, Ontario. And in 2005 he saw the release of another of his rewritings of history, a 5-CD plus one DVD set titled The Band: A Musical History, in which he re-mastered his own choices of material from Ronnie Hawkins & the Hawks' 1963 single 'Who Do You Love' through to the combined Band and STAPLE SINGERS performing Robertson's 'The Weight' in a studio in 1977 for inclusion in the Last Waltz movie—the notes to which fudge over the date and place of recording for quite a number of those items once claimed as coming from the Basement Tapes sessions. The re-masters include various tracks with Dylan: the 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' single from 1965, 'Tell Me Mama' and 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' live from Liverpool May 1966, 'Odds and Ends' from the Basement Tapes 1967, 'I Ain't Got No Home' from the Guthrie Memorial Concert in 1968, 'Forever Young' from Planet Waves recorded in 1973, and 'Rainy Day Women #12 & 35' and 'Highway 61 Revisited' from the 1974 come-back tour.

How he feels about these collaborations of the past is hard to say. But in 1992 he had been conspicuous by his absence from the so-called Bob Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration in New York City. Thirteen years later, in his good friend Martin Scorsese's film about Dylan, No Direction Home, Robbie Robertson is conspicuously absent again. And in Chronicles Volume One, he is almost the only musician adversely criticised. Dylan effectively repudiates all that Bob & Robbie cronyism of the mid-60s years:

> 'Once in the midsummer madness I was riding in a car with Robbie Robertson . . . I felt like I might as well have been living in another part of the solar system. He says to me, "Where do you think you're gonna take it?"

'I said, "Take what?"

'"You know, the whole music scene." The whole music scene! The car window was rolled down about an inch. I rolled it down the rest of the way, felt a gust of wind blow into my face and waited for what he said to die away . . .'

[Robbie Robertson & Bob Dylan: 'Positively Van Gogh (?)', 'Don't Tell Him (?)', If You Want My Love (?)', 'Just Like a Woman' & 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands', privately recorded Denver, CO, 12–13 Mar 1966, unreleased but circulating; 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', NY, 8 Dec 1975. Eric Clapton, Robbie Robertson & Bob Dylan: 'Sign Language', Malibu, Mar 1976, issued Eric Clapton, No Reason to Cry, Polydor RSO RS1-3004, 1976. The Band: concert at Winterland, San Francisco, CA, 25 Nov 1976, filmed as The Last Waltz, dir. Martin Scorsese, US, 1978; The Last Waltz—Special Edition DVD, MGM Home Video 1003426, US, 7 May 2002 (17332DVD, UK, Oct 2002); soundtrack first issued as The Last Waltz, Warner 3 WS 3146, 7 Apr 1978; 4-CD box set version The Last Waltz, Warner Bros/Rhino R2 78278, US, Apr 2002. Carny, dir. Robert Kaylor, Lorimar, US, 1980. Robbie Robertson: Robbie Robertson, Geffen WX-133, NY, 1987; Storyville, New Orleans, nia, Geffen GEC 24303, NY, 1991; Music for the Native Americans, Cema/Capitol 28295, NY, 1994; Contact from the Underworld of Red Boy, Cema/Capitol 54243, NY, 1998; Classic Masters, EMI/ Capitol 39858, NY, 2002.

Peter Viney: e-mails to present writer 8 Aug & 28 Oct 2005. Levon Helm, This Wheel's on Fire: Levon Helm and the Story of The Band (written with Stephen Davis), New York: Wm Morrow, 1993 & Chicago: A Capella Books, 2000. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.117. Stephen Thomas Erlewine, All Music Guide, seen online 19 Sep 2005 at http://theband.hiof.no/albums/last_waltz.html. Al Kooper testimony re Feb 1966 sessions, e-mail to Peter Stone Brown, reported to the online Band Guestbook 16 Jun 2000.]

Robinson, Edwin Arlington [1869 - 1935] Robinson's is not a name bandied about much these days, but, like POE and WHITMAN, he was a self-taught poet (and a Pulitzer prize-winning one at that) and might be considered a small influence on Dylan's work. The bulk of his own was achieved between 1910 and 1935, after an earlier career on the New York subways.

His poems forge the way, either directly or via his influence on modern ballads, for something in Dylan's early songwriting. Short, sharp, quirky poems like 'Richard Cory', 'Reuben Bright' and 'Charles Carville's Eyes' contain those little detonations of observation that Dylan echoes in the better flashes of his hobo-hero, old-friend-hero songs. This is from 'Richard Cory': 'And he was always quietly arrayed / And he was always human when he talked; / But still he fluttered pulses when he said / "Good morning", and he glittered when he walked.'

(Hopelessly corrupted but recognisable by its title and crude narrative parallels, the poem re-emerges as a PAUL SIMON song on The Sounds of Silence. The album sleeve offers 'apologies to E.A. Robinson' . . . rather than royalties. The poet died only in 1935; under European law, his copyright would have been protected until 75 years after his death; lucky for Paul Simon that US law required active renewals every 28 years to keep copyrights protected. He could therefore not only misrepresent and ruin the poem but steal the proceeds too—including those from its recording by VAN MORRISON'S early group Them.)

The echo of Robinson in Dylan is perhaps not a point to insist upon. It is more in the nature of a hunch, a suggestion of a link there somehow, and offering it is simply to go along with F.R. Leavis' definition of the critic's task—that of saying/asking: 'This is so, is it not?'

['Richard Cory', 'Reuben Bright' and 'Charles Carville's Eyes' are in Robinson: The Torrent and the Night Before, 1896, re-published as The Children of the Night, 1897. Robinson's Collected Poems, 1921, 1929 & 1937. Simon & Garfunkel: 'Richard Cory', nd., 1965; The Sounds of Silence, Columbia CS 9269, New York (CBS SBPG 62690, London), 1966. Them: 'Richard Cory', nd., Apr 1966; The World of Them, Decca (S)PA 86, London, 1970. F.R. Leavis' assertion that 'A judgment . . . aspires to be more than personal. Essentially it has the form: "This is so, is it not?" . . . a collaborative exchange.' is in the essay 'Mr. Pryce-Jones, the British Council and British Culture', 1951, Scrutiny vol. XVIII, Cambridge, UK, 1951–52; collected in A Selection from Scrutiny vol. 1, 1968.]

Robinson, Smokey [1940 -] William Robinson Jr. was born on February 19, 1940 in the Brewster ghetto of Detroit, where he grew up. Inspired to turn to music by his mother's record collection, he became one of the greatest commercial soul singer-songwriters, a great promoter of other people's talent and almost as crucial to the phenomenal rise of Motown Records as its founder, Berry Gordy. From 1961 to 1988 he was company vice-president, but far more importantly, he was the writer of a huge number of its hit songs, including 70 top 40 hits for Motown between 1959 and 1990 as a recording artist, some solo but more as the lead singer of the label's most magical group, the Miracles. This witty, light-footed, blazingly optimistic outfit, with an unmistakeable sound that appealed across all boundaries of race and class (and across many of nationality), released a torrent of hit singles, including the great 'Shop Around', 'What's So Good About Goodbye?', 'You've Really Got a Hold on Me', 'The Tracks of My Tears', 'Going to a Go Go', 'I Second That Emotion' and 'The Tears of a Clown'. Robinson's hit compositions for others included the Mary Wells classic 'My Guy', Marvin Gaye's 'Ain't That Peculiar' and 'I'll Be Doggone' and the Contours' 'First I Look at the Purse'. At their best, and many were at that level, his fusion of words and melody made it sound as if the two sprung unbounded and without effort from one clear fountain of adept and sassy inspiration. At the end of 1965, just when such music, and indeed the whole notion of the hit single, was starting to be scoffed at and held in contempt by a burgeoning hip snobbery, Bob Dylan was asked at his San Francisco press conference whom he considered his favourite poets and answered, among others: 'Smokey Robinson'.

This answer was not especially noted at the time—but by 1967 it was being said in an interview in which Dylan had been asked to name the greatest living poet, and had answered 'Smokey Robinson'. This reply, with no source given, was widely quoted, very often as an example of Dylan's wit. But search back now for the quote and you won't find it: you will only find the much less specific, much less definite 1965 press conference mention of Robinson in a list of other people.

You won't find the 'greatest living poet' reply because in fact Dylan never said it: Al Abrams, a PR man for Tamla Motown, made it up, as he revealed in an interview in 2005, discussing his first moves after setting up Al Abrams Associates in April 1967:

> 'I wrote the bios. . . . Along the way, I created some legends that I made up on the spur of the moment. Smokey Robinson—the Bob Dylan quote about him being America's greatest living poet—I made that up. Now, it's been around so much that if you asked Dylan, he'd probably say he said it.'

It's true that in the very funny interview with JANN WENNER published in Rolling Stone on November 29, 1969, when Wenner says, 'What about the poets? You once said something about Smokey Robinson . . .' Dylan responds with 'I didn't mean Smokey Robinson, I meant ARTHUR RIMBAUD.' But he wasn't really retracting; he was simply teasing Jann Wenner. It was easily done.

Robinson and Dylan came together decades later for the recording of the 'We Are the World' single in Hollywood on January 28–29, 1985. How much better that song might have been if Bob and Smokey had written it between them.

[Dylan press conference, KQED-TV studios, San Francisco, 3 Dec 1965. Al Abrams, phone interview 22 Jul 2005 for 'Living Music', seen online 21 Feb 2006 at http://sitemaker.umich.edu/lmadmin/browse_subjects&mode=single&recordID=595398, website of the University of Michigan School of Music's American Music Institute.]

rock'n'roll Rock'n'roll happened as a strange, appealing mixture of 'race' and country music. Mix FATS DOMINO with HANK WILLIAMS and you get the beginning of rock'n'roll. (This very combination eventually occurs. 'Jambalaya' uses Creole patois but was written by Hank Williams; Fats Domino's version is a classic.) But rock took off en masse for whites because of ELVIS PRESLEY. Without Presley, Bill Haley would have been a nine-day blunder, like the Twist; without Haley, Elvis would still have been a massive original talent. It simply wasn't Haley in 1955 that mattered, it was Presley in 1956, as even the Billboard charts bear out. (Billboard was the Cincinnati-based weekly trade-paper, rivalled by New York's Cashbox.) Haley's 'Rock Around the Clock' topped the US Hot 100 in 1955 only to be followed for the rest of that year by the appalling Mitch Miller, the Four Aces, the saccharine piano of Roger Williams and the saccharine gravel of Tennessee Ernie Ford. 1956 began just as comfortably, with Dean Martin. Then—the false craze exposed—Kay Starr climbed up there with her peekaboo 'Rock and Roll Waltz', just as FRANK SINATRA and Ella Fitzgerald were to yawn in on the Twist craze in 1962, crooning in its coffin nails. After Kay Starr, it was back to dinner-suits with the Nelson Riddle Orchestra and Les Baxter. And that would have been that, but for 'Heartbreak Hotel', Presley's first nation-wide no.1 hit record. It owed as much to Bill Haley as Dylan owes to RINGO STARR, and on its own it transformed the US charts and more besides. (The no.1s that succeeded it that year were Gogi Grant's 'The Wayward Wind' and then 'Hound Dog' and 'Don't Be Cruel', both by Presley, the Platters' 'My Prayer' and back to Elvis for 'Love Me Tender'.) The give me-the-moonlight regime was vanquished. Presley became the prototype: rock'n'roll was made in his image.

One of the changes—and it was part of the sudden flow of black modes of speech and song into the white mainstream—was that before rock'n'roll you had to enunciate. Every word had to be heard (even though the words so carefully delivered weren't generally worth any attention). With rock'n'roll the meaning of words, as a general rule, mattered less than their sounds, and the voice became an instrument. The grown-ups who laughed at Presley's 'mumbling' didn't understand. It was actually exciting to have part of the record where you didn't know what you were singing when you sang along with it. (On Bill Haley's records, you can hear every word, from 'one o'clock' right through to 'twelve o'clock rock'. Perhaps this is partly to be blamed on his being half English. Maude, his mother, was a music teacher from Ulverston, Lancashire, and emigrated to the US as a child.)

The best of the American stars had music that grew out of their own local roots. They picked up genuine skills and techniques unself-consciously. So Presley was not a suffocating influence—he got a lot of people started on things that weren't just copies. Duane Eddy said that 'none of us would have got anywhere without Elvis', and Duane Eddy didn't sound at all like Elvis Presley.

People were independent-minded, partly because they had vital popular music to draw on, and partly because music in America was never handled through a monopolistic institution. (In Britain, everything was obstructed, diluted, mishandled and misdispensed by BBC Radio, which had no idea what rock'n'roll or pop music was, didn't know how long it would last, didn't like or approve of it and so hardly bothered to adapt to its demands. Radio Luxembourg, the only alternative life-line, was little better. Reception was terrible, it was evenings only, and the DJs were mostly old men.)

American radio, in contrast, was infinitely variegated. In any one town, a single DJ with gumption and enthusiasm could tap undiscovered markets, shape tastes—could play what s/he liked!—free from the dictates of play-lists. Dewey Phillips in Memphis in the 1950s was one example out of many. It took a couple of decades before US radio completely ossified, becoming over-formularized through sheer greed. (The future loomed early, though: the first fixed play-list based on the national pop charts was introduced on Todd Storz's chain of Midwest stations in 1955.) Which goes to show that 'free enterprise' can stifle anything as fully as a nationalized industry if it tries.

Variety was also inbuilt in the US because of the record company situation. There were myriad small companies attuned to local communities and able to breathe because of local radio. By 1961, there were over 6,000 independent labels in America. Today, uniformity has crept across America too but in the 50s and early 60s, American rock'n'roll and pop was boundlessly healthy.

One of many good things offered by Peter Guralnick's Last Train to Memphis: The Rise of Elvis Presley, 1994, is his re-creation of the way that, when Elvis went into the studio to make not only that first record but the ones that followed, no-one knew what a record should be like. No formulae, no rules, no norms existed. That anything might be possible and no-one could know what: this was the essence of the moment, the fundamental artistic condition—one that is today virtually inconceivable, let alone attainable. Elvis, the musicians, producer Sam Phillips: they didn't say 'let's make a rockabilly record', or 'let's aim for a crossover'. The categories were unformed. All they knew was that they were reaching for a new, exciting noise to express the volatile moment.

Presley's very success created categories, including rockabilly, a genre that has enjoyed cult status ever since the early 1960s. GREIL MARCUS' Mystery Train, 1975, is good on its essential mediocrity: '. . . most rockabilly singers weren't even imitating blacks, they were imitating "All Shook Up". Collectors call the likes of Alvis Wayne and Johnny Burnette geniuses, but their aggressive stance is never convincing and the flash is always forced.' The only snag with this existentially accurate analysis is that most 'authentic' rockabilly was recorded before the release of Presley's 'All Shook Up' (in March 1957). Any connoisseur will tell you that if it's after 1957, it's suspect.

Bob Dylan's interest in rockabilly was as unadvertised as his love of early Presley. His mid-60s electric rock music paid clear tribute, for example, to the work of CHUCK BERRY, yet we lived out the second half of the 1960s in a counter-cultural climate in which all of rock'n'roll, the simplicities and crude brevity of its 'singles' and the naively consumerist, pre-druggy world it represented, seemed to have been outgrown. Rock'n'roll was regarded as so laughably 'unprogressive' and irrelevant that it was felt that Dylan's writing 'Ambition: To join LITTLE RICHARD' in his Hibbing High School yearbook (1959) had been youthful misjudgement, pre-dating a damascene conversion to the integrity of folk music and then to the values of the new counter-culture.

The complexity of Dylan's own work, of course, had begun our journey into these delusions. He radically expanded the possibilities of song; that didn't make him responsible for the hip snobbery of the Progressive Rock era. Nonetheless Dylan himself deliberately made no further public acknowledgement of the pioneers of rock'n'roll or of the two and a half-minute single until in 1969, in a Rolling Stone interview, he mentioned Presley's having recorded his own 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time' and then put versions of THE EVERLY BROTHERS' 'Let It Be Me' and 'Take a Message to Mary' on Self Portrait (1970): something very badly received by a hip public. (It emerged later that even at the very height of Dylan's artistic genius and hipness, the tour of 1966, he could still—off-stage—bear in mind the Everly Brothers of the much sneered-at 1960–62 period: the film Eat the Document shows him performing their 1960 hit 'When Will I Be Loved?' in his Glasgow hotel-room, May 18–19, 1966. Eat the Document was first screened only in 1971—and only twice then—and remains, another 35 years later, rarely seen.)

These debts to rock'n'roll and the pop it ushered in should perhaps have been admitted readily by everyone: they were surely undeniable. No-one was owning up to any of it back then. No-one talked about Elvis as a great artist except Greil Marcus in Mystery Train. The furtiveness about liking Elvis that was felt necessary among the hip was eventually confirmed by Dylan himself. He told ROBERT SHELTON (No Direction Home, 1986): 'The thing SUZE [ROTOLO] could tell you . . . [is] that I played, back in 1961 and 1962, when nobody was around, all those old Elvis Presley records.'

(There was an oldies-revivalism in the mid-1970s but it was mere kitsch, like Sha Na Na, or merely naff, like Britain's Showaddywaddy, or it was unconvincing attempts to revisit Chuck Berry, as with the Electric Light Orchestra's 1973 top 10 hit with 'Roll Over Beethoven' and Presley's 1975 top 10 hit with 'The Promised Land'.)

At any rate, this period was not the first era to assume that rock'n'roll had died. Its initial flowering had been brief (though it didn't seem so if you were young at the time). Its first year of international impact was 1956—when Dylan was 15: the perfect age to feel transformed by music—and 'the day the music died', with the death of BUDDY HOLLY, was in 1959. Indeed along with the pressure on radio stations from advertisers trying to squeeze out this anti-social oeuvre, a series of personal disasters befell the greats of rock'n'roll, and by the time Dylan came out of school and discovered the small bohemian world of Dinkytown and the Twin Cities of Minneapolis-St. Paul, Little Richard was no longer there to be joined, and the pop mainstream was (unfairly: see pop 1960–62: not all hopeless) felt to have returned to dull, safe platitudes placed in the teen-clean mouths of the boy and girl next door by music-industry men with cigars in their own mouths. Rock'n'roll was dead. Bob Dylan went into Folk.

[Fats Domino: 'Jambalaya (On the Bayou)', Philadelphia, PA, 6 Nov 1961; Imperial 5796, LA (in the UK London American 9520), 1961. Re Bill Haley: in 1953 'Crazy, Man, Crazy' by Bill Haley and His Comets became the first rock'n'roll song to make the best-selling lists. 'Shake, Rattle and Roll' was top 10 for 12 weeks from Sep 1954; 'Rock Around the Clock' was top 10 for 19 weeks, including 8 at no.1, from May 1955. Elvis Presley: 'All Shook Up', Hollywood, 12 Jan 1957; RCA 20-6870 (78rpm) and 47-6870 (45rpm), New York, March 1957. Everly Brothers: 'Let It Be Me', Nashville, TN, 15 Dec 1959, Cadence 1376, NY (London American HLA 9039, London), 1960; 'Take a Message to Mary', Nashville, 2 Mar 1959, Cadence 1364 (London American HLA 8863), 1959; both LP-issued The Fabulous Style of the Everly Brothers, Cadence CLP 3040, NY, 1960; 'When Will I Be Loved?', Nashville, 18 Feb 1960, Cadence 1380 (London American HLA 9157), 1960.]

Rodgers, Jimmie [1897 - 1933] Jimmie Rodgers was born in Meridian, Mississippi, on September 8, 1897, disproving General Sherman's post-march announcement of the 1860s that 'Meridian no longer exists!' Rodgers, looking in his publicity pictures like a cross between Bing Crosby and Stan Laurel, was 'the father of country music' yet he was mesmerised by the blues, a genre to which he contributed, and with which he became familiar from working alongside black railroad labourers. Hence his other appellation, 'the Singing Brakeman'.

(The railroad line, and even the train, still runs through Meridian, which is built on a rise. The track crosses a wide street that climbs to tall, elderly buildings, some of which must have gone up during Jimmie's childhood.)

Rodgers, the inventor of the Blue Yodel, had a short life and a brief career. He had already contracted tuberculosis and had to give up his day-job by the time he was discovered and first recorded by Ralph Peer in 1927, and his last session was 36 hours before his death, which was in New York on May 26, 1933. In the five and a half years in which he recorded he cut 110 sides. You can get them all on a 6-CD set.

At least he enjoyed stardom while he lived, as well as posthumously. Recognised in his own lifetime as having initiated an important idiom, it has proved enduring since. His records were astoundingly popular, selling in huge numbers, and he became the first rural artist to match the commercial success of northern popular singers.

His fame in segregated Mississippi sometimes had surprising results. At the huge and swanky King Edward Hotel in downtown Jackson, Rodgers, hearing marvellous Tommy Johnson and Ishman Bracey on the street, brought them up to the hotel roof to perform for his own audience. This black ragamuffin act, plucked off the street, bemused the supper-club crowd, but Rodgers knew talent when he heard it.

This is what Bob Dylan said of him in the Biograph interview of 1985: 'The most inspiring type of entertainer for me has always been somebody like Jimmie Rodgers, somebody who could do it alone and was totally original. He was combining elements of blues and hillbilly sounds before anyone else had thought of it. He recorded at the same time as BLIND WILLIE McTELL but he wasn't just another white boy singing black. That was his great genius and he was there first . . . he played on the same stage with big bands, girly choruses and follies burlesque and he sang in a plaintive voice and style and he's outlasted them all.'

As early as May 1960, and again that fall, Dylan was recorded performing Rodgers' 'Blue Yodel No. 8 (Muleskinner's Blues)' in Minneapolis, and 'Southern Cannonball' in East Orange, New Jersey, in February or March 1961. The Rodgers influence on the young Dylan was perhaps not wholly beneficial. The repulsively maudlin 'Hobo Bill's Last Ride' (written by West Texas farm boy Waldo O'Neal, and, at his sister's urging, submitted cold to Rodgers in 1928) influenced Dylan's deservedly obscure 'Only a Hobo'. Both lyrics make the same crude attempt at rhetoric, in protest-singer-saintly style: 'just another railroad bum . . .', whines Rodgers; 'Only a hobo . . .', whines Dylan. As Rodgers sings it, though, the melody for 'Hobo Bill's Last Ride' shares quite a bit with that of 'I Dreamed I Saw Joe Hill Last Night', which is, in turn, the song behind Dylan's own 'I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine'—in which altogether more complex issues of saintliness, and guilt, come in for a fine, detached scrutiny, light-years ahead of either 'Only a Hobo' or 'Hobo Bill's Last Ride'.

Dylan and JOHNNY CASH's duets, recorded in Nashville on February 19, 1969, included 'Blue Yodel No.1' and 'Blue Yodel No.5', and it may have been from their presence in 'Blue Yodel No.12', recorded a week before Rodgers' last session, that Dylan took the essentially common-stock couplet 'I got that achin' heart disease / It works just like a cancer, it's killin' me by degrees' and re-processed it into his own line 'Horseplay and disease are killin' me by degrees' on 'Where Are You Tonight (Journey Through Dark Heat)?' on Street Legal.

Mules' years later, Dylan went into the studios in Chicago in June 1992 and recorded, among other things, Rodgers' 'Miss the Mississippi and You' (see Bromberg, David). In Memphis, two years later, he recorded Rodgers' 'My Blue-Eyed Jane' for a tribute album that was, reportedly, a project Dylan initiated. We first heard a tantalising snatch of one take on the CD-ROM Highway 61 Interactive in 1995, its woodsmoke guitars making it sound almost like an outtake from New Morning; a second complete take circulated among collectors in 1996, on which shared vocals by EMMYLOU HARRIS had been overdubbed in the interim; and then later that year a third version, with Dylan's vocals re-recorded and Harris' removed supplanted both and saw release on what turned out to be the first release on Dylan's own Egyptian Records label, in the collection finally issued as The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers—A Tribute.

More recently still, Dylan pays Rodgers the further tribute of impersonating him, in jest, on a re-recording of a Slow Train Coming song with MAVIS STAPLES (see the entry 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking' [2003 version]); and in 2004, in Chronicles Volume One, Dylan returns us to the beginning of Rodgers' impact upon him, which he says was back in Hibbing, in the days before his earliest performances of the material:

> 'One of the reasons I liked going there [to ECHO HELSTROM's house], besides puppy love, was that they had Jimmie Rodgers records, old 78s in the house. I used to sit there mesmerized, listening to the Blue Yodeler, singing, "I'm a Tennessee hustler, I don't have to work." I didn't want to have to work, either.'

[Jimmie Rodgers: complete recorded works, from 'The Soldier's Sweetheart', Bristol, TN, 4 Aug 1927, to 'Years Ago', NY, 24 May 1933, on The Singing Brakeman, Bear Family BCD 15540-FH, Germany, 1992. Bob Dylan: 'My Blue-Eyed Jane', Memphis, TN, 9 May 1994, vocals re-recorded unknown location early May 1997, The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers—A Tribute, Various Artists, Egyptian/Columbia Records 485189 2, NY, 1997. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.59.

The book on Rodgers is Nolan Porterfield's Jimmie Rodgers: The Life and Times of America's Blue Yodeler, Champaign, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1979.]

Rogers, Weldon [1927 -] The bass riff used on the Oh Mercy track 'Everything Is Broken', and relied upon far more heavily in live performance of the same song, is taken from the Weldon Rogers song Dylan often used, perversely, to greet his 1986 US tour audiences: 'So Long, Good Luck & Goodbye'. Rogers cut his own record of it at Norman Petty's legendary custom-studio in Clovis, New Mexico, some time in the first half of that marvellous music year, 1957.

He is an impressively obscure rockabilly (or old-fashioned country wannabille) artist for even Bob Dylan to have picked up on. Born in Marietta, Oklahoma, on October 30, 1927, he learnt to play guitar while serving in Italy in World War II. Returning to the States, he drifted around for many years but then, in Texas with his accordion-playing girlfriend Jean, founded Jewel Records ('Je' from Jean, 'wel' from Weldon), which used Norman Petty's studios and issued ROY ORBISON & the Teen Kings' 'Ooby Dooby' before the far larger Sun Records (no giant itself) stepped in when the record was beginning to do well, signed Orbison and halted sales of the Jewel label pressing.

Rogers, who had previously been a Seminole, Texas, DJ and cut two 1955 sides for the Quenn label in San Antonio, then cut a duet with his brother Willie on Jewel, before persuading Lew Chudd of Imperial Records to sign him up by pretending that Orbison's 'Ooby Dooby' B-side, 'Trying to Get to You', was his own. Chudd paid for Rogers, now backed by the Teen Kings (whom Orbison had dumped), to go back into the Clovis studios. On the way there, Weldon wrote 'So Long, Good Luck & Goodbye'. It was issued with Orbison's version of 'Trying to Get to You' on the B-side. Consequent ructions meant that despite the A-side's moderate success, it was the end of Weldon Rogers' Imperial Records career.

Later, with his wife Wanda Wolfe duetting, he made records (back on Jewel), such as 'Everybody Wants You', as by Weldon Rogers & Wanda Wolfe, with the then-unknown Glen Campbell on lead guitar. From 1961, he started moving around again, taking day-jobs as a radio DJ and making records now and then—in Farmington, NM; Pueblo, Colorado, and Medford, Oregon. His last recordings were in 1972, and in the 1980s the radio-station jobs became as station manager instead of DJ. He retired in 1989, the same year Bob Dylan recorded 'Everything Is Broken', finally settling back in the Texas panhandle in 1991.

When Dylan picked up Rogers' 'So Long, Good Luck & Goodbye' and re-used its riff over 30 years on, he was suggesting that even one-hit rockabilly stars are not forgotten—and that not everything is broken.

[Weldon Rogers: 'So Long, Good Luck & Goodbye', Clovis, NM, Jun? 1957, Imperial X5451, 1957. Weldon Rogers & Wanda Wolfe: 'Everybody Wants You', Jewel 45-103, late 1958-early 1959. Bob Dylan: 'So Long, Good Luck & Goodbye', débuted as his set-opened San Diego, 9 Jun 1986, and used as such at 17 further 1986 concerts; 'Everything Is Broken' débuted 'live' 1st night at the Beacon, NY, 10 Oct 1989. The same riff is also the basis of 'Melo Melo' (1978), written by Serge Gainsbourg, on the LP Ex-Fan des Sixties—Baby

Alone in Babylone (pardon?) by Jane Birkin, CD-reissued Phonogram 514124-2, UK, 1992.]

Rolling Stone*, London office of See Wenner, Jann and unloading heads.

Rolling Stones, the In middle age, decades after their prime, the once-incomparable rock band the Rolling Stones toured with Bob Dylan, rather briefly, in South America, in April 1998. On the 4th & 5th, during the Stones' sets in the River Plate Stadium in Buenos Aires, Argentina, Dylan came on stage and shared vocals with MICK JAGGER as the Stones played Dylan's 'Like a Rolling Stone'. The on stage collaboration was repeated in Brazil, on April 11 in Rio de Janiero and two nights later in Sao Paolo.

Three years earlier, on July 27, 1995, they had tried this out at a Rolling Stones' concert in Montpellier, France, though on this occasion Dylan had sung only the second verse of the song and Jagger all the rest. This was eight days after the Stones had studio-recorded the song themselves with stupefying dullness.

In 2004, when Rolling Stone magazine announced its poll results for the 'Top 500 Songs of All Time', Dylan's 'Like a Rolling Stone' was no.1; the Stones' '(I Can't Get No) Satisfaction' was no.2.

(See also Jagger, Mick; Richards, Keith; Wood, Ron; and Taylor, Mick.)

[The Rolling Stones: 'Like a Rolling Stone', 19 Jul 1995, Stripped, Virgin CDV2801, 1995; also issued on 4-track single VSCDT 1562, Virgin, 1995.]

'Romance in Durango' [1976] 'Romance in Durango', one of the songs on Desire co-written with JACQUES LEVY, is a kind of pop song—it is splendidly the heir of Marty Robbins' 'El Paso', and parodies that 1959 hit single's death-scene magnificently—but it is utterly marvellous, right from its flinty, glistening opening line: 'Hot chili peppers in the blistering sun', which gets a supercharged impact from the minimal melody, the stabbed bunching of the syllables and the desert-burn of Dylan's voice.

Hence it raised the pop song onto an undreamt-of high plane (or in this case high plain), through its skilful concentration of language. It has a strange dynamism, derived from alternating the travail of long, syllable-crammed lines—'We'll drink tequila where our grandfathers stayed'—with sudden oases of more spacious lines, in which, as often before, Dylan says more with less: 'The dogs are barking and what's done is done.'

While it's impossible to trace accurately those parts of the Bob Dylan-Jacques Levy lyrics which have been contributed by Levy, it seems a plausible hunch that, overall, Levy's input, like SAM SHEPARD's in the Dylan-Shepard lyric 'Brownsville Girl' in the mid-1980s, has been by way of additional detailing: that the co-writer encourages an attention to concrete objects and a tendency to insert or retain adjectives where Dylan's own bent is more for 'keeping things vague', as JOAN BAEZ puts it in her own excellent song about Dylan, 'Diamonds and Rust'.

Perhaps without Levy the opening line of 'Romance in Durango' would have been 'Chili peppers in the sun'. Or perhaps not. There is, however, one specific touch in the song which must surely have come from Levy—from his knowledge of psychotherapy, a subject in which Dylan has never expressed sympathetic interest (rather the opposite) but in which Levy trained. Levy would have known the subject matter described here in Eric Berne's popularising book of the early 1970s, What Do You Say After You Say Hello?; he may well have known the book and thus this passage itself:

> 'Amenhotep-haq-Uast's other name (besides Ikhnaton) was Nefer-kheperu-Ra-ua-en-Ra, whose hieroglyphs roughly translate as "Take your lute and your scarab and enjoy the sun", while according to the Ikhnaton cartouche, he has traded this in for a cake and a feather. . . . This is like a modern, hippie script switch, either way: people with guitars get a yen for cake, or people with cake turn it in for a guitar.'

So it proves to be in 'Romance in Durango', in which Dylan sings: 'Sold my guitar to the baker's son / For a few crumbs and a place to hide / But I can get another one . . .'

Berne's most famous and successful book was the earlier Games People Play, 1964, which injected copious amounts of psychobabble into everyday language and preceded the JOE SOUTH record of the same name, a hit in 1969—and unfortunately for the neatness of the lute/cake, guitar/crumbs parallel, Berne's assertions about Ikhnaton's name are equally unreliable, even if Levy took them on trust. As Egyptologists transliterate the hieroglyphs, they mean 'Beautiful are Ra's transformations, the only one in Ra, glory in the Aten [the solar disk].' (Ikhnaton is a variant spelling of Akhenaten/Akhenaton, the original name of Amenhotep IV, a king of the 18th Dynasty of Ancient Egypt, who died in 1358 BC.)

Dylan began performing 'Romance in Durango' on the very first night of the first Rolling Thunder Revue—before the release of Desire. Indeed it was the first of six songs from the album that were previewed ahead of its release that night; the others were 'Isis', 'Oh Sister', 'Hurricane', 'One More Cup of Coffee', and 'Sara'. He continued to perform it early on in every 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue concert. The version from Cambridge, Massachusetts, on November 20 has since been released on the Bootleg Series Vol. 5, while that from Montreal on December 4 was featured in the Renaldo & Clara movie and on the 1985 Biograph box set.

On the 1976 leg of the Rolling Thunder Revue, 'Romance in Durango' was performed far less regularly and was not among the songs on the 'Hard Rain' television special. Its last performance that year was on May 11 in San Antonio, Texas—and then Dylan never revisited the song until, to the amazement of everyone lucky enough to be there, he suddenly embarked upon it, and rather magnificently, on the penultimate night of a 33-concert tour of Europe in 2003, at the Hammersmith Apollo, London.

In Las Cruces, New Mexico, on August 29, 1989, Dylan began his concert with an instrumental performance of, yes, Marty Robbins' 'El Paso'.

[Bob Dylan: 'Romance in Durango', NY, 28 Jul 1975; live début Plymouth, MA, 30 Oct 1975; surprise live performance London, 24 Nov 2003.

Marty Robbins: 'El Paso', Nashville, 7 Apr 1959, Columbia 4-41511, NY (in the UK, Fontana Records H 233, London), 1959. Joan Baez: 'Diamonds and Rust', Los Angeles, 17–29 Jan 1975, Diamonds and Rust, A&M SP 3233, LA (AMLH 64527, London), 1975. Eric Berne, What Do You Say After You Say Hello?, c.1972. The contradictory transliteration of the hieroglyphs has been supplied by A.J. Iriarte.]

Romney, Jahanara [1941 -] Bonnie Jean Beecher was born in Minneapolis on April 25, 1941, the daughter of people who owned the well-to-do Beecher's Resort in Annandale, MN, west-northwest of Minneapolis. So she had money, and used to go on shopping trips to New York City, where she bought a number of LPs on each trip. She would go to Sam Goodys, choosing 'any old record that looked like it had some kind of funky singer or blues singer . . . records by CAT IRON, RABBIT BROWN . . .' So it was that when she first met Dylan in Dinkytown in 1959 or 1960, he and HARVEY ABRAMS were sitting around in the 10 O'Clock Scholar, mentioning obscure singers' names, and she was able to join in.

They got on well, had enough of a relationship for some commentators to suspect that she, rather than ECHO HELSTROM, was the 'Girl of the North Country'. This is unlikely, but certainly Dylan was keen on Bonnie, and she seems to have been the subject of a passing reference in his early poem 'My Life in a Stolen Moment', in which he writes: 'I fell hard for an actress girl who kneed me in the guts / an' I ended up on the East Side a the Mississippi River / with about ten friends in a condemned house / underneath the Washington Avenue Bridge just south a Seven Corners / That's pretty well my college life . . .'

They remained close throughout Dylan's Minneapolis days and they stayed in touch all through his rise to New York City fame. He would see her on each revisit to Minnesota during 1961, and she (as well as TONY GLOVER) recorded Dylan performing at her apartment that May and December. The December tape is particularly important, and had they not been friends, and her apartment thus not available, we would be the poorer for its nonexistence. Her recording of this magical early Dylan performance, made on her art teacher's reel-to-reel machine, has long circulated, and in reasonable quality; the one Tony Glover recorded did not circulate, is in better quality and has been drawn upon for three officially issued tracks (so far). The May tape, catching a far less confident performance and in far poorer sound quality, is nonetheless interesting for its choice of material, which reveals how deeply Dylan had already sunk himself into blues material (including pre-war blues) as well as into Guthrie's and traditional white folksong.

Not all its material was old. Bonnie gave a delightful interview to Markus Wittman, for fanzine The Telegraph, in 1990, in which she gave a vivid and fond picture of the endearing, advantage-taking, hustling, shambolic young Dylan. Asked if he wrote songs back then, she revealed that he had written 'a couple of fooling around songs', including the one on the tape called 'Bonnie Why'd You Cut My Hair?'—which collectors were familiar with but had always assumed was an obscure traditional song.

She said: 'He wrote one when I cut his hair, which made me so angry! He came to my apartment and said, "It's an emergency! I need your help! I gotta go home an' see my mother!" He was talking in the strangest WOODY GUTHRIE-Oklahoma accent. I don't know if she was sick, but it was an unexpected trip he had to make up to Hibbing and he wanted me to cut his hair. He kept saying, "Shorter! Shorter! Get rid of the sideburns!" So I did my very best to do what he wanted and then in the door come DAVE MORTON, JOHNNY KOERNER and Harvey Abrams. They looked at him and said, "Oh my God, you look terrible! What did you do?" And Dylan immediately said, "She did it! I told her just to trim it up a little bit but she cut it all off. I wasn't looking in a mirror!" And then he went and wrote that song, "Bonnie, why'd you cut my hair? / Now I can't go nowhere!" He played it that night in a coffee-house and somebody told me recently that they had been to Minnesota and somebody was still playing that song, "Bonnie, Why'd You Cut My Hair?" It's like a Minnesota classic! And so I've gone down in history!'

Bonnie also said she was grateful to Dylan for his example:

> 'When I lived in the sorority house we had a music room with a piano that no-one ever used and Dylan would come and learn how to play piano there and the harmonica. I got him his first harmonica holder at Schmidt's Music Shop. So he would come over to the sorority house and play the piano, horribly! And he'd play this harmonica, which he didn't know how to play! And my friends would come in and they would just go, Uurgh! Who is this geek? I wanted him to play the guitar, which he could play well and which I knew would impress them, but he wasn't having any of it. He was saying, Naw. I wanna get this—Hwang! Whwaongg! Hahaha! I was mortified but he didn't give a shit. It's been a big lesson to me in life—don't give a damn what people think, just go for what you are!'

Of course, this wouldn't work if everyone were equally selfish; in her own case, this bright, quick-minded, talented girl understood him, picked him out of the gutter, cleaned him up, lent him money and so on—and did so as if it were her vocation, even though she was ambitious herself, to be an actor.

By the time of that interview Bonnie Beecher had long been calling herself Jahanara Romney—Jahanara was a Sufi name she took in 1975—having moved to the West Coast 'probably in 1962 or 1963' and acted in television from 1964 to 1968. She was running a Hollywood restaurant, the Fred C. Dobbs, when she met Hugh Romney, aka Wavy Gravy, and settled for a life of hippiedom on the California avant garde art scene.

'Together,' said Wavy later, 'we survived L.A. Acid Tests and in 1965 we married each other. We also married the Hog Farm. The Hog Farm is the name still associated with our expanded family. We acquired it while living rent free on a mountaintop in Sunland, California, in exchange for the caretaking of forty actual hogs. Within a year of moving there, the people engaged in our bizarre communal experiment began to outnumber the pigs. At first we all had separate jobs. I had a grant to teach brain-damaged children improvisation while teaching a similar class to contract players at Columbia Pictures. Harrison Ford was one of my students. My wife Bonnie was a successful television actress. . . . Bonnie Jean gave birth to Howdy Do-Good Gravy at the Tomahawk Truckstop in Boulder, Colorado.' In 1976 she gave Wavy another child, Birthday Party Gravy. (On his 13th birthday, Howdy legally changed his name to Jordan Romney, and he's now a computer programmer.) Wavy and Jahanara run Winnarainbow, a performing arts summer camp—so Bonnie has ended up in a version of her parents' business after all. Its website (designed by Jordan) shows a photo of Jaharana and Wavy together, and reports that she has been the camp's administrative director since 1983, and that she also serves on the board of the Berkeley-based Seva Foundation, helping to develop its Central American projects.

Dylan says in Chronicles Volume One that it was Bonnie—described only as 'A girl I used to know in Minneapolis' who 'had become an actress'—who introduced him to John Wayne when he went to visit her in Hawaii on the set of In Harm's Way (where she 'was playing a supporting role')—but she says that is not how it happened: 'No. I drove him to the airport when he was going to Hawaii, and ended up going there with him. Brandon de Wilde, an actor in that film, and his wife were friends of mine, so I took Bob and Victor [Maymudes] to the filming at Brandon's invitation. We all got to hang out on the set and with the cast, for several days. They were all interested in meeting Bob. At one point I was invited to join a group of extras creating a crowd scene, but I was not officially cast in any rôle whatsoever!'

Like Dylan, she got away from Minnesota; like him, she comes back to have another look around from time to time on the quiet. Last time was in 1997 for a memorial service for her mother. She doesn't recall when she last saw Bob Dylan. 'It has been a long time.'

[Jahanara Romney, aka Bonnie Beecher, interview by Markus Wittman, 'The Wanted Man Interview: Jahanara Romney', Telegraph no.36, Romford, UK, summer 1990, reprinted John Bauldie, ed., Wanted Man, in Search of Bob Dylan, London: Black Spring Press, 1992, pp.26–27, and by the present writer, by e-mail, 29 Nov 2005. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.249. Gravy quotes from 'A Sketch of my Thumbnail', seen online 25 Oct 2005 at www.cleartest.com/testinfo/gravy.htm. More detail Paul Krassner, 'Wavy Gravy: Salute to a Good-humored Humanitarian', online 5 Oct 2005 at www.earthisland.org/project/newsPage2.cfm?newsID=600&pageID=177&subSiteID=44. Relevant Winnarainbow website page is www.campwinnarainbow.org/staff/staff.html. In Harm's Way, dir. Otto Preminger, 1965.]

Ronson, Mick [1946 - 1993] Michael Ronson was born in what is now claimed to be the obesity capital of Britain, the north-east port of Hull, more fully named Kingston-upon-Hull, on May 26, 1946. He grew up to be the opposite of obese himself, and donated his considerable lead guitar talents primarily to another artificial stick-insect blonde with a penchant for make-up and repulsive 1970s clothes, David Bowie, starting with his early band the Hype and then The Man Who Sold the World, though he also collaborated a good deal with Ian Hunter and his group Mott the Hoople, co-produced (with Bowie) LOU REED's significant album Transformer, playing piano on its track 'Perfect Day', and in the early 1990s produced the album Your Arsenal by the great Morrissey, giving him a heavier sound and less emphasis on the lyrics but making for a compelling whole. He worked with many other people and released three solo albums, the last, Heaven and Hull, issued posthumously and featuring Bowie as guest on Ronson's cover of 'Like a Rolling Stone'.

It was a surprise to Dylan followers when Ronson became a lead guitarist on the Rolling Thunder Revues of 1975 and 1976, since those who find Bob Dylan interesting and those who find David Bowie interesting are almost wholly different groups of people. Stylistically, however, his expansive white lines of electric guitar-work proved an inspired blend with Dylan and threw an authoritative rock-star hauteur in amongst the munchkin collective of STONER, SOLES and NEUWIRTH. He can be seen to fine effect in Renaldo & Clara and the 'Hard Rain' TV Special as well as blazing his way across the Hard Rain album. The lead guitar part he brought to Dylan's very different Rolling Thunder version of 'It Ain't Me, Babe', mournful but resourceful, alive but elegiac, is a fine instance of how much he contributed. He was also particularly good in the improvised playlets within Renaldo & Clara, inhabiting the rôle of jobsworth-on-the-door perfectly, blocking the RONNIE HAWKINS character and refusing to countenance any reasoning or plea with the stolid implacability that in real life only the stupid can fully muster. A nice irony, then, as well as appealing humour, that when asked by RONEE BLAKLEY at some point on the tour, 'Isn't Bob wonderful?', Ronson replied: 'I don't know—he's never spoken to me.'

Oddly, Ronson was a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (the Mormons), though reportedly he became disillusioned with it late in life. He died of cancer of the liver on April 29, 1993.

Rosen, Jeff [1950s -] Jeffrey Rosen was born in Brooklyn in the 1950s and would prefer to leave it at that. He has been running Bob Dylan's music publishing empire and general office since the retirement of his mentor Naomi Salzman (who with her husband Ben was still being thanked on the sleevenotes of Knocked Out Loaded in 1986; Ben's name gave rise to Big Ben Music, the UK branch of Dylan's music publishing in the 1960s which circulated the initial 14 Basement Tapes songs as demos, from which came early bootlegs). If Jeff Rosen were merely a business executive he wouldn't require an entry here but he has not only transformed Dylan's publishing from a commercially modest enterprise into an exponentially larger one but along the way he has been proactive in creating the Biograph box set ('Produced for reissue by Jeff Rosen', as the back-cover credit has it) and creating the whole Bootleg Series, devising and overseeing its production and its compilations. He was also co-producer with Don DeVito of the so-called 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration of 1992 and of its 2-CD live album set.

Rosen has supervised the introduction of the website www.bobdylan.com and led the systematised accumulation of Dylan's invaluable archives, including taking the active rôle of conducting most of the interviews filmed over the past decade—among them the interview with Dylan himself that we see in SCORSESE's No Direction Home film in 2005: a film he gets a 'producer' credit on. He was active too when Dylan performed JOHNNY CASH's 'Train of Love' on film in March 1999, for playing at the Cash Tribute he was unable to attend in person; it was Jeff Rosen who made that single-camera film. He is also the interviewer in, and co-producer of, the extra feature in the Masked & Anonymous DVD package, the 16-minute feature 'Masked & Anonymous' Exposed, in which the movie's stars talk to him about making the film—and he was, with Nigel Sinclair, the producer of the film itself. Look at the production credits for the film, and there's a swathe of people down as 'executive producer'—Marie Cantin, Joseph Newton Cohen, Vladimir Dostal, Guy East, Anatoly Fradis, Pietro Scalia, David M. Thompson—and there are 'co-producer' credits for David Gaines and Nikolai Makarov; but only Sinclair and Rosen are tagged 'producer'.

Through all this runs a main theme: that Jeff Rosen has, while optimising Dylan's business potency dramatically, also effected a sea-change in the Dylan-office culture as it affects the ordinary aficionado, fundamentally improving and making more productive the level of contact and exchange between the business guardianship of Dylan's art and the constituency out there that has long been interested in the art itself.

Rotolo, Suze [1943 -] Susan Elizabeth Rotolo was born in Queens, New York, on November 20, 1943, the younger sister of Carla Rotolo. ('Of the two sisters, I loved the young,' as Dylan sang in his immaturely personal yet majestically delivered 'Ballad in Plain D' on 1964's Another Side of Bob Dylan.) They were the nieces of the Boston-based painter Petro Pezzati, and their parents were political Lefties and friends of Charles Flato (aka Floto), a member of the American Communist Party who acted as a Soviet agent while working for the US Government (though he was never prosecuted). Not long before his death in 1984 he gave Suze (pronounced 'Suzy') his car.

Suze and Carla's father died when Suze was 14, after which, deciding college wasn't going to be possible, she was free to come and go as she pleased, crossing the bridge into Manhattan and finding in Greenwich Village a place that made sense to a teenager whose idols were Edna St. Vincent Millay and Lord Byron.

'I grew up as an outsider, having politically Left parents,' she has said. 'Having a sense of social consciousness in the 1950s was very, very, very unusual . . . people were very wary of speaking out, of saying anything. And folk music was a place to hear other voices and people who were like you, who were socially conscious . . . and it was through music that I found people . . . who had the same interests I had.'

Suze was a teenage activist. Already involved at school in SANE (which was somehow the acronym for the National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy), Suze picketed Woolworths stores in New York City in parallel with those picketing for the integration of lunch counters in the South, and by the time she met Bob Dylan in the first half of 1961, she was already a seasoned attendee of hootenannies at Gerde's Folk City, performances in Washington Square Park and concerts at Carnegie Hall. Though it's often said by Dylan commentators that she first saw Dylan at his first paid gig, which was that April 5, at the Loeb Music Center for the University of New York Folk Society, which she attended, she says she first saw Dylan while he was playing at a hootenanny with MARK SPOELSTRA, and though she was more attracted physically to the latter (he 'had lovely shoulders'), Dylan's harmonica playing had 'an earthiness that was wonderful' and she was 'a sucker for anyone who plays a good harp'. The two began a flirtation at the end of an all-day hootenanny to launch Riverside Church's radio station that July 29, at which Dylan performed 'Handsome Molly', 'Naomi Wise' (aka 'Omie Wise') and 'Poor Lazarus' before playing harp for DANNY KALB on 'Mean Old Railroad' and then joining RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT for a song that scoffed at teen pop culture, 'Acne'.

As Dylan recalls in Chronicles Volume One, they were introduced by Carla, whom Dylan knew slightly because she was at this point ALAN LOMAX's assistant: Suze was 'the most erotic thing I'd ever seen.' They were soon 'going steady'—so that Suze was a witness to almost the entire transition from Dylan the hustling unknown to Dylan the Columbia Records recording artist, Dylan the writer of a PETER, PAUL & MARY hit single, Dylan the star. At the same time, Suze was doing day-time odd jobs and took an extra job painting scenery for off-Broadway productions—most significantly for Brecht on Brecht, a sort of theatrical compilation sampler of BERTOLDT BRECHT's work, staged at the Circle on Sheridan Square, in the Village.

Dylan, remembering the production as having been at the Theatre de Lys on Christopher Street, says that going there 'to wait for Suze' he 'was aroused straight away by the raw intensity of the songs.'

To the dismay of Carla and of Suze's mother, who saw Dylan as a fairly harmless young phoney and nicknamed him Twerp, Suze moved into Bob's apartment above Bruno's Spaghetti Shop at 161 West 4th Street, and they became, in her own phrase, increasingly 'huddled together'. Yet she also took a job with CORE (the Congress for Racial Equality)—an office job, but in an office where news constantly poured in about the freedom rides in Birmingham, Alabama, and other campaigning demonstrations CORE was involved with as part of the civil rights battles of the day.

'The time of the early 1960s,' Suze wrote recently, 'was a protest time and an eventful time and an event-filled time and the time leading up to and out of the release of Dylan's Freewheelin' album in 1963—and talk made the music and music made the talk, and action was already in the making with Civil Rights marches and marches against the Bomb, and THE BEATS had already cracked the rigid morality of the 1950s. So we were ready to roll. And it was my personal story but . . . it's become history.'

Rotolo did indeed occupy at once a typical and a very untypical position at this time. It was, as she says, her 'personal story', just as it was the story of all those who fought and campaigned, all those who were rejecting America's mainstream 1950s culture, all those who were part of the Folk Revival and the Blues Revival, the coffee-house scene in Greenwich Village and equivalent places in Boston, Philadelphia and Washington, D.C. Yet at the same time, as Bob Dylan's girlfriend as he was shooting to fame, she was at once being singled out, pointed at and set apart from her chosen life.

For a start, she was there with Dylan on the cover of that Freewheelin' album, still a teenage girl yet looking far more mature than the Gallup, New Mexico, tale-spinning Huck Finn-faced youth she's arm in arm with, walking down that snowy street. And at the March on Washington in August 1963, when Martin Luther King made his 'I have a dream' speech, Suze was bound to be there—how would she not have been, given her background and interests and her involvement with CORE: and she remembers, in that context, 'listening to King and looking around. . . . It was wall to wall people; no longer were we a small group of protesters. . . . This was definitely a turning point, a special time.' Yet it must also have been special to witness Bob stand up in front of those wall to wall people, one of those who had earned the right to be there as a performer—to be there, as it were, on the same bill as Martin Luther King.

But before either the release of Freewheelin' or the March on Washington, their relationship had changed; it was finishing. Her mother had remarried in 1962, and that year Suze had the chance to sail to Italy with her mother and stepfather and to live in Perugia, the lovely and ancient hill town that is the capital of Umbria. She agonised about going, but she went—and didn't regret it: 'I felt I didn't want to be a string on his guitar, because I wasn't ready to retire. I hadn't even started out yet.' In sunny Italy, a million miles from the dark clubs of dark New York, she felt 'let loose to be young again'.

Thus Suze, by escaping Dylan, became the prompt for some of his finest early songs: in particular 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right'—its line 'I once loved a woman, a child I'm told' re-uses a remark of ROBERT SHELTON's to Dylan, telling him how young Suze still was—and the magnificent 'Boots of Spanish Leather'. (There are also the lines Dylan puts inside his minor Freewheelin' song 'Down the Highway': 'the ocean took my baby, / My baby took my heart from me. / She packed it all up in a suitcase, / Lord, she took it away to Italy. Italy.'

Suze stayed away about seven months, and returned to much hostility in the Village (including from JOHNNY CASH), from those who thought it their business to tell her how she'd hurt Bob. 'He mooned in public. He created this image of himself as the abandoned, wounded lover. I'm sure he was having a fine time also. Classic.' They got back together for a while, and it's generally held to have been in February 1963 that the Freewheelin' cover shot was taken (by Don Hunstein, a Columbia Records staff photographer).

In the years after their demise as an item, Rotolo retained Dylan's respect by her determined silence and her absolute refusal to give interviews. The first interviews she gave were for Victoria Balfour's misleadingly titled book Rock Wives, and for Robbie Woliver's book Hoot! A 25-Year History of the Greenwich Village Music Scene, both published in 1986: and in neither did she break her silence on the private side of her life with Dylan.

For his part, in Chronicles Volume One he remembers her warmly and in the sort of detail that surprises the reader all the way through that book: 'Suze was seventeen years old. . . . She was involved in the New York art scene, painted and made drawings for various publications, worked in graphic design and in off-Broadway theatrical productions, also worked on civil rights committees—she could do a lot of things. Meeting her was like stepping into the tales of 1,001 Arabian nights. She had a smile that could light up a street full of people and was extremely lively, had a particular kind of voluptuousness—a Rodin sculpture come to life.'

In the 1970s, Suze Rotolo married an Italian film editor whom she'd first met on that early trip to Perugia, Enzo Bartoccioli. Their son Craig Rotolo plays rhythm guitar in Cleanser, a pop rock band in New York that includes a violinist. In late 2004, Suze made a surprise appearance on a discussion panel as part of the Experience Music Project's exhibition in Seattle, 'Bob Dylan: An American Journey 1956–1966'; and in 2005 a small part of the interview she had given to Dylan's office was used in MARTIN SCORSESE's film No Direction Home. (A typed letter written by Suze to her mother on July 10, 1962, which begins with the rebuke 'Mother, I have lost all faith in being honest to you because you never give Bob a chance', was auctioned in 2005: but Rotolo insists this was a fake.)

Dylan attributes his beginning to draw to Suze's example: 'I actually picked up the habit from Suze, who drew a lot.' And 'someplace along the line Suze had also introduced me to the poetry of French Symbolist poet ARTHUR RIMBAUD. That was a big deal too.' More generally, 'I began to broaden my horizons, see a lot of what her world was like, especially the off-Broadway scene . . . [and] I went with her to where the artists and painters hung out. . . . A new world of art was opening up in my mind . . .' Finally, as Dylan acknowledges, it was also through Suze Rotolo that he encountered the work of Brecht—work that would strongly influence his own early writing.

Suze told Robbie Woliver: 'It was always sincere on his part. He saw something. The guy saw things. He was definitely way, way ahead. His radar was flying. He had an incredible ability to see and sponge—there was a genius in that. The ability to create out of everything that's flying around. To synthesize it. To put it in words and music. It was not an intellectual approach that he had to research something—he did it on his own.'

But with a little help from Ms. Rotolo.

[Main sources for the above are Rotolo's comments at the EMP panel discussion Nov 2004, online at www.emplive.org/visit/galleries/dylanPanel.asp, incl. part 'she wrote recently'; Victoria Balfour, Rock Wives, New York: Beech Tree Books & London: Virgin Books, 1986; Robbie Woliver, Hoot! A 25-Year History of the Greenwich Village Music Scene, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1986; Wikipedia, online 23 Sep 2005 at http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Suze_Rotolo; and Chronicles Volume One, pp.272, 264–65, 288, 268–70. Link between 'Don't Think Twice' line and Shelton remark claimed by Shelton to the present writer, date unremembered.]

'Royal Canal, the' Dylan may have been inspired in respect of the seagulls smilin' in his 'When the Ship Comes In' by the pseudo-folksong 'The Royal Canal', aka 'The Old Triangle', by Brendan Behan—which, it later emerged, Dylan and THE CRACKERS/THE BAND included among the rich assortment of material recorded on the Basement Tapes (Woodstock/West Saugerties, June–October 1967). One verse runs: 'On a fine spring evening / The lag lay dreaming / The seagulls beaming / High above the wall.'

It may also have influenced Dylan's 'I Shall Be Released', also on the Basement Tapes. In Invisible Republic, 1997, GREIL MARCUS calls 'The Royal Canal' '. . . "I Shall Be Released" without any hope for freedom'; he might also have noted the particularity of Dylan's song repeating that phrase 'High above the wall' from within Behan's.

It is possible too that Dylan's phrase 'the jingle jangle morning', in 'Mr. Tambourine Man', was inspired by 'The Royal Canal', the chorus of which runs 'And that old triangle / Goes a jingle jangle / All along the banks / Of the Royal Canal.' However, there are other possible sources for this. In Chronicles Volume One Dylan mentions Tex Ritter's 'Jingle, Jangle, Jingle' as something heard on the radio late at night in his youth. 'Jingle Jangle' is also a record by the Penguins, whose hit 'Earth Angel' was known to Dylan and friends in Minnesota back in 1956.

'The Royal Canal' is a key element in Behan's first play, The Quare Fellow (first produced Dublin, 1954, with Behan singing the song off-stage). It was familiar repertoire in early 1960s Greenwich Village.

['Jingle, Jangle, Jingle', Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, p.188. Tex Ritter: 'Jingle, Jangle, Jingle', Hollywood, 11 Jun 1942, CD-reissued (adjacent to his 'Blood on the Saddle', Hollywood, 1 May 1945), on the Ritter compilation High Noon, Bear Family BCD 15634, Vollersode, Germany, 1991. The Penguins: 'Jingle Jangle', Hollywood, 12 Nov 1955; CD-reissued Earth Angel, Bear Family BFX 15222, c.1991).]

Russell, Leon [1942 -] Claude Russell Bridges was born in Lawton, Oklahoma, on April 2, 1942, attended Lawton's Will Rogers High School and went out into the music world after playing in a club with RONNIE HAWKINS behind JERRY LEE LEWIS at age 14 and moving to LA at 16, where he started work in PHIL SPECTOR's wall-of-sound factory in time to appear on many of those classic girl-group hit singles.

Later, Russell played on THE BYRDS' 'Mr. Tambourine Man'—the only member of the group to do so being McGuinn. His first hit as a songwriter was Joe Cocker's 'Delta Lady', after which he was the organiser of Cocker's Mad Dogs and Englishmen tour—something he achieved in two weeks, to the astonishment of A&M bosses Herb Alpert (on whose own records Russell had also played piano) and Jerry Moss.

He came into Dylan's orb by producing, as well as playing piano on, the Dylan session of March 16–19, 1971 in New York from which came 'When I Paint My Masterpiece' (on Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits Vol. II) and the 'Watching the River Flow' single. The session also yielded a set of still-uncirculated recordings that sound very alluring indeed: 'Spanish Harlem', 'That Lucky Old Sun', 'Alabama Bound' and 'Blood Red River'. Russell also played on the recording of 'George Jackson (Big Band Version)', but this time on bass, on November 4, 1971.

Appearing at the Concert for Bangla Desh that August seemed to make Russell an instant superstar—or for those who had followed Joe Cocker's Mad Dogs & Englishmen tour perhaps confirmed him in that rôle: he came on all-powerful, utterly in your face, musically supra-vivid, his lurid gothic vocals allied to a laconic confidence at the piano only ever surpassed by that of Jerry Lee himself. And then within a couple of years he became, like Melanie and Donovan, one of the showbiz disappeared. He kept on working, playing, producing, writing and recording—but he had vanished from the land of the giants.

Rutman, Howard [1941 -] Howard Irving Rutman was born in St. Paul, Minnesota, on February 13, 1941 and met Bob Dylan when they were both adolescents at the co-educational Jewish summer camp they and LARRY KEGAN were all sent to, Camp Herzl in Webster, Wisconsin—sent to, in Bob's case, as Rutman told biographer HOWARD SOUNES, because his mother wanted him to 'meet Jewish kids and maybe some Jewish girls'.

Bob Dylan made his earliest known extant recording with Rutman and Kegan, at a custom recording facility in the Terlinde Music Shop in St. Paul, Minnesota, on Christmas Eve 1956! The three 15-year-olds share vocals along with Bob's piano as they race through incomplete versions of eight songs in little more than nine minutes. (See earliest extant recordings, Dylan's.) This trio, formed first at summer camp, called itself the Jokers. Though these aspiring rock'n'rollers never really got beyond singing round the piano, Rutman says their mothers made them sleeveless cardigans in red and grey, with JOKERS stitched across the fronts, and that they once went on a Twin Cities Channel 9 TV talent show, even earlier than their début recording. He says it was early 1956, when they were all 14. They played together off and on till spring 1958, when Bob had Hibbing groups—groups with real instruments—to concentrate on.

Dylan often stayed overnight at the Rutman family home in St. Paul, and they would listen to radio programmes like 'Lucretia the Werewolf' and Bob would play the piano in the basement. 'He would bang the shit of the piano,' Howard told Sounes. 'He would get up there and dance on the damn thing. . . . Ah God, he just ruined it.'

Rutman left Minnesota around the same time as Dylan, but headed in the opposite direction, taking dentistry at Arizona State before settling in LA and hoping to become an actor. He worked in television a little but didn't give up the dentistry, and he says that Dylan's mother Beatty came into his office one time, around 1978, to say she wanted to make an appointment for her son to have his teeth looked at. Her son? Yes, she said, Bobby Zimmerman. Howard said he could see him right away. He didn't realise it but Bob was waiting in the car-park. Howard was just phoning his wife of the time to say guess what: Bob Dylan is coming in here to get his teeth fixed, when he felt a tap on his shoulder. Bob was already in the room. It takes a very old friend to get away with making that kind of phone call in Dylan's hearing, but he did.

Since 1990 Rutman has worked in films, mainly as a driver and 'transportation coordinator'—on films including Killer Tomatoes Eat France! and Captain Nuke and the Bomber Boys—though his credits also include second unit director on 1995's Criminal Hearts and 'additional photography' on 1997's Campfire Tales.

Howard Rutman's father Harvey was first cousin to, and best friend of, the Joseph Rutman who eventually married Beatty Zimmerman, many many years after their first spouses had died. So Howard and Bob, decades down the road from their teenage comradeship, have ended up related by marriage.

[Quote from Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, Ch.1; post-Minnesota, dentistry and Rutman family detail, Howard Rutman phone call from this writer, 13 Feb 2006.]

Sager, Carole Bayer [1947 -] See Bayer Sager, Carole.

Sahm, Doug [1941 - 1999] Douglas Wayne Sahm was born on November 6, 1941 in a predominantly black section of San Antonio, Texas, where he grew up. He was of German and Irish descent, not, as often reported, of Lebanese. A steel-guitar, mandolin and fiddle prodigy he sang on radio at age five and by eight he was a regular on the Louisiana Hayride radio show, billed as Little Doug Sahm. Just weeks before HANK WILLIAMS' death, he brought Doug on stage with him in Austin.

S

He heard many live blues and country musicians as he grew up and by 13 knew the records of HOWLIN' WOLF, FATS DOMINO and JIMMY REED. His mother wouldn't let him accept an offer to join the Grand Ole Opry but he did start making records for local labels, starting with the 78rpm as well as 45rpm release 'A Real American Joe' c/w 'Rollin', Rollin'', made when he was 11 but released in 1955, and fronting local bands while still in high school.

It was the British invasion and the BEATLES that led to producer Huey P. Meaux, with whom Sahm had been pushing to record, to commission Sahm to get a group together, write a song with a Cajun two-step beat (Meaux thought the Beatles' hits had the same on-the-beat formula), grow his hair long and come back to the studio. Hence the supposedly British-sounding name the Sir Douglas Quintet, and hence 'She's About a Mover', recorded in January 1965 and an immediate massive hit, which Bob Dylan was quick to praise.

In March 1966, arrested in Texas for possession of marijuana, Sahm moved to San Francisco for five years, there recording the album Mendocino and others, to increasingly little effect; but in 1972 Sahm and the group appeared in the movie Cisco Pike with KRIS KRISTOFFERSON (its soundtrack featuring his 'Michoacán') and that October JERRY WEXLER bought him out of his record deal, brought him to Atlantic and to New York, rescuing him from the doldrums and producing the album Doug Sahm & Band, one of the most charming albums ever made, Sahm's lazy but perky voice one ingredient in a fond fusion of loose yet sinewy Tex-Mex country-rock music on which Bob Dylan appeared on a number of tracks in a variety of mostly self-effacing minor rôles. The whole thing sounded as if it were being played in your parlour, yet also sounded the unarguable laid-back prototype for the Austin Sound that was so successful later that decade.

Doug Sahm himself plays guitar, piano and bajo sexto on the album; other players include Dr. John, DAVID BROMBERG, Flaco Jiminez, AUGIE MEYERS and Dave 'Fathead' Newman. On the expansive, chunky opening track '(Is Anybody Going to) San Antone' Dylan sings harmony vocals and plays guitar; on 'It's Gonna Be Easy' and 'Faded Love' he plays organ and on 'Poison Love' guitar; on his own composition 'Wallflower' he sings lead vocals and plays guitar, on 'Blues Stay Away from Me' he shares vocals and plays guitar, and on 'Me and Paul' he plays guitar and harmonica. The outtakes—some released in 1992 on Doug Sahm & Friends, and all released in 2003 on the set The Genuine Texas Groover—were 'On the Banks of the Old Pontchartrain', 'Hey Good Lookin'', 'Mr. Sandman' and 'I'll Be There' (all with Dylan on guitar), 'COLUMBUS STOCKADE BLUES' and 'The Blues Walked In' (Dylan on piano and organ) and 'Tennessee Blues', with Dylan on harmonica.

Nothing much happened for Doug Sahm as a result of the original album release, in December 1972, and Atlantic persevered with his career no more than Mercury before it, though his fan-base in Texas remained ardent. He drifted through the rest of the 1970s, playing guitar on RICK DANKO's eponymously titled solo album of 1977 and appearing in the film More American Graffiti in 1979. In 1983, with long-time musical compadre Augie Meyers, he signed to Swedish label Sonet, enjoying one of the biggest hit singles in Scandinavian history with 'Meet Me in Stockholm', from their album Midnight Sun, and touring Europe recurrently until in 1985 he moved to Canada, where he formed a new band with Amos Garrett. Three years later he finally returned to Texas, recording for a small Austin label and after various touring configurations with others, he joined the Texas Tornados—intended as a Tex-Mex TRAVELING WILBURYS—along with Meyers, Flaco Jiminez and Freddie Fender. They made seven albums plus The Best of Texas Tornados, the last being a live album made in Austin 11 months before his death. However, in tandem with the Texas Tornados (also the name of a Houston volleyball team), Sahm reformed the Sir Douglas Quintet in 1994 with two sons.

On August 24, 1988, shortly before Sahm quit Canada, Bob Dylan's Never-Ending Tour, then only ten weeks old, played Edmonton, Alberta. TRACY CHAPMAN came on for the encore number 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' and that must have seemed to the audience the end-of-evening surprise. But topping that, Doug Sahm was brought on stage and, backed by Dylan and his band, finally got to sing 'She's About a Mover' to its prominent admirer, 23 years after he'd first heard it. The two men's final conjunction came another seven years on, when the Never-Ending Tour was back in Texas and on their second and final night in Austin, on November 5, 1995, Doug Sahm graced the stage one more time, playing guitar on 'Maggie's Farm', 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues', 'Never Gonna Be the Same Again', 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'Alabama Getaway', and the final number of the night, 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'. At the end of 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues', on which Sahm also shared vocals, he said to the audience: 'Austin, Texas, do we love this dude or what! He's the greatest! I'm telling you man, I've got to say it. And tomorrow's my birthday and tomorrow this year will be thirty years this man's been a beautiful friend of mine and I love him. I wish everybody in the world could know him like I do. I love this dude. Thank you, Austin, Texas! Thank you Bob Dylan!'

It was indeed Sahm's 55th birthday next day. Soon after his 58th, Doug Sahm died of a heart attack while on holiday in Taos, New Mexico, on November 18, 1999.

[Little Doug: 'Real American Joe' b/w 'Rollin, Rollin'', nia, Sarg 113, US, 1955. The Sir Douglas Quintet: 'She's About a Mover', Texas, 15 Jan 1965, Tribe 8308, US, 1965. Doug Sahm: Doug Sahm & Band, NY, Oct 1972, Atlantic SD-7254, US, 1972; Doug Sahm & Friends, Rhino R2 71032, US, 1992; The Genuine Texas Groover, Atlantic/Rhino RHM2 7845, US, 2003. The Texas Tornados: The Best of Texas Tornados, Reprise 45511-2, US, 1994. Career rundown based largely on Joseph Levy's 'Doug Sahm and the Sir Douglas Quintet: A Brief History', online 3 Dec 2005 at www.laventure.net/tourist/sdq_hist.htm.]

'Sally Sue Brown' See Alexander, Arthur.

Sandburg, Carl [1878 - 1967] Carl August Sandburg was born in Galesburg, Illinois, on January 6, 1878, the son of Swedish immigrants. Leaving school at 13, he worked as a newsboy, milk delivery boy, barbershop shoeshine boy and milkman, and at 19 rode a boxcar to Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado and Iowa, and worked on a railroad section gang, as a farmhand and a dishwasher. He volunteered for the Army and served in Puerto Rico in the Spanish-American war, and then, back in the US, worked as a journalist and copywriter. He wanted to become a poet of the Midwestern American people and began his poetry career with the privately printed Reckless Ecstasy in 1904.

This got him nowhere and he continued in journalism until he became the secretary to Emil Seidel, Milwaukee's first socialist mayor, from his election in 1910 till his defeat in 1912. Sandburg's experiences had made him a sometime Wobbly, sometime anarchist and lifelong man of the Left. In 1914 some of his work was published in Poetry magazine, followed by the free-verse volume that made his reputation as a major poet of the Midwest, Chicago Poems (1916), followed by Cornhuskers (1918), Smoke and Steel (1920) and Slabs of the Sunburnt West (1922). After that he wrote the first part of a huge biography of Lincoln—Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years (2 volumes, 1926)—and published The American Songbag (1927), the collection of folksongs for which he is valued by generations of folksong students and musicians who have never read his poetry.

By this point he had also published his first two collections of stories for children, Rootabaga Stories (1922) and Rootabaga Pigeons (1923), followed by a third, Potato Face in 1930. After The American Songbag he produced the further volumes of his own poetry, Good Morning, America (1928) and The People, Yes (1936) and the second part of the Lincoln biography, Abraham Lincoln: The War Years, published in four volumes in 1939. In 1948 he published a novel, Remembrance Rock, in 1950 his Complete Poems plus a second folksong collection, The New American Songbag, and in 1952 his autobiography, Always the Young Strangers.

He was now 74 years old—and he was a man of 86 by the time Bob Dylan and his road-trip companions made their stoned way to his house to meet him in February 1964. They were directed to the 240-acre ranch at Hendersonville, North Carolina, where Sandburg and his family had lived since 1945, and found his wife Lillian—an internationally recognised goat breeder—sitting out on the porch. 'I am a poet,' Dylan announced. 'My name is Robert Dylan and I would like to see Mr. Sandburg.' Mrs. Sandburg duly took this message indoors. There was an extremely long wait. When Sandburg eventually emerged, unshaven and shambling but sharp-eyed, he surveyed the group of four and immediately honed in on Dylan. 'You look like you are ready for anything: I would like to ask you about 40 good questions,' he told him. Sandburg had never heard of Dylan nor listened to his work. Dylan handed him a copy of The Times They Are a-Changin', and PAUL CLAYTON proffered one of his own albums too. Sandburg expressed interest, they in turn enthused about The American Songbag, Dylan reiterated that he was a poet and a singer, and Sandburg said he'd always regarded poetry and songs as related arts. After 20 minutes, the old man announced that he must get on with his work. His visitors left disappointed. ROBERT SHELTON writes that 'Dylan had wanted this great writer to "open up" and take them into his study to see his books, his piles of manuscripts.'

Afterwards, Dylan told Shelton that Sandburg had said to him: 'You certainly look like an intense young man.'

'I'm a-Ridin' Old Paint' (see separate entry), having been 'found' by Margaret Larkin, was one of the songs popularised by its publication in The American Songbag; the collection of some 280 ballads and songs also contained, among those with a subsequent Dylan connection, 'Frankie & Albert' and 'Froggie Went a-Courtin''.

The Dylan news-item collector IAN WOODWARD thinks that Dylan went to call on Sandburg because of his folksong collecting rather than because he was a poet: 'There were plenty of poets he didn't go and see.' This seems wilfully at odds with accounts of the visit itself, and ignores the fact that Dylan often did call on other poets. We know that by the time he went to see Carl Sandburg he had long since been drawn into friendships with aspiring poets like EDDIE FREEMAN, had initiated a disappointing meeting with ROBERT GRAVES and had struck up a friendship with ALLEN GINSBERG; he would go on to hang out in California with FERLINGHETTI and many others; and in Chronicles Volume One we get a highly engaged Dylan's detailed account of his visits to, and attempts to work with, ARCHIBALD MacLEISH. For Dylan, Carl Sandburg was at least as much a poet, and a symbol of fellow Midwestern heroism, as a folksong collector. It has always been the creative writer, not the documentarist, that Dylan has admired. There were plenty of folklorists he didn't go and see.

Carl Sandburg died at the home Bob Dylan had visited, on July 22, 1967. He was 89. His ashes were returned to Galesburg, Illinois, as he'd wished, and buried behind the three-room cottage in which he'd been born. Ten years later, his wife's ashes were placed there too.

[Carl Sandburg's poetry now available as Complete Poems, New York: Harcourt, revised edn., 1970; The American Songbag, New York: Harvest Books, 1990. Sources: for poetry career: Ian Ousby, ed., The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1995; for early labour, www.uncp.edu/home/canada/work/canam/sandburg.htm timeline, seen online 13 Oct 2005; Robert Shelton's account of the Dylan-Sandburg meeting, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., pp.242–43. Ian Woodward quote, phone call to this writer, 1994.]

Santana, Carlos [1947 -] Carlos Augusto Alves Santana was born in Autlán de Navarro, Mexico, on July 20, 1947, the son of a mariachi violinist. Carlos swapped violin for guitar by the age of eight, later playing in dangerous border-town clubs in Tijuana before moving to San Francisco in 1961. Five years later he formed the Santana Blues Band, a jazz-rock fusion outfit with African and Latin elements (but not enough), which went down well at Fillmore West. By the time they played Woodstock in 1969, leading to their mega-success and a major record deal, the name had been pruned to Santana.

The first time Carlos Santana played with Dylan was as one of those nightly guests during Dylan's half-gospel, half-secular 'Musical Retrospective' tour in the fall of 1980. On November 13 in San Francisco he came on and played guitar alongside Dylan and the band on a run of four songs in mid-set: 'Covenant Woman', Solid Rock', 'What Can I Do for You?' and the live début of 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar'. Dylan seemed to hope he'd play more, because after the four he told the audience: 'Carlos is gonna be up here and he can play anytime he wants. He may, he may just be walking by'; and he did walk on by. However, when Dylan launched into his big-venue European tour of 1984—his first European dates for three years—Carlos' mega-selling group Santana co-headlined. Carlos Santana attended the press conference Dylan gave in Verona, Italy, before the tour began there on May 28, and the tour itself continued through to July 8 in Slane, Ireland. On their 27 shared dates, Carlos generally appeared on stage in Dylan's set to play electric guitar on the encores, and sometimes accompanied Dylan on acoustic guitar during his otherwise-solo acoustic numbers.

On these, he could decorate around Dylan attractively, but he was not popular with Dylan's crowd, because before these Dylan performances you had to stand through the almost interminable vulgar tedium of the group Santana's own sets.

Savakus, Russ [1925 - 1984] Russell A. Savakus, a bass player, was born in Reading, Pennsylvania, on May 13, 1925. Thirty years later he replaced Joseph Macho Jr. on bass for the afternoon Dylan session of July 29, 1965, and therefore plays on the 'Positively 4th Street' single. He returned for the next day's Highway 61 Revisited session, at which the album cut of 'From a Buick 6' and the alternative Japanese album cut of the same song were recorded, and which also yielded the early version of 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' mistakenly released by Columbia under the title 'Positively 4th Street'. Savakus did not play on any other Dylan sessions.

Though he worked a good deal with jazz musician Chet Baker, he was a more widely used bass player among folk-rock people, has toured and recorded with Don MacLean and has played on albums by Jean Ritchie, IAN & SYLVIA, JUDY COLLINS, RICHARD & MIMI FARIÑA, JOAN BAEZ, Buffy Sainte-Marie, THE CLANCY BROTHERS, NEIL DIAMOND, Phoebe Snow, Donny Hathaway, THE GREENBRIAR BOYS, John Denver, PETER, PAUL & MARY and DOC WATSON.

Russ Savakus died in Bangor, Pennsylvania, on June 25, 1984, aged 59.

Saved* [album, 1980] The nearest thing to a follow-up album Dylan has ever made: a Slow Train Coming II, and inferior. Two stand-out tracks, nonetheless: the turbulent 'Pressing On' (Dylan creating convincing hot gospel) and the intelligently submissive, courageous address (including a lovely, aptly devotional harmonica) that is 'What Can I Do for You?'

[Recorded Sheffield, AL, 12–15 Feb 1980, released as stereo LP Columbia PC 36553 (in UK CBS 86113), 19 or 20 Jun 1980.]

Saville, Philip [1934 -] See Madhouse on Castle Street, The.

Scaduto, Anthony [19?? -] Anthony Scaduto was Dylan's first biographer. He became a police reporter for the New York Post, specializing in organized crime stories. He also wrote showbiz biographies, including, in 1968, one called The Beatles. It was because he was an 'outsider' and a 'hack journalist' rather than a Dylan fan, that he wasn't too awed to go after his subject nor to expect, and receive, a series of interviews with Dylan in 1971 for his book, which was published in 1972. There was a commensurate amount of hostility among Dylan aficionados, who felt that someone more sensitive and knowledgeable should have done the book instead—yet Dylan undoubtedly prefers 'outsiders', and might have been less co-operative with the 'sensitive and knowledgeable' type. At any rate, retrospectively, most Dylan enthusiasts concede that Scaduto did a decent job: including an intelligent exploration of the John Wesley Harding album. As NIGEL WILLIAMSON noted, it was 'not only the first Dylan biography, but one of the first serious rock biographies' but 'has become very much a period piece.'

His other books include Mick Jagger, 1974, FRANK SINATRA in 1976 (looking at Sinatra's alleged Mafia connections), and, the same year, Scapegoat: The Lonesome Death of Bruno Richard Hauptmann (interesting sub-title), a contentious re-investigation of the Lindbergh case, which had engaged his interest in 1973, shortly after the modest success of his Dylan biography. He continued on his two-track career, writing, for instance, a lurid piece titled 'How the Mafia is Destroying the FBI' for Gallery magazine, a Playboy-type US monthly, in 1979, and interviewing Suzanne Vega, for New York Newsday in 1997.

[Anthony Scaduto, Bob Dylan, An Intimate Biography, New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1971, and London, W.H. Allen, 1972; paperback: London: Abacus, 1972, revised edn., 1973; New American Library edn., US 1979; republished London: Helter Skelter Publishing, 1997 and 2001. Mick Jagger, Mayflower paperback edn., London, 1975. Frank Sinatra, New York: Putnam Books, 1976. Scapegoat: The Lonesome Death of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, Putnam Books, 1976. 'How the Mafia is Destroying the FBI', Gallery, Feb 1979. Interview with Suzanne Vega, New York Newsday, 18 Oct 1997. Nigel Williamson, The Rough Guide to Bob Dylan, London: Rough Guides, 2004, p.368.]

Schatzberg, Jerry [1927 -] Jerrold Schatzberg was born in the Bronx on June 26, 1927. He attended the University of Miami and from 1954 to 1956 served an apprenticeship as a photographer under Bill Helburn before becoming a freelance fashion and portrait photographer. By the late 1960s he was directing TV commercials and in 1970 made his film director's début with, aptly, a movie about the fantasy reminiscences of a fashion model, Puzzle of a Downfall Child written by Adrien Joyce (aka Carol Eastman), starring Faye Dunaway and described by Halliwell's Film Guide as a 'Pretentious, fashionable, seemingly interminable collage of sex and high living.' Schatzberg's second film was the more widely noticed and better-regarded The Panic in Needle Park (1971), partly written by Joan Didion and starring Al Pacino, who also starred in Schatzberg's Scarecrow (alongside Gene Hackman). This very 1970s film about two confused drifter-victims of the alienation of the day was, according to the veteran critic Stanley Kauffmann 'a picture that manages to abuse two American myths at once—the Road and the Male Pair.'

These scrutinies of modish losers had a suggestion of autobiography about them, since Schatzberg was an independent both as photographer and film-maker, coming into movies at the start of a renaissance decade for Hollywood yet belonging to no 'school', and often attracting more admirers in Europe than the States. Nonetheless Schatzberg attempted more commercial films too, including Honeysuckle Rose (1980), starring WILLIE NELSON, Dyan Cannon and Slim Pickens, and The Seduction of Joe Tynan (1979), the latter probably his best-known and certainly most conventional work. A decade after it came Reunion, scripted by Harold Pinter from the novel of the same name by Fred Uhlman, filmed and produced in Europe in 1989 and starring Jason Robards. His last film was The Day the Ponies Came Back (2000), in which, coming full circle, the action takes place in the Bronx as a man wanders alone in search of his long-lost father, and thus his own past.

Jerry Schatzberg's photographic portrait subjects make for a fine list of odd bedfellows, including as they do Fidel Castro and FRANK ZAPPA, Milos Foreman and THE ROLLING STONES, Roman Polanski and JIMI HENDRIX, Francis Ford Coppola and ARLO GUTHRIE. More to the point, they include Bob Dylan, to whom Schatzberg was introduced by SARA DYLAN. He had known Sara since 1962 or '63, when, he recalls: 'she was modeling. The [Ford] agency asked me to do test shots of her. I did and we subsequently became friends. She was the first person to make me aware of Bob Dylan's music.' It was two or three years later before Schatzberg told Sara that he wanted to photograph Dylan. The most striking result was the iconic gatefold cover of Blonde on Blonde, showing Dylan blurred and golden, as if so hip that you couldn't even see or capture him in clear focus.

This Schatzberg shot was, at the time, the single most crucial visual signal that Dylan had changed again from the clear-cut sharp hipness of 1965 and Highway 61 Revisited to the warmer, softer, fuzzier, still-more-far-out Dylan of 1966 and that expansive, purring double-album. Schatzberg also took the black and white pictures on the inner sleeve (including a shot of himself), selected by Dylan from among shots he saw in Schatzberg's studio as well as some taken specially. Hence the self-portrait and the photograph of Claudia Cardinale, which was later withdrawn because of a dispute over clearance.

The Dylans, ALBERT GROSSMAN and Schatzberg all kept in touch afterwards: 'We went out socially. I was a fashion photographer and I would host big parties . . . they'd show up at the parties for a while. I also was part-owner in a couple of discotheques at different times and he used to hang out at them.' Schatzberg took many photographs of Dylan and his entourage in this period, most of which remain unpublished. Another of his studio shots from 1966 was used 32 years later for the slipcase front cover of the Bootleg Series Vol. 4: Bob Dylan Live 1966. This seems the inevitable choice. Many photographers took fine photographs of the volatile Dylan of 1966—but it was Jerry Schatzberg who, in creating the Blonde on Blonde cover shot, implanted that one shimmering image in a generation's mind.

[Puzzle of a Downfall Child, Universal/Newman-Foreman, US, 1970. The Panic in Needle Park, Gadd, US, 1971. Scarecrow, Warners, US, 1973. The Seduction of Joe Tynan, Universal, US, 1979. Honeysuckle Rose, Warners, US, 1980. Reunion, Rank/Les Films Ariane/FR3/NEF/GLC/TAG, UK-France-Germany, 1989. The Day the Ponies Came Back, Mondo Films, France, 2000.

First quote from Jerry Schatzberg, e-mail to this writer 26 Dec 2005; 2nd quote from interview in On the Tracks no.18, Grand Junction, CO, nia, seen online 21 Aug 2005 at www.b-dylan.com/pages/samples/jerryschatzberg.html (in which Ms. Cardinale is given as Claudia Cartinelli & Sara Lownds as Sara Lowndes). Quote from Halliwell's Film Guide, 11th edn., London: HarperCollins, 1995, p.926; quote from Stanley Kauffmann ditto p.998.]

Scheff, Jerry [19?? -] Jerry Scheff was born in Vallejo, northern California, grew up there in a housing project, took up the tuba in the school orchestra, swapped to bass violin in his teens and later to electric bass, after moving to Sacramento at age 14, where a supportive mother encouraged his interests by taking him to jazz and classical concerts, while he was also paying attention to R&B on the radio. By 16 he was playing clubs in San Francisco, preferring East Coast jazz to the 'cool' West Coast scene. Playing too much to do well in school, he was nudged into the military, joining the US Navy but landing in its music school in Washington, D.C. He quit the Navy for San Diego State College, then after some bad patches found work with the 16-year-old Billy Preston, which led to sessions in LA, but as a horn player initially. After the Watts riots of 1964 he felt prevented, to his great regret, from working within the black music scene again. He played on hits by the Association, with jazz guitarist Barney Kessel, on bubble-gum hits and with album artists from Johnny Mathis to the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band and from JUDY COLLINS to Leonard Nimoy, and he played on the Doors' album L.A. Woman.

After working with JAMES BURTON, he was invited (by Burton) to join the band he was assembling to play on ELVIS PRESLEY's return to live performance. He wasn't a fan, but was converted within minutes of meeting him, and took the gig. Scheff can be heard to advantage on June 1972's Elvis as Recorded at Madison Square Garden performances. He continued to work with him off and on until his death.

In late 1977, he reports: 'I got a call from saxophonist Steve Douglas telling me that Bob Dylan was rehearsing and had fired his bass player [ROB STONER]. I went down to play with him and all of a sudden we were on our way to Europe . . .' He omits to mention that before that he played bass in the studios on the whole of the Street Legal album. But he does mention that they toured 'on a private train. It was a wonderful tour. We had a private dining car complete with private chef and an extensive wine collection. When we left, say, Paris for Berlin, our cars were added to a train heading for Berlin, and away we went. . . . The last concert . . . was at Blackbush Aerodrome in England for 250,000 people: the largest crowd I have ever played for live.'

After that he settled for John Denver ('a very gracious and generous person in material ways') until T-BONE BURNETT recruited him for ELVIS COSTELLO's King of America. After years of further session-work, Scheff returned to working with the other Elvis—the dead one. The band and the vocal group and so on now tour around the world playing 'Elvis the Concert', playing live along with footage from early 1970s shows from which all the music except Presley's vocals has been removed. A backing musician's dream:

> 'For us, the only differences between the shows we did with Elvis and this present show are that the present show is twice as long as the old shows and we are twice as old. The intensity is just the same, and if anything . . . the band is playing even better today. Also, in the old days, we never knew what Elvis was going to do from one second to the next. That is understandably not the case now.'

Not perhaps the ideal attitude to have brought to playing with Bob Dylan.

[Quotes & background detail www.scheff.com/jerry/index.html. Elvis Presley: Elvis as Recorded at Madison Square Garden, RCA LSP-4776 (LP), 1972.]

Schleser, Burkhard [1960 -] See Parking Meter.

Scobie, Stephen [1943 -] Stephen Arthur Cross Scobie was born in Carnoustie, Scotland, on the last day of 1943. He first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1963, and his first published writing about him was a letter in the Glasgow Herald in summer 1965, protesting against 'a dumb "Dylan's gone electric" review'. Moving to Canada, he pursued an academic career at the University of Alberta and then the University of Victoria, publishing work on Canadian literature, Paris, literary theory and more, while also becoming a poet with over 20 books published. He was the 1981 winner of Canada's most prestigious literary prize, the Governor-General's Award, and has an entry in the Oxford Companion to Canadian Literature.

He has written a number of essays on Dylan's work in the fanzines ON THE TRACKS (US) and Judas! (UK) and used to be a regular contributor to the online newsgroup rec.music.dylan. He has sometimes fused his interest in Dylan and his work as a poet, as with And Forget My Name: A Speculative Biography of Bob Dylan, 1999. However, his major work on Dylan is Alias Bob Dylan, which, like AIDAN DAY's Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan (1984), pioneered a post-structuralist critical approach to its subject. Published in 1991, it was republished, updated, revised and much expanded, as Alias Bob Dylan Revisited in 2003. It is one of the critical works of consequence about Bob Dylan's art.

Scobie specifies patiently some of the new critical notions: that 'the very idea of "canon" itself is now in question', that 'What dies in "the death of the Author" is . . . his authority: . . . the position of the author as the final criterion by which every reading of a work is to be measured and judged', and that rather than being 'concerned with Bob Dylan as biography', the aim is to deal 'with the alias Bob Dylan: "Bob Dylan" as text . . . multiple and shifting . . .' Yet his book begins boldly with a preface about Robert Zimmerman's childhood in the odd milieu of Hibbing, Minnesota: an upbringing to give any artist-to-be a formative sense of the double, if not multiple, identity of everything ('Reality has always had too many heads', Dylan sings on 1997's 'Cold Irons Bound'), and this first part of the book is inspired, well-written and a better slice of biography than we get in the biographies (not least for a wonderful description of why 'Every stage that Bob Dylan has played on for the last thirty years has been, after Hibbing High School Auditorium, an anticlimax'). Indeed, despite his disclaimers, Scobie is actually very interested in Bob Dylan's biography and his book is none the worse for that.

Crucially, though, Scobie argues that 'the notion that we are not singular entities but variable and multiple personalities' is a major concern of Dylan's work itself, and that in this sense, 'far from being opposed to critical theory, Dylan's work thematizes one of its central questions.'

[Stephen Scobie: Alias Bob Dylan, Calgary, Alberta, Canada: Red Deer College Press, 1991; And Forget My Name: A Speculative Biography of Bob Dylan, Victoria, B.C., Canada: Ekstasis Editions, 1999; Alias Bob Dylan Revisited, Calgary: Red Deer College Press, 2003.]

Scorsese, Martin [1942 -] Martin Scorsese was born on November 17, 1942 in Flushing, Queens, New York. After wanting so strongly to enter the priesthood that he was entered a seminary in 1956, he turned instead to films, graduating in film studies at NYU in 1964. (He also went on to have five wives.) He co-edited Woodstock, 1970, and then directed Boxcar Bertha, 1972, followed by the film that defined his style, made his name and showed his talent, Mean Streets, 1973. After other work came Taxi Driver, in 1976, New York, New York, 1977, and Raging Bull, 1980. Subsequent films include The King of Comedy, 1983, The Color of Money, 1986, The Last Temptation of Christ, 1988, Goodfellas, 1990, and The Aviator, 2004.

From Mean Streets onwards, Scorsese deployed the rock music that so entrances him, foregrounding it to what was then a pioneering extent. But he has also made rock music the subject of films, beginning with his filming of THE BAND's farewell concert as The Last Waltz in 1978, for which ROBBIE ROBERTSON was a producer. This partnership didn't please everyone involved: LEVON HELM's autobiography has this to say, first about the concert event and its filming:

> 'As the evening progressed, I couldn't figure out what was wrong with Robbie. Instead of taking care of business and getting the guitar parts solid and in pitch, Robbie was running up to the microphone and pretending to sing the lead vocals on all the songs: my songs, RICK [DANKO]'s songs, even RICHARD [MANUEL]'s songs. . . . After the show, it became obvious what had happened: As we tried to play the best concert of our lives, it was picture-taking time for Scorsese and Robertson . . .
>
> 'We had just fought our way through five-plus hours of backing every "big star" who happened to live in California at the time, doing their songs. All we had accomplished was the same old thing we had worked our asses off to avoid—being another backup house band. Congratulations boys, you are once again relegated to the old "sideman" position. This means that GARTH [HUDSON], Rick, Richard and I get to enjoy billing underneath and below all the big names on the marquis.
>
> 'When Music from Big Pink was released, we made a point of emphasizing the collective, egoless nature of The Band—no individual outranked the other in importance. Now our group was being portrayed as Robbie Robertson and his back-up musicians. Years of history and hard work were corrupted in one fell swoop.'

Helm's criticism didn't stop there; he alleges that Scorsese and Robertson also had the whole project sewn up financially too:

> 'It was going to be a grand celebration of our legacy with the promise that it would generate huge profits and financial security for Rick, Richard, Garth and I. To say that it fell short of our expectations would be the understatement of the century. Robbie made himself executive producer of the project and placed himself and director Martin Scorsese, and all their flunkies and yes men, on huge salaries. And so began their year and a half love story of buying houses and apartments on both coasts, taping up all the windows with aluminum foil (like ELVIS did) and spending all night and all day "cutting" the movie. Scorsese said of the new partnership, he "just loved being around all that energy." That "energy" was referred to as coke and blow by most people . . . I'd hate to see that part of the budget. Better still, I'd like to see a real accountant and find out if they hid it in the travel, marketing, advertising or entertainment portions of the budget. I'm a patient man, but it's been almost 30 years and Garth and I are still waiting for our "financial security" to materialize. The sad thing is there's no more waiting for Rick and Richard.'

Scorsese and ROBBIE ROBERTSON are certainly long-time friends, even ex-housemates, and in the 1980s Robertson composed and produced the soundtrack for The Color of Money.

Helm's criticisms of The Last Waltz may be as valid as they are heartfelt, and it was obvious all along that the guest appearance of NEIL DIAMOND was incongruous (and could only be explained by Robertson's having produced a Diamond album), but in most respects, for the average viewer, the film was a masterly documenting of a great event.

Dylan was among those taking part, and though it was far from his best performance, he was sympathetically filmed, as were The Band when they were on stage with him—perhaps especially Levon Helm, in fact, whose keen relish of Dylan's unpredictability is captured beautifully. The film has recently been released on DVD, with extra material, colour correction, and re-mastering (by Robertson), but also with omissions and much rewriting of history; there is also now a 4-CD audio version, which is different again. And look up the DVD online and you'll soon find it billed as 'starring Robbie Robertson', rather than The Band.

The amount of Bob Dylan on offer varies between all these different issues. The original movie version showed his 'Forever Young', the reprise version of 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' and (sharing vocals with Richard Manuel) 'I Shall Be Released'; the original audio gave us the same, omitted the second verse of 'Forever Young' but also included Dylan's first rendition of 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down' and his 'I Don't Believe You'. The 4-CD box set adds 'Hazel' and a complete 'Forever Young'. (And then in February 2003 Rhino also reissued the original 1978 audio release but as a 30-track Limited Edition 3-LP box set, reproducing the original album, but using the 2002 remasters.)

Scorsese returned to music in 1987 when he directed Michael Jackson's 'Bad' video, and in 2003 directed the program 'Feel Like Going Home' in the acclaimed PBS series 'The Blues'. In 2005 he returned both to music and to Bob Dylan, making the extraordinary documentary No Direction Home: Bob Dylan ('A Martin Scorsese Picture'): an absolutely unprecedented Bobfest.

[The Band: concert at Winterland, San Francisco, CA, 25 Nov 1976, filmed as The Last Waltz, dir. Martin Scorsese, US, 1978; The Last Waltz—Special Edition DVD: MGM Home Video 1003426, US, 7 May 2002 (17332DVD, UK, Oct 2002); soundtrack first issued as The Last Waltz, Warner 3 WS 3146, 7 Apr 1978; 4-CD box set version The Last Waltz, Warner Bros/Rhino R2 78278, US, Apr 2002. No Direction Home: Bob Dylan, 2-DVD set, Paramount Home Video 097360310542, US, 20 Sep 2005 (UK, 5 Oct 2005).

Levon Helm: This Wheel's on Fire: Levon Helm and the Story of The Band (written with Stephen Davis), New York: Wm Morrow, 1993 & Chicago: A Capella Books, 2000; quotes taken from www.razormagazine.com/feature0204c.php.]

Scott, Jack [1936 -] Jack Scott was a rocker who found, after many a label switch, that the country-pop market was larger. He was born Giovanni Scafone, Jr. on January 24, 1936 in Windsor, Ontario, Canada, but when he was ten his family moved close to Detroit. He might have been an Italian Canadian, but he soon sounded like Nashville. His biggest successes were the US top 3 record 'My True Love' and the transatlantic hit 'What in the World's Come Over You', a hit in the UK alongside Jim Reeves' more lugubrious but comparable 'He'll Have to Go'.

Scott hasn't had a hit since 1960 and rarely performs live, though he does appear from time to time with the Starlight Drifters back in his hometown of Hazel Park, Michigan.

Dylan performed Scott's 'Let's Learn to Live & Love Again' at two concerts in 1990—in Berlin on July 5 and in Des Moines, Iowa, on August 26.

Sebastian, John [1944 -] John B. Sebastian Jr. was born in Greenwich Village on March 17, 1944, the son of a classical harmonica player and a radio script writer. Growing up in the city, he absorbed its music, learnt harmonica from his father, saw many musical greats in person—some of them as visitors to his parents' house, including WOODY GUTHRIE—and became a member of the Even Dozen Jug Band (with MARIA D'Amato—later MULDAUR—Stefan Grossman, Steve Katz, Joshua Rifkin, DAVID GRISMAN and Peter Siegel).

After that he joined the Mugwumps and then, with the Canadian ex-Mugwump Zal Yanovsky on guitar, bassist Steve Boone and drummer Joe Butler, he formed the Lovin' Spoonful. A regular act at the Nite Owl Café in the Village, they cut four unsuccessful sides for Elektra (for whom Sebastian had been a session musician) but then, perhaps to their surprise, found themselves a pop hit act with their next release. Turning down an offer from PHIL SPECTOR, they signed to Kama Sutra and in August 1965 released 'Do You Believe in Magic?', giving them a top 10 hit single and a top 40 album. This success was sustained over a period of several years, as the band produced albums full of catchy songs and hit singles that somehow managed to be happy without causing offence, among them 'Daydream', 'Nashville Cats', 'Summer in the City', 'Did You Ever Have to Make Up Your Mind?' and 'Darling Be Home Soon', mostly written by Sebastian. In 1967 a drug bust turned sour, and in 1968 the group collapsed.

By this time, Dylan and Sebastian had long been acquainted. They can be seen together in 1964 in photographs by Douglas R. Gilbert in the book Forever Young, to which Sebastian contributes an Introductory Note. One photo shows Dylan falling backwards onto an alarmingly candlewick bedspread, swamped by the entire Paturel family, owners of the Café Espresso in Woodstock, plus John Sebastian. (Dylan used to write in the studio apartment above the café.) Another shot, inside the café, shows Sebastian playing an acoustic guitar and looking hesitant, faced with the puzzlement of how to fit in with Dylan, cigarette-in-mouth cool, who is plunking an electric guitar.

On January 14, 1965, in New York City, Sebastian was one of those who played on that evening's session for the Bringing It All Back Home album (along with BRUCE LANGHORNE and others). Nothing performed that day made it onto the album, but 'I'll Keep It With Mine' was issued 20 years later on Biograph. That evening's versions of 'Love Minus Zero/No Limit', 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue', 'Bob Dylan's 115th Dream', 'She Belongs to Me' and 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' have not circulated.

(According to DAVID HAJDU's Positively 4th Street, Sebastian had also been there on the first day of Bringing It All Back Home sessions, January 13, playing bass as Dylan 'sang and played acoustic versions of eleven new songs'. This was the day that yielded the versions of 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' and 'Farewell Angelina' that emerged on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, but on which Sebastian receives no credit.)

In 1969 the still-youthful John Sebastian appeared, very tie-dyed, at the Woodstock Festival, babbling away but singing exquisitely, including on the lovely 'Sporting Life'. Various solo albums were followed by another unexpected huge hit, 'Welcome Back', a no.1 record in April 1976 (a TV-series theme song). His solo career has continued since, embracing TV and film appearances (including in the TV series 'Married with Children' and the 1980 PAUL SIMON movie One Trick Pony). He has played harmonica behind Willie Dixon, MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT, the Doors, JUDY COLLINS, CROSBY, Stills, Nash & YOUNG and many others.

In the 1990s he returned to the idea of the jug band, playing live as John Sebastian & the J-Band, which included Fritz Richmond (who died in 2005), the great Yank Rachell (who died in 1997) and GEOFF MULDAUR. In 2004, on a PBS special, he described in detail how he felt that 'Daydream' and 'Do You Believe in Magic' had influenced the music of THE BEATLES, while the same year saw 'Welcome Back' sampled on a hit by Mase (a rapper), also titled 'Welcome Back'. Sebastian still lives in Woodstock, New York.

[Douglas R. Gilbert, Forever Young: Photographs of Bob Dylan, New York: Da Capo, 2005. David Hajdu, Positively 4th Street: The Life and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña and Richard Fariña, London: Bloomsbury edn., p.232.]

Sedgwick, Edie [1943 - 1971] Edith Minturn Sedgwick was born in Santa Barbara, California, on April 20, 1943, into an etiolated, mentally unstable Old Boston Family. She grew up on the family ranch in California, attended private school and had already suffered two breakdowns by the time she met BOB NEUWIRTH, Bob Dylan's mid-1960s sidekick, in December 1964. Neuwirth told her biographer:

> 'Bobby Dylan and I occasionally ventured out into the poppy nightlife world. I think somebody who had met Edie said, "You have to meet this terrific girl." Dylan called her, and she chartered a limousine and came to see us. We spent an hour or two, all laughing and giggling, having a terrific time. I think we met upstairs at the Kettle of Fish on MacDougal Street, which was one of the great places of the Sixties. It was just before the Christmas holidays; it was snowing, and I remember we went to look at the display on Houston Street in front of the Catholic church. . . . Edie was fantastic. She was always fantastic.'

They met, that is to say, a month before Edie Sedgwick met ANDY WARHOL, and three months before she starred in her first Factory film, Vinyl, shot in March 1965. That year she also appeared in Space, Restaurant, Poor Little Rich Girl (which is what Warhol always called her, while spending her money), Kitchen, Horse and Beauty #2. In 1966 she was to have been the star of Chelsea Girls, but Warhol supposedly edited her out after she quit the Factory.

The Warhol people—Andy, Paul Morrissey and Gerard Malanga—all felt that she quit because she'd been misled by Neuwirth into believing both that Warhol was exploiting her and that 'Dylan's people' were going to make her a real star. Perhaps in this case, without his knowledge, this meant D.A. PENNEBAKER, since he was involved in Dylan's mid-1960s films, and Neuwirth had been an assistant on the first of them, Don't Look Back. Pennebaker shot 'a lot' of footage of Edie Sedgwick, he said later, simply because she often came round to his studio.

The non-Warhol people tended to feel that Sedgwick quit the Factory because she was provoked, in a row with Warhol in a restaurant in February 1966, when she had announced that she was going to star in a film with Dylan, and Warhol, out of spite, had asked her if she knew that Dylan was married. She left the room, made a phone call (to Dylan, Paul Morrissey assumed) and then left, never to return.

Either way, there's no evidence—and no real grounds to suppose—that Dylan and Edie had any personal relationship at all, let alone a significant one. She comes into the Dylan equation only because people used to believe that she is the girl whispering in Dylan's ear in a photograph on the foldout sleeve of the original Blonde on Blonde double-LP, and because of a persistent hunch by many people that, with however light a prompt, she was the 'blonde on blonde'. PATTI SMITH said so, in her poem 'Edie Sedgwick (1943–1971)': 'Everyone / knew she was the real heroine of / Blonde on Blonde. . . . / she was white on white / so blonde on blonde'. Smith's poem goes on to hint, and again this was widely whispered, that Edie Sedgwick was a subject of the album's song 'Just Like a Woman': 'she broke down / like a little girl / like a baby girl / like a lady.' It's also been claimed that she was the woman who wore the 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat', that she's the 'débutante' in 'Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again'. This may all or mostly be untrue; but even if it is all true, it doesn't signify Sedgwick was a significant person in Dylan's life—only that she was an interesting spectacle or personality, visually memorable and made more so by the air of tragedy she carried around with her: the fog, perhaps, in 'her fog, her amphetamines and her pearls'.

It's also been suggested that she and Warhol were both the subject of an earlier Dylan song, 'Like a Rolling Stone'—she the addressee who 'went to the finest school', he the 'Napoleon in rags'. Well, to go there is only possible 'if you're looking to get silly'. But there's no doubting that the ghost of Edie Sedgwick hangs around Blonde on Blonde.

Edie's last film was Ciao! Manhattan, which was filmed partly in 1967 in black and white, and partly in colour very soon before her death. Alternating between the two sets of footage, it alternates between 'now' and 'then', between 'fact' and fiction, between Edie looking the gorgeous young model and Edie the near-comatose self-abasement queen. She died of 'acute barbituate intoxication' in bed on the West Coast in the early hours of November 16, 1971. She was 28.

The film Factory Girl, in production in 2005, was going to include the supposed Sedgwick-Dylan 'affair', but he threatened legal action unless this theme was dropped. The film is going ahead, starring Sienna Miller as Edie and Guy Pearce as Warhol, but with no 'Bob Dylan'. According to The Times (October 28, 2005): 'To fill the void, producers have cast Hayden Christensen and given him messy hair, and sunglasses. "They aren't allowed to call him Bob Dylan," says Meredith Ostrom, who plays Velvet Underground collaborator Nico. "But he is absolutely the young Dylan. It's obvious."'

[Ciao! Manhattan, dir. John Palmer & David Weisman, US, 1972; DVD '30th Anniversary edition' with outtakes, US, 2002. Bob Neuwirth & Pennebaker quotes, Jean Stein, Edie: An American Biography, George Plimpton, ed., New York: Knopf, 1982, p.166 & nia. Patti Smith: 'Edie Sedgwick (1943–1971)', Seventh Heaven, Boston: Telegraph Books, 1972. Factory Girl, dir. George Hickenlooper, written Captain Mauzner (aka Josh Klausner) & Simon Monjack, Bob Yari Productions, US, 2006.]

Seeger, Mike [1933 -] Michael Seeger was born in New York City on August 15, 1933 into, yes, that Seeger family. His father was the academic musicologist Charles Seeger, his mother the avant-garde composer Ruth Crawford Seeger, his half-brother PETE SEEGER and his sisters Peggy, Barbara and Penny Seeger.

Mike grew up in Maryland, close to Washington, D.C., on a heavy diet of folk music. He learnt to play a large number of instruments: guitar, banjo, auto-harp, harmonica, fiddle, mandolin, dulcimer, dobro, jew's harp and pan pipes (quills). He began making recordings of traditional musicians on his own tape recorder at age 20, and later field-recorded for MOSES ASCH's Folkways label, including making the first recordings of ELIZABETH COTTEN (she was closest to hand, being the family maid), and field-recording the Stoneman Family, the Lilly Brothers, Doc Boggs, Don Stover and many more. In 1958, with JOHN COHEN and TOM PALEY he co-founded the seminal folk-revivalist group THE NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS. He has also performed, and toured the world, as a solo artist and in duos with various of his romantic partners. He has been the director of a number of folk festivals, the producer of instrument instruction books and videos, worked with innumerable other musicians and even won a GRATEFUL DEAD Rex Foundation award. In 1960, with Pete, he co-wrote and performed the original music for the fiction film Indian Summer, in which 'an old farmer on New York's Delaware River is displaced by the construction of a reservoir', and 20 years later was the sole subject of Yasha Aginsky's 42-minute documentary film 'Homemade American Music'.

Every so often in recent years he has rounded up musicians from his past and recorded with them to produce a series of 'reunion albums'. Dylan was drawn in to one of these. In the same month that we believe Dylan recorded World Gone Wrong, May 1993, he got together with Mike Seeger for a re-recording of his own 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', with Seeger on banjo, in Los Angeles. Alongside tracks Seeger shared with MARIA MULDAUR, DAVID GRISMAN, RALPH STANLEY and the inevitable scattering of other Seegers, the Bob Dylan/Mike Seeger track duly appeared in 1995 on the Third Annual Farewell Reunion album.

'Mike Seeger's really real', wrote Bob Dylan in the poem 'Blowin' in the Wind', published in Hootenanny magazine in December 1963. In Chronicles Volume One, 40 years later, he elaborated at some length. The gist of it comes here, when he explains that Mike Seeger struck him as so good that it pushed him into truly deciding, for the first time, that he would have to write songs: 'He . . . played in all the genres and had the idioms mastered—Delta blues, ragtime, minstrel songs, buck-and-wing, dance reels, play party, hymns and gospel—being there and seeing him up close, something hit me. It's not as if he just played everything well, he played these songs as good as it was possible to play them. . . . The thought occurred to me that maybe I'd have to write my own folk songs, ones that Mike didn't know. That was a startling thought. Up 'til then, I'd gone some places and thought I knew my way around. And then it struck me that I'd never been there before.'

[Bob Dylan with Mike Seeger: 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', LA, 19 May 1993, on the Various Artists compilation album Third Annual Farewell Reunion, Rounder ROU-0000313, Somerville, MA, 1995. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.70–71.]

Seeger, Pete [1919 -] The youngest of three sons of ethnomusicologist Charles Seeger, an academic grandee, and his first wife Constance, Seeger was born on May 3, 1919, in Paterson, New Jersey. His parents divorced in 1927, when Peter was eight. Five years later, his father married Ruth Crawford, and moved the expanding family to Washington in 1935. Pete's half-siblings by this marriage included MIKE and Peggy Seeger, both of whom grew up to be folksingers too, the latter marrying the British communist folksinger EWAN MacCOLL.

A comrade of WOODY GUTHRIE, blues giant LEADBELLY, the great folklorist ALAN LOMAX and other formative figures in the history of 20th century musical America, Seeger spent decades touring the world, adapting songs and passing them along, while preaching ceaselessly the primacy of the common people and democratic politics, and the power of song to inspire, uplift and persuade people into paths of political righteousness.

He and two others formed the pioneering folk group the Almanac Singers, setting up a Greenwich Village commune in 1940. Guthrie joined the group in 1941, and Seeger encouraged him to write his great autobiography, Bound for Glory. Seeger was a tireless internationalist, a leading light of Sing Out! and a founder of Broadside magazines and, in 1948, of the Weavers, the group that was, in popularising folksong and songs that copied folksong instead of Tin Pan Alley, the precursor of such later popularisers as the Kingston Trio and PETER, PAUL & MARY.

Seeger was also a brave man blacklisted in the McCarthy era after standing up to the House Un-American Activities Committee under threat of a gaol-sentence (and was long blacklisted by ABC-Television's 'Hootenanny' folk showcase). He was a lifelong advocate of universal brotherhood—if, like most of us, a rather shorter-term enthusiast for sisterhood—and a campaigning supporter of black rights long before the movement was widespread or fashionable. You'll find him standing alongside Martin Luther King in photographs back in 1957.

Nor was Seeger closed to later manifestations of 'the struggle'. In his late 70s, admirably, Seeger ensured that a 2-CD collection of his songs—by various artists, but with notes by Seeger himself—made room to detail current campaigning organisations from Peace Action and Honor the Earth to World Hunger Year and the Center for Defense Information, and to remind us that 1998 was the 25th anniversary of the murder of Victor Jara in Chile. (All rather more admirable than advocating the attractions of Victoria's Secret underwear.)

As well as an uncountable number of recordings, Seeger has published at least 27 books and songbooks, from the self-published How to Play the Five-String Banjo (1948), Bantu Choral Folk Songs (1959) and a Moscow State Publishers edition of Pete Seeger Sings Songs of the American People (1965) through to 1991's Everybody Says Freedom and beyond.

He became, inevitably, a star of the anti-star folk revival movement of the late 1950s and early 1960s, and a father-figure to more than one generation. He was also the first established performer to be influenced by Bob Dylan. By the end of 1962 Seeger was performing Dylan songs and, presciently, calling him the most important new songwriter of the time—though in writing 'Where Have All the Flowers Gone?' in the mid-1950s, Seeger can himself be said to have created the modern Protest Song. It isn't far from this anthem to 'Blowin' in the Wind'. At the 1963 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, very soon after the two had visited GREENWOOD, Mississippi, together, Seeger and Dylan sang Dylan's tedious and self-righteous song 'Ye Playboys & Playgirls' at one of the afternoon workshops. It is their only officially released duet performance.

Yet Seeger's songwriting might be said to have reached full bloom with 'Where Have All the Flowers Gone?', whereas Dylan's had barely begun to peep up from the compost of the folk-revival movement with 'Blowin' in the Wind'. For all his international wandering and co-operative cross-fertilisation, Seeger's writing has never really developed in the 60 years or so that he has been at work. Indeed Seeger has written and composed remarkably little. Of the 200 songs on Where Have All the Flowers Gone: The Songbook, Pete was creditably quick to point out that most were other people's, or everybody's, and he is associated with them only because he tinkered with them slightly or sang them a lot. Solo invention was rare. The words of his best song, 'Turn, Turn, Turn', are, with one line's exception, from Ecclesiastes. Overall, his well-meant quilt-making is not so much the folk process as creative paucity.

If the Seeger muse is a meagre muse, it is partly political correctness that stifles it. His compulsion to be Goody Two-Shoes also overrides the critical faculties most people turn upon themselves as well as on others. There is no abrasion or anti-pomposity-alarm at work with Seeger. When Dylan called him 'saintly' it was a two-edged, sly critique: exactly the kind of subtle barb Seeger is incapable of. The main feature of his persona is an overarching piety. Even when you're in solid agreement with his politics, it's hard not to want to hit him.

His 'saintliness' also embraces a suspect just-folksiness. In the stimulating and professorial Washington home of his teenage years, Pete learnt the songs of the people, not least from family servant and folksinger ELIZABETH COTTEN, the writer of 'Freight Train'. When he grew up, he went to folksy old Harvard (and in due course dropped out).

Alongside the earnestness and working-man style sits an uneasy 'sense of humour', not coursing naturally through everything but offered as a special, separate segment in his work. Just as there are earnest songs, so there are humorous songs. These have a fatal, fey whimsy once widespread on the folk scene. To listen to the insufferably cutesy 'All Mixed Up', or to be jollied through 'Get Up and Go' ('How do I know my youth is all spent? / My get-up-and-go just got up and went / But in spite of it all I'm able to grin / And think of the places my get-up has bin'—he found these words on a diner-menu and liked them) is to be plunged back to the excruciating sing-along folk-world in which Julie Felix was always going to the zoo, zoo, zoo.

This sense of fun did not extend to tolerance of other people's ideas of 'folk'. When Dylan 'went electric' at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival (where blues artists had been 'electric' many years earlier), Seeger wanted to cut the cables with the woodsman's axe with which he had been conducting a work-song workshop.

Even if you knew nothing of his history of antagonism to rock'n'roll, you could tell that Seeger carried this disapproval right next to the heart on his sleeve from hearing him perform. He has exactly the sort of wooden unmusicality that white banjo playing is heir to. Considering the people among whom he has moved as a performer and those he has identified with politically throughout a long career and life, it's quite remarkable, and sadly ironic, how little impact black music had upon his musicality.

'Pete showed us all that caring about people is the music. We follow the path he has blazed—with gratitude and pride,' declared Peter Yarrow of Peter, Paul & Mary in the 1990s. These people still believe that well-meaningness makes good music, and, like Seeger, still prove that it doesn't.

[Bob Dylan & Pete Seeger: 'Ye Playboys & Playgirls', Newport, RI, 27 Jul 1963, Newport Broadside (Topical Songs) Vanguard VRS-9144 (mono) / 79144, NY, 1964; CD reissued Vanguard VCD 770003-2, NY, 1997.]

Seger, Bob [1945 -] Robert Clark Seger was born on May 6, 1945 in Dearborn, Michigan, a town long since sprawled in upon by Detroit. He was a pre-SPRINGSTEEN 'Heartland rocker', a blue-collar guitar star who started out with Bob Seger & the Last Heard and the Bob Seger System before settling for the group he steered to mega-sales, Bob Seger & the Silver Bullet Band. His first album, Ramblin' Gamblin' Man (by the Bob Seger System) came out in 1969, the first of four made for Capitol; after one oldies album on a smaller label (Smokin' O.P.'s on Palladium) he switched to Reprise, released his sixth album under his own name and with a title that seems to have been prescient about the phenomenon of instant nostalgia—issued in 1973 it was called Back in '72. The seventh album, reasonably enough, was called Seven, and its opening track was Seger's signature song 'Get Out of Denver'. Issued as a single, it was not the huge hit it's assumed to have been: it reached only no.80 on the Billboard Hot 100, but in the decades since its 1974 release it has become regarded as some kind of classic. Certainly its remorselessly simple upbeat churn—pop made rock only by being guitar-led—typified the Seger style. After Beautiful Loser (which marked his return to Capitol) he made the first albums with the Silver Bullet Band, Live Bullet and Night Moves, both 1976, the latter his real breakthrough album, making the top 10 album charts and giving him a top 5 single with the LP's title track. He might have looked like Roy Wood and sounded like Status Quo, but he typified a certain sort of 1970s Americana. After 1995's album It's a Mystery there was a ten-year gap before the next new album, announced for 2004 as Face the Promise but still unreleased as of November 2005.

His slender connections with Bob Dylan are these: when Dylan and TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS played Clarkston, Michigan, on July 1, 1986, Seger came on stage for the last encore number and shared vocals on 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'; and 18 years later, when Dylan's Never-Ending Tour spent three nights at the small, old-fashioned State Theater in Detroit, Dylan paid Seger the tribute of a one-off performance of 'Get Out of Denver' as the last encore song in his second-night set, on March 16, 2004.

Self Portrait* [1970] The tenth album, and misjudged on Dylan's part. You could have made a good minor album out of it if you'd cut it down from the overblown double-LP set that it was. There was no reason why Dylan shouldn't have made this new departure—largely into pop songs and Tin Pan Alley country material written by other people—but it just wasn't that good. It was the cue for large numbers of Dylan's followers to give up on him. In Chronicles Dylan claims that this was what he'd set out to do: that the album's vapidness was deliberate. That's rather an insult to the musicians who worked on it with him, and to whom he was perfectly respectful at the time. Either way, he had deconstructed himself.

Now, seen in the long back-projection of his work, it isn't gruellingly important that the album was so second-rate—but when it was new, in 1970, the adjustments necessary to come to terms with Self Portrait seemed enormous. Dylan was demanding more and giving less with this album. At first hearing, much of the work was trite, rutted and simplistic: and that, in itself, had huge and perplexing impact. Here was an apparently mediocre collection of work from a man who, rightly or wrongly, had become accepted as the genius of our generation.

There were, of course, people who didn't face these difficulties—those who simply listened and enjoyed; and Dylan has always been on their side, against classification, with those who, in his view, know 'too much to argue or to judge'. All the same, the question 'How should we respond to this album?' was a common one among those whose concern isn't disproportionately with Dylan's music at the expense of a concern with the words.

First, there is a blandness of defeat about it, which comes across most clearly through Dylan's voice. It conveys, especially in the 'happy' songs, a sort of choking caution (listen, for instance, to 'I Forgot More')—an impression that Dylan has walked, Godlessly, close to the valley of the shadow of death and dare not now explore beyond the simplistic verities adhered to by Nashville, Tennessee. It is not so much mental plumpness as an exhaustion of courage—as if the Dylan of Self Portrait has placed himself under house-arrest because the old Insanity Factory is too close to his gates. And while this kind of rest/retreat is understandable enough in the man, it doesn't do much for his art.

The parallel with the Born Again Christian albums Slow Train Coming and especially Saved is very strong: on these, Dylan s panic at Godlessness has him clinging not to Nashville's country verities and simplicities but to the gospel ones of the Bible Belt. The main virtue of 'Saving Grace' is that it confesses this need-to-cling, just as 'Watching the River Flow' was to do not long after Self Portrait. Yet just as Slow Train Coming and Saved are good enough to repay countless plays, so too Self Portrait, albeit a very minor Dylan work, has its own riches; and now that the album is well into the past, it is easier to enjoy them.

First, the album does not lack warmth; and second, its self-deprecation can be seen as showing an egolessness which is, now and then, a welcome ingredient in Dylan's largely ego-emphatic output. As Bill Damon put it (Rolling Stone, September 3, 1970): 'With all of its unity and inclusiveness, Self Portrait is too complex to have a point of view. . . . It is Eastern in its egolessness. . . . Dylan does remind us on this album of all the ways we have known him . . . but Dylan's image serves only his music.'

Even the cover painting has its virtues: its child-like technique and colouring are a relief from image-building ad-man photography, and interesting also because, like the painting Dylan did for THE BAND's Music from Big Pink album, it owes a lot to the pen-and-ink sketches of WOODY GUTHRIE.

Quite a throwback—and on one level, the whole album is a throwback: a deliberate package of Golden Oldies, from folk to country to chart-climbing pop. Best tracks are 'Days of '49', 'Early Morning Rain', 'Let It Be Me', 'Belle Isle', 'Copper Kettle' and 'Wigwam'.

In September 2005 it was reported that an out-take from the Self Portrait sessions, Dylan's recording of the traditional song 'Tell Ol' Bill', never previously circulated even among collectors, was lined up for imminent release on the soundtrack album to the film North Country. By October 2005 this had been contradicted and we were told that Dylan had recorded the song anew for the film, and that the backing musicians included Elana Fremerman, fiddle player from the group Hot Club of Cowtown; and then it transpired that this recording was not only new but of a new song: that Dylan had taken the title 'Tell Ol' Bill' but written a song entirely different in melody and words from the traditional song. (A novelty in itself, in the age of "Love and Theft".)

The film is the real-life-based story of one woman's struggle in the 1980s against discrimination by Eveleth Mines of Minnesota—a taconite mining and processing company (owned by Oglebay Norton Co. of Cleveland, Ohio) that opened in 1965 and is based in Eveleth, a very small town less than 20 miles east of that other taconite town, Hibbing.

Thus an apparent resourceful redirecting of attention to the Self Portrait sessions proved to be no such thing.

[Recorded Nashville, TN, 24 & 26 Apr & 3 May 1969; Isle of Wight Festival, UK, 31 Aug 1969; and NY, 3–6

Mar 1970; released as stereo 2-LP set, Columbia C2X 30050 (in UK CBS 66250/S 64085-86), 8 Jun 1970.

The Band: Music from Big Pink, NY & LA, Jan–Feb 1968, Capitol SKAO 2955, LA (Capitol ST 2955, London), 1968. Bob Dylan: 'Tell Ol' Bill', NY, 4 Mar 1970, unissued. Bob Dylan: 'Tell Ol' Bill', nia, 2005, Music from the Motion Picture 'North Country', Columbia/Sony Music Soundtrax 1CK 97777, NY, 11 Oct 2005 (which also includes previously released Dylan tracks). North Country, dir. Niki Caro, US, 2005.]

Sellers, Brother John [1924 - 1999] John Sellers was born in Clarksdale, Mississippi, on May 27, 1924. Abandoned by his parents in a flood at the age of four, he was performing in tent shows at five, removed from a bordello at the age of ten by Mahalia Jackson (but what was she doing there?), taken to live with her in Chicago and encouraged to sing with her and with BIG BILL BROONZY. From 1945 to 1951 he stuck with gospel but then went secular and in London sang with a jazz group that included the famous British cartoonist Trog. He recorded blues and gospel from the 1940s onwards, billed as Reverend John Sellers on Miracle in 1948 and as Johnny Sellers on some 1952 blues sides. He moved to New York City and fell in with the Greenwich Village world, recording 'folk blues' in the predictable way. He was not a great singer or an especially dexterous tambourine-shaker, but according to Studs Terkel, whose talks he helped illustrate with song around the end of the 1950s, he had 'a clarity and a sense of urgency. . . . Brother John had a way of making things come alive.' He was best on material like 'Wade in the Water'.

In 1961 in the Village, Dylan and MARK SPOELSTRA were 'the Dungarees' in Brother John & the Dungarees, playing back-up guitars and harmonicas behind Sellers at hoot nights at Folk City, where he was an MC and a regular performer. Dylan played at his birthday party there in August 1961.

In 1963 Sellers appeared in the first Broadway production of the black playwright-poet-novelist Langston Hughes' Tambourines to Glory (first published as a novel in 1958). He also collaborated with choreographer Alvin Ailey on the latter's Blues Suite and Revelations and continued to perform as a musician in Ailey's American Dance Theatre until 1997. Sellers died in New York City on March 27, 1999, in the middle of suing Ailey over royalties and copyright.

[Main sources include the Independent's obituary, nia, seen reproduced without author byline 13 Feb 2006 online at http://elvispelvis.com/johnsellers.html.]

Sexton, Charlie [1968 -] Charles Wayne Sexton was born in San Antonio, Texas, on August 11, 1968, and like his younger brother Will, became a guitarist prodigiously young. He was taken under Joe Ely's wing, became a friend of STEVIE RAY VAUGHAN and was already famous on Austin's music scene by the time he signed a record deal and made his first album at the age of 16. Pictures for Pleasures was released in 1985. He toured with David Bowie in 1987, joined the Arc Angels in the early 1990s (appearing on their ferociously good 1992 album), formed the Charlie Sexton Sextet in 1995, produced and played on an Edie Brickell album, and played on albums by Don Henley, Lucinda Williams and the excellent Shawn Colvin.

He has also appeared in, and /or written and played music for, a small number of films, including Beverly Hills Cop II (1987) and Air America (1990). In Thelma & Louise (1991) he played a bar-band singer, and in F.T.W. (1994) a cowboy called, er, Slim. In 2003 he also appeared in Masked & Anonymous—because by that time his career path had crossed with Bob Dylan's.

It has been rumoured that he was first involved with Dylan when contributing to some demos with him in 1983–85, but no such material has been logged, let alone circulated. A more reliable first sighting is when Dylan's Never-Ending Tour hit Austin on October 25, 1991 and Charlie Sexton and Jimmie Dale Gilmore both came on stage to play guitars with Bob and the band on 'Everything Is Broken'. Five years went by, almost to the day, and Dylan was back in town, this time for two nights at the Austin Music Hall, and Charlie Sexton appeared both nights. That October 26 (1996)—allegedly brought on in instant response to Dylan's visible falling out in mid-set with his longstanding lead guitarist JOHN JACKSON—Sexton played on 'Man of Peace', 'Where Teardrops Fall', 'Maggie's Farm', 'Like a Rolling Stone' and 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'; the following night he was back at exactly the same point in the set, and played on 'Seeing the Real You at Last', 'Positively 4th Street', 'Cat's in the Well' and again on 'Like a Rolling Stone' and 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'.

After a further couple of years, he was called into the Never-Ending Tour band itself, replacing BUCKY BAXTER as from June 5, 1999 in Denver, Colorado (the first of the shared tour with PAUL SIMON), and remaining in place until after the last concert of 2002, on November 22 in Fairfax, Virginia (except for a couple of numbers in the middle of the set that August 31, in Grand Junction, Colorado, when, early on, he was replaced for 'To Be Alone with You' and 'Lay Lady Lay' by DAVE ALVIN). When the tour resumed in 2003, Sexton had been replaced by BILLY BURNETTE.

Altogether, Sexton played in 396 Bob Dylan concerts. He also took part in the recording of the "Love and Theft" album and, as noted, the filming of Masked & Anonymous. He's also to be glimpsed in the video of ''Cross the Green Mountain'. For all that he was a guitar prodigy in his youth, he never took—and would not have been allowed to take—a virtuoso rôle in Dylan's band. He augmented rather than led. He worked co-operatively with LARRY

CAMPBELL, the other main guitarist with the band throughout Charlie Sexton's time in it, and aside from the horrible vocal choruses they added to 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', he was a pleasure to listen to. For many, he was more of a pleasure to watch; it was widely felt that his cheekbones put the sex in Sexton.

Surprisingly for someone who made such an early start, he has still made only four solo albums. After 1985's Pictures for Pleasures came Charlie Sexton in 1989; then, with Charlie Sexton & Sextet, he released Under the Wishing Tree in 1995. After that his devotees had to wait a decade for Cruel and Gentle Things. Such a spare tally of releases is especially odd granted that he feels, as he told the Rocky Mountain News: 'Touring is fine, but for me records are the thing. That's the legacy everyone leaves behind.' There's probably nothing like touring with the Dylan of the late 1990s and beyond to urge that conclusion upon you.

Meanwhile Sexton is back in Austin, Texas. He might be perplexed, despite his good looks, to read this postscript to his online movie database biography: 'Trivia—he is a guitar player.'

[Charlie Sexton: Pictures for Pleasures, MCA 31163, US, 1985; Charlie Sexton, MCA 6280, 1989; Under the Wishing Tree, MCA 11208, 1995; Cruel and Gentle Things, Back Porch, nia, 2005. The Arc Angels: Arc Angels, Geffen 24465, 1992. Movie Database bio: www.imdb.com/name/nm0786644/bio, seen online 22 Nov 2005.]

Shakespeare, Robbie [1953 -] See Sly & Robbie.

Shakespeare in "Love and Theft" Eric Lott's book about minstrelsy, Love and Theft, from which Dylan thieves his 2001 album title, establishes that the minstrel shows incorporated cod-Shakespeare recitals: snatches of speeches like Hamlet's 'to be or not to be', treated with varying degrees of competence, melodrama and comedy.

In parallel, Dylan offers his own comic Shakespeare touches on the "Love and Theft" album. In 'Po' Boy' we have this wittily rhyming, sly extrapolation from Othello: 'Othello told Desdemona "I'm cold, cover me with a blanket / By the way, what happened to that poisoned wine?" / She said "I gave it to you, you drank it"', delivered with all Dylan's unimpaired capacity for squeezing whatever number of syllables he cares to into a line and for catching conversation with authentic casualness. And in 'Floater (Too Much to Ask)', he gives us this marvellous comic compression of a contemporary adolescent conversation which, by calling the speakers Romeo and Juliet, he contrasts so good-humouredly with the language of their Shakespearean equivalents: 'Romeo, he said to Juliet, "You got a poor complexion, / It doesn't give your appearance a very youthful touch!" / Juliet said right back to Romeo, "Why don't you just shove off / If it bothers you so much?"'

But there is a third Shakespeare presence on "Love and Theft", and not, as it happens, comic in character. As so very often, Dylan's skill with literary allusion is such that if you don't happen to pick up on the echo, it doesn't obtrude, distract or bother you; but if you do pick up on it, it deepens the resonance of the song. In this instance, it occurs in 'Bye and Bye', when Dylan sings that lovely line 'I'm not even acquainted with my own desires'. The delivery, on the track, is modest, reflective, personally confessional, but at the same time the language itself is of Shakespearean eloquence. It comes from Rosalind, the heroine of As You Like It, in Act One, Scene 3, when she has been exiled and accused of treason by the duke, and she replies: 'I do beseech your grace, / Let me the knowledge of my fault bear with me: / If with myself I hold intelligence / Or have acquaintance with mine own desires . . .'

[Eric Lott, Love and Theft: Blackface Minstrelsy and the American Working Class, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.]

Shelton, Robert [1926 - 1995] Robert Shelton, who was born Robert Shapiro on June 28, 1926 in Chicago, was one of the very few arts journalists whose work had a tangible influence on the shape of the 1960s.

At age 13, still in Chicago, Shelton discovered jazz and blues; drafted into the US Army in France at 18 in 1944, he developed there another lifelong passion, becoming a Europhile with a special abiding love of France, French culture and cinema. After World War II, he attended the School of Journalism at Northwestern University, gaining an early BSc in journalism and moving in the early 1950s to New York City, where he soon joined the New York Times.

His political allegiance, which was to a passionate, perhaps naive, liberalism—he always looked for the best in individuals and in humanity—was tested when the Eastland Committee (part of the McCarthyite machinery of the times) subpoenaed him in a case of mistaken identity. He could have corrected their error and escaped their attentions, but he refused to dignify their questions by answering at all; thus he paid his dues in siding with the angels.

From 1958 to 1968 he was the paper's folk, pop and country-music critic, and with a rare commitment and gusto, rightly recognised at the outset that what was beginning to happen in and around Greenwich Village would catalyse a musical and cultural revolution around half the world.

Instead of descending from his prestigious newspaper to turn in adequate reviews of whatever headline acts were in town, he entered fully into the milieu of coffee-bars, folk festivals and bohemian basements, urging the creation of Gerde's Folk City, co-editing the annual NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL programmes and above all befriending and encouraging new talent. While knowledgeable about the history of a wide range of American music, he was actively responsive to the young and fresh.

At the first Newport Folk Festival, in 1959, he 'discovered' 18-year-old JOAN BAEZ, and over the next decade aided the careers of many others including PHIL OCHS, Janis Ian and JUDY COLLINS. Catching the very different talent of FRANK ZAPPA at his first East Coast shows, Shelton's review on Christmas Day 1966 recognised presciently 'the first pop group to successfully amalgamate rock'n' roll with the serious music of Stravinsky and others.' But it was Shelton's write-up of the 20-year-old support-act to THE GREENBRIAR BOYS at Gerde's, one Bob Dylan, on September 29, 1961 which, kick-starting Dylan's career, made both of them famous.

Shelton's prose could suffer from an old-fashioned 'professionalism' and glib metaphor, but more often and more importantly it was acute, accurate and thoughtful beyond the call of journalistic duty, and it says much for these qualities that that first write-up of Dylan still captures the essence of this most chameleonic star, 45 years later: not least in its description of Dylan's voice and its understanding of how much this drew upon the pre-war country blues tradition. Under the pseudonym Stacey Williams, he also wrote the début album's sleevenotes. He continued to write essays about and reviews of Dylan's work for many years, including a review of the New York Town Hall concert of April 1963, in which he called Dylan a 'young giant', a review of Dylan & the Hawks' Forest Hills concert of August 1965, and a piece on the 'Born Again' period in 1980.

In writing his main work, the critical biography No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, 1986—a project which took almost 20 years—Shelton was cruelly messed-about by succeeding publishing editors, so that after years writing and re-writing 300,000 words, he then had the dispiriting, time-demanding task of pruning 100,000 off (with Dylan, of course, inconveniently active all the while).

Shelton chose to move out of New York City to get the book written, and moved to a tiny cottage up a dirt track off Sydenham Hill in south-east London, where he also found himself grappling with an isolation worse than the interference he foresaw himself suffering if he stayed in New York. Fêted by the music industry as well as valued in the Village, he was disdainful of the bribes constantly offered, yet resentful of others' profiting from the very integrity that kept him poor: bitter, for instance, that Dylan's manager ALBERT GROSSMAN could use his Janis Joplin review to land her a huge Columbia Records contract (making Grossman mega-bucks overnight) precisely because Columbia knew Shelton's rave-review could not have been bought.

So Shelton escaped all that, and from the pressures he felt would rain down on him from Dylan's office if he were in town—and landed up in a miserable, philistine part of London where there was no music in the cafés at night (there were no cafés at night), it could take 90 minutes to get in or out of the city center, and there was certainly no equivalent to the camaraderie and street-life of the Greenwich Village in which Shelton had been a star. In Sydenham he was just a middle-aged American: a small fish in no pond at all but rather, out of water. And getting divorced, from Carol, his third wife (there had been two short-lived marriages in his youth), who had hoped in vain that he might turn her into a country-music star.

Shelton soon ran out of money too, and had to keep breaking off from the book to write bits of journalism, not least to pay storage on 2,000 albums acquired from reviewing in New York (there's no such thing as a free platter). There was no room for them all in the cottage, where the book alone took up a room full of filing cabinets. He generally wouldn't let people even peep into this room, perhaps because the paper-work was a lot less, or a lot less ordered, than he wanted to maintain, or perhaps because the extreme guardedness he derided in Bob Dylan he came close to himself. While trying to surround himself with bright young things, essentially he worked alone.

Out of touch with any thriving arts scene of the kind he had helped to shape before his emigration, he was also out of touch with Dylan collectors. Wary because he had uncirculated tapes he feared having stolen, he was nonetheless given to tantalising others by describing some of these treasures—'I've got a tape of Dylan teaching ROBBIE ROBERTSON "Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands" in a hotel-room in March '66: I have it because I was in the room at the time', he might say: or more rarely, might play fragments of one or two of these things. At the same time he needed to keep all this to himself to avoid dishonouring or losing Dylan's trust: a hard fear to live and work under since Dylan's trust was bound to be, in any circumstances, fitful.

They continued to see each other on occasion. When Dylan toured Europe for the first time in 12 years in 1978, and his tour reached London, a number of people were brought out into the deep black backstage area in small groups to meet Dylan; Shelton was amongst the few who also went out to dinner with Dylan that week. Nevertheless the two long maintained an uneasy relationship, since Shelton felt due some credit for having helped Dylan's career and Dylan resented the slight hint of a proprietorial air.

Shelton's book was too long in the making for its own good, and disappointing, tainted by a haste that usually betrays a too-quick project, not one so very long in the making. When it emerged at last, the reviews were mixed. But it was a triumph against many demons that he published the book at all, and despite its scars it will remain important for its solidity, wide-ranging interests and the many gems that come from Shelton having been an influential intimate of Dylan himself in the vital early years.

Shelton did many interviews to promote the publication of the book in 1986, but none more thorough than the one he gave to the fanzine The Telegraph, published in 1987. A further interview was published in The Telegraph posthumously in 1996 (and featured Shelton on its cover), though this was a slightly abbreviated version of an interview he had given in November 1987 to the very short-lived literary magazine Words International, reprinted 'as The Telegraph's memorial to' its subject.

Shelton's other books include: a songbook-cum-biography of Josh White; The Face of Folk Music with photographer David Gahr; The Country Music Story with illustrator Burt Goldblatt in 1966 (an early history of a genre Shelton championed far ahead of its revival); and, with Karl Dallas, Dave Laing and Robin Denselow, the fine Electric Muse: The Story of Folk into Rock. He also edited Born to Win, 1965, a collection of WOODY GUTHRIE's prose and poems.

In 1982 Shelton moved to Brighton, reviewing for the Evening Argus and specialising in films—a specialism he maintained, as film critic for the Birmingham Post and reviewer for the international newspaper The European, until his death. When Dylan and his partners in the crime of the film Hearts of Fire held a press conference at the National Film Theatre in London, on August 17, 1986, Shelton was there as a film critic, casting an understandably baleful eye on this non-event.

A founder-member of the UK's Guild of Regional Film Writers, he displayed in this final phase of his life the same rare qualities as in his New York City heyday: he was gregarious, warm, a good listener, secretive to a fault about his own distinguished past, and whole-heartedly committed to the humane arts.

Robert Shelton died, aged 69, in his adopted hometown of Brighton, England, on December 11, 1995. His papers were divided between the Music Experience Project in Seattle, Washington, and the University of Liverpool's Institute of Pop Music. The latter shocked visitors by cellotaping some of this material when displaying it, but it also honoured its donor's memory by founding the annual Robert Shelton Memorial Conference in 1999.

Meanwhile that tape of Dylan and Robbie Robertson (including more than a moment of Dylan in truth-attack mode sneering unpleasantly at Shelton), which was recorded on the night of March 12–13, 1966, in a Denver, Colorado, hotel-room, has passed into general circulation. The 221-minute tape of the interview with Dylan that Shelton recorded earlier the same day, during their flight together from Lincoln, Nebraska to Denver, has not circulated.

[Robert Shelton: 'Bob Dylan: A Distinctive Folk Song Stylist: 20-Year-Old Singer is Bright New Face at Gerde's Club', New York Times, 29 Sep 1961; 'Bob Dylan Sings His Compositions: Folk Musician, 21, Displays Originality at Town Hall', New York Times, 14 Apr 1963; 'Dylan's Godspell', Melody Maker, UK, 21 Jun 1980; No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, New York: Beech Tree Books/Wm Morrow, 1986; republished New York: Da Capo Press, 2003. Interviews with Shelton: The Telegraph no.27, UK, summer 1987 & no.54, UK, spring 1996.]

Shepard, Sam [1943 -] Samuel Shepard Rogers was born in Fort Sheridan, Illinois, on November 5, 1943, grew up in Calfornia, moved to New York City as an actor in 1963 and starting writing plays that year, seeing the first two, Cowboys and Rock Garden, staged in a double bill in 1964. He has written prolifically ever since: he wrote over 40 plays between 1963 and 1993, his work has been staged in many countries and by the 1970s he was being dubbed 'the most influential young playwright in America'. He also played drums for a while in the 1960s with Pete Stampfel's Holy Modal Rounders, lived with PATTI SMITH and co-wrote a play with her, Cowboy Mouth (a phrase from Dylan's song 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands').

He published an early collection of other work, Hawk Moon: A Book of Short Stories, Poems and Monologues (1971) and Rolling Thunder Logbook (1977), his underrated account of being commissioned to come along on Dylan's 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue to help write mini-scripts for the Renaldo & Clara film. Though any idea of scripts was soon forgotten, Shepard proved a refreshing observer of the Rolling Thunder process in action, as well as bringing a disinterested eye to bear on its individual musicians. He is best in the Logbook when grappling with the largest talents, giving acute and sympathetic accounts of seeing both Dylan and ALLEN GINSBERG in action, especially in front of audiences. His account 'Kaddish on the Mah-Jong Circuit' is tremendous writing, which acts out what it describes in cranking up many notches when it reaches Dylan's arrival on stage, energizing everyone 'until every molecule of air in the place is bursting. This is Dylan's true magic. Leave aside his lyrical genius for a second and just watch this transformation of energy which he carries. . . . he can do it here, in the dead of winter, at an off-season seaside resort full of menopause . . .' The book ends with a self-effacing account of the excruciating experience of having Bob and SARA DYLAN attend an off-Broadway production of his play Geography of a Horse Dreamer.

The major Dylan-Shepard collaboration came a decade later, on the jointly written 'Brownsville Girl'. It's an oddity perhaps that while Dylan told Bill Flanagan that 'Brownsville Girl' was written partly in response to a LOU REED song, in turn that Lou Reed song starts by referring to going to see Sam Shepard's play Fool for Love. But for their collaboration on the song, see the see separate entry on the song itself.

They collaborated again in a more minor way the year after 'Brownsville Girl' was released, in that Dylan allowed himself to be interviewed by Shepard, and this turned into a Shepard piece in Esquire (July 1987), presented as the script of a short play called 'True Dylan'. This is discussed at length in STEPHEN SCOBIE's book Alias Bob Dylan, though perhaps with a flawed determination to feed a particular bee in his critical bonnet. Scobie's theme is the death of patriarchy, a theme he finds everywhere in Dylan's work. He cites the key features of the 'play' as including the eccentricities of the soundtrack on the intermittently played cassette machine, the noises off and so on, but he doesn't notice that the talk between Dylan and Shepard - the talk that Scobie insists is grounded in the death of patriarchy—is repeatedly interrupted by Dylan going off to talk on the telephone to his daughter.

More simply, it might be concluded from all of this that 'True Dylan' is a more than usually oblique work, and certainly not a play. But Shepard has certainly written plenty more of those since, and has continued his film careers as actor and writer. Like that other SAM, PECKINPAH, though in very different style, his work has always pushed away at the theme of the myth of the West and the betrayal and death of the American dream. His major plays include La Turista (1966), Operation Sidewinder (1967), The Tooth of Crime (1972), Buried Child (1978), True West (1980), Fool for Love (1983), A Life of the Mind (1985), The State of Shock (1991), Simpatico (1994), The Late Henry Moss (2000) and The God of Hell (2004). A further short stories collection, Great Dream of Heaven, was published in 2002.

In film, he wrote the acclaimed screenplay for Paris, Texas (1984) and acted in Days of Heaven (1978), Resurrection (1980), Frances (1982), The Right Stuff (1983), Paris, Texas, Fool for Love (1985), Crimes of the Heart (1986), Baby Boom (1987), Voyager (1991), The Pelican Brief (1993) and more besides. So while you might think from the content of his work that he spends a lot of time staring off into the desert from behind the dusty curtains of a seedy motel room, the sheer listing of his work tells a different story. Like Bob Dylan, he works almost incessantly.

[Sam Shepard: Rolling Thunder Logbook, New York: Viking Press, 1977; 2nd ed., New York: Da Capo, 2005 with new preface by Shepard, new foreword by T-Bone Burnett but less than half the photos in the original edition; Fool for Love, play, premiered San Francisco, 8 Feb 1983, dir. Shepard & NY, May 1983, again dir. Shepard; Fool for Love, film, dir. Robert Altman, written Shepard, starred Shepard, Kim Basinger, Randy Quaid & Harry Dean Stanton; Cannon/Golan-Globus, US, 1985. Shepard's 'play'/interview 'True Dylan', Esquire, US, Jul 1987. Bill Flanagan, Written in My Soul, Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1986.]

Shot of Love* [1981] The first post-evangelising album, a ramshackle collection of generally second-rate tracks with Dylan's voice often petulant and querulous, the music tired and the production thin. It excludes some of the best songs cut at the relevant sessions: a snatching of mediocrity from the jaws of distinction that Dylan was to manage again and again with his 1980s albums. Even the cover was careless and tawdry (as those of Saved, Slow Train Coming and Bob Dylan at Budokan had been before it), whereas before the late 1970s a Dylan cover was rightly used to help define an album's distinctive character, and had to be devised with care and imaginative precision. Time has not transformed Shot of Love into a first-rate collection, but has made more engaging the interest in 1950s music on Dylan's part which suffuses its atmosphere. Best of the minor songs on the album is the shimmering Motownesquerie of 'Watered-Down Love'. 'Lenny Bruce' is an endearing bad song. The stand-out track, and free of all these vocal, instrumental and production faults, is the defiantly classic 'Every Grain of Sand'. Subsequent reissue of the album on CD has added as track 6 one of the good initial rejects, 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' (a song interesting for its vibrantly creative, ferocious words—new Dylan writing—fused to a music that re-uses SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON II's 1955 song 'Don't Start Me Talking', which Dylan would perform on US TV three years later).

[Recorded (though the documentation on this is confused) LA, May 1981; released as stereo LP Columbia TC-37496 (in UK CBS 85178), 12 Aug 1981.]

Silber, Irwin [1925 -] Irwin Silber was born in New York City on October 17, 1925. He was editor of Sing Out! magazine from 1951 to 1967, writer and executive editor for the US weekly radical newspaper The Guardian from 1968 to 1979, associate editor of CrossRoads (another left-wing US journal, formed from the merging of two others, Front Line and North Star Review) from 1990 to 1995 (it died after issue no.62 in August 1996), and author of books including Songs of the Civil War, Songs of the Great American West and Socialism: What Went Wrong? He also founded a self-proclaimed Marxist-Leninist party called Line of March.

With his brother Fred, he also edited, in 1973, the 1,000-song collection Folksinger's Wordbook, while his son Marc Silber was a folk performer at one time in a group with Artie and HAPPY TRAUM

(but also ran, with IZZY YOUNG, a Greenwich Village guitar shop called Fretted Instruments; he describes his encounters with Dylan very graciously in Tracy Johnson's book Encounters with Bob Dylan: If You See Him, Say Hello).

In the November 1964 issue of Sing Out! Irwin Silber published his rebuke 'An Open Letter to Bob Dylan', written 'because some of what has happened is troubling me. And not me alone. Many other good friends of yours as well. . . . Your new songs seem to be all inner-directed now . . . maybe even a little maudlin or a little cruel on occasion. And it's happening on stage, too. You seem to be relating to a handful of cronies behind the scenes now—rather than to the rest of us out front. Now that's all OK—if that's the way you want it, Bob. But then you're a different Bob Dylan from the one we knew. The old one never wasted our precious time.'

Dylan offers his own thoughts on this, recollected in tranquility, in Chronicles Volume One:

> 'Irwin Silber, the editor of the folk magazine Sing Out! . . . would castigate me publicly in his magazine for turning my back on the folk community. It was an angry letter. I liked Irwin, but I couldn't relate to it. Miles Davis would be accused of something similar when he made the album Bitches Brew, a piece of music that didn't follow the rules of modern jazz, which had been on the verge of breaking into the popular marketplace, until Miles's record came along and killed its chances. Miles was put down by the jazz community. I couldn't imagine Miles being too upset. Latin artists were breaking rules, too. . . . As for me, what I did to break away was to take simple folk changes and put new imagery and attitude to them, use catchphrases and metaphor combined with a new set of ordinances that evolved into something different that had not been heard before. Silber scolded me in his letter for doing this, as if he alone and a few others had the keys to the real world. I knew what I was doing, though, and wasn't going to take a step back or retreat for anybody.'

Dylan, of course, was right—right from his side, and from art's; and it takes a sly mendaciousness to write such a letter, tugging the 'good friend' string yet publishing it for all to see; Dylan was outraged at this, and stopped making his songs available in Sing Out! in response. On the other hand Silber was, as he claimed, writing what many others on the folk scene were feeling. In addition to which, while his 'Open Letter' is notorious, it's less well-known that Silber later retracted. In The Guardian in 1968 he wrote: 'Many of us who did not fully understand the dynamics of the political changes . . . in America . . . felt deserted by a poet. . . . And Dylan did desert—not us, but an outmoded style of values which had become unequal to the task of reclaiming America. "This land is not your land", Dylan told us in 1965. But some of us . . . inheritors of a superficial "Marxism" based on diluted Leninism and rationalized Stalinism were not ready . . .'

Silber is still going—still playing tennis after two knee and one hip replacements (he wrote a book about that too)—and though living on the West Coast now, he's still slogging away in the endless internecine warfare of the American Left. Here he is in September 2001, opening a book review: 'The great virtue of Commies, Ronald Radosh's self-serving Journey Through the Old Left, the New Left and the Leftover Left, is that it clears up any remaining ambiguity as to his niche in the political spectrum. It also manages to demolish the dubious notion that his work is that of a "distinguished conservative scholar and historian." Radosh's politics were always paper-thin and had more to do with his acknowledged ambition "to become a leader in the American Communist movement" than with any readily apparent interest in their substance.' Just the sort of talk Bob Dylan has always enjoyed.

[Irwin Silber: Songs of the Civil War, New York: Columbia University Press, 1960; Songs of the Great American West, New York: Macmillan, 1967; Socialism: What Went Wrong?, London: Pluto Press, 1994; A Patient's Guide to Knee and Hip Replacement, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1999; 'An Open Letter to Bob Dylan', Sing Out!, New York, Nov 1964, reprinted in CRAIG McGREGOR: Bob Dylan, the Early Years: A Retrospective, New York: Da Capo, 1990; retraction in The Guardian, nia, 1968, quoted from ROBERT SHELTON, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., p.314; review of Radosh's Commies in Z magazine, Sep 2001, online 23 Oct 2005 at www.zmag.org/ZMag/articles/sept01silber.htm. Fred & Irwin Silber, Folksinger's Wordbook, New York: Oak Publications, 1973, reissued Music Sales Corp., 2000. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.66–67. Tracy Johnson, ed., Encounters with Bob Dylan: If You See Him, Say Hello, Santa Cruz, CA: Humble Press, 2000. Ronald Radosh, Journey Through the Old Left, the New Left and the Leftover Left, San Francisco: Encounter Books, 2001.]

Simmons, Gene [1949 -] Gene Simmons was born Chaim Witz in Haifa, Israel, on August 25, 1949, moved to Brooklyn, NY, at age nine and grew up to be the bassist and vocalist with the successful American 1970s glam-punk group Kiss.

Simmons and Bob Dylan have co-written two songs: 'Laughing When You Want to Cry' in 1991 and the ballad 'Waiting for the Morning Light'; they came out of a day spent together at Simmons' LA home. The latter was recorded by Simmons and released in June 2004 on his first solo album for 25 years, understatedly titled Ahole.

Simmons said of the collaboration with Dylan: 'We understood each other right away. He picked up an acoustic guitar, and we just tossed it back and forth, "How 'bout this, how 'bout that?" And he started to strum, because he—at least with me—tended to talk and strum guitar at the same time.

And as soon as I heard the first three or four chords, I went, "Wait, wait, what's that? Do that again." So I went and started to write a lyric around that.' About the later co-composition, and why it emerged some years after the first, Simmons said: 'Bob came up with the chords, most of them, and then I took it and wrote lyrics, melody, the rest of it. I'd see him on tour, and I'd say, "Bob, you wanna write the song?" And he would say, "No, man, you write it, Mr. Kiss."' In this 1996 interview, he added that a demo had been made of the song; no other detail was given, and none has emerged. It might be thought comical that in a collaboration between these two talents, it was Simmons who wrote the words.

[Gene Simmons: 'Waiting for the Morning Light', nia, Ahole, Sanctuary, US, 2004. Simmons quote & background information thanks to the 'Starlight in the East' section of Alan Fraser's website www.searchingforagem.]

Simon, Paul [1941 -] Paul Frederic Simon was born in Newark, New Jersey, on October 13, 1941 and grew up in Queens, New York. He and Art Garfunkel had a pop hit as Tom & Jerry with 'Hey Schoolgirl' at age 16; Simon had a minor hit in 1962 with the group Tico & the Triumphs ('Motorcycle') and as Jerry Landis with 'The Lone Teen Ranger' in 1963.

The precocious pop singer became, with and without Art Garfunkel, one of the key folk-rock singers and composers of the 1960s, with a popularity that saw him remain a star ever afterwards. Always more accessible, more melodic and less substantial than Dylan, Simon (and Simon & Garfunkel) outsold Dylan many times over.

Dylan's first acknowledgement that Paul Simon existed was his revisit to Simon's 'The Boxer' on the 1970 Self Portrait album. Dylan's minimal rewrite of the lyric is very telling—and typical of Dylan's ability to say more with less. He simply changes one word, shifting it from 'And he carries a reminder / Of every glove that's laid him down' to 'Of every blow that's laid him down.' That 'blow' means we actually see the boxer better: we comprehend that outside the ring as well as inside it, his life is a series of defeats.

The inspiration for Dylan's use of two different voices on 'The Boxer' may well be a pre-war gospel record, BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON's marvellous 'Let Your Light Shine on Me', which in its chorus strongly prefigures that of Dylan's 'Precious Angel' and in using two voices on one track certainly shines a new light on 'The Boxer'. Johnson didn't have the technology to double-track his two voices, as Dylan does, but in switching suddenly from the one to the other (in mid-line, even, at the end) he makes the difference between them so stark that this becomes the central point of the recording, as with Dylan's double-tracking on 'The Boxer'. (For Dylan's familiarity with, and debt to, Blind Willie Johnson see separate entry).

Dylan never performed 'The Boxer' live but did perform Simon's earlier songs 'Hazy Shade of Winter' (two concerts, 1992) and 'Homeward Bound' (three concerts, 1991) and he contributed harmonica & back-up vocals behind the GRATEFUL DEAD on a rehearsal of Simon's later 'Boy in the Bubble' (San Rafael, CA, March–April 1987). In spring 1999 it was announced that Dylan and Simon would tour together that June in North America. And they did, despite their well-known mutual dislike.

They began in Denver, Colorado, on June 5, giving 38 high-priced, large-venue concerts between then and the last day of July. They alternated who headlined and whose set came first, and mostly the one whose set was first would come back on to share the stage for four numbers at the end of the headliner's set. Dylan headlined on the opening night (as he had doubtless insisted on doing), performing 13 songs with his band. Paul Simon came on at the end to share vocals and guitar on 'The Sound of Silence', 'I Walk the Line', 'Blue Moon of Kentucky' and 'Forever Young'. And this was the way it continued, except that they dropped 'Forever Young' after that first attempt and substituted 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' thereafter. As from July 4 (in Milwaukee), 'That'll Be the Day' and 'The Wanderer' replaced the middle two songs, until they reverted to their earlier choices as of July 23 in Mansfield, Massachusetts. For the last few nights, the middle songs switched about between the four, but introduced nothing new. The tour ended with two nights at Wantagh, New York.

In September, however, Dylan & Simon went out on the road together again, for a brief (ten-date) tour through Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Indiana, Louisiana and Texas. This time their duets began with . . . 'The Boxer'.

When they duetted, it was a very rare experience for Dylan: he was the taller one.

[Paul Simon: 'The Boxer', nia, issued on Simon & Garfunkel's Bridge Over Troubled Water, Columbia KCS 9914, NY (CBS 63699, London), 1970. Blind Willie Johnson: 'Let Your Light Shine on Me', New Orleans, 10 Dec 1929, Blind Willie Johnson, RBF RF-10, NY, 1965; 'John the Revelator', Atlanta, GA, 20 Apr 1930, American Folk Music; 'Jesus Make Up My Dying Bed', Dallas, TX, 3 Dec 1927; all CD-reissued The Complete Blind Willie Johnson, Columbia Roots N' Blues Series COL 472190 2, NY, 1993.]

Sinatra, Frank [1915 - 1998] Francis Albert Sinatra was born to Italian parents in Hoboken, New Jersey, on December 12, 1915 and became a fine actor, a controversial celebrity with a series of glamorous actress wives and with Mafia connections, but more importantly the finest male singer of his generation. (A certain sort of singer, that is.) At his peak, in the early 1950s, his attractive voice combined with a unique instinct for timing and phrasing to give him a primacy comparable to that of Bing Crosby in an earlier age. This is not the place for a summary of his career, though it is the place to note that his musical world was the one rock'n'roll was born to abolish—that of the jazz-tinged crooner who emerged from the era of the Big Band and whose performances relied upon the supposedly sophisticated songs of Cole Porter and his ilk (typically replete with lines like 'Use your mentality, wake up to reality', as in the awful 'I've Got You Under My Skin') and the notated orchestral arrangements of Nelson Riddle, Billy May and the like.

Two and a half years before his death, at the so-called 80th Birthday concert held in his presence at the Shrine Auditorium in Los Angeles several weeks before he turned 80, one of the guest artists was Bob Dylan. With his Never-Ending Tour band of the day, he performed just one song, an inspired choice from his 1964 album Another Side of Bob Dylan, 'Restless Farewell', which he had never performed live in the 34-year interim. (He first sang it live in Chicago in December 1963, and then twice in 1964.)

By the time Dylan came to sing it for Sinatra, he was looking almost equally old, and holding himself so stiffly and defensively that to watch the performance on TV detracted from the experience of hearing it. To attend to the audio alone was to recognise that Dylan's greatness was still present. He offers a near-wholly sustained, considered performance, blotched only once, on the title phrase at the end of the first verse, by that posturing gargle he gives us sometimes—that short tour of the phlegm in his throat, which never fails to coarsen things—and its twin assassin, the silly sob. Throughout the rest, he's controlled, careful, discreet, alert to what he's on about: so much so that it makes you conjecture as to how it might have seemed if it were a new song, and on Time Out of Mind. Many's the person who would have rushed to say what a major work it was: a major work of retrospection, looking back down the long hallways of his life. Ironic, since it was not only a work of his youth but always regarded as a very minor work back then. One of the penalties he pays for our over-enthusiasm and under-discrimination these days is that when we step back, in this case, we're likely to re-stress that it is a minor and youthful work, rather than recognising that what he achieves with this revisit is a refashioning that is expressive for the middle-aged artist. One or two of the lines do betray an immaturity, but in general his 1995 performance re-occupies and renews the material. Whoever would have guessed?

'Happy birthday, Mr. Frank!' said Dylan eccentrically and shyly at the end. Frank Sinatra died of a heart attack in Los Angeles on May 14, 1998. He was 82. Dylan reprised 'Restless Farewell' in his LA concert one week later, and has never sung it again since.

[Bob Dylan: 'Restless Farewell', LA, 19 Nov 1995; complete song performance televised in Europe, first on Swedish TV, 12 Dec 2005; only 3 verses televised on ABC-TV, US, 14 Dec 1995. Other live performances Chicago, 27 Dec 1963; Berkeley, CA, 22 Feb 1964; London, 17 May 1964 & LA, 21 May 1998.]

Sloman, Larry [1950 -] Larry 'Ratso' Sloman is the author of one of the few great books about Bob Dylan, the essential and very funny On the Road with Bob Dylan, written about the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue. Sloman was born on July 9, 1950 in New York City, growing up in Queens. He was first struck by Dylan's work hearing 'Like a Rolling Stone' in the summer of 1965; his first act of Dylan publication was putting him on the cover of a special music issue of the University of Wisconsin newspaper The Daily Cardinal that Sloman edited in 1971. Next came a preview article about Blood on the Tracks in Rolling Stone.

On the Road with Bob Dylan was his first book and its strength was its outsider's pitch: it's a classic account of scrabbling for access to the star—though in fact he became a halfway-insider pretty early on. He features in the cast list of Renaldo & Clara as 'Newspaper Man', but the name 'Ratso' was appended by JOAN BAEZ; by the time of the 11th concert, at Waterbury, Connecticut, Dylan was dedicating a song to Sloman from the stage, and when they reached Montreal it was Sloman whom Dylan delegated to go and collect LEONARD COHEN, to make sure he came to the concert.

Years later, brought much further inside, Sloman found himself co-producing, with George Lois, the crudely splendid video for 'Jokerman', the best track on 1983's Infidels album. Insider or not, his account of how this video came into being—and how easily it might have fallen by the wayside—is also entertaining. (See 'Jokerman' video, the.)

Being around the Rolling Thunder Revue also inspired Sloman to write song lyrics, and after the tour he collaborated on many songs with Rick Derringer and then with John Cale. The latter turned into a collaboration over several albums.

Larry Sloman has also written books about professional ice hockey, the history of marijuana in the USA, and on Abbie Hoffman and the 1960s' radical movement. He has also collaborated on books with Howard Stern, Anthony Kiedis of the Red Hot Chili Peppers, and on David Blaine's Mysterious Stranger—in which Blaine says that thanks to Sloman's background research he became 'much more knowledgeable about the art than most magicians'. Sloman's most recent book, on Houdini, will be published on Hallowe'en 2006. Meanwhile he also appears as a character in another author's fiction: in the 16 or more detective novels by Kinky Friedman, 'editor Larry "Ratso" Sloman' makes many an appearance.

He has been involved in other films besides Renaldo & Clara. He is credited as a 'developer' on the John Waters movie Hairspray (1988), plays a reporter character based on himself (but called Charlie Phelps) in the 1992 movie Primary Motive, and, uncredited, plays a town mayor who goes to a Hallowe'en party dressed as Bob Dylan in the 2004 horror film Santa's Little Helper 'from genre master Jeff Lieberman'.

In 2002, when the 2-CD set the Bootleg Series Vol. 5: Bob Dylan Live 1975, The Rolling Thunder Revue came out, the text of its lavish booklet was dominated by a long retrospective essay, full of unexpected detail, specially written by Larry 'Ratso' Sloman.

[Larry Sloman: On the Road with Bob Dylan: Rolling with the Thunder, New York: Bantam Books, 1978, republished (with new introduction by Kinky Friedman), New York: Three Rivers Press and London: Helter Skelter Publishing, 2002; Reefer Madness, Marijuana in America, New York: Bobs-Merril/Grove Press, 1979; Steal This Dream: Abbie Hoffman and the Countercultural Revolution in America, New York: Doubleday, 1998. David Blaine: Mysterious Stranger, New York: Villard and London: Channel 4 Books, 2002.]

Slow Train Coming* [1979] Anyone else, riding as high as Dylan was in 1978, would have stuck with the same band and produced another Street Legal-type album. Dylan did no such thing. Converted to Born Again Christianity, he gathered different musicians around him and produced an album destined to be profoundly unpopular amongst almost everyone who'd ever valued him as a writer. It is not, however, an album that can be ignored, and in some ways now seems a logical direction for Dylan to have taken. No-one should have been surprised at Dylan choosing to add gospel to the many different modes of American popular music he has covered (and so well) on his artistic travels over the decades. Musically it's strong, and strikingly well produced in Alabama's Muscle Shoals Sound Studio under the supervision of veteran Atlantic Records producer JERRY WEXLER. Stand-out tracks are 'Gotta Serve Somebody', 'Precious Angel', 'Slow Train' and 'When He Returns'.

[Recorded Sheffield, AL, 1–4 May 1979 (with later overdubs), released as stereo LP Columbia FC 36120 (in UK CBS 86095), 18 or 20 Aug 1979.]

Sly & Robbie Sly & Robbie—Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare—make up the longstanding and innovative Jamaican rhythm section used by Dylan for the Infidels sessions of 1983 in New York.

Lowell Charles Dunbar was born on May 10, 1952 and Robert Shakespeare on September 27, 1953, both in Kingston, Jamaica. They were first brought together as live performers by Bunny Lee in the Revolutionaries and as studio players for the Hoo Kim Brothers' Channel One label. This is not the place for an informed appraisal of the changes they contributed to in the history of reggae and related musics (nor to any listing of the astonishingly large number of recordings on which they have appeared) but their three main innovations were: the harder beat of the Rockers style, which displaced the previously ubiquitous One Drop style when Sly & Robbie brought it onto the Mighty Diamonds' début album Right Time in 1976; the Rub a Dub sound they created at the start of the 1980s; and the Bam Bam style—so called because introduced on the huge hit 'Bam Bam' by Chaka Demus & Pliers (and on their 'Murder She Wrote'), which pushed sweet and rough vocals into a novel partnership. Since then Sly & Robbie have explored the use of computers in music, fused Latin and other sounds and launched an experimental melding of R&B with Hip Hop.

They have performed live and in the studio with more or less everyone in Jamaica, including Peter Tosh, Black Uhuru, the Upsetters, Gregory Isaacs, Dennis Brown and the great, mad Lee Perry. (Check out his emphatically rewritten 1988 version of 'That Lucky Old Sun', which he titles 'Show Me That River' and claims sole composer credit for.) They set up their own Taxi label in 1980, on which many reggae stars' albums have seen release.

At the same time, Sly & Robbie have always been fans of a wide range of other music, from country to Tamla Motown. They have worked with Grace Jones, Joan Armatrading, Joe Cocker, MICK JAGGER, THE ROLLING STONES and many others from Sting to Serge Gainsbourg. Their album La Trenggae includes versions of JONI MITCHELL's 'Big Yellow Taxi' and of that late-1950s Italian pop hit 'Volare', while Sly had chosen that nickname in the first place in tribute to a favourite black American star, Sly of Sly & the Family Stone. When Sly & Robbie were brought in to provide the rhythm section for Bob Dylan in 1983, therefore, they were fully aware of who he was and were open to whatever music was required.

He was open too, and they found him easy to work with. Sly told HOWARD SOUNES: 'He would just come into the studio with his 'armonica and his guitar, and he start play the song, and we just fall into the groove. He would take different takes of a song in different keys and he would change words on the fly. . . . He would look at us and say, "That's the take." . . . We couldn't believe how smooth it went.' They in turn were able to slip in a little reggae ('so quietly that you wouldn't realise that's what we're doing'): and on 'I and I' they did. Perhaps this smooth way of flowing together in the studio works best of all on 'Jokerman', on which the Sly & Robbie rhythm section is a prominent and distinctive backbone to a spare sound counterbalanced by Dylan's lovely vocal and his superlative words. Sly told Howard Sounes that this was achieved before they'd realised the tape was running.

They began on April 11, 1983 and worked six consecutive days, had one day off before resuming on April 18 for a further nine consecutive days and after two days' break resumed for several scattered days in May. Robbie Shakespeare's bass and Sly Dunbar's drums therefore pin down everything on Infidels and also the transcendental still-unreleased version of 'Blind Willie McTell' as well as the released version, 'Foot of Pride', 'Tell Me', 'Lord Protect My Child' and 'Someone's Got a Hold of My Heart' (all on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, 1991), 'Death Is Not the End' (on Down in the Groove, 1988) and 'Angel Flying Too Close to the Ground', which was released on the B-side of the 'Union Sundown' single in Europe.

In 1985 Sly & Robbie returned to the same New York studios to play on February 19 on at least one attempt at 'Never Gonna Be the Same Again' and various early tries at 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky', including the one later released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3; next day they returned to trying out 'Never Gonna Be the Same Again' and achieved the take used on Empire Burlesque; over the days that followed they were joined by AL KOOPER and others and achieved the Empire Burlesque cut of 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky', an unreleased but circulated attempt at 'Something's Burning Baby' and further unknown and uncirculated tracks.

The last of these sessions took place on March 4, 1985 and in April, Dylan reciprocated, going into another New York City studio to overdub a harmonica part onto Sly & Robbie's 'No Name on the Bullet', which was released that August as one of the six tracks on their electronics-oriented album Language Barrier.

[Sly & Robbie: Language Barrier, Island 90286-2, US, 1985. La Trenggae, Taxi nia, Jamaica, 2001. Mighty Diamonds: 'Right Time', Right Time, nia, 1976. Chaka Demus & Pliers: 'Bam Bam' & 'Murder She Wrote', nia. Lee 'Scratch' Perry: 'Show Me That River', Battle of Armagideon (Millionaire Liquidator), Trojan, nia, 1988. Bob Dylan: 'Blind Willie McTell', NY, 5 May 1983, unreleased; 'Angel Flying Too Close to the Ground', NY, May 2, 1983, CBS A 3916, Europe, 1983. Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, manuscript p.421.]

Smith, G.E. [1952 -] George Edward Smith was born in Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania, on January 27, 1952, learnt the guitar at four, 'started getting good at seven' and by 11, when he was given his first electric guitar (a 1952 Fender Telecaster), he was playing in high school bands and for vacationers in resorts in Pennsylvania's Pocono Mountains. In his teens, he switched musical base to New Haven, Connecticut, and in the second half of the 1970s was a member of the Scratch Band, which was considered hot. Then he was hired by Dan Hartman and toured Europe and the US with him, moved to Manhattan and played guitar for the 1979 Broadway show Gilda Live (starring Gilda Radner, whom he married).

From Broadway he went back into rock music, hired by Hall & Oates in 1979 and remaining with them a surely purgatorial six years. In his last year with them came LIVE AID, at which the Hall & Oates band, fronted by G.E., served as house-band, backing MICK JAGGER and Tina Turner. In consequence he duly appeared on two Jagger solo albums, She's the Boss and Primitive Cool; but 1985 also saw Smith appointed as band frontman and lead guitarist on the long-running TV series 'Saturday Night Live'. Again, he served a long sentence: ten years this time, and thus played with many a star.

In November 1987, when Dylan was putting together the original band for the first legs of what became known as the Never-Ending Tour, he auditioned and/or rehearsed G.E. Smith—this was just five weeks after the end of that year's touring with TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS. The upshot was that he brought Smith in as the centrepiece of his newly stripped-down unit, and from the tour's opening night, June 7, 1988 in Concord, California, it was clear that the tall, slim man with the flat, cadaverous face under lustrous blond ponytailed hair was a powerful electric guitarist whom Dylan could lean on.

For many long-term fans, here was Bob Dylan's best lead guitarist since ROBBIE ROBERTSON. And the pattern of the concerts was such that after a run of seven electric numbers—kicking off to general amazement with the first-ever live renditions of the 1965 classic 'Subterranean Homesick Blues'—there would be a patch of acoustic songs, and for these segments, during which Dylan revealed a renewed interest in traditional folk songs, G.E. Smith provided acoustic guitar support. This allowed Dylan to go noodling away, clawing at the strings anyoldhow, in the knowledge that Smith would throw him melodic lifelines to keep it going and to make it alright in the end. Over time, though Smith was always fluid, many people grew to wish that Dylan would take on the burden of the acoustic playing alone, and ask Smith to take a break. At the end of 1988, when Dylan played NEIL YOUNG's Bridge Benefit concert in Oakland, he performed six songs, all acoustic, without his band, but again he brought G.E. Smith along to play second guitar.

All too soon, as it now seems in retrospect, the Smith years came to an end: October 19, 1990, the last of that year's run of concerts at New York City's Beacon Theater, was his final concert as a member of Dylan's band. He had been there three years—only half the time he'd spent with Hall & Oates, and less than a third of the time he'd given to 'Saturday Night Live'.

It wasn't the last time they shared the stage, though. Smith found himself in another house-band supporting a string of stars for the so-called Bob Dylan 30th Anniversary Celebration Concert at Madison Square Garden on October 16, 1992. Moreover, he was the event's musical director. He remembers that 'The rehearsals for that concert you wouldn't believe. I was rehearsing with GEORGE HARRISON in the morning, ERIC CLAPTON in the afternoon, and LOU REED at night. One afternoon, rehearsing the finale, I had Harrison, Tom Petty, Clapton, Neil Young, Dylan and ROGER McGUINN all lined up and I'm saying, "OK, George you sing here, Eric you play now, Bob you come in here" . . .'

Three years on, and back at the Beacon Theater on December 14, 1995, the familiar figure of G.E. came on stage to play guitar with Dylan once again, though only on 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35', the gruesome final encore number. A further five years down the line and there he was again, on November 5, 2000, at Dylan's Ann Arbor, Michigan, concert, coming on to play in mid-set on a 'Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat' and reappearing at the end, including on the encore, for 'All Along the Watchtower', 'Highway 61 Revisited' and a final acoustic rendition of 'Blowin' in the Wind'.

Altogether he had played at well over 200 Dylan concerts.

[G.E. Smith quote from his Green Mirror record-label website, seen online 25 Jun 2005 at www.greenmirror.com/gebio.html.]

Smith, Harry [1923 - 1991] Harold Everett Smith was born in Portland, Oregon, on May 29, 1923, the son of a salmon cannery night-watchman and a teacher, both followers of theosophist Madame Blavatsky, and as a child he spent time on the Native American reservation where his mother taught. He duly studied Anthropology at the University of Washington but dropped out into an early West Coast bohemia, started into abstract painting, made abstract animated films by applying paint straight onto the film itself, and began large collections of many esoteric things; those usually mentioned are Ukranian Easter eggs, Mayan codices, tarot cards, rare books, Seminole patchwork dresses, the mounted string figures he wrote a vast treatise on, found paper airplanes and above all the 78rpm hillbilly and 'race' records from the 1920s from amongst which he would eventually assemble his masterpiece, the 1952 6-LP vinyl anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC, the importance of which is stressed in the present work not only in its separate entry but necessarily in myriad others.

Smith's work in avant garde film, painting and off-the-wall anthropology has been avidly studied by different enthusiasts but what matters most surely remains the unequalled impact of his work in music. Perhaps music mattered most to Smith too. One of the contributors to the box set CD-reissue of American Folk Music in 1997, Luis Kemnitzer, wrote that 'He would lend out books that he thought you might want, gave away paintings and collages, but once a record came into his room it never left.' He loved 'the records themselves as well as the music encoded in them'.

His polymath talent was remarkable even within music. Another contributor to the 1997 box set's booklet, Luc Sante, tells an especially pleasing small story about him late in his life, when he was staying in ALLEN GINSBERG's 'tenement on East 12th Street'. Smith and Sante both attended a nearby party, and Sante recalls: 'He was rude in that preemptive way that small men sometimes assume, and he helped himself to a great deal of cake and bogarted all the reefers. Then he proposed a challenge: if we'd sing a verse of "Barbara Allen," he'd tell us what county we were born in. As it happened, the only person present who remembered the words was my then-girlfriend. After she sang, Harry instantly said, "Bennington County, Vermont." And he was right. It was news to me—I'd always thought she was born in Massachusetts.'

Another pleasing story about Smith is also set in his Ginsberg-apartment days. On a visit to New York from Colorado in 1985 he was sleeping in Ginsberg's spare room when Bob Dylan called round to show Ginsberg the lyrics to his brand new album, Empire Burlesque. Dylan was thrilled to learn that the legendary Smith was there, and asked to meet him. Ginsberg went through to tell Smith who their visitor was. Smith refused to get up.

In his New York days a long-term resident of the Chelsea Hotel, Smith had moved to Colorado in the 1970s; he moved back to New York City to die, which he did six months later, checking out of the Chelsea Hotel for good on November 27, 1991.

[Smith-Dylan story reported fully in 'The Night Bob Came Round', by Raymond Foye, Telegraph no.36, Romford, UK, summer 1990.]

Smith, Patti [1946 -] Patricia Lee Smith, born in Chicago on December 30, 1946 but raised in Woodbury, New Jersey, near Philadelphia, grew up to be one of those essential and endearing New York punk bohemians who keeps on keeping on, wearing her art on her sleeve, living, at least in our imaginations, an endlessly erratic life in the world of Chelsea Hotel grot-chic, with a string of liaisons with the famous behind her, from Robert Mapplethorpe to SAM SHEPARD and from poet Jim Carroll to Tom Verlaine. A singer, songwriter and poet, she began to record in the mid-1970s, beginning with a single 'Piss Factory' c/w 'Hey Joe', made with Lenny Kaye and underwritten by Mapplethorpe. Both sides had strong spoken word elements, one citing ARTHUR RIMBAUD and the other Pattie Hearst.

The Patti Smith Group then signed to a major label deal and the result was the 1975 classic Horses—a stark Mapplethorpe cover enclosing a clamorous début, with punk, poetry and rock'n'roll fighting among themselves, and right from the outset: a seizing of VAN MORRISON's 'Gloria' for her own argumentative purposes. After the less well received Radio Ethiopia, a fairly serious fall from the stage and a period of quiet, she came back in 1978 with the far more accessible Easter, the album with her great anthemic hit 'Because the Night', co-written with BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN.

For Patti, though, Bob Dylan has always been more special—she has never been afraid to be a fan, whether he likes it or not—and her poem 'Dog Dream', in her 1978 collection Babel, is about him. (Her first collection, Seventh Heaven, was a slim volume published in Boston in 1972). She had 'hung out' with him in 1975 when he was back in New York and starting to dream up the Rolling Thunder Revue. There's a particular photograph of the two of them together at this point: black and white, as it would have to be, and it's one of those examples of Dylan's great chameleon talent for looking like the person he's alongside: he and Patti look almost mirror images of each other, both black shocks of hair above thin white striking faces. A shot of them embracing in the Village Voice was captioned TARANTULA MEETS MUSTANG. Smith said later:

> 'It was so intense, like, when you have a crush on a guy in high school and after a year he finally talks to you and you have nothing to say . . . it was so adolescent . . . very sexy. . . . He has levels completely untapped. . . . He just needs to be sprung loose again. He's got all this stuff just waiting to come gushing out. . . . The electricity coming from his face, his eyes, is real!'

It was many years after that before they worked together, but in late 1995 they did, at a run of seven consecutive concerts on that leg of his Never-Ending Tour, starting in Boston on December 10, followed by New York City (11), Bethlehem, Pennsylvania (13), New York City (14) and then three nights in Philadelphia (December 15–17). Every night Patti Smith would come on in the middle for the tenth song of the set and they would share vocals on 'Dark Eyes', the acoustic song from the end of the Empire Burlesque album of ten years earlier, and which he had never sung live before.

The routine might have been the same every night but there was nothing routine about it. It's a song about which NIGEL HINTON said, in assessing the album version, 'I'm slightly suspicious of people who declare that they ". . . live in another world / Where life and death are memorised"'—but without question live performance brought it alive, and it was Patti Smith who made it happen. Here, in the tingling electricity between them as they traded verses and duetted on the choruses, the song was the conduit of a beauty and excitement it had never possessed.

Many Dylan followers believed that he felt challenged by Patti Smith's still possessing a fierce anti-showbiz, anti-bullshit credibility that had in his own case been compromised by then: that she therefore kept him on his toes as no performance with his own band alone would have done. As it was, he rose higher than his toes.

Patti Smith's career seems to have become reactivated since, reaching a crescendo of international activity in 2005, including curating the London Meltdown Festival that June, within which Smith performed the whole of Horses; being made, as Dylan had been 15 years earlier (and MEMPHIS SLIM earlier still), a French Commandeur de L'Ordre des Arts et Lettres; and in August performing twice at the German RuhrTriennale, delivering Pattified versions of songs by Dylan, HENDRIX and PHIL SPECTOR—and then next morning delivering a lecture on the poetry of BLAKE and Rimbaud. It's not very punk but it's certainly pitching in—and it's certainly still toiling in the fields of poetry and music.

[Patti Smith: Seventh Heaven, Boston, MA: Telegraph Books, 1972; Horses, Arista LP 4066, US, 1975; Radio Ethiopia, Arista LP 4097, 1976; 'Dog Dream', Babel, New York: G.P. Putnam & Sons, 1978, re-collected in Early Work 1970–1979, New York: W.W. Norton, 1994; Easter, Arista LP 4171, US, 1978. Village Voice, 7 Jul 1975 & Smith on Dylan 1975 from Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, p.439. Nigel Hinton: 'Into the Future, Knocked Out and Loaded', 1st published Telegraph no.25, Bury, UK, autumn/winter 1986, but quoted here from the version collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: W.H. Allen, 1987.]

Smith, Warren [1932 - 1981] The extravagant 'thanks' list in the liner notes to Knocked Out Loaded includes thanks to 'gal shaped just like a frog'. Though the 'gal' in Washboard Sam's post-war 'Soap and Water Blues' is claimed to be 'shaped like a frog', Dylan's allusion is more likely to be to (and is more exactly a quote from) Warren Smith's rockingest record, 'Miss Froggie', which has the opening line 'Well I got a gal shaped just like a frog'. Smith's recordings, first for Sun in Memphis and then 2,000 miles west in Hollywood, for Liberty, ring other Bob Dylan bells too.

Warren Smith was born near Yazoo City, Mississippi, on February 7, 1932. He served in the US Air Force before heading for Memphis and a career in music. He became one of Sam Phillips' rockabilly legends, but reluctantly: he wanted to be a country singer and, oddly, was allowed to become one in Hollywood.

He was the vocalist with the quaintly named Snearly Ranch Boys (also featuring the great Stan Kesler) when he went into the studios with a song

JOHNNY CASH wrote (or bought from George Jones), 'Rock'n'Roll Ruby'. A rockabilly classic that was also an instant regional hit. Smith dumped his aggrieved band and went solo.

His next single was a rockabilly version of a song Dylan includes on Good as I Been to You, 'Black Jack David': in Smith's case a version that teeters on the edge of being comically terrible—a foreshortened, moralising version on which Smith sounds as if he's pretending to be Johnny Horton. Smith's Sun recordings also give us 'Red Cadillac and a Black Moustache' (the spelling of 'moustache'/'mustache' varies between record labels) and 'Uranium Rock', both unreleased by Sun at the time but soon prized items on many compilation albums. Dylan has covered both. And it might even have been the Smith version of Slim Harpo's 'Got Love If You Want It' that Dylan remembered when he recorded and nearly released the song on his Down in the Groove LP in 1988 (it is on the version issued in Argentina).

Neglected by Phillips, who was busy trying to cope with JERRY LEE LEWIS' far bigger success, Smith went west, cut some morose sides for Warner Brothers under the pseudonym Warren Baker and then signed with Liberty, where he was produced by ex-Cricket Jerry Allison. At his second Liberty session, Smith, like JIMMY REED before him, recorded a number with the title 'Odds and Ends', a title Dylan recycles for a song of his own on the Basement Tapes.

Amphetamine addiction and a serious car smash in 1965 ended that phase of his career. Drink and drugs prevented much happening on the other labels he signed to after this. He spent 18 months in gaol in Huntsville, Alabama, and then took a day job as, er, Safety Director for a company in Longview, Texas. In April 1977 Britain's rockabilly fanatics brought him over to the UK and, to his amazement, gave him the kind of adoring reception he'd always thought his due. He died of a massive heart attack at age 47 on January 31, 1981.

Dylan's 1986 tours found him especially interested in revisiting the rockabilly era. At the third concert of the tour, in Sydney on February 10, he débuted Smith's song 'Uranium Rock', playing it a further 26 times on subsequent nights—if not 29, since there are three Perth concerts mid-February for which no tape or set-list is known (what's wrong with these people?) and no reason to feel that Dylan would have stopped singing the song nightly, as before and afterwards. Perhaps 'Uranium Rock', with the repeat line 'rock 'em dead', wasn't his most tactful song choice for the concerts in Japan (where he took to performing it just ahead of a hummed version of 'Sukiyaki').

When the next leg began, in the US, on June 9 in San Diego, Dylan opened the concert with another rockabilly artist's hit, WELDON ROGERS' 'So Long, Good Luck and Goodbye', but retained 'Uranium Rock' for the first two nights. After that Dylan dropped the Smith song temporarily but reintroduced it in Chicago on June 29, the concert after he'd débuted 'Red Cadillac and a Black Mustache' (at East Troy, Wisconsin, June 27). At the Chicago concert he performed both Warren Smith songs. Altogether 'Uranium Rock' was used 13 times on this leg of the tour, but 'Cadillac' was dropped after a third performance (July 2, Akron, Ohio).

However, Dylan later set about recording 'Red Cadillac and a Black Mustache': first in Hollywood in April 1987 (an uncirculated version featuring DAVE ALVIN on guitar, STEVE DOUGLAS on sax, James Jamerson on bass and MADELYN QUEBEC and CAROLYN DENNIS on backing vocals) and then more purposively in early May 2000 (this time with his tour-band members CHARLIE SEXTON, LARRY CAMPBELL, TONY GARNIER and DAVID KEMPER). This pleasant, fond version, from quite a sweet-voiced Dylan, was made for, and released on, the various-artists album Good Rockin' Tonight: The Legacy of Sun Records, issued 18 months later.

Finally, and perhaps inspired by his visit to Sun Studios the previous month, Dylan also got around to recording 'Rock'n'Roll Ruby': on May 1, 1987 in Hollywood, a Down in the Groove session. This remains uncirculated.

[Warren Smith: 'Miss Froggie', Memphis, 1957, Sun 268, Memphis 1957; 'Rock'n'Roll Ruby', Memphis, 5 Feb 1956, Sun 239, 1956; 'Black Jack David', Memphis, Aug 1956, Sun 250, 1956; 'Got Love If You Want It', Oct 1957, Sun 286, 1957; 'Red Cadillac and a Black Moustache', Memphis, 1957, unissued by Sun; 'Uranium Rock', Memphis, 23 Feb 1958, unissued by Sun; all CD-reissued on Warren Smith: Classic Sun Recordings, Bear Family BCD 15514-AH, Vollersode, Germany, c.1991. 'Odds and Ends', Hollywood, 17 Nov 1960, Liberty LRP 3199, Hollywood 1961, CD-reissued (with all his Liberty and later Slick recordings) on Call of the Wild Bear Family BCD 15495-AH. Some of the info on Smith above comes from the splendid British rockabilly website Rockabilly Hall of Fame, www.rockabillyhall.com.

Bob Dylan: 'Red Cadillac and a Black Mustache': Hollywood, Apr 1987, unissued, and nia, early May 2000, Good Rockin' Tonight: The Legacy of Sun Records, London, Sire 31165-2, US 1991.]

Smith, Willie [19?? - ????] William D. 'Smitty' Smith played keyboards on the 1980 semi-gospel 'Musical Retrospective' tour (November 9 to December 4), on some of the April 1981 sessions and the May 15 session for the Shot of Love album and on the spring 1981 tour (June 10 to July 25).

On the 1980 tour he opened the concerts, playing sole musical accompaniment, on piano, while the gospel group sang four numbers, and in the middle of each show there was a slot where Dylan and Smith played alone, Dylan on acoustic guitar and Smith again on piano. On the 1981 tour, these duets were dropped. The four-song gospel set at the start of each concert continued to include a song co-written by Smith, 'Saved By the Grace of Your Love'. On one occasion—July 14—Smith sang the song himself. On Shot of Love his only credit is for organ on 'Heart of Mine'.

Smith was a widely used session player reported to have met an untimely death. No details could be found for this entry.

Snerd, Mortimer J. Dylan's untitled prose-poem on the back cover of the 1965 Bringing It All Back Home LP sandwiches 'jayne mansfield.humphrey bogart' between 'SLEEPY JOHN ESTES' and 'mortimer snerd'.

Mortimer J. Snerd is one of the inventions of ventriloquist Edgar Bergen (1903–78). Bergen was on US radio as from December 1936 but long remained less famous than his first major creation, the top-hatted, monocle-wearing, quick-witted dummy Charlie McCarthy ('the funny wooden dummy . . . we all knew and loved so well', as Dylan mentions in passing in Chronicles Volume One). In 1937, given his own series on NBC (he switched to CBS in 1949), Bergen added a hayseed with six toes on one foot and a favourite cow named Bessie, who grew up on his grandfather's farm in Snerdville—the outrageously slow-witted Mortimer J. Snerd. Except that the dumbness of this dummy was allowed to be penetrating too, as when appearing on 'The Muppets' TV show in 1977 (Jim Henson had been a Bergen fan). Bergen says 'Our act is easy' and Snerd says, 'Yeah. I sit on the stage and talk and Bergen stands next to me and moves his lips.'

Edgar Bergen died before completion of The Muppet Movie, in which he, Charlie McCarthy and Mortimer Snerd also appeared. Snerd's film début had been in 1938 (in Letter of Introduction). On April 29, 1956 he was a mystery guest on the TV series 'What's My Line'.

A further Ed Bergen creation (1946) was his daughter, Candice Bergen.

['The Chase & Sanborn Show' (named for sponsors but starring Bergen etc.), NBC; 'The New Edgar Bergen Hour', CBS. Letter of Introduction, dir. John M. Stahl; Universal, US, 1938. 'The Muppet Show', 13 Jul 1977. Main source: www.snerdville.com. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.269.]

Snow, Hank [1914 - 1999] Clarence Eugene Snow was born in a Nova Scotia fishing village on May 9, 1914. He ran away from an abusive stepfather by going to sea as a cabin-boy at age 12. Here he first heard JIMMIE RODGERS (on the radio) and determined to become a country singer. He had a Canadian radio show in 1933, first recorded October 1936 (in Montréal), and after years of trying to break into the US market—years that included performing with his trained horse Shawnee and working at a radio-station in Wheeling, West Virginia, in the mid-1940s—he finally appeared on the Grand Ole Opry on January 7, 1950. He became a regular for over 40 years. He wrote and recorded 'I'm Movin' On', which became the top country song of 1950; 'I Don't Hurt Any More' repeated this feat in 1954.

ROBERT SHELTON's Dylan biography No Direction Home, 1986, notes that Dylan 'often alluded to Hank Snow' and that in Bob's boyhood home in 1968, the old records left behind in his bedroom included the LP Hank Snow Sings Jimmie Rodgers.

This last contains no material Dylan has yet utilised; but this was neither the first nor last Snow LP of Rodgers material, nor the only evidence of Dylan's familiarity with Snow's work. In 1953 the 10-inch LP Hank Snow Salutes Jimmie Rodgers had included 'My Blue-Eyed Jane' and 'Southern Cannonball'. Dylan recorded the former in 1994 for a Various Artists' JIMMIE RODGERS 'tribute album'; 33 years earlier Dylan was taped performing 'Southern Cannonball' at the Gleasons' home in East Orange, New Jersey, in February or March 1961. Hank Snow Sings in Memory of Jimmie Rodgers (America's Blue Yodeler), 1970, containing no material utilised by Dylan except 'Frankie and Johnny', was followed by The Jimmie Rodgers Story, 1972, on which Snow sings Rodgers songs interspersed with narrations by one Albert Fullam. This too includes a Snow version of 'My Blue-Eyed Jane', and on the sleevenotes Ernest Tubb remarks that Hank's special favourite in this collection is 'My Blue-Eyed Jane'.

But Hank Snow served more of a function for Dylan than as a purveyor of Jimmie Rodgers repertoire. First, Dylan would certainly have heard him on the radio. Second, Dylan performed 'I'm Movin' On' at 16 1986 concerts, a 1988 sound-check and three 1993 concerts. Snow also recorded, ahead of ELVIS PRESLEY, '(Now and Then There's) A Fool Such as I', which Dylan performed on the Basement Tapes in June 1967 and recorded again at the Self Portrait sessions—a version released instead on the 1973 LP Dylan.

(Snow helped Presley's early career: star of the Opry when Elvis made his bottom-of-the-bill appearance on it in October 1954, Snow soon had Presley on tour with him, and the first gigs booked by Col. Tom Parker were for Hank Snow Enterprises. It was also Snow who first told RCA Nashville, and his own music publishers, Hill & Range, about Presley. But when Snow's 'I Don't Hurt Anymore'—another song Dylan cut on the Basement Tapes—was at no.2 on the Country & Western charts for August 18, 1954, Presley's 'Blue Moon of Kentucky' was at no.3.)

Snow also made the single 'Ninety Miles an Hour', which Dylan recorded on the largely abject Down in the Groove in the 1980s. Dylan also performed Snow's song 'I'm Glad I Got to See You Once Again' as a one-off during the very first leg of the Never-Ending Tour (in Hollywood on August 4, 1988).

But the most interesting instance of a direct influence of Hank Snow upon the young Bob Dylan came to light only in 1993, courtesy of the Dylan fanzine Isis. One issue had published the text of a 'poem', written in Bob Zimmerman's own hand, the original of which had been posted by an unnamed hand to the fanzine's editor, DEREK BARKER. This 'poem' was a mournful tale narrated as if by a scared boy in hiding to avoid being beaten by his drunkard father. Five issues later, reader John Roberts wrote in to say that he had found an album on the cheap RCA Camden label, dated 1962, titled The One and Only Hank Snow, and risked wasting his 75p (then about $1) on this unknown music because of its inclusion of a song, credited to Clarence E. Snow, titled 'The Drunkard's Son' and handily summarised in the sleevenotes as 'the mournful tale of a scared boy in hiding to avoid being beaten by his drunkard father.' Yes indeed. As Roberts nicely observes, if the 'Zimmerman Transcript' is authentic, which now seems established, it is a 'truly unique document—the first evidence we have of Bob's plagiarism!'

Ironically, it's an example of Snow's plagiarism, too. Look back at the Jimmie Rodgers catalogue, and there, recorded in Atlanta in 1929, is Rodgers' 'A Drunkard's Child'.

Perhaps it was still in Hank Snow's repertoire when Dylan, in his youth, was in the audience for his show at the Veterans Memorial Building, Hibbing. Dylan mentions this in Chronicles Volume One—and a few pages later writes that before he encountered WOODY GUTHRIE, when HANK WILLIAMS had been his 'favorite songwriter', Hank Snow had been 'a close second'.

Snow died at home in Madison, TN, December 20, 1999, aged 85.

[Hank Snow Sings Jimmie Rodgers' Songs, RCA Victor LSP/LPM-2043, NY, 1959; 'My Blue-Eyed Jane' & 'Southern Cannonball', Nashville, TN, 12 Feb 1953, Hank Snow Salutes Jimmie Rodgers (10-inch LP) RCA Victor LPM-3131, NY, 1953; 'Frankie and Johnny', Nashville, 9 Dec 1969, Hank Snow Sings in Memory of Jimmie Rodgers (America's Blue Yodeler), RCA Victor LSP/LPM-4306, NY, 1970; 'My Blue-Eyed Jane', Nashville, 27 Dec 1971, The Jimmie Rodgers Story, RCA LSP-4708, NY (RCA LSA 3107, London), 1972 (this LP was re-issued as RCA Victor ANL1-2194, 1977, though without Tubb's sleevenotes); 'I'm Movin' On', Nashville, 28 Mar 1950, 10-inch LP-issued Country Classics, RCA Victor LPM-3026, 1952 (reissued as 12-inch with extra tracks as LPM-1233, 1955) & on The Best of Hank Snow, RCA Victor LSP-3478, 1966; '(Now and Then There's) A Fool Such as I', Nashville, 19 Feb 1952, LP-issued Country Classics (above), LPM-1233, 1955 and The Best of Hank Snow (ditto); 'I Don't Hurt Anymore', Nashville, 1954, RCA Victor 5698, 1954; 'Ninety Miles an Hour (Down a Dead-End Street)', RCA Victor 8239, 1963. (Snow is billed as 'The Singing Ranger' on two 4-CD sets of his RCA Victor work issued on Bear Family BCD 15426-DH and 15476-DH, Vollersode, Germany, 1988 & 1990, which include 'I'm Movin' On' & '(Now and Then There's) A Fool Such as I'. 1954–1958 sides Snow recorded for radio play only are on a 5-CD set The Thesaurus Transcriptions, Bear Family BCD 15488-EH, 1991, including another 'Frankie and Johnny'.) 'The Drunkard's Son', nia, 1st issue Canada 1943–49, nia; 1st US issue as a single, RCA 21-0303, NY, 1950; LP-issued on The One and Only Hank Snow, Camden CAL-722, NY (RCA Camden CDN5102, London), 1962 (sleevenotes by Roy Horton). The song appears on various other Snow releases, variously titled 'The Drunkard's Son', 'The Drunkard's Child' and 'A Drunkard's Child'.

Bob Dylan: 'My Blue-Eyed Jane', details see entry on Rodgers, Jimmie; 'Southern Cannonball', East Orange, NJ, Feb/Mar 1961, unreleased; 'A Fool Such as I' & 'I Don't Hurt Anymore', Woodstock, NY, June 1967. Bob Dylan, Chronicles, 2004, p.43 & 49. Isis no.44, Aug–Sep 1992, & no.49, Jun–Jul 1993, Coventry, UK.]

Soles, Steve [19?? -] J. Steven Soles, a guitarist, harmony vocalist and sometime record producer, was the first husband of actress and Penthouse model P.J. Soles (the husband before Denis Quaid). They married in 1971 and divorced in 1975.

Soles, who is a vintage car fan, was one of the few who played in Guam on both the Rolling Thunder Revue tours and throughout the 1978 World Tour (guitar and vocals each time), and who was also called in to work on both the studio albums recorded in that period, Desire and Street Legal, as well as, of course, appearing on the two live albums Hard Rain and At Budokan and in both the 'Hard Rain' TV Special and Renaldo & Clara.

On Desire, his only session was the October 24, 1975 session, almost two full months after the last of the rest, and necessitated by Dylan's need to avoid litigation by re-cutting 'Hurricane' with amended lyrics. Soles plays guitar; on Street Legal he contributes vocals as well as guitar, and plays on all tracks. On the first Rolling Thunder tour, the opening set by Guam each night generally included Soles singing his own song 'Don't Blame Me'; on the second tour, this changed to 'Mad Man'.

DEREK BARKER reports another Dylan-Soles connection: 'Dylan band member Steven Soles says Dylan came to his apartment one afternoon in 1977 and played him and T-BONE BURNETT ten or twelve ". . . Very dark, very intense" songs. Soles could only recall one title, "I'm Cold".'

Like Burnett, Soles was a Born Again Christian and thought Bob would be happier (and presumably write cheerier songs) if he joined the march of onward Christian soldiers too. Soles told CLINTON HEYLIN: 'I kept telling him that I was so glad that I didn't have to place my faith in man any longer.' Clearly, since he said this more than once, he can have had little idea how repulsive it sounds.

Despite his long service and his proselytising, or possibly because of them, he was not asked to be part of any of Dylan's own Born Again or gospel recording or touring in the period immediately following the 1978 World Tour. He was a co-founder of the Alpha Band (for details see the entry Burnett, T-Bone), and after it folded released two solo albums, Promise (1980), and Walk By Love (1982). In 1988 Soles was among those on the 'ROY ORBISON and Friends: Black & White Night' TV Special, and in the early 1990s played in ELVIS COSTELLO's band—on acoustic guitar and harmony vocals. He has also composed for a handful of films, including, in 1996, for an action thriller titled Don't Look Back.

[Derek Barker, '1978 and All That', collected in 20 Years of Isis: Bob Dylan Anthology Volume 2, New Malden, UK: Chrome Dreams, 2005, p.220 but taken from Sounes, p.210. Clinton Heylin, Behind the Shades Revisited, London: Penguin, 2003.]

'Solid Rock' [1980] Dylan recorded this on the second day of the sessions for the Saved album (though some percussions and back-up vocals were overdubbed a day later). Like the title track, this is at the least skilfully written end of Dylan's evangelical work. The sound strives for power but achieves only bombast, while the lyrics foam with generalised scriptural rebuke. The only moment of Dylan's creative flash comes here: 'It's the ways of the flesh to war against the spirit / Twenty-four hours a day you can feel it and you can hear it', where he wakes us up briefly by inserting into this deadening biblical fulmination that playfully modern phrase 'Twenty-four hours a day'. It's a small blob of jam on a large pill.

Dylan's text here is taken from Galatians 5:17: 'For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other . . .' But this theme doesn't have to be expressed with such dead preachiness. The Bible itself makes the same point elsewhere in far more human, attractive and poetic terms. In Romans, for example, Paul speaks, neatly, of those who 'served the creature more than the Creator' (1:25) and, not to exclude himself, admits that 'I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind' (7:23); while in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians he says that '. . . while we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord' (5:6).

The founding texts, as it were, behind the title and chorus of 'Solid Rock' (behind 'Well I'm hangin' on to a solid rock / Made before the foundation of the world') are from John 10:4 ('. . . and that Rock was Christ') and the verbatim 'before the foundation of the world'—one of those nondescript phrases which hook the attention by incantatory repetition throughout the New Testament. It is in John 17:24, Ephesians 1:4 and I Peter 1:20 (with the lesser 'from the foundation of the world' in Matthew 13:35, Luke 11:50 and Hebrews 4:3 and 'since the foundation of the world' in Hebrews 9:26).

In the so-called Good News Bible, 1966–76, the full phrase has become so much more nondescript that the effect of repetition is nil, since it passes entirely unnoticed, being merely 'before the world was made'. This, of course, killing all figurative possibility, obviates the connection with 'solid rock'.

The full phrase, as Dylan uses it, allies most clearly with the idea of Christ as the Rock in I Peter 1:20, which describes him so: 'Who verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you.' In this way Christian orthodoxy solves the problem of how Christ can be such a late-comer yet can have been around all along: God, forseeing the fall of humankind, pre-prepared the remedy that was to cure the disease. (Even in Jewish orthodoxy, seven things existed before the creation of the world, and one was the Messiah.)

Dylan débuted 'Solid Rock' live in concert on the opening night of the first gospel tour (on November 1, 1979, in San Francisco), long before he recorded it. He performed it every night of that tour, and every night of the follow-up tour in January–February 1980. It remained in place for the third and last all-gospel tour, with Dylan still playing the preacherman. Introducing the song on the fourth night in Toronto that April, as the music twitches restlessly behind him, ready to burst through, Dylan declaims from memory another text by Paul, from I Timothy 3:16. The text is this: 'God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.' Whether deliberate editing or faulty recollection prompts Dylan's changes, they work well enough, as he declares: 'It [the solid rock] was manifest in the flesh! an' justified in the Spirit! an' seen by angels! an' preached on in the world!' Had his audience been black church, you would have heard the 'Yes, Lord!'s' and 'A-men!'s' coming back at him between each ascending, clamorous phrase. As it was, his gospel back-up vocalists supply these responses with mellifluous but authentic 'Oh yea-ea-eah!'s'.

[Bob Dylan: 'Solid Rock', Sheffield, AL, 12 Feb 1980; Toronto, 20 Apr 1980.]

song in the history of English Literature WILFRID MELLERS, professor of music and former Scrutiny literary critic: 'We talk nowadays as though the relationship between . . . [words and music] . . . constituted a problem; even as though there were a natural antipathy between them which composer and poet must overcome as best they may. Yet the separation of the two arts is comparatively recent, and the link between them would seem to be rooted deep in human nature.'

Dylan has chosen a medium we are still unused to taking seriously: an inseparable mixture of music and words. We grew up finding this a cheap and trivial formula but if we look back beyond the Elizabethan age we find a very long period in which troubadours were an important part of our culture, when that culture was orally dominated and when sophisticated art was the same in kind as the heritage ‘of the people’.

It is only comparatively recently that folk and sophisticated culture have been separate. The gulf was not complete in England until the emergence of the Augustans, with their classicists and coffeehouse smart-sets, although it had started with Chaucer, who brought to dominance an East Midlands dialect which became what we call ‘standard English’.

With only a few exceptions, pre-Elizabethan poetry was ‘of the people’. Pre-Aelfredian poetry was all vernacular and all, in essence, orally disciplined, including ‘Beowulf’, the longest surviving poem in Old English, and written about a thousand years ago. It was sung, and its development was the responsibility of its singers; and so, roughly, things continued until the Norman Conquest. And in the long run, the English absorbed the Normans and the English language rose in importance.

The poetical literature that grew with it was again emphatically ‘of the people’ from Langland’s ‘Vision of Piers Plowman’ in 1362 to Orm’s ‘Ormulum’ (early 13th century verse homilies by an Augustinian canon). ‘Piers Plowman’ might now be the province of university English departments, but in its own time it appealed to everyone. Written in the Old English manner, in alliterative verse, it had an equal impact on those who wanted a reform of the Church and those labourers and serfs to whom Wat Tyler offered himself as a symbol of progress and hope.

Throughout the entire 15th century the divisive power of Chaucer’s influence was fought by those ingredients of English life which worked towards keeping up the old cultural unity. In this transitional period, ballads, lays and so on blossomed alongside a renewed concern with classical literature. So the Elizabethan age that followed grew out of a cultural turmoil never equalled before or since, until our own times. Folk culture was intimately and creatively linked with literary culture in the age that has given us an unmatched richness of artistic achievement.

If 1960s guru MARSHALL McLUHAN was right, if our technology is pushing us forward into another orally dominated age, then it shouldn’t be surprising to find a serious artist once again at work in the medium Dylan has chosen. Nor should it astonish us that such an artist can have re-forged the links between folk and sophisticated culture.

Everywhere in the West, minority cultures are being tossed together and mixed with, on the one hand, lumpen uniformity and on the other, what passes as the haute culture of the age (and the process accelerates all the time), so that whatever our class or geographic centre, we have more in common with one another, more shared experience, than the men and women of any period since the heyday of the Elizabethan age in England. Full circle. And this wheel’s on fire—we are caught up in a kind of vulgar, neurotic renaissance. Hail the return, as McLuhan insists, to oral primacy.

Small wonder that Dylan should select, or rather, find himself at home in, an artistic medium not merely literary but involving a return to a medieval interdependence of words and music. ‘Popular songs,’ he said in 1965, ‘are the only form that describes the temper of the times. . . . That’s where the people hang out. It’s not in books; it’s not on the stage; it’s not in the galleries.’

See also Bunyan, John.

[Mellers: source unknown; quoted from Michael Gray, Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, p.45. Dylan re-quoted in ‘The Playboy Interview: Bob Dylan: a candid conversation with the iconoclastic idol of the folk-rock set’, Playboy, Mar 1966.]

‘Song to Woody’ [1962] The only self-composed songs on Dylan’s first album were ‘Talkin’ New York’ and the reflective ‘Song to Woody’. Here, irony closes the lyric: after he salutes CISCO HOUSTON, SONNY TERRY and LEADBELLY and the unnamed other ‘good people’ who had traveled with WOODY GUTHRIE, Dylan ends by saying ‘the very last thing that I’d want to do / Is to say I bin hittin’ some hard travelin’ too.’ Clearly, to say he’d been hitting some hard travelling too is not the last thing Dylan would like to be able to do. It is with those final lines—which get their special strength not just from the understatement but from the carefully clipped reluctance of the cadence—that we get a fresh focus on the whole theme of the song. At the same time, we still hear the echoes of all those delicate rushes of confidentiality which, throughout the lyric, establish its tone. Other aspects of the song also contribute to its appeal. There is the frank if implicit statement of what is, on Dylan’s part, a plea for an innocent drop-out and the concern to find a new allegiance in the ‘hard travelin’’ ethos. Again there is a delicacy in handling this: a balance struck in perceiving both the harsh reality and its romantic flavour. The song not only reflects Guthrie faithfully but assesses his real but disappearing America from Dylan’s, the young man’s, perspective. We are offered a highly intelligent understanding of the subject.

This comes over too in the rhythmic balance of the lyric: look at the third and fourth lines, the seventh and eighth, and so on; and likewise, the wind and the dust are there in the song’s construction. Lines and syllables take the form of a list:

the suggestion is one of restless movement within a preordained pattern of repetition. The sharecropper's life rhythm. In Guthrie's triumphant autobiography, Bound for Glory (1943), we see him travelling around with the homeless families who are also the heroes of Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath (1939); and while recalling one particular encounter, Guthrie quotes one of his own songs, 'Pastures of Plenty'. Dylan's tribute reworks this, changing the last verb in Guthrie's 'We come with the dust and we go with the wind' from 'go' to 'are gone', showing his awareness that the era which produced such men was all but over.

If Dylan's debt to Guthrie is, as he admits, substantial, it is not in essence just derivative. Few people can have gained so much from Guthrie's work, even though that work is among the best of the American folk-art accessible to us from the pre-1960s. When Dylan sings in 'Song to Woody' that 'I'm seein' y'r world of people and things' he is too modest: he has not so much seen as recreated.

[Recorded NY, 20 Nov 1961, but Dylan is known to have performed the song 'live' at the Gaslight Café in Greenwich Village on 6 Sep that year (there's an extant unreleased recording). By the end of 1998 Dylan had only performed the song 'live' 24 times. A version recorded NY, 1–2 May 1970 with GEORGE HARRISON has also circulated.]

'Soon' [1987] See Gershwin, George & Ira.

'The Sopranos' [TV series] Created by David Chase, 'The Sopranos' occupies the world of the New Jersey mob as if it were Ancient Greece. First aired in 1999 on cable TV, it has proved one of those drama series not only popular but cool to admire. Dylan recorded a song specially for it. On December 17, 2000, at the New York session at which he recorded 'I Can't Get You Off of My Mind' for the HANK WILLIAMS tribute album Timeless, he also recorded 'Return to Me', a song co-written by Guy Lombardo's brother Carmen and a big 1958 hit by Dean Martin, for 'The Sopranos'. Dylan's version, a fond and fumbling recreation of the Martin version, complete with a verse in Italian, cut with TONY GARNIER on bass and LARRY CAMPBELL on guitar but augmented by Shawn Pelton on drums and Brian Mitchell on accordion, was for the slot at the end of each episode when the credits roll to a different slice of music each time. It ran in the 2001 series—Episode 38, 'Amour Fou'—and was released on the compilation soundtrack album The Sopranos—Pepper & Eggs: Music from the HBO Original Series, released in 2001. (Episode 24 in the first series had used part of the Slow Train Coming cut of 'Gotta Serve Somebody' and included it in the first compilation album.)

[Bob Dylan: 'Return to Me', NY, 17 Dec 2000, The Sopranos—Pepper & Eggs: Music from the HBO Original Series, Columbia/Sony Music Soundtrax C2K 85453, May 2001.]

Sounes, Howard [1965 -] Howard Guy Sounes was born in Welling, Kent, UK, on January 3, 1965. He first took an interest in Dylan's work in about 1979 when he started to explore an older sister's record collection and found within it, among an abundance of Rod Stewart, Roxy Music, Tommy and the like, the quiet jewel of Blood on the Tracks. An acoustic-guitarist best friend at school, and the friend's dad, were both Dylan fans; the friend worked his way through Dylan songbooks while Howard smoked cigarettes and listened. At age 16, the two of them went to see Dylan live at Earl's Court, London, in June 1981.

Apart from writing the highly praised biography Locked in the Arms of a Crazy Life: Charles Bukowski, published in 1998, Bukowski in Pictures (2000), The Wicked Game (i.e. golf, 2004) and Fred & Rose: The Full Story of Fred and Rose West and the Gloucester House of Horrors ('by a journalist who covered the story from day one', 1995), Howard Sounes became one of Bob Dylan's many biographers, interviewing 250 people to produce Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan in 2001. Its particular achievement, beyond its competence at handling detail, was the revelation of Dylan's having been married to CAROLYN DENNIS and their having a daughter.

Since the golf book he has turned his attention to a history of the arts in the 1970s, to be published by Simon & Schuster in 2006. Its working title is Seventies. Dylan is touched upon.

[Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001; Fred & Rose: The Full Story of Fred and Rose West and the Gloucester House of Horrors, London: Warner Books, 1995; Locked in the Arms of a Crazy Life: Charles Bukowski, New York: Grove Press, 1998; Bukowski in Pictures, Edinburgh: Rebel Inc., 2000; The Wicked Game, New York: HarperCollins, 2004.]

South, Joe [1940 -] Joseph Alfred Souter was born on February 28, 1940 in Atlanta, Georgia, and grew up to be a briefly famous hit-making performer in his own right, the writer of a cluster of big hit songs that have been recurrently covered, and a fine session-playing guitarist with a distinctive biting sound. His first work was playing in R&B groups in Atlanta, as a staff guitarist for National Recording Corporation in Atlanta (as were Ray Stevens and Jerry Reed) and on country radio. In 1957 he joined PETE DRAKE's group, recorded the 1958 novelty single 'The Purple People Eater Meets the Witch Doctor' and became a session player both in Nashville and at Muscle Shoals in Sheffield, Alabama. He played on records by Marty Robbins and Eddy Arnold but also on tracks by Wilson Pickett and Aretha Franklin (his is the stand-out guitar part on her 'Chain of Fools'). He creates the distinctive sound on Tommy Roe's wannabe-BUDDY HOLLY hit 'Sheila' and plays the lead electric guitar part that producer TOM WILSON overdubbed onto SIMON & Garfunkel's 'The Sound of Silence'.

In his own right he had a transatlantic top 10 hit in 1969 with his fearsomely catchy and swamplike 'Games People Play', proving himself a fine coordinator of words and music. He scored again with 'Walk a Mile in My Shoes' after a more minor success with 'Don't It Make You Want to Go Home'. His first hit as a writer was in 1962, with the Atlanta-based group the Tams' hit 'Untie Me'. He went on to write the Deep Purple hit 'Hush' (a UK hit all over again by the short-lived but mega-successful Kula Shaker in 1997), Billy Joe Royal's splendid 'Down in the Boondocks' and 'I Knew You When' (both 1965; the latter revived by Linda Ronstadt) and Lynn Anderson's huge 1971 hit '(I Never Promised You a) Rose Garden'.

His own version of 'Rose Garden', like 'Games People Play', was on his début solo album, Introspect (1968)—a pioneering classic of soul country which was quickly withdrawn and then reissued as Games People Play. It also includes his 'Birds of a Feather', the melody of which rather resembles that of VAN MORRISON's 'Brown-Eyed Girl'. South's follow up, Don't It Make You Want to Go Home (1969), included 'Walk a Mile in My Shoes'. Two further albums followed, A Look Inside and So the Seeds Are Growing. South also produced Billy Joe Royal, Sandy Posey and others.

'Walk a Mile in My Shoes' became a personally applied theme song in ELVIS PRESLEY's live repertoire of the 1970s, and was the first of the 50 songs Bob Dylan performed at his four-set night at Toad's Place, New Haven, CT, on January 12–13, 1990.

Joe South, however, had earlier Dylan connections. He played guitar on the November 30, 1965 Dylan session, at which first attempts at Blonde on Blonde material were made, using as musicians a blend of Hawks and session men: RICK DANKO, ROBBIE ROBERTSON, RICHARD MANUEL and GARTH HUDSON, plus AL KOOPER, BRUCE LANGHORNE, PAUL GRIFFIN, BOBBY GREGG and South. It was the session that produced circulated first outtakes of 'Visions of Johanna' (though he goes uncredited when one is released on the 2005 set the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack) plus the properly issued version of the single 'Can You Please Crawl Out Your Window?' On this occasion, the session log has South down under his real name, Joseph Souter. Not so for the February 14–16, 1966 sessions, on which he plays both bass and guitar, or the March 7–9 sessions, on which he plays guitar. Al Kooper credits him with 'playing the soul guitar on "Stuck Inside of Mobile". . . . [and] the great bass line of "Visions of Johanna".'

South was derailed by the 1971 suicide of his brother Tommy, who had also been the drummer in his studio and touring band. Joe suffered severe clinical depression and vanished to live in the jungle on the Hawaiian island of Maui. He made a brief return in 1975 with a solid new solo album, Midnight Rainbows, but though two more albums followed in 1976, You're the Reason and Look Inside, South promptly retired again, emerging only in 1994, when he took part in a multi-artist London concert showcasing southern musicians and then settled down to work in music publishing.

[Joe South: Introspect, Capitol ST108, US, 1968; Don't It Want to Make You Go Home, Capitol ST392, 1969; A Look Inside, Capitol ST-11074, 1972; So the Seeds Are Growing, Capitol ST637, nia; Midnight Rainbows, Island LPS 9328, US, 1975. Al Kooper quoted from booklet inside Dylan's Bootleg Series Vol.7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, 2005.]

'Spanish Harlem Incident' [1964] On the fourth album, Another Side of Bob Dylan, perhaps the most historically interesting song is 'Spanish Harlem Incident', because here we find the really substantial beginnings of Dylan's famous complexity, the beginnings of what 1965 brought out so explosively.

'Spanish Harlem Incident' begins with this: 'Gypsy Gal, the hands of Harlem / Cannot hold you to its heat'—which is a stylish and immediately impressive declaration of independence on Dylan's part: a marker in the development of his figurative language.

'I am homeless, come and take me / Into the reach of your rattling drums. / Let me know, babe, all about my fortune / Down along my restless palms.' There, strikingly, is that individual style of impressionism that Dylan was to cultivate (and which attracted so many unfortunate imitations—including much from the Beatles, with their 'plasticine porters' and 'marmalade skies'). Dylan's has work to do. He begins simply enough with that non-literal, non-physical 'homeless'; and while he moves to that apparently vaguer 'rattling drums' yet the adjective there has a precision of its own: we're shown how appropriate the phrase is to the spirit of the Gypsy Gal as Dylan sees her. Next, there is a precise function in the uniting of two ideas in 'my restless palms'—the validity of the fortune-telling allusion being sympathetically strengthened by its connection to the singer's admitted desire for hand-in-hand contact, while the wish implicit there harks back to that 'come and take me' in the earlier line. It is as part of the evocation of this particular Gypsy Gal that this near-Gothic effect works also: 'The night is pitch black, come an' make my / Pale face fit into place, ah! please!' For such a girl, the night would make itself dramatic. Again, we feel that her individual personality draws out this, in the final verse: 'On the cliffs of your wildcat charms I'm riding, / I know I'm round you but I don't know where.'

The first of those lines gives a perfect summary of how the writer stands for the creation of the song. His language, throughout, is intent on eliciting a captivating vision of those 'wildcat charms'—a nice phrase, jostling the untamed with the traditionally genteel so freshly—and his singleness of purpose places Dylan's impressionistic imagery a long way from the random hit-and-miss version of his imitators. Theirs is exhibited for its own sake and is its own reason for being; Dylan's is there to assist the communication of specific and personally realised themes.

It's instructive to take this 'minor' song from 1964 and compare it to a minor song from the wretched Empire Burlesque album of 1985: say, 'Emotionally Yours'. The differences in vocal performances on such early and such later recordings are discussed elsewhere. Here let's consider the songs themselves.

Whatever aspect of the two you choose, there's simply no contest. Compare the titles. 'Spanish Harlem Incident' has a deft particularity, even after all these years: in its cultural allusiveness—the playfully used mock movie title or mock headline it conjures—it carries the spark of an alert mind, not taking itself too seriously but on the ball, while as a comment on its contents—a making light of the feelings expressed with such energy in the song, it contributes to the expression of those feelings, signalling the singer's wistful regret that such affairs must pass. What does the title 'Emotionally Yours' signify? Bullshit and sludge. There's nothing alert, sparky or culturally allusive here, no deft particularity—no particularity at all. It makes no comment, other than by default, since anyone with a modicum of alertness to language themselves will be warned off by the clumsy untruth at its ponderous core.

Compare the repeating line that ends the verses—the device that is as near to having a chorus as either song comes. In 'Spanish Harlem Incident' we get 'I got to know babe . . .' (yes, there's one 'babe' in each of the three verses); then that 'Let me know babe, all about my fortune / Down along my restless palms'; then 'Let me know, babe—I'm nearly drowning—If it's you my lifelines trace'; and then 'I got to know babe, will you surround me / So I can know if I am really real.' (These lines were subjected to stupid twiddles of alteration in the version published in Writings and Drawings, 1972, and perpetuated in later songbooks.)

What we have here, then, is a sustained conceit—'gypsy gal' = fortune-teller—deftly used, to say that in the moment evoked in the song, the singer feels that his future is in her hands; this is sustained for the conclusions of the first two verses—and without a pop cliché in sight: not with 'your heart is in my hands', but rather in language new to popular song, and with a particularity that convinces you there's a specific person envisaged here, and a particular moment experienced: these are 'restless palms'. This also allow the verse's end to balance its beginning, in which 'the hands of Harlem / Cannot hold you to its heat.'

This conceit, this calculation and planning, if you will, in the composing of the lyric, far from having the effect of making it seem a construct of artifice, enables the song's authenticity to flow. Its last verse ends with just the necessary minimal difference to signal that it is the song's end, and to finish with a renewal of ardour and urgency, acting as a protestation at coming to the end of the affair it describes. Where the other verses both end with 'Let me know', in the last this becomes 'I got to know'. What of the repeated line at each verse end in 'Emotionally Yours'?: 'And I will always be emotionally yours.' 'And I will always be emotionally yours.' 'But I will always be emotionally yours.' The 'And' becomes 'But' to signal song's end. Nothing else moves, in any sense.

Compare strikingness of openings. 'Spanish Harlem Incident' opens vividly, with a clear-sighted placement of person and cityscape that yet leaves the listener to fill that picture in—trusts the listener to do so—while beginning as it means to go on, with a poetic conceit, and one that coheres with what will follow. 'Emotionally Yours' also begins as it means to go on: 'Come baby, find me, come baby remind me, of where I once begun. / Come baby, show me, show me you know me, tell me you're the one.' On this evidence the writer is sorely in need of reminding of where he once begun.

Further, the one song has vivid imagery, the other virtually none. Does 'come baby, lock me into the shadows of your heart' do anything but palely loiter in the shadows of 'come and take me / Into the reach of your rattling drums'? Something is happening in the specific moment, something is being visualised in the Harlem night, when the Dylan of 1964 sings 'The night is pitch black, come an' make my / Pale face fit into place, ah please!'—not least because something is happening to enact it in the dynamics of the line itself. Dylan expresses his awkward fit with the marvellous awkward fit of the word distribution and the inspired onomatopoeic stuttering of those alliterative ps and fs along that insistent, urging second line. Nothing is happening when the Dylan of 1985 sings 'Come baby, shake me, come baby, take me, I would be satisfied. / Come baby, hold me, come baby, enfold me, my arms are open wide.' The verbs of imprecation hold no urgency here: they're there because they rhyme; there's no enactment of any of the demanded shaking or taking—and nothing for the visual imagination to get a grip on, except for the stiff cliché of 'my arms are open wide'. Where the earlier minor song is personal and fresh and fired by particularity, the later one is tired before it starts, and its only stuffing is the dullest of pop cotton-wool.

You'd think it should be the other way around. In 1964 Bob Dylan had good reason to be drawn to pop. Pop was exciting right at that point, not least to Dylan. This was the era when he was freeing himself from the constraints of 'folk', taking his car trip around America and hearing, inevitably, THE BEATLES on the radio all the time. The 1960s was really beginning. Yet the young Bob Dylan, absorbing all this, was nevertheless writing songs that benefited from his saturation in all the richness of folksong. By 1985 what had been fresh was stale, what had been youthfully alive was encrusted in weary detritus. Weird time for Bob Dylan to join the pop party, and for his writing to benefit only from saturation in the shallow histrionics of corporate rock. (See also co-option of real music by advertising, the.)

Yet despite all this, Dylan himself seems never to have cared much for 'Spanish Harlem Incident'. He performed it live only once, so far as we know: having recorded the studio version on June 9, 1964 (along with all the other tracks on Another Side of Bob Dylan), he ignored it at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL that July, didn't play it at the JOAN BAEZ concert at Forest Hills in August (at which he sang three songs), and ignored it at his Philadelphia Town Hall concert in September. Then he performed it as the second song at his important New York Philharmonic Hall concert that Hallowe'en (issued 40 years later on the CD the Bootleg Series Vol. 6), and has never played it again since. One live performance of this tremendous song!

[Bob Dylan: 'Spanish Harlem Incident', NY, 9 Jun 1964 & NY, 31 Oct 1964; 'Emotionally Yours', Hollywood, 14 Feb 1985 (+ overdubs Feb 25 & beyond). The Beatles' phrases are from 'Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds', London, 2 Mar 1967, Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts' Club Band, Parlophone PCS 7027 (PMC 7027 mono), London (Capitol SMAS 2653, LA), 1967.]

Spector, Phil [1940 -] Phil Spector, the world's oldest boy genius, was born Harvey Phillip Spector in the Bronx on Boxing Day, 1940. He and his mother Bertha moved to Los Angeles when he was 12, three years after his father Ben's suicide: an event that, more than any other, 'explains' Spector's lifetime of disturbed behaviour. Mad, inspired record-producer; seven-stone weakling; gun-toting paranoiac; teen tantrum king; abusive husband and father: this is Phil Spector on a good day.

He achieved immortality in the world of pre-BEATLES pop, making what he dubbed as 'little symphonies for the kids'—a lava flow of hit singles by the Crystals, the Ronettes, Darlene Love, the Righteous Brothers, Bob B. Soxx & the Blue Jeans and more besides—and spent the next 40 years or so in dark and stormy decline.

He learnt piano, french horn, drums and guitar at school, and began writing songs with school friend Marshall Lieb. With the splendidly named Annette Bard (really Kleinbard), another school friend, they formed vocal trio the Teddy Bears, and in 1958 recorded Spector's composition 'To Know Him Is to Love Him', its title taken from his father's tombstone. It hit the US top 10 and sold a million. Spector was 17 years old. Unforgettably catchy, it is an artfully naïve record, very sweet and very 'white'. Even the upbeat B-side has a timid sensitivity, summed up in the comically solicitous couplet 'Don't you worry my little pet, don't you worry and don't you fret'.

All this was totally out of character for its creator. Spector's own musical taste ran to jazz and rhythm'n'blues; as his later records would soon prove, he preferred thunderous bedlam to tender timidity and he was about as solicitous as a crocodile.

Four Teddy Bears follow-ups were flops, and so were records by the so-called Spectors Three. This was the first of many career reverses, and the ambitious singer and songwriter didn't take it well. A murky period in Spector's history followed. It's said that he took advantage of a job-offer as interpreter in French at UN headquarters in New York to get his airfare paid but never showed up for work, instead meeting his backroom-boy heroes, Leiber & Stoller, who had written hits for ELVIS and for many black acts like the Coasters. More likely, he stayed in LA, worked as a typist while studying at UCLA and then at 18 re-entered the record-business, working under guitarist Duane Eddy's producers, Lester Sill and Lee Hazelwood in Phoenix, Arizona, learning studio production before persuading Sill to send him to New York in 1960.

There he not only met Leiber & Stoller but co-wrote, with Leiber, Ben E. King's classic 'Spanish Harlem'. He also met Ray Peterson, star of the death record 'Tell Laura I Love Her', and produced his follow-up, 'Corrina Corrina', Spector's first hit as a producer. He was soon back in the charts with the Paris Sisters' 'I Love How You Love Me', Gene Pitney's 'Every Breath I Take' and Curtis Lee's 'Pretty Little Angel Eyes', and doing freelance A&R for Atlantic Records. These conventional slices of pop gave no hint of the distinctive vision Spector was about to unleash.

The famous Wall of Sound arrived in 1962, by which time Spector had bought out his partner and at 21 was sole owner of the record-label Philles. He brought together a team of session players, many of whom, like pianist LEON RUSSELL and guitarist Glen Campbell, would later be famous themselves. Spector bullied and hectored these people into a phenomenon—a hit-making machine that, under his dictatorial direction, turned out around 15 timeless classics, including 'He's a Rebel', 'Da Doo Ron Ron' and 'Then He Kissed Me' by the Crystals, 'Be My Baby' and 'Baby I Love You' by the Ronettes, 'Zip-a-Dee-Doo-Dah' by Bob B. Soxx & the Blue Jeans and '(Today I Met) The Boy I'm Gonna Marry' and 'Christmas (Baby Please Come Home)' by Darlene Love. Spector was a millionaire before he was 22. Tom Wolfe called him 'the first tycoon of teen'.

These records changed the rules. Instead of the music being mere 'backing' behind the vocals, it became exponentially multiplied, so that the mix of teenage angst and howling sexuality offered by the singers had to make itself heard above a torrid cacophony in which no distinction was possible between percussion and other instrumentation. Instead of the producer being an anonymous figure whose job was to transmit without interference the individual singer and song, Spector invented, at a stroke, the auteur director of sound, dreaming up and hurling out three-minute Wagnerian operas in which the youthful and raunchy vocalists were almost as interchangeable as back-row violinists. So thoroughly were all these other talents mere tools in the fiery workshop of the maestro that to this day everyone knows the 1963 LP A Christmas Gift for You as Phil Spector's Christmas Album. As Darlene Love recalls, 'He wanted to build an empire for himself and be bigger than his artists. And it worked.' More generous than Spector ever was, she adds: 'You don't know how some of those singers sounded without him. Phil made everyone sound good.'

He also revitalised the early-60s pop record, replacing the thin, exhausted platitudes of a hundred Bobbies and Johnnies with the tumult of musical armageddon and the erotic exotica of nubile girl groups with very short skirts and towering, sticky beehive hair-dos. For many fans, their first glimpse of the sultry Ronettes and first hearing of that up-front demand 'Be my baby NOW!' was a sexual awakening.

Yet at the same time, just as black Americans were beginning to march and stand up for their civil rights, Spector had the nerve to make records that were often racially androgynous. You couldn't tell if the Righteous Brothers were black or white; you couldn't tell the male-female mix of Bob B. Soxx & the Blue Jeans.

Spector's unique mastery of the sound-desk meant that his songwriting skill went unnoticed. Yet if he hadn't been a producer, he'd still have been a rich, significant figure in pop as a writer or co-writer of classics, from his very first attempt, on across his Wall of Sound smashes (he co-wrote most of them), through 'You've Lost That Lovin' Feelin'' to Ike & Tina Turner's 'River Deep Mountain High'. In later years he co-wrote with Harry Nilsson, GEORGE HARRISON and LEONARD COHEN.

Spector was one of four pop figures customarily called a genius, and influenced at least one of the others, Beach Boy BRIAN WILSON. While Spector himself 'retired' at 25, furious that 'River Deep Mountain High' was a flop in America (it was a smash in Britain), the Beach Boys' complex mid-60s recordings like Pet Sounds and 'Good Vibrations' owed much to Wilson's admiration for Spector.

His influence was everywhere. THE ROLLING STONES' early manager/producer, Andrew Loog Oldham, was a Spector wannabe. And if the Beatles and Stones made Spector seem old-fashioned, and the girl-group hits dried up, he bounced back when notorious music mogul Allen Klein put Spector and the Beatles together. By this point a legend and still only 30 years old, Spector was hired by Klein to remix Let It Be. McCARTNEY hated Klein issuing the re-mixed 'Long and Winding Road' as a single. Beatle publicist Derek Taylor says when Paul heard what Spector had done, he thought it was 'the shittiest thing anyone had ever done to him, and that was saying something.'

After the Beatles split, LENNON used Spector on his first solo LP and then Phil produced the ex-Beatle solo album that wiped the floor with everyone else's, George Harrison's triple-LP All Things Must Pass. Spector-produced hits from these albums included 'Instant Karma' and 'My Sweet Lord', and in 1971 he produced the Concert for Bangla Desh organised by Harrison that brought together everyone from Ravi Shankar to CLAPTON and Dylan. (Dylan and Harrison, getting together in the studio the previous May, had tipped their hats to Spector with a fond but daft, Dylanised version of 'Da Doo Ron Ron', on which 90 per cent of the lyric remained out of his grasp.)

This was the first of only two real Spector-Dylan encounters, though between the two has come the famous hoax of a rumoured 1965 Bob Dylan Christmas album, supposedly part-produced by Spector and titled Snow Over Interstate 80: a hoax perpetrated by UK music paper New Musical Express in 1975. (One of the tracks they claimed as included, 'Silent Night', was later recorded by Dylan: at an Infidels session in New York on April 22, 1983; this has never circulated, but, unlike Snow Over Insterstate 80, did exist.)

The other actual Spector-Dylan encounter was in 1977 when, on Leonard Cohen's Spector-produced album Death of a Ladies' Man, Bob Dylan and ALLEN GINSBERG were back-up vocalists on one song, 'Don't Go Home with Your Hard-On'. This album was not a success, and nor were Spector-produced mid-1970s records by Dion and Cher.

People never gave up on Spector, though. In 1980 New York punk group the Ramones got him to produce their album End of the Century, and as late as 1996 he was warring with Celine Dion's team over an abortive collaboration, declaring: 'You don't tell Shakespeare what plays to write, or how to write them, and you certainly don't tell Phil Spector.'

Rather, he gave up on himself. He stayed locked inside the most wired, guard-dog infested mansion in all of Hollywood, and wore, as well as the obligatory dark glasses, a huge cross around his neck and a gun on his hip. Drug stories and arrests, bodyguard beatings and dangerous tantrums became commonplace around him, culminating in his indictment on a murder charge in 2004, after 40-year-old actor Lana Clarkson was found dead in early 2003, shot through the mouth at his home. Spector was freed on $1 million bail. At the time of writing (January 2006), he has withdrawn a $1 million suit against his own first trial attorney, lost his bid to rule out police testimony that he first claimed he'd shot Ms. Clarkson by accident before claiming she'd killed herself, and announced that if acquitted he will, at age 65, marry 25-year-old fiancée Rachelle Short.

As writer Mary Harron put it, 'He had one perfect moment in the early 60s, and never recovered.'

[The Teddy Bears: 'To Know Him Is to Love Him', LA, 1958, Doré 503, US & Canada (London-American HL 8733, UK), 1958. Various Artists: A Christmas Gift for You, nia, Philles PHLP-4005, US, 1963. Bob Dylan & George Harrison: 'Da Doo Ron Ron', NY, 1–2 May 1970, unreleased. The NME hoax article, dated only as 1975, is reproduced online (seen 6 Jan 2006) at www.searchingforagem.com/snowover.htm.]

Spitz, Bob [1950 -] Robert Spitz was born in Reading, Pennsylvania, on January 29, 1950. He is an American writer who claims to have once 'represented' BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN and ELTON JOHN, and whose books include the malevolent Dylan: A Biography (1988), which Publishers Weekly described as '526 cliché-ridden pages' on Dylan up to 1978 followed by 25 pages on the Born Again period and after. 'Spitz (by name and spits by nature)', as Andrew Ford noted, 'is the sort of writer who wants to grow up to be Albert Goldman . . . not much of an ambition.' In 2005 Spitz published The Beatles: The Biography. Enjoy.

[Bob Spitz, Dylan: A Biography, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1988; The Beatles: The Biography, New York: Little Brown, 2005. Andrew Ford on Spitz, in 'Wagner v. a man named Zimmerman', Sydney Morning Herald, 26 Aug 1989.]

Spivey, Victoria [1906 - 1976] Victoria Spivey was born in Houston, Texas, on October 15, 1906, and turned out to be one of the few 'classic women blues singers'—the women who mainly came out of vaudeville and jazz and were earliest on record with the blues—who survived and continued to perform all the way through to the folk and blues revival period at the beginning of the 1960s, though her career declined in the 1940s and in the 1950s she temporarily quit secular showbiz for church-based performing. She survived not least because she was a talented songwriter as well as a singer and pianist, she had a good head for business, knew her market and aimed straight at it. Many of her songs 'dwelt on disease, crime and outré sexual images', sung in a 'small, acrid voice', as blues critic Tony Russell puts it (with quiet relish).

After providing the musical entertainment in Houston whorehouses, she began recording in 1926, and her first song, 'Black Snake Blues', was a big success. By mid-1929 she had seen 21 of her records released on the OKeh label, and in the same year she appeared as Missy Rose in King Vidor's first sound movie, the black musical Hallelujah (at one point playing Wagner's 'Here Comes the Bride' on harmonium). At her peak she could command accompaniment by Louis Armstrong and LONNIE JOHNSON, and she continued to record copiously for major labels in the 1930s. Two of her sisters, Addie and Elton, who performed as Sweet Peas (sometimes spelt Pease) Spivey and Za-Zu, were less successful.

The photograph by Len Siegler on the back cover of the 1970 album New Morning, of a sweetly youthful Dylan pictured with a mumsy Victoria Spivey, is a memento of the sessions Dylan charmed his way into with Spivey and BIG JOE WILLIAMS for her newly formed, Brooklyn-based label Spivey Records in March 1962. (For these sessions' recording and release details see the Williams entry.) Dylan writes in Chronicles that when it came to the New Morning album, he 'knew that this photo would be on the cover before I recorded the songs. Maybe I was even making this record because I had the cover in mind and needed something to go into the sleeve.' A few pages later he calls it 'the photo of me and Vickie'.

The original art-print photograph was owned for many years afterwards by Len Kunstadt, a record collector, artists' manager and blues magazine editor whom Dylan knew and who was also the last of Spivey's husbands. Kunstadt edited Record Research, in which Spivey wrote a regular column, 'Blues Is My Business'.

In her column for December 1964 she wrote an utterly unreliable, highly entertaining piece, 'Just thinking about the original "Corinne, Corrina"', which tells us in passing a little about Ms. Spivey and her family too:

> 'Corrina was actually a Creole girl, the most beautiful thing you ever saw in your life, with such gorgeous clothes, who came from New Orleans to Houston, Texas, before the first World War. Her mother was called Miss Marie Green who had a small mansion in the first ward in Houston. The door was open to anybody nice who wanted to have a good time and pay for it. Corrina was about 16 and I was eight, and through my oldest sister, Leona, I met Corrina and her mother. At their home I learned to do the Ball The Jack. My musical inspiration, the great pianist Robert Calvin also used to drop by to peep sweetly at my sister, Leona, when I was there. Corrina was a well-preserved girl with her mother giving her all the motherly protection in every walk of life. Corrina had very wavy red hair, was very light skinned (you couldn't tell her from white), had blue eyes and had a beautiful mole on her face. Her speech was soft-spoken and educated-like. I believe that this was the Corrina that they immortalized with that great all-time blues standard, Corrine, Corrina.'

The April 1965 issue ran an ad for her label—'Spivey Means High Blues Fidelity: A Class Product for Today's and Tomorrow's Generation'—and Ms. Spivey's column turned to describing Dylan. Under the heading 'Luck Is a Fortune!' she wrote:

'If you live long enough your luck is bound to change. I was just thinking about little BOB DYLAN. The years flashed back to 1961 when I first met him at Gerde's Folk City in Greenwich Village, New York City. He was the sweetest kid you would ever want to meet. Just a bundle of nervous energy. He would say Moms, this Moms, that Moms, always trying to get my attention, He was a doll. I was so proud of him then because he really had some talent which was just ready to explode. And did it! Just a couple of years later he was on his way to becoming a world idol in his field.

'Speaking about idols! Bob used to tell us all about his childhood and how he used to get next to the Chicago blues people. He had an idol too, among others, and he was none other than the great country blues singer, Big Joe Williams. A dream came true for Bob when Big Joe was here in New York for a Gerde's engagement. Bob knew about my little record company SPIVEY and my plans to record Big Joe, and he wanted "in" too. What a sight as little Bob was carrying Big Joe's unusual guitar to the studio! And did they play well together! Like they were together for 50 years! "Come on Big Joe Little Junior, Play your harp." That's the way Big Joe proudly gave Bob the cue to "take off" on one of the titles. Yes, this was Bob before Dame fortune was to reward him for his great talent.

'When I see him now he still gives me that big baby kiss and hug. He's still the same Little boy to me and I am so happy for him. On a recent Les Crane TV show Bob was simply great. I believe he could become a great comedian in addition to his writing and singing.

'So Bob! keep up the good work and stay the same young man you were in 1961, and you won't have to look back.'

In 1985 Dylan said of Spivey herself: 'oh man, I loved her . . . I learned so much from her I could never put into words.'

Victoria Spivey died in Brooklyn on October 3, 1976.

[Victoria Spivey: 'Black Snake Blues', St. Louis, MO, 11 May 1926. Hallelujah, dir. King Vidor, MGM, 1929. The first three Spivey releases, just prior to that with Dylan on it, were: Lucille Hegamin, Hannah Sylvester, Victoria Spivey with Buddy Tate, Eddie Barefield, Dick Vance: Basket of Blues, Spivey LP 1001; Victoria Spivey: Victoria and Her Blues, LP 1002; & Willie Dixon, Sunnyland Slim, St. Louis Jimmy, Homesick James, John Henry Barbee, Cocoa (sic) Taylor, Evans Spencer & Washboard Sam: Chicago Blues, LP 1003.

Victoria Spivey: 'Blues Is My Business', Record Research no. 65, NY, Dec 1964 & no.67, NY, Apr 1965, p.11. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One quote, p.139; 1985 quote, the Biograph box set. Tony Russell, The Blues—From Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Aurum Press, p.168. For an entertaining read on Spivey and others, see the chapter 'Billie and Bessie' in David Widgery, Preserving Disorder, London: Pluto Press, 1989.]

Spoelstra, Mark [1940 -] Mark Spoelstra was born on June 30, 1940 in Kansas City, Missouri, but grew up in El Monte, California, where he was playing guitar by age 11. His third gig was opening act for SONNY TERRY & BROWNIE McGHEE. He moved to New York City (via Berkeley) and joined the folk revival scene, playing a big B-45 Gibson 12-string guitar.

According to his own breezy account, 'A friend of mine ran into me on the street one day and said there was a guy he thought I should meet. He was sitting alone in a joint, having just come to town. So I was one of the first acquaintances Bob Dylan met when he came to the big city. We hung out together a lot, because at the time we had a lot in common. One night we were playing at the Café Wha?, and JOHN COHEN, who was with THE NEW LOST CITY RAMBLERS, came in and was blown away by my JOHN HURT style guitar and Bob's blues harp . . .'

A couple of months after they met, as an extant photograph confirms, Dylan and Spoelstra performed together at the Indian Neck Folk Festival in Branford, Connecticut, in May 1961; the corollary tape catches Dylan singing 'Talking Columbia', 'Hangknot, Slipknot' and 'Talking Fish Blues': all WOODY GUTHRIE songs. Spoelstra's main influences, Mississippi John Hurt aside, were JESSE FULLER, PETE SEEGER and Skip James.

That summer, the two often appeared behind BROTHER JOHN SELLERS at Gerde's Folk City hootenannies, backing up his gospel shouts and tambourine with guitars and harmonica (and were even announced as Brother John & the Dungarees). Spoelstra says in the film No Direction Home that in these early years, Dylan shared with him and so many others the belief that song could help to abolish racial segregation and change the world for the better: that they talked about these things with enthusiasm.

In Chronicles Volume One Dylan describes Spoelstra as 'a singing pal of mine', recalls their playing with Brother John Sellers and recalls the day when, having arranged to meet up with Mark at 'a creepy but convenient little coffeehouse . . . run by a character called the Dutchman', who 'resembled Rasputin', he arrived to find Mark Spoelstra there waiting for him and the Dutchman lying dead in the doorway with a knife in him, killed by the old man who was his landlord.

Spoelstra got a record deal with Folkways that same year, and recorded two albums for them, The Songs of Mark Spoelstra with Twelve-String Guitar and Mark Spoelstra Recorded at Club 47 Inc., which were both released a bit belatedly in 1963.

He was one of the featured artists on two different albums on which Dylan appeared as Blind Boy Grunt. On the Various Artists album Broadside Ballads, released in October 1963 (on which Dylan performed 'John Brown', 'Only a Hobo' and 'Talkin' Devil'), Mark Spoelstra performed his own topical song 'The Civil Defense Sign'; and on the Various Artists album The Blues Project in 1964, on which Dylan played on a GEOFF MULDAUR track, Spoelstra had a track on each side of the LP, with renditions of 'France Blues' and 'She's Gone'. The other featured artists were DAVE RAY, ERIC VON SCHMIDT, DAVE VAN RONK, Ian Buchanan and DANNY KALB.

Like Dylan, Spoelstra also became an occasional contributor to Broadside magazine, and appeared at the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL. Unlike Dylan, his career never took off, despite having an early hit single in Canada ('Walkin' 'Round Town' by Mark & the Two Timers), despite signing to Elektra and making another two albums, released in 1965 and '66, despite a couple of his pieces being used on the soundtrack of that great film Electra Glide in Blue, and despite Janis Joplin covering one of his songs. In part, but only in part, this was because he was a conscientious objector placed in 'alternative service' instead of being called up, and so he was prevented from touring to promote those mid-60s albums.

In San Francisco he formed a rock band; it got nowhere. In 1969 Columbia signed him as a solo artist again, and released one album, Hobo Poet (from which the Electra Glide in Blue tracks are taken) but by this time Spoelstra and his family were 'almost starving'. He gave up trying to find music-industry success and found God and a series of day-jobs instead.

Mark Spoelstra still has a day-job, driving a shuttle bus at a northern California Indian Casino. He's stayed with God, too; but in 2001, after a gap of more than 20 years, he released a new album, Out of My Hands, for the distinguished blues-revival company Origin Jazz Library, with a cover-painting by ERIC VON SCHMIDT and a sound-bite from Tom Paxton: 'I always wanted to play guitar like Mark Spoelstra. I still do and I still can't.'

[Mark Spoelstra quoted in Eric von Schmidt & Jim Rooney, Baby, Let Me Follow You Down, Garden City: Anchor Books, 1979, p.204 and précis'd from No Direction Home, dir. Martin Scorsese, 2005; The Songs of Mark Spoelstra with Twelve-String Guitar, NY, 1961, Folkways FA 2444, NY, 1963; Mark Spoelstra Recorded at Club 47 Inc., Boston MA, 1961, Folkways FG 3572, 1963; 'The Civil Defense Sign', NY, Feb–Mar? 1963, Broadside Ballads, Broadside BR301, NY, Oct 1963; 'France Blues' & 'She's Gone', NY, early 1964, The Blues Project, Elektra EKL 264, NY, Jun 1964; Five & Twenty Questions, nia, Elektra EKL-283 / EKS-7283, NY, 1965; State of Mind, nia, Elektra EKL-307 / EKS-7307, NY, 1966; Hobo Poet, San Francisco, nia, Columbia CS 9793, 1969; 'Meadow Mountain Top' & 'Song of Sad Bottles' also on Electra Glide in Blue (dir. James William Guercio) soundtrack album, United Artists UA-LA062-H, US, 1973; Out of My Hands, nia, Origin Jazz Library OJL 2001, Thousand Oaks, CA, 2001. Mark & the Two Timers: 'Walking Around Town' c/w 'Corinna Folkways', nia, F45001, NY, 1964. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, pp.74–75.]

Springs, Helena [1961? -] Helena Lisandrello, professional name Helena Springs, worked with Dylan both as a back-up singer and songwriting partner. As the former, she was the only one there throughout the entire 1978 World Tour—from Japan in February through to the American end in December—and to remain with him for the gospel tours of 1979. She may have acted as a small preparatory catalyst for the change in nature between the two. She says she and Dylan had a conversation about prayer: 'He was having some problems once and he called me and asked me questions that no one could possibly help with, and I just said, "Don't you ever pray?" And he said, "Pray?" . . . I said, "When I have trouble, I pray." He asked me more questions about it, he started inquiring: he's a very inquisitive person which is one good thing about him—he's always searching for truth, truth in anything he can find.' Springs may therefore have helped to prepare the way, ahead of MARY ALICE ARTES. (See 'Born Again' period, a slow train coming to the.)

As a co-songwriter with Dylan, in the same period, Helena Springs had mixed success. On the one hand she co-wrote a larger number of songs with him than any other collaborator in his career; on the other hand, most of them remained barely recorded and unreleased. The titles copyrighted (to Dylan-Springs except where otherwise stated) were as follows:

'Baby Give It Up', 'Coming from the Heart (The Road Is Long)', 'Her Memory' (Dylan-Springs-Ken Moore), 'I Must Love You Too Much' aka 'Love You Too Much' (Dylan-Springs-Greg Lake)', 'If I Don't Be There By Morning', 'More Than Flesh and Blood', 'One More Time' (though this one now seems not to have been part of the list, but rather a song by Shel Silverstein titled 'Daddy's Going on One More Ride'), 'Responsibility', 'Someone Else's Arms' 'Stop Now', 'Take It or Leave It', 'Tell Me the Truth One Time', 'Walk Out in the Rain', 'The Wandering Kind', 'What's the Matter', 'Without You' and 'Your Rockin' Chair'.

Though the most appealing lyric is probably that of the patchy but often adroit 'The Wandering Kind', the nearest to significant from among these songs are 'Coming from the Heart (The Road Is Long)', 'I Must Love You Too Much', 'Walk Out in the Rain' and 'If I Don't Be There By Morning'. The first of these was rehearsed with the tour band in Santa Monica in April 1978 (this tape has circulated) and recorded at the Street Legal sessions on May 1 (this has not circulated, though another Dylan-Springs song recorded the same day has: the unremarkable 'Stop Now', as has another performance of this latter from a rehearsal on June 8) and performed once on the tour itself: at St. Paul, Minnesota, on Hallowe'en 1978. The circulated recordings show it to have a catchy, almost anthemic chorus melody. It was covered in 1979 by those survivors of the 1960s Merseybeat scene, the Searchers, who had been offered a comeback opportunity by Sire Records and included the song on the first of the two albums that resulted (though only on the US version).

'Love You Too Much', with messed-about lyrics, was recorded and released as a 1981 single by Greg Lake (formerly of Emerson, Lake and Palmer, who in an earlier era had made a magnificently, perversely different extravaganza out of Dylan's 'She Belongs to Me'). The lyrics as published subsequently in the Bob Dylan Lyrics 1962–1985 and Bob Dylan Lyrics 1962–2001 both determinedly preserve Lake's rewrites instead of the Dylan-Springs words as performed in concert by Dylan when he came to sing the song, which was twice: in Binghampton, NY, on September 24 and at Madison Square Garden on September 29, 1978. (Dylan and the band had sound-checked it in New Haven, CT, on the 17th.) Years later, the re-constituted version of THE BAND included a version on their High on the Hog album of 1985.

'Walk Out in the Rain' and 'If I Don't Be There By Morning' were both covered by ERIC CLAPTON on his Backless album of late 1978, and he makes both mournfully appealing. Helena Springs must have gained more royalties income from this album than from any other professional source. The album went platinum immediately upon release, and remains, via CD reissue, part of the mega-selling industry that is the Clapton catalogue. In 1997 'Walk Out in the Rain' was a bluegrass hit single for Robbie & Ron McCoury, two years after its inclusion on their eponymously titled début album.

As with 'Coming from the Heart', Dylan recorded his own 'Walk Out in the Rain' on May 1, 1978, at the Street Legal sessions, but this hasn't circulated; ditto with 'If I Don't Be There By Morning', recorded sometime that same month. He never performed either in concert, nor 'Your Rockin' Chair', though this was sound-checked in Omaha, Nebraska, that November 4th.

'The Wandering Kind' was covered by PAUL BUTTERFIELD on the album The Legendary Paul Butterfield Rides Again in 1986. 'More Than Flesh or Blood' and 'Take It or Leave It' got as far as being sound-checked in mid-September 1978 (and a tape has circulated); otherwise, that seems to have been the end of the co-written material—except that Helena Springs herself made demos of 'Responsibility', 'Tell Me the Truth One Time' and 'The Wandering Kind' (and possibly 'What's the Matter' and 'Without You') in Santa Monica in September 1979. Bob Dylan may play piano on these tracks. Dylan recorded 'Her Memory' in Santa Monica on September 23, 1980, playing piano himself, with FRED TACKETT on guitar and JENNIFER WARNES sharing vocals (this tape has not circulated) and again, along with another co-written song, 'Brown Skin Girl', at a longer session that October.

Helena Springs hung on in Dylan's backing group till the after the last date of 1979, in Santa Monica on November 21, sometimes taking lead vocals, mid-set, on the gospel song 'What Are You Doing with Your Heart?'—but she did not re-appear with Dylan for the 1980 dates—or ever again.

She met actor Robert De Niro in 1979 and began what she told the papers was a three-year affair with him. She told the New York Post she became pregnant by De Niro 'at Chateau Marmont. . . . But I knew he didn't love me so I didn't tell him. I aborted. He never knew.' However, she gave birth to a daughter on July 1, 1982, and both believed De Niro to be the father. (Ten years later she hired Marvin Mitchelson to file a paternity suit against him, and pursued this even after blood tests proved he was not the child's father—because, said Mitchelson, De Niro 'had accepted the girl as his daughter and supported her for a long time.')

By May 1983 she had joined BETTE MIDLER's troupe, as one of the Harlettes, for the second leg of her touring show 'De Tour', which began in Philadelphia on June 16 and ran through till early September in Minneapolis. Springs can therefore be glimpsed in the video release of Midler's HBO-TV Special Art or Bust, taken from the show.

After going back in the studios with David Bowie and MICK JAGGER—she's on their terrible 1985 hit single 'Dancing in the Street' (as is Dylan's first Never-Ending Tour lead guitarist G.E. SMITH)—she was on tour with ELTON JOHN in 1986. That year too she co-wrote a song with the Pet Shop Boys, variously called 'New Life, New Love', 'A New Life' and 'New Love', which they recorded. (She had also sung on their records 'West End Girls' and 'You Know Where You Went Wrong'.)

Helena Springs also recorded 'New Love' herself, for an album of the same name made for Arista UK that summer. She had made some demos in London for popster and songwriter BA Robertson ('BA' put like that is how he likes it), and used one of these, of 'The Other Side of the World', co-written with Mike Rutherford of Genesis, to get her own record deal.

Her track 'New Love' was also issued as a UK single, following up the earlier single 'I Want You' from the same album—for which a video was made, directed by Brian Grant (who has apparently directed 175 pop videos . . .). Other titles included 'Paper Money', 'Midnight Lady' and, er, 'Be Soft with Me Tonight'. The album was also issued in Germany, but never released in the US.

Helena Springs has continued to work in cabaret (her lawyer was describing her as 'a cabaret singer' by 1992); in 2001, living in New York City, she reportedly moved home 'from near the World Trade Center shortly before 9/11'.

[Helena Springs: 'Responsibility', 'Tell Me the Truth One Time & 'The Wandering Kind', Santa Monica, CA, Oct 1979, unissued; 'What Are You Doing with Your Heart?' live during Dylan concerts, e.g. San Francisco, 10 Nov 1979; New Love, US & UK, summer 1986, Arista 208 119, London, 1986. Quote re prayer from 'Bob Dylan's Unshakeable Monotheism—Part II: The 1970s', by Scott Marshall, seen online at www.jewsweek.com, 11 Oct 2005; New York Post quote from Andy Dougan, Untouchable: A Biography of Robert De Niro, New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1996, p.136; paternity suit details from headline article, AmeriCast.com, 1 Nov 1992, seen online 11 Oct 2005 at www.mit.edu/afs/net.mit.edu/user/tytso/usenet/americast/twt/news/338; quote re home online ditto http://216.127.80.118/~admin27/adf/messages/1019/1978.html?1084070847 but posted May 2004.

Greg Lake: 'Love You Too Much', nia, Chrysalis 103634, US (Chrysalis CHR1357, UK), 1981, & on the LP Greg, CD-reissued as The Greg Lake Solo CD, GL-CD 0115, nia. Eric Clapton: 'Walk Out in the Rain' & 'If I Don't Be There By Morning', nia, Backless, RSO 3039, 1981. Robbie & Ron McCoury: Robbie & Ron McCoury, Rounder CD 0353, US, 1995. Paul Butterfield: 'The Wandering Kind', nia, The Legendary Paul Butterfield Rides Again, Amherst AMH 3305, 1986. Dylan & tour band: 'More Than Flesh or Blood' & 'Take It or Leave It', sound-check, New Haven, CT, 17 Sep 1978. Bette Midler: Art or Bust, Lion's Gate Video, US, 1983. David Bowie & Mick Jagger: 'Dancing in the Street', London, 29 Jun 1985, EMI America B-8288, US (EA 204, UK), 1985. BA Robertson detail, e-mail to this writer 16 Oct 2005.]

Springsteen, Bruce [1949 -] Bruce Frederick Springsteen was born in Long Branch, New Jersey, on September 23, 1949, grew up in Freehold Borough, New Jersey, bought his first guitar at 13, joined local group the Castilles (they recorded two tracks in a custom studio in Bricktown, NJ), then joined Virginia's Richmond-based group Steel Mill before returning to New Jersey and becoming a local hero in Asbury Park and other waterfront towns. JOHN HAMMOND signed him to a Columbia solo contract in 1972 and at the start of 1973—effectively at the existential start of the 1970s—he was 'launched' with the début album Greetings from Asbury Park, NJ and with a magnificent, edgy, sweaty performance for music journalists at Max's Kansas City in New York. After a slow start and a re-launch, based upon journalist JON LANDAU's May 1974 review quote 'I have seen the future of rock'n'roll, and it's name is Bruce Springsteen' and the third album, Born to Run, he became the most important rock artist of the decade and of his generation.

As NIGEL WILLIAMSON reminds us in The Rough Guide to Bob Dylan, Springsteen was, early on in his Columbia career, one of several new artists given the tag 'the new Bob Dylan' but proved 'the one who transcended the tag the most effortlessly'. Indeed he swiftly overshadowed Dylan by music-biz standards: 'At the time Dylan hadn't toured in seven years, and the throne appeared to be vacant. Bruce was enthusiastically awarded the crown by critics . . .' (Speak for yourself.) Born to Run paralleled this conquest in sales terms. Williamson notes that Born to Run sold 'six million copies, while Blood on the Tracks, released in the same year, sold two million.' He was also a thrilling, grandstanding live performer, his E Street Band a unit of extravagant pizzazz, and as he jumped about in his tight building-worker t-shirts and delivered three-hour-long high-energy shows, he couldn't help but emphasise that he was the fittest young lion in the pack.

The side of Bob Dylan that cared about all these things was wounded, without doubt. Springsteen's prowess, his sales figures, the critical plaudits he had achieved in what seemed from the outside a rocketing to fame: all this gave Dylan's pride a knock. You could sometimes detect this in oblique remarks Dylan made later in the 1970s, as for instance when he said of his own 1978 World Tour sax player STEVE DOUGLAS that it was unreasonable to put anyone else (meaning the E Street Band's Clarence Clemons) in the same league. Perhaps even the decision to front such a large band himself, and give such long performances with it on that 1978 tour, was in part a response to the phenomenon of Springsteen. It was noticeable too, at the so-called Dylan 30th Anniversary Concert in New York City in 1992, Springsteen was not a guest.

But if he was a mega-success, and a phenomenon, Springsteen was also palpably a likeable, straightforward man, and one who never showed anything but ardent respect for Dylan's work. The two first met in that crucial year for both, 1975. Bruce has famously paid Bob tributes and given great sound-bites about him, for instance describing the impact of first hearing of 'Like a Rolling Stone' at least as articulately as anyone else, and saying in January 1988, as he inducted Dylan into the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame, that 'ELVIS freed our bodies, and Dylan freed our minds.' Dylan, in response, paid tribute, as so often, to earlier pioneers, going out of his way to thank ALAN LOMAX and LITTLE RICHARD (and MUHAMMAD ALI). The occasion also gave us Dylan and Springsteen performing together, notably as Springsteen shared backing vocals on 'Like a Rolling Stone' and as Dylan played guitar for MICK JAGGER and Springsteen on '(I Can't Get No) Satisfaction'.

It was not their only on-stage meeting. Two years later, at a TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS concert in Los Angeles on March 1, 1990, after Dylan came on and sang 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35' and then sang with Petty on 'Everybody's Movin', Bruce Springsteen arrived on stage and Dylan played guitar behind him while Springsteen sang 'Travelin Band' and 'I'm Crying'. Then in October 1994, at the last of Dylan's three Never-Ending Tour concerts at the old Roseland Ballroom in New York, Springsteen—plus NEIL YOUNG—played guitar on the encore numbers, 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35' and 'Highway 61 Revisited'. As ANDREW MUIR, who was there, commented: 'Musically forgettable it might have been but the sight of the three together was one not to be missed.'

A year later, at a Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame Gala Concert in Cleveland, Ohio, on September 2, 1995, Dylan sang 'All Along the Watchtower', 'Just Like a Woman', 'Seeing the Real You at Last' and 'Highway 61 Revisited'—and then Bruce Springsteen came on and shared vocals with Dylan on 'Forever Young'. (Only Dylan's 'All Along the Watchtower' was included on the album The Concert for the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame, but all of it was shown on HBO on September 26, 1995). Most recently, Dylan sang 'Highway 61 Revisited' with the E Street Band in a brief guest appearance at the end of a Springsteen show at Shea Stadium on October 4, 2003. It was the first time the band had played the song but they seemed to know it better than Dylan.

The two singers have not performed together in public since, but one final conjunction is that Dylan's lyric for 'Tweeter and the Monkey Man', on the first Travelin' Wilburys album, is riddled with good-natured comic references to the words of Springsteen songs. That's the nearest he's come to any paying of tributes in reverse.

In the end, of course, to concentrate on Springsteen's greater music-biz success, or even his once great critical modishness, is to miss the essential point in any comparison. Dylan knows, and so do we, that though commercially Bruce Springsteen might have been far more successful, as an artist Dylan's achievement has been incomparably greater.

[Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame induction: NY, 20 Jan 1988; Dylan Roseland concert, NY, 20 Oct 1994. Various Artists: The Concert for the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame, Columbia 483 793 2, US, 1997. Nigel Williamson: The Rough Guide to Bob Dylan, London: Rough Guides, 2004, p.362. Andrew Muir, Razor's Edge: Bob Dylan & the Never-Ending Tour, London: Helter Skelter, 2001, p.119.]

St. Andrews University Honorary Degree ceremony [2004] The University of St. Andrews, Scotland's oldest, awarded Dylan an honorary doctorate (in Music) on the afternoon of Wednesday, June 23, 2004. It was the first time he had agreed to accept an honorary degree since Princeton had awarded him one in 1970.

Much credit for St. Andrews' success (and it says something about Dylan's status and behaviour in the world that it should be counted more the ancient university's success than the degree recipient's) belongs to NEIL CORCORAN, with the support of Brian Lang, the University's Principal. For the speech Corcoran delivered at the ceremony, see separate entry. For a good eye-witness account of the proceedings, see ANDREW MUIR's 'Went to Find a Doctor', Judas! no.10, Bluntisham, UK, July 2004.

A fine parody of all this appeared in Private Eye no.1,110, London, July 9–22, 2004, which, below a photograph of a be-robed Dylan looking outrageously put-upon and vexed, offered a mock version of the citation in cod-Latin, rendering the title 'Blowin' in the Wind' as 'Responsus Est, Amicus Meus, Pufferandum in Vento', and finishing with '© University of St Andrews (formerly the Glen Miller Distillery and Polytechnic, "A wee dram afore ye graduate")'.

Stace, Wes [1965 -] Wesley Stace was born in Hastings, England, on October 22, 1965. He first took an interest in Dylan's work at the age of 12, and first wrote about him in a fanzine review of Infidels. He became a contributor to The Telegraph, conducting its interviews with ALLEN GINSBERG and RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT and supplying anecdotes and photos. He also wrote on Dylan in LA Style, Stereophile, The Stranger and elsewhere. His first encounters with The Telegraph also served notice of his other career, as a singer-songwriter. As Dave Dingle recalled years later: 'A youngster called Wes came visiting JOHN [BAULDIE] and they both sat playing and singing. Wes was still at school talking about becoming a star whilst us older guys sat humoring him, little knowing he would go on to a successful career as John Wesley Harding.' After playing in the Accelerators, Wes did indeed become John Wesley Harding, and since 1989 has released 15 albums, starting with It Happened One Night (produced by, er, Wes Stace). He has also toured the world (performing duets with SPRINGSTEEN, JOHN PRINE and others along the way), and had his songs featured in movies and covered by many other artists. As Wesley Stace he published a very well-received first novel, Misfortune, in 2005.

[Wes Stace: 'Interview: Allen Ginsberg', The Telegraph no.20, Bury, UK, summer 1985 & in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, ed. Gray & Bauldie, London: Sigwick & Jackson, 1987; 'Interview with Ramblin' Jack Elliott', Telegraph no.50, Romford, winter 1994; Misfortune, New York: Little, Brown & London: Cape, 2005. John Wesley Harding: It Happened One Night, Demon L-Fiend 137 (CD & vinyl), London, and Rhino 70764, US, 1989; Dave Dingle quote from 'Wherever You Might Look Tonight, You Might See This Wanted

Man', seen online 24 Aug 2005 at www.interferenza.com/bcs/frnpage1.htm.]

Staehely, John [1952 -] John Staehely was born in Austin, Texas, on January 25, 1952. A guitarist and vocalist who, with his bassist & guitarist brother Al, joined the fourth line-up of Spirit in 1972. After their disbandment in 1973, the Staehely brothers went out on the road as Spirit, and in 1974 sold the name back to the original members at great profit, the same year John joined Jo Jo Gunne, in which he remained until 1975, the same year both brothers played on Keith Moon's album Two Sides of the Moon. In 1976 John Staehely returned to the status of minor local hero, supporting the band Gypsee Eyes at the World Armadillo Headquarters back in Austin. When Dylan was including a series of extra guitarists on stage in the summer of 1990, John Staehely was the first, augmenting the Never-Ending Tour band in Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, on August 13, in Calgary on the 15th and 16th, and at George, in Washington State, on the 18th. That fall, when G.E. SMITH was leaving the band and Dylan was virtually auditioning replacements in concert as he went along, John Staehely played in the band from the third night at the Beacon Theater in New York City on October 17 through to the last concert of the year, in Detroit on November 18.

[Keith Moon: Two Sides of the Moon, MCA 2136, US (Polydor 2442 134, UK), 1975, CD-reissued Pet Rock KBD 60038, US, 1997.]

Stanley Brothers, the Carter Stanley was born on August 27, 1925, two years ahead of brother RALPH, in Big Spraddle Creek, western Virginia, and they grew up influenced by THE CARTER FAMILY, the folk culture of their rural surroundings, the Primitive Baptist Church they belonged to and their parents' amateur performing. Their father wasn't a musician but sang a repertoire that included 'Man of Constant Sorrow' and 'Pretty Polly', and their mother played old-timey claw-hammer banjo. With Ralph on banjo and a high tenor voice, and Carter on guitar and lead vocals, they formed the Stanley Brothers in 1946, made their radio début on 'Farm and Fun Time', on WCYB in Bristol Tennessee that December 26, and their first recordings in 1947, on the small label Rich-R-Tone, before signing to Columbia and then Mercury and, in the end, the King of Cincinnati. Carter was the more usual songwriter for the act, including songs like 'The Lonesome River', 'I Just Got Wise', 'She's More to Be Pitied' and 'The White Dove'. They also sang ALBERT E. BRUMLEY's 'Rank Stranger to Me'.

They temporarily in 1948 to take day-jobs working at the Ford car factory in Detroit, and disbanded briefly again in 1951, when after another Detroit stint, Carter Stanley became one of Bill Monroe's Blue Grass Boys (and in five months with them managed two recording sessions) and Ralph helped Monroe out when his own banjoist was called up—until Ralph was in a car crash. This was an odd blip, given Bill Monroe's antipathy to the Stanleys, which was strong enough that he had quit Columbia Records when the label signed them in 1949; but brief disbandments aside, the Stanley Brothers performed and toured together for 20 years—till Carter Stanley's death at 41 from liver cancer on December 1, 1966.

In the early days of the Folk Revival, ROBERT SHELTON remembers, the Stanley Brothers were 'sponsored by MIKE SEEGER', just as 'RALPH RINZLER squired about Bill Monroe and DOC WATSON, and JOHN COHEN became Roscoe Holcomb's "discoverer" and good friend': this was at a time (Shelton specifies no dates) when 'it was as if each active city performer "adopted" a country performer to escort, tout and make popular'.

When the Stanley Brothers couldn't get a record deal in the early 1960s they cut sessions for a radio station, returning to their traditional repertoire after years of trying to be more modern. These were pressed and put into private circulation (on Wango), after which three LPs were 'commercially' released from this material in the early 1970s on County Records of Virginia. One of these, The Stanley Brothers of Virginia Vol. 2: Long Journey Home, includes 'Pretty Polly' and 'East Virginia Blues'.

WILFRID MELLERS uses the Stanley Brothers as a springboard for some interesting comments on the relationship between country and other kinds of music in his A Darker Shade of Pale: A Backdrop to Bob Dylan (1984). Hearing their recording 'Daniel Prayed' on the collection Hills and Home: 30 Years of Bluegrass, he terms it 'bluegrass euphoria' and says that it 'is similar in principle to the antiphony of black gospel music, which in turn relates to the improvised dialogue of jazz. As with solo singers, country music groups grow up when their country manners come to terms with the reality of black jazz . . .'

The Stanley Brothers have been increasingly acknowledged as an important influence by Dylan in the 1990s. He chose to open a 1997 charity performance in aid of the Simon Wiesenthal Center by singing the Stanley Brothers' 'Stone Walls and Steel Bars'. Three months and one day later he reintroduced it into his repertoire when the Never-Ending Tour hit the Stanleys' home turf of Virginia on August 23, 1997, after that performing it a further 11 times between that year, 13 times in 1998, seven times in 1999, four times in 2000, giving it a rest throughout 2001 and bidding it farewell with a reprise in Baltimore on August 18, 2002.

[Stanley Brothers: The Stanley Brothers of Virginia Vol. 2: Long Journey Home, County 739, Floyd, VA, c.1973; 'Man of Constant Sorrow' & 'Rank Stranger to Me', CD-reissued on Stanley Brothers & The Clinch Mountain Boys 1949–1952, Bear Family BCD 15564-AH, Vollersode, Germany, c.1990. Bob Dylan: 'Stone Walls and Steel Bars': Beverly Hills, 22 May 1997.

Robert Shelton, in Laing, D., Dallas, K., Denselow R. & Shelton, R., The Electric Muse: The Story of Folk Into Rock, London: Methuen, 1975. Wilfrid Mellers, A Darker Shade of Pale: A Backdrop to Bob Dylan, London: Faber & Faber, 1984, p.83. Other background detail mainly from John Wright, Traveling the High Way Home: Ralph Stanley & the World of Traditional Bluegrass Music, Urbana, IL & Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1993.]

Stanley, Ralph [1927 -] Ralph Stanley, younger brother of Carter, with whom he formed THE STANLEY BROTHERS, was born in Big Straddle Creek, in south-western Virginia, on February 25, 1927. After Carter Stanley's premature death in 1966, bluegrass claw-hammer banjoist and high tenor singer Ralph continued to play, and after a gap revived the CLINCH MOUNTAIN BOYS, who had backed the Brothers. In 1997, still playing and singing extremely well, Ralph Stanley made a follow-up to his 2-CD set Saturday Night and Sunday Morning, not a retrospective soundtrack to the British 1950s Angry Young Men novel by Alan Sillitoe or the spin-off Albert Finney film (1960), but a mix of secular and gospel material with guest performers from Bill Monroe to EMMYLOU HARRIS.

The 1997 follow-up 2-CD set was billed as by 'Ralph Stanley & Friends' and titled Clinch Mountain Country, on which he performed on a total of 36 tracks, each one with a different partner or partners. The first person signed up for the project was Bob Dylan, who plays guitar and sings lead on the verses alongside Ralph's banjo (and shared chorus vocals) on a Stanley Brothers classic, 'The Lonesome River'.

Dylan's vocal is precarious but avoids the easy rasp, and when they sing together on the choruses it works extremely well. They recorded it in Nashville on November 30, 1997, along with an uncirculated attempt at 'Riding the Midnight Train' and an earlier take of 'The Lonesome River'. Dylan overdubbed guitar onto the finished take later, and the set was released the following May on Rebel Records: the label Stanley had been on since the early 1970s. At the time of its release, this rebel was 70 years old and the sleevenotes claimed he was still performing 200 dates per year—which was more than Bob Dylan (who in 1998 played a mere 111).

The night after the recording, and the night after that, Dylan tried 'The Lonesome River' and the Stanley Brothers' 'The White Dove' at his sound-checks in Atlanta, but didn't play 'The Lonesome River' when it came to his performances. He did, however, play 'The White Dove' both nights and on a further four on that leg of the Never-Ending Tour.

Ralph Stanley was, inevitably, one of those turned to by T-BONE BURNETT when assembling the music for the film O Brother Where Art Thou (2000); it includes his recording of 'O Death'.

[Ralph Stanley: Saturday Night and Sunday Morning, Freeland 9001, US, 1993. Ralph Stanley & Friends: Clinch Mountain Country, Rebel RBL 0005001, US, 1998.]

Stanton, Harry Dean [1926 -] Harold Dean Stanton was born in West Irvine, Kentucky, on July 14, 1926, grew up in Lexington, graduated high school in 1944 and served briefly in World War II before acting on stage first at the University of Kentucky and then at the Pasadena Playhouse. A musician as well as an actor, he toured the US with a male voice choir and worked in children's theatre before heading for Hollywood, appearing first under the name Dean Stanton in a 1957 cowboy film, Tomahawk Trail. He continued to use this name till the start of the 1970s, and worked prolifically, but always in minor rôles in film and in TV series, right through till the 1980s.

He has been the classic case of a character actor whose wonderful face you see a hundred times before you ever become aware of his name, and whose rôles improve only as he comes close to retirement age in other industries. In Harry Dean Stanton's case the face has been splendidly long and miserable, exuding a kind of life-battered meanness that pulls in your sympathy, a parched, fish-eyed lugubriousness and a dry, deadpan humour. It's said that his rôles went up a grade in films like Cool Hand Luke (1967), Kelly's Heroes (1970), Dillinger (1973) and The Godfather: Part II (1974), but he still wasn't exactly one of the star faces on the posters for those movies, and in the last of them had only got as far as playing 'FBI man #1'. He fared a little better in Alien and far better in John Huston's Wise Blood (both 1979), based on the Flannery O'Connor novel, in which he played Asa Hawks. Stardom, however, arrived only with the release of two stand-out films of 1984, Repo Man and Paris, Texas—by which time Stanton was 58 years old. Only from 1984 onwards does he ever appear as 'himself' on TV shows by David Letterman types. These two key rôles make him a star.

They also enabled him to form a sort of Tex-Mex mariachi jazz-rock band, Harry Dean Stanton & the Repo Men, later known as just the Harry Dean Stanton Band, featuring his lead vocals and guitar (though he made no contribution to the music in Repo Man itself).

His connection with Bob Dylan is not simply that both appear in the 1973 SAM PECKINPAH film PAT GARRETT & BILLY THE KID—in which Stanton plays the minor rôle of Luke—nor even that during the filming, it was Dylan and Stanton who ruined a second day's attempt at a crucial shot, so that Harry nearly got knifed by Peckinpah, as explained by KRIS KRISTOFFERSON in Garner Simmons' book Peckinpah—A Portrait in Montage:

'Well, Bobby wasn't in the shot, and he and Harry . . . decided they were goin' on a health campaign and run five miles. Only the first part of the five miles was right through the shot. I came out on the set, and it was like a tomb. I asked what happened and I hear "The Dylan boys just ran through the shot." And everybody is sittin' around not sayin' a word as Harry Dean Stanton comes walkin' in. . . . sayin' "Hi, Sam!" And everybody is sayin' to themselves, "Oh shit," and Sam growls, "You just cost me $25,000." And Harry Dean says, "Sam, I knew it was wrong, and I was runnin' after him to tell him to stop." Now Sam throws a pretty mean knife. . . . he's got this knife in his hand, and he lets 'er fly, and it sticks in the wood next to old Harry Dean, who flies through the door like nothin' flat shoutin' behind him, "I promise, Sam, it'll never happen again." And when Dylan heard about it, he just said, "Well, let's have a concert and pay him back."'

Stanton was also among those on set who flew up to Mexico City for Dylan's recording session there on January 20, 1973, though he didn't take part as a musician or singer. However, he did drop in on a session for Planet Waves later that same year in Santa Monica, and plays guitar on outtakes of 'Forever Young' and an uncirculated cut of the traditional song 'Adelita'; there are two attempts at this, with Stanton also on shared vocals.

After this, he makes a nice beanpole appearance in Dylan's own film Renaldo & Clara, filmed in 1975 and released 1978, as Lafkezio. This is still the 1970s: it's another very minor rôle.

The two reconvene after Stanton has become a star; along with Dylan's son-in-law PETER HIMMELMAN, they appear together, in a splendidly bizarre TV performance for that year's CHABAD TELETHON, with Stanton on harmonica on the traditional 'Einsleipt Mein Kind Dein Eigalach', on vocals and harmonica on 'Adelita' (16 years down the line from their first attempts) and on guitar and vocals for 'Hava Nagilah'. The informal group name was said to be Chopped Liver.

Finally, at the ROY ORBISON tribute concert in LA on February 24, 1990, Harry Dean Stanton and Bob Dylan found themselves jostling in the crowd of back-up singers on an ensemble rendition of 'Only the Lonely' fronted by ROGER McGUINN and DAVID CROSBY.

Harry Dean Stanton is still making films and his band still plays around the LA area. He's 80 years old.

[Harry Dean Stanton at Planet Waves session, Santa Monica, CA, 10 Nov 1973. Garner Simmons, Sam Peckinpah—A Portrait in Montage, nia, quoted from Chris Whithouse, 'Alias, Pat Garrett & Billy the Kid', collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds, All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: Futura edn., 1988, pp.114–15.]

Staple Singers, the This American musical institution was formed in 1948 in Chicago by the Mississippi-born Roebuck 'Pops' Staples (1915–2000) and his family. It was known in the plural as the Staples Singers for many years, till Roebuck Staples (who had been taught guitar by CHARLEY PATTON and been a member of the Golden Trumpets and the Trumpet Jubilees) decided to change it in 1965. The family's recording career began in 1953 with a series of gospel singles, mostly on Vee-Jay Records. Their last Vee-Jay single, in 1962, was 'Sit Down Servant', which Bob Dylan misremembered as one of the songs of theirs he heard earliest. That year they switched to Riverside, and in 1963 released a version of 'Blowin' in the Wind', their first real non-gospel A-side. Their commercial success began in the 1960s on Epic, then Stax and later on Curtis Mayfield's Curtom label, as they explored different kinds of secular soul music, made albums with BOOKER T. & the MGs, and a no.1 US single with 'I'll Take You There' in 1972. They appeared with THE BAND in a studio-filmed 1977 performance of 'The Weight' included in the film The Last Waltz, and returned to the song in 1994 to record a minor hit version with Mary Stuart.

Dylan has specified the Staple Singers as a strong influence on his musical development, and gave a surprising amount of detail when interviewed for the Chicago TV station WTTW's 'Chicago Stories' programme in 2001: '. . . when we met for the first time . . . I was probably about 20 . . . but I'd heard them since I was about 12. . . . I couldn't have been more than 12 years old, listening to the radio. . . . we used to pick up this station out of Shreveport. . . . at midnight the gospel stuff would start . . .' He said that what struck him in the Staple Singers was the two different voices. Pops had, he remembered, 'a sweet, gentle kind of approach to it, but even back then . . . he sounded more to me like a blues singer singing gospel.' (Re MAVIS' voice see separate entry.) 'And,' he added, 'they had the other stuff, the more rhythmic things and different combinations of rhythm that I later found out was just Pops playing that tremolo guitar. . . . Pops' sound not only made the listener tremble and shake where other peoples' seemed very conventional to me, and also very professional. . . . the Staple Singers they were just more way off the road, and there was no telling which way they were gonna go. . . . every song was different. It had combinations of rhythmic pulse but then it could go down to no pulse, which would go like a Greek drama . . . some Armageddon type thing which I could relate to where that was at the time.'

[The Staples Singers: 'Sit Down Servant', Vee-Jay 912, US, 1962; 'Blowin' in the Wind', Riverside 4568, US, 1963. Bob Dylan's quotes, Staple Singers tribute show, Chicago, 27 Oct 2001, fragments shown on 'Chicago Stories', WTTW-TV, Chicago, 25 Feb 2002;

taken here from Glen Dundas' transcription in Tangled, Thunder Bay, Ontario: SMA Services, 2004.]

Staples, Mavis [1939 -] Mavis Staples was born in Chicago on July 10, 1939 (though her birth year is very often given as 1940), into the singing family THE STAPLE SINGERS, headed by her father Roebuck and her mother Oceola. She began to sing with the group as a child from around 1948 onwards and became a full member in 1950 and in 1953 started recording, her strong deep voice combining with her father's higher, thinner singing. A record of theirs that got nowhere but which the young Bob Dylan found compelling, 'Sit Down Servant', was not one of their earliest—indeed its release date was 1962, so he may well have been conflating it with another when in a television tribute to the Staple Singers in October 2001, he described hearing the group as a teenager and specified the effect achieved by Mavis' voice on this material:

> '. . . then this other voice came on, which was . . . Mavis. And one of the first songs I heard . . . was a song called "Sit Down Servant". And that just made me stay up for about a week after I heard that song. Mavis was singing stuff like "Yonder comes little David with his rock and his sling, I don't want to meet him, he's a dangerous man". And oh my goodness, you know, I mean that just made my hair stand up listening to that. I mean, that just seemed like "that's the way the world is".'

The astonishment worked the other way around when Mavis and family heard 'Blowin' in the Wind'. As the same interviewer expressed it: 'In our talks with Mavis, she explained how she reached greater understanding through talking to you. And I'll read you a quote . . . : "We just wondered how with him being a little white boy, how he could feel all those things we felt, you know? All this pain and the hurt, you know. How could he write these songs? He saw things and he wrote about them."'

The two met that same year, introduced by ROBERT SHELTON, then still Folk Critic on the New York Times. According to HOWARD SOUNES' Dylan biography, young Bob 'developed a platonic crush' (whatever that means) on Mavis Staples, as soon as they were introduced. 'During SUZE [ROTOLO]'s absence,' he writes, 'Bob became so besotted he went to the patriarch of the family, Roebuck "Pops" Staples, and asked: "Pops, can I marry Mavis?" "Don't ask me, ask Mavis," replied Pops, not best pleased. . . . She did not accept his proposal, although she and Bob remained friends.'

Thirty years later, Mavis Staples' redoubtable presence was to be seen and heard at the performance of 'Like a Rolling Stone' at the 'Late Night with David Letterman' 10th Anniversary Special, recorded in New York on January 18, 1992 and aired that February 6. She was the heartiest of the backing singers—the others being Roseanne Cash, NANCI GRIFFITH, EMMYLOU HARRIS and Michelle Shocked.

Forty years after 'Blowin' in the Wind', Bob and Mavis recorded together: they sing a duet, and talk their talk, on the re-make of Dylan's Slow Train Coming song 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking'—see separate entry—made specially for the album Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan.

Mavis continues to sing powerfully. She has spent most of her career as the group's lead singer but starting in 1969 with Mavis Staples she has also made a number of solo albums, including two produced by Prince—1987's Time Waits for No One and 1993's Voice. After the latter there was a gap of more than a decade before her most recent CD, Have a Little Faith, released in 2004.

[Mavis Staples: Mavis Staples, nia, 1969, CD-reissue Hdh 300, 1995; Only for the Lonely, nia, 1970, CD-reissue Stax 88012, 1993; Don't Change Me Now, nia, Stax, nia; Time Waits for No One, nia, 1987; Voice, Slash nia, 1993; Have a Little Faith, nia, Alligator nia, 2004. The Staples Singers: 'Sit Down Servant', Vee-Jay 912, US, 1962. Bob Dylan's interview re Mavis Staples, Staple Singers tribute show, Chicago, 27 Oct 2001, fragments shown on 'Chicago Stories', WTTW-TV, Chicago, 25 Feb 2002; Mavis Staples' quote re Dylan, recording date unknown, other details same; both taken here from Glen Dundas' transcription in Tangled, Thunder Bay, Ontario: SMA Services, 2004. Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, manuscript p.161.]

Starr, Ringo [1940 -] Richard Starkey was born in the Toxteth district of Liverpool on July 7, 1940, in a terraced house the city council is now determined to demolish. Ringo moved out of it at age four and grew up across the city in Dingle. Ill health scarred his childhood, consigning him to much time in hospital and leaving him semi-literate (though not unable, in later life, to narrate many UK children's TV series of 'Thomas the Tank-Engine'). He learnt drums and played in his first group, the Eddie Clayton Skiffle Group, in 1957. Following a stint in the Raving Texans, he joined Rory Storm & the Hurricanes and while playing with this well-known Liverpool beat group in Hamburg, West Germany, in 1960, first met the rest of the Beatles. When they sacked Pete Best in August 1962, Ringo replaced him. When the Beatles met Dylan in 1964 and Dylan handed JOHN LENNON the first joint any of them had encountered, John immediately passed it to Ringo (as a king to his taster); Ringo, not knowing the etiquette, smoked the whole thing himself.

Never the brightest starr in the firmament, and one of its dullest vocalists, the point about Ringo has always been that he is one of rock's greatest drummers. After the Beatles disbanded in 1970, he was surprisingly quick off the blocks with his solo albums: Sentimental Journey and the better-received Beaucoups of Blues both came out that year, followed by hit singles like 'It Don't Come Easy' (1971) 'Back Off Boogaloo' (1972) and later the US no.1 hits 'Photograph' and a remake of Johnny Burnette's 'You're Sixteen', both from 'his first rock album', Ringo, in 1973.

By this time he had already also starred in the movie version of Terry Southern's Candy (1968), in The Magic Christian (1969) and That'll Be the Day (1973) and played both FRANK ZAPPA and Larry the Dwarf in Zappa's 200 Motels (1971). He had also been a participant in the August 1971 Concert for Bangla Desh, at which he played tambourine behind Dylan. Later film rôles included being the Pope in the Ken Russell film Lizstomania (1975) and the Mock Turtle in a US TV film of Alice in Wonderland ten years later. He has been married twice, detoxed after becoming an alcoholic in the 1980s, has suffered the further ignominy of TV-advertising Pizza Hut, has inevitably voiced himself in 'The Simpsons' (1991) and in 2005 agreed to work with comic-books legend Stan Lee on the creation of an animated musical featuring an unlikely, Starr-based new superhero.

His work with Dylan did not stop at the Concert for Bangla Desh, however. At THE BAND's Farewell Concert in San Francisco on November 25, 1976, Ringo made a surprise appearance to share drumming duties on the Dylan-plus-ensemble version of 'I Shall Be Released'. Five years later, on May 15, 1981, Ringo was in the studios in LA with Bob recording a session for the Shot of Love album, from which one track, 'Heart of Mine', made it onto the album and became a single. Though the liner notes for the album credit Ringo with playing drums on an unspecified track, in fact he plays tom tom on this track, and on this track only.

On April 14, 1987 (Beatle people say April 29, but they're less reliable), Dylan repaid the favour, dropping in on a Starr session at Chips Moman's studio in Memphis to share vocals on 'I Wish I Knew Now (What I Knew Then)'—a session it's reported that Starr had videotaped. This entire album, blighted by Starr's alcoholism at time of the prolonged sessions (they'd begun that February), never came out except on bootlegs; Moman tried to issue it but Starr blocked its release, which was to have been in 1989.

That was also the year Ringo turned up again with Dylan, this time at a Never-Ending Tour concert in Frejus, France, during the summer festivals season, when Starr was back in action and touring the first of his Ringo Starr & His All-Starr Band line-ups (in which at different times various members of The Band, among others, took part). Coinciding geographically, Starr came on stage during Dylan's June 13 concert to play drums on the last two pre-encore numbers, 'Highway 61 Revisited' and 'Like a Rolling Stone'.

In LA on December 17, 1997, Ringo was in the audience for another Dylan concert. At one point Dylan said from the stage: 'One of the great drummers on this kind of music is in the audience tonight—Ringo Starr! Where are you, Ringo?' Pause. 'I guess we don't want to put the spotlight on him.' Ringo was up in the balcony's VIP section. He gave a cheery wave, as in the long-gone moptop days.

[Joint-smoking, see Aronowitz, Al. Ringo Starr: Sentimental Journey; Beaucoups of Blues; Ringo. Candy, dir. Christian Marquand, ABC/Corona, France-Italy-US, 1968. The Magic Christian, dir. Joseph McGrath, Commonwealth United/Grand Films, UK, 1969. 200 Motels, dir. Tony Palmer & Charles Swenson, Bizarre/Murakami-Wolf, US, 1971. That'll Be the Day, dir. Claude Whatham, EMI Films, UK, 1973. Lisztomania, dir. Ken Russell, Goodtimes/VPS/Warner, UK, 1975. Alice in Wonderland, dir. Harry Harris, CBS-TV, US, 1985. 'The Simpsons' series 2, no.18, 'Brush with Greatness', 11 Apr 1991.]

Stewart, Dave [1952 -] David Allen Stewart was born in Sunderland, Tyne & Wear, in the north-east of England, on September 9, 1952. Diverted by injury from football to music and the guitar, his early band Longdancer signed to ELTON JOHN's Rocket label but broke up in 1977 when Stewart met Annie Lennox, forming the Catch with her and a Peet Coombes. After the single 'Borderline' the Catch mutated into the Tourists (1978–80), a new waveish group that enjoyed two UK top 10 hits, 'I Only Want to Be With You' and 'So Good to Be Back Home Again.' In mid-tour in Bangkok the Tourists disbanded, to be superceded by Lennox and Stewart's new group the Eurythmics. They rose slowly but inexorably, their first hit 1983's plaintive and catchy 'Sweet Dreams (Are Made of This)', to become the most successful male-female duo in pop history (it says here).

It was clear that Annie Lennox was a gifted singer, though with an irritating inability to vary her phrasing, as for instance on the title line of their hit 'There Must Be an Angel', which she sings identically over and over again as if she were a tape-loop or a singing parrot; but it was never clear what Dave Stewart's talent was. The PR aura surrounding them attempted to portray him as a musical genius and inspired Svengali, though to most reasonable people he looked like a self-regarding and affected twit with a gift for wide-ranging mediocrity.

The Eurythmics split in 1990, Lennox to a successful solo career and Stewart not, though he produced other people's albums, worked with Alison Moyet, MICK JAGGER, Shakespear's Sister, BOB GELDOF and others. His own band the Spiritual Cowboys (well, quite) released two indifferently received albums and in 1993 he joined Terry Hall of the Specials to form a new group, Vegas, releasing one album ahead of Stewart's 1994 solo album

Greetings from the Gutter. Diddums. He has also worked in film, his biggest project being Honest, a very badly reviewed film directed and co-written by him and starring some of the group All Saints. As a session multi-instrumentalist he has played on albums by Aretha Franklin (1985) and Daryl Hall (1986) and as a guitarist on albums by Hall and Oates (1990 and 1997), Steve Hillage (1991), Carly Simon (1994), Joe Strummer and the Mescaleros (1999), Sinéad O'Connor (2000), Bryan Ferry and Marianne Faithfull (both 2002), Jimmy Cliff (2004) and many others.

The number of professional connections Dave Stewart has managed to make with Bob Dylan is absurdly large (and even one or two might seem excessive). On August 22, 1985, in the gymnasium of the First Methodist Church in Hollywood, Stewart directs the hopeless videos for Dylan's 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky' and 'Emotionally Yours'—and while he's at it records himself singing 'I Shall Be Released'. Three months later to the day, in his own London studio, he's on guitar (with three other musicians) backing Dylan on two instrumental rambles televised on The Old Grey Whistle Test on BBC-2 that November 26, and on a backing track for the song 'Under Your Spell', co-written by Dylan and CAROLE BAYER SAGER, onto which Dylan later dubs vocals; with backing vocals also added, this becomes the last track on the 1986 album Knocked Out Loaded.

From this visit to Stewart's London home turf of Crouch End comes the delightful story of Dylan being directed to Dave's house, knocking on the door and having it answered by a young woman who doesn't recognise her visitor. 'Is Dave in?' Bob asks. 'No, but he shouldn't be long: come in and wait,' comes the reply. Bob spends an hour or more at the kitchen table before the householder, a plumber called Dave, duly returns to find Bob Dylan in his house.

Six years later Stewart arrives onstage in the middle of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour set at the festival at Antibes (July 12, 1992) to play guitar on a thrash through 'Highway 61 Revisited', and does exactly the same thing again near the end of two of the London dates in early 1993 (February 9 and 13). Four more years and there he is with Dylan in Japan—February 10 and 11, 1997 in Tokyo—filming him from onstage the first night and playing guitar the second night, this time on the almost unavoidable encore number 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'. A teasing fragment of his film of 'Like a Rolling Stone' was later made available from Stewart's website.

Before these last two sightings, Stewart had been occupied more usefully on Dylan's behalf behind the camera (the preferable placement, you might think), filming another video, this time for 'Blood in my Eyes' from Dylan's World Gone Wrong album. This was filmed in Camden Town, London, on July 21, 1993 (see the entry the Mississippi Sheiks) and is Dave Stewart's only valuable contribution.

Stewart, Maeretha [19?? -] Maeretha A. Stewart is a gospel, soul and general session singer who has recorded with a wide range of people and in many genres, from Cyndi Lauper's 'Girls Just Want to Have Fun' to Philip Glass' The Photographer: A Music-Drama in Three Acts (both 1983), HARRY BELAFONTE's Turn the World Around (unreleased in the US, and which as it happens featured Dylan's friend Ted Perlman on guitar) and Nina Simone's fine 1978 album Baltimore (1978), with its majestic non pareil version of JUDY COLLINS' great song 'My Father'. Maeretha Stewart is also one of the backing singers on Dylan's Self Portrait and New Morning albums of 1970—and hers is the scat singing on the latter's track 'If Dogs Run Free'. In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan says that this was done in one take; he also makes it sound as if he hadn't a clue who she was. He writes: 'There were three girl singers in the room, who sounded like they'd been plucked from a choir and one of them did some improvisational scat singing.'

[Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.138.]

Stibal, Brian [1954 -] See Styble, Bryan.

Stokes, Frank [1888 - 1955] The stupendous black Memphis artist Frank Stokes was born in Whitehaven, Tennessee (now a section of South Memphis), on New Year's Day 1888, and became both a blacksmith and a founding father of the Memphis blues, making solo records, remarkable duets with fellow guitarist Dan Sane as the Beale Street Sheiks and lovely creations with violinist Will Batts (including his 'South Memphis Blues' of 1929). He was particularly good at anti-preacher and anti-deacon rants. His recording career was over by the end of 1929 but he continued to perform through to the 1940s, sometimes working with BUKKA WHITE in that decade. He retired but continued to hold memorable house parties full of guests we might now term celebs. He died in Memphis on September 12, 1955.

His specific relevance to Dylan resides in his successful début recording from 1927, 'You Shall', which strongly prefigured Dylan's 'I Shall Be Free': see separate entry. See also blues, inequality of reward in.

Frank Stokes' grandson, Nathaniel Kent, runs a reggae band in Memphis, and his granddaughter is the librarian at the Memphis Commercial Appeal newspaper.

[Frank Stokes: 'South Memphis Blues', Memphis, 23 Sep 1929.]

Stone/Edelstein family, the The maternal side of Robert Allen Zimmerman's family. Dylan's mother was born Beatrice R. Stone in 1915, and had an older brother, Vernon. Two younger siblings followed, Lewis and Irene. All born in the US, they were the children of Lithuanian Jewish immigrants Benjamin David Solemovitz (born 1883), who changed Solemovitz to Stone, and his wife Florence Sara née Edelstein, herself one of ten children.

Taking Florence Sara first: the Florence who would become Bob Dylan's grandmother—she and the other nine Edelstein children were in turn the sons and daughters of Benjamin Harold Edelstein (born 1870) and Lybba née Jaffe, from Korno in Lithuania. (Benjamin Harold's parents were David and Ida Edelstein; Ida's parents were Yehada Aren and Rachel née Berkovitz. Lybba Jaffe's parents were Aaron Jaffe and Fannie.)

Benjamin Harold and wife Lybba, plus the first four of their ten children, left their village of Vilkomir, Russia, in 1902, on the ship Tunisia, arriving into the US at Sault St. Marie, Michigan, by way of Liverpool, St. John, New Brunswick and Montréal. They arrived on Christmas Eve 1902 and settled with relatives at Superior, Wisconsin, across Lake Superior from Duluth. The four children who came with them were Bob Dylan's grandmother-to-be, Florence Sara (born 1892), Goldie and Julius (1896) and Rose (1899). In Superior, Wisconsin, came Samuel (1903) and Jennie (1905). Their father moved to Hibbing in 1904, brought the rest along in the second half of 1905 and in Hibbing they had their last four children, Max (1906), Mike (1908), Ethel (1911) and Sylvia (1912). These siblings all duly became Beatty's maternal aunts and uncles. Their father, in partnership with one of his immigrant brothers, Julius, starting with tent shows, set up a chain of Iron Range movie theatres. In Hibbing they acquired the Garden Theater in 1925, renamed it the Gopher and sold it to another chain in 1928. In the 1940s they built a new Hibbing movie house, naming it the Lybba after Benjamin Harold's wife.

On Beatty's father's side of the family were the Stones, previously known as the Solemovitzes, again a family of Lithuanian Jewish immigrants. Her father Benjamin David Stone was one of four children, his siblings being Rosy, Eddy and Ida, all the children of Robert aka Samuel Solemovitz (aka Solomawitch aka Salamovitz) and Bessie née Kaner. Robert, the son of Abraham and Mary Solemovitz, arrived in Superior from Lithuania in 1888 or 1889, and five years later Bessie and the children arrived. In 1906 Ben's younger sister Ida was murdered by a Scot named John Young, who had wanted to marry her. Within a year, her mother Bessie had died 'of a broken heart'. Her husband remarried in 1909, to another immigrant from Russia, May Levinson, who had three children of her own, Roy, Bennie and Sam.

That same year—three years after his sister's murder—Ben, then aged 26, started work in Hibbing. There he met Florence Sara Edelstein; they married in 1911 and set up a store at Stevenson Location, 12 miles west of Hibbing, supplying clothing to iron ore miners' families; when the mine was used up, they opened their store in downtown Hibbing instead. Florence's grandparents—Benjamin Harold Edelstein's parents—were still alive when Florence and Ben's first three children, were born: Vernon in 1910, Beatty on June 16, 1915 and Lewis in 1918. But Florence's grandmother, Ida Edelstein, died at 69 in Superior in 1922, the year before Ben and Florence's youngest child, Irene, arrived. Florence's grandfather, David Edelstein, died aged 73 in 1924.

Beatty married Abe Zimmerman at her mother's house on June 10, 1934. He was 22; she was six days short of her 19th birthday. Six years and 11 months later, she had her first child, Robert Allen, on May 24, 1941. Her grandmother Lybba died the year after, on September 5, 1942. Five years after Robert came Beatty's second child, DAVID. Her father, Ben Stone, died in 1952; her grandfather, Benjamin Harold Edelstein, survived till January 24, 1961, dying in the same Duluth hospital Bob had been born in almost 20 years earlier. Beatty's mother Florence, the grandmother who then lived in the Zimmerman house when Bob and David were growing up—the grandmother much praised in Chronicles Volume One—died in March 1964.

Some years after the boys' father's death in 1968, Beatty married again, to a Joseph Rutman of St. Paul, Minnesota. (See Rutman, Howard.)

Beatty appeared on stage with Bob Dylan, clapping along to the music during the finale of one of the 1975 Rolling Thunder Revue concerts in Toronto, as shown in the photo on page 40 of the booklet inside the 2-CD set Bootleg Series Vol. 5: Bob Dylan Live 1975, The Rolling Thunder Revue, released in 2002. She died in St.Paul, Minnesota, on January 27, 2000. She was 84. She was survived by her younger brother Lewis, Bob Dylan's uncle, who died at home in Hibbing at the age of 86 on January 24, 2005. Their youngest sister Irene, now Irene Goldfine, is still alive and living in Arizona.

[Main source: Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues: Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs-Mesabi, 1997 + the 1900 & 1920 US censuses; special thanks to Sarah Beattie.]

Stoner, Rob [1948 -] Robert David Rothstein was born in New York City on April 20, 1948. He grew up in Manhattan and New Rochelle, New York, and formed a rockabilly band, Rockin' Rob & the Rebels, at the age of 11 in 1959, and could play guitar, bass and keyboards. Before attending Columbia College, New York, from which he graduated in 1969, he'd also played in a high school band signed to a music publishing deal with the once-great Leiber and Stoller (themselves songwriters who wrote many of ELVIS PRESLEY's greatest 1950s hits but who seem to have felt nothing but contempt for rock'n'roll and felt that their best work was achieved later writing for 'real song stylists' like Peggy Lee). In 1973 Stoner signed to the Nashville division of Epic as a solo recording artist and songwriter. His songs have been recorded by Shirley Bassey and Johnny Winter (a pleasingly rare linkage of artists).

In 1975 Bob Dylan appointed him his bass player and the informal leader of GUAM, the band that played the 1975 and 1976 Rolling Thunder Revues. In the group slot at the start of each concert, Stoner sang lead on his own song 'Too Good to Be Wasted', which SAM SHEPARD called a 'great song'. Stoner also played bass on all but the first of the Desire sessions: he started on July 28, 1975 (the session that yielded the album cut of 'Romance in Durango' and the outtake 'Catfish', released in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3), and was there on July 29–31 and October 24. Stoner also played on the televised 'World of John Hammond' performance Dylan gave in Chicago that September 10—technically September 11, since it was 1:30AM before he came on—at which the stripped-down unit of Dylan, Stoner, SCARLET RIVERA and HOWIE WYETH played 'Oh Sister', 'Simple Twist of Fate' and 'Hurricane' (televised on PBS-TV that December 13). Stoner features quite prominently in the movie Renaldo & Clara and in the 'Hard Rain' TV Special, and is also on the Hard Rain album. Since he was the band leader, he can take a great deal of credit for the way that Guam delivered for Dylan exactly the kind of ragged gyspy band he'd wanted; as a bassist, his work achieved an admirable mix of nervy precision and melodic freedom. He brought his adolescent admiration for rock'n'roller GENE VINCENT's band into his own New York punk style (and even spent the 1975 tour with a teddy boy look and a 1950s greaser haircut created for him by MICK RONSON, a man whose own hair was irremediably of the 1970s Rod Stewart persuasion).

Stoner, along with DAVID MANSFIELD and STEVE SOLES, made the transition to Dylan's 1978 World Tour Band—and at one of the December 1977 rehearsals, on Boxing Day in Santa Monica, Dylan performed an otherwise unknown composition, 'First to Say Goodbye', specifically for Rob Stoner. As it turned out, Stoner was first to say goodbye. He survived only to the end of the first leg, the Far East section of the tour, starting on February 20 in Tokyo and ending on April 1 in Sydney: a total of 23 concerts. According to the 'Dylan Who's Who' webpage on Stoner, Dylan biographer CLINTON HEYLIN says that Stoner quit; but his replacement, JERRY SCHEFF, reports being recruited by a phone call from sax player STEVE DOUGLAS, saying that Dylan had just fired his bass player.

At any rate, no special animosity can have been involved, because when the subsequent European leg of the tour reached London, for a run of six nights at the huge Earls Court hall, DEREK BARKER reports that one night (June 14), Dylan and his London record-company press officer, Elly Smith, went out late to a number of uninspiring clubs, ending up at the Music Machine in Finchley, where Dylan was attacked with a knife by Sid Vicious backstage—and that Dylan had gone there to see Robert Gordon, 'whose band then featured Link Wray and Bob's recently departed bandleader Rob Stoner.'

After that band, Stoner made a solo album, Patriotic Duty (1980), and became the first non-southerner to record for Sun Records in Memphis—fulfilling a fantasy that every old rockabilly must have entertained.

Rob Stoner played on sessions and/or in live performance with a large number of interesting artists, among them Hank Ballard (writer of 'The Twist'), CHUCK BERRY, Don Covay, JERRY GARCIA, LEVON HELM, JOHN HERALD, Garland Jeffreys (with whom Dylan drummer SANDY KONIKOFF also worked), LOU REED, ROBBIE ROBERTSON and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN.

In 2006 Stoner appeared as a 'special guest' on the Dylan tribute band Highway 61 Revisited's misleadingly titled CD Bob Dylan 1975–1981, Rolling Thunder and the Gospel Years—which contains neither Bob Dylan nor any of his songs. Based in West Nyack, New York State, today Rob Stoner offers private lessons in songwriting, singing, bass and guitar, specialising in beginners.

[Background data in part from Rob Stoner, e-mail to this writer, 18 Feb 2006. Derek Barker, '1978 and All That', collected in 20 Years of Isis: Bob Dylan Anthology Volume 2, New Malden: Chrome Dreams, 2005, p.231]

Stookey, Noel [1937 -] See Peter, Paul & Mary.

Street Legal* [1978] Released around the time of Dylan's first London concerts for 12 years, this is Dylan's 20th album and for a minority it is, after Blood on the Tracks, arguably Dylan's best record of the 1970s: a crucial album documenting a crucial period in Dylan's own life.

Every song deals with love's betrayal, with Dylan's being betrayed like Christ, and, head on, with the need to abandon woman's love. Street Legal is one of Dylan's most important, cohesive albums: and it warns us, as pointedly as art ever should, of what is to come. It prepares us for Dylan's conversion to Christianity just as plainly as the end of John Wesley Harding prepares us for the country music of Nashville Skyline, and just as plainly as Bringing It All Back Home signals what is just around the corner on Highway 61 Revisited.

It is of astonishing complexity and confidence, delivered in one of Dylan's most authoritative voices, and extremely badly produced. The 1999 and 2003–4 attempts at re-mastering for CD reissue (after a first CD reissue, which wasn't re-mastered and is now a rarity) have failed to make aural amends. The other fault might be said to be the title. After the overblown swagger of titles like Planet Waves and Masterpieces here we have another dodgy claim, this time cloaked in modesty; but there is nothing modest about claiming cool status. Such virtues shouldn't be self-proclaimed.

[Recorded Santa Monica, CA, 26–28 Apr & 1 May 1978, released as stereo LP Columbia JC 35453 (in UK CBS 86067), 15 Jun 1978; re-mastered, re-mixed CD release, Columbia CK 65974, 1999; further re-mastered CD reissue, taken from the specialist 2003 hybrid SACD released, Columbia CK 92403, 1 Jun 2004 (in Europe Columbia 512355 2), 29 Mar 2004.]

Strzelecki, Henry [1939 -] Henry Strzelecki—the name is Polish, and more famously belongs to Count Paul Edmond de Strzelecki, an early explorer of Australia—was born in Birmingham, Alabama, on August 8, 1939. He became one of the session bass players in the Nashville of the late 1950s onwards, playing on records by everyone from Homer & Jethro through to Reba McEntire. Between the two he's played for Patsy Cline and k.d. lang, for Narvel Felts and CONWAY TWITTY, Hazel Dickens and David Allan Coe, Chet Atkins and Joe-El Sonnier, RAY CHARLES and MEMPHIS SLIM, JOHNNY CASH and GORDON LIGHTFOOT, FLATT & SCRUGGS and JOAN BAEZ, Sleepy LaBeef and Tom T. Hall, WILLIE NELSON and ELVIS PRESLEY, Waylon Jennings and Box-Car Willie, Hank Locklin and Hank Williams Jr., DON GIBSON and Marty Robbins.

Among these sessions he played on two different albums considered a humiliation by the artists themselves. In February 1965 Henry Strzelecki joined the old Elvis team of Scotty Moore and D.J. Fontana, plus further guitarists Grady Martin and CHARLIE McCOY and further drummer KENNY BUTTREY, along with keyboards veteran Floyd Cramer, to play the contemptible songs that formed the soundtrack album for what may be the nadir of Elvis' film career—imagine that!—namely the thrown-together Harum Scarum, in which Elvis dressed up in old Rudolph Valentino costumes and sulked about on a 1925 Cecil B. de Mille set. And in late 1968, Strzelecki played on the Flatt & Scruggs album Nashville Airplane, on which they made pleasant country covers of songs like 'Like a Rolling Stone': a process so unpalatable to Lester Flatt that he broke up the duo shortly afterwards.

Between those two albums, the Nashville sessions Henry Strzelecki contributed to included those for Blonde on Blonde held on February 16–17, March 7, 8 & 9, 1966. He therefore plays bass on 'Absolutely Sweet Marie', 'Pledging My Time', 'Just Like a Woman' and 'Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again'. (He's also on the earlier outtake from the same session, released on the Bootleg Series Vol. 7—No Direction Home: The Soundtrack, 2005). The only mystery seems to be why Charlie McCoy had to play bass and trumpet simultaneously on 'Most Likely You Go Your Way (And I'll Go Mine'), granted that Henry Strzelecki and his bass was on hand at that session too. Maybe he just clocked off early that day, feeling he'd done enough. And all told, he certainly had.

'Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again' [1966] 'Memphis Blues Again' (nowadays officially listed as 'Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again' on the www.bobdylan.com website) goes beyond being an exciting rock-music performance. It shares with those slower Blonde on Blonde songs 'Visions of Johanna' and 'Sad-Eyed Lady of the Lowlands' a greater-than-average duration and a general high seriousness of intention. The narrator is someone just trying to get by in modern America: someone trying to get by, that is, without shutting off or closing up; someone who sees a lot happening around him but can't discern any pattern to it nor any constant but meaninglessness; someone who, in this situation, stays more outwardly vulnerable than he needs to because he retains a yearning, however vague, for some better kind of world.

All this comes through to the listener from disconnected visual glimpses. The song begins with this: 'Oh the ragman draws circles / Up an' down the block / I'd ask him what the matter was / But I know that he don't talk'—and the visual dominance is such that we get a picture to cover the third and fourth lines, they don't just pass over as abstract reflection. We see the singer standing disconsolate, aware that there is no point in trying to communicate. The same applies throughout the song. The narrator is there in front of us, avoiding 'some French girl who says she knows me well', confronting Mona, believing the railroad men, thinking about Grandpa, hiding under the truck, winning his argument with the teen preacher, staggering around stoned and telling us that we just get uglier, smiling at Ruthie, and sitting patiently on Grand Street ('where the neon madmen climb'). It is only with the heartfelt cry of the chorus, 'Oh! Mama! Can this really be the end?! / To be stuck inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues again!' that the visual predominance dies away. We only picture Dylan saying 'Oh! Mama!': we don't picture Memphis, Tennessee, or Mobile, Alabama, at all. They are not part of the visual language; they are symbols, words that stand for other things—hope and despondency, potential and restraint, energy and somnambulence. They are, except in the special sense touched upon later, abstract ideas.

The song is interesting too in the way that Dylan handles his moral point. He bestows an implicit blessing on some things and frowns on others, drawing to the listener's attention that some things strike the artist as enhancing and others as restrictive. The narrator himself is also made to represent certain values, certain virtues—a frank and sensitive openness to life, even at the expense of sophistication and propriety: 'An' I said Oh! I didn't know that! . . . / . . . Ev'rybody still talks about / How badly they were shocked; / But me I expected it to happen, / I knew he'd lost control! . . .', which is contrasted with the machinations of the senator 'Showing everyone his gun, / Handing out free tickets / To the wedding of his son' and to the neon madmen of the modern city, the ones who have settled into it all, and to the claustrophobic 'ladies' who 'furnish' him with tape, and so on.

In this stance, in its whole sensibility, 'Memphis Blues Again' very much anticipates the influential HUNTER S. THOMPSON book Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, 1972. This formative and unequalled work of the New, or Gonzo, Journalism, takes exactly the position expressed so cogently in the Dylan song. His line 'And people just get uglier and I have no sense of time' especially prefigures the prose of Thompson's book—a book sub-titled 'A Savage Journey to the Heart of the American Dream', in which 'Every now and then when your life gets complicated and the weasels start closing in, the only real cure is to load up on heinous chemicals and then drive like a bastard from Hollywood to Las Vegas . . . not a good town for psychedelic drugs. Reality itself is too twisted. . . . The TV news was about the Laos Invasion . . . Pentagon generals babbling insane lies. . . . The man was getting ugly, but suddenly his eyes switched away. . . . The frog-eyed woman clawed feverishly at his belt. . . . I turned away. It was too horrible.' Towards the end, Thompson acknowledges his debt: 'I listened for a moment, but my nerve ends were no longer receptive. The only song I might have been able to relate to, at that point, was "Mister Tambourine Man". Or maybe "Memphis Blues Again". . .' (The book is dedicated 'To Bob Geiger, for reasons that need not be explained here—and to Bob Dylan, for "Mister Tambourine Man".')

The humour that breaks out in the song, beyond the histrionics of hamming up 'Oh! I didn't know that!', also aids the moral evaluation. The narrator only adds to our awareness of his virtue when he raps out 'Y'see, you're just like me. / I hope you're satisfied.' Who wouldn't have been back then?

Dylan ends the song—calming down here into a patient acceptance that Hunter S. Thompson does not replicate—with a disarming, memorable summary of the predicament he's been showing us that we are all in: 'And here I sit so patiently / Waiting to find out what price / Ya have to pay to get out of / Going through all these things twice.'

The one way in which Memphis and Mobile are not, in the song, mere abstract ideas is this: Dylan's title, 'Memphis Blues Again', includes implicit acknowledgement that there is another 'Memphis Blues'—and indeed there are several. The classic W.C. Handy song 'Memphis Blues' (he wrote the melody, published in 1912; George A. Norton wrote the lyrics in 1913) was cut by Esther Bigeou at her début session as early as 1921. Ma Rainey sang 'Memphis Bound Blues' in 1925; FRANK STOKES (with Will Batts on violin) cut a 'South Memphis Blues' in Memphis in 1929; MEMPHIS MINNIE's 'North Memphis Blues' was cut in Chicago in 1930.

Influence is often hard to trace. It just could be that Dylan picked up his own song's Mobile-Memphis contrast from something he must have seen in print many times: HARRY SMITH's summary of the Uncle Dave Macon track 'Way Down the Old Plank Road' (NY, April 14, 1926). While the recording itself would hardly suggest it, Smith's typically comic, pithy ellipse summarises the song as giving us 'WENT MOBILE, GET GRAVEL TRAIN, NEXT I KNEW: BALL AND CHAIN . . . NASHVILLE PRETTY, MEMPHIS BEAUTY.'

As for the format 'stuck inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues again', it parallels exactly that we associate with BUKKA WHITE's powerful 1940 track 'Aberdeen Mississippi Blues', with its simple 'Sittin' down in Aberdeen with New Orleans on my mind.'

[Bob Dylan: 'Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again', performed live hundreds of times, usually with several verses deleted. Hunter S. Thompson's Fear & Loathing in Las Vegas began life as a sprawling serialisation: 'Fear and Loathing In Las Vegas', by 'Raoul Duke', Rolling Stone nos.95 & 96, San Francisco, 11 & 25 Nov 1971.

Esther Bigeou: 'Memphis Blues', NY, c.5 Oct 1921; Ma Rainey: Chicago, c.Aug 1925; Frank Stokes: 'South Memphis Blues', Memphis, 23 Sep 1929; Memphis Minnie: 'North Memphis Blues', Chicago, 11 Oct 1930. Harry Smith, notes on Uncle Dave Macon: 'Way Down the Old Plank Road', NY, 14 Apr 1926, on American Folk Music, Folkways FP 251–3, NY, 1952. Bukka White: 'Aberdeen Mississippi Blues', Chicago, 8 Mar 1940, issued on The Male Blues Singers, Collectors Classics CC3, Denmark, c.1965; CD-reissued Parchman Farm Blues, Blues Collection CD 23 (magazine + CD), London, 1994.]

Styble, Bryan [1954 -] Brian Stibal was born on October 12, 1954 in St. Louis, Missouri, where he grew up. He attended Boston University and as a sophomore founded and edited the very early Dylan fanzine Talkin' Bob Zimmerman Blues, which under three different names ran from early 1975 till late 1979, by which time its editor was pursuing a media career and found himself in Houston, Texas.

For the first five issues, the name was as above. These were dated February 1975, March 1975, July 1975, March 1976 and August 1976. Then he shortened its name and lengthened the gap yet further between issues; Zimmerman Blues was the title for issues 6–9 (respectively dated August 1976, winter 1977, fall 1977, fall 1978, winter 1979). For issue

10, summer 1979, he changed the name again, to Changin', because when he met his hero, 'Dylan personally asked if perhaps a new title couldn't be found, one that concentrated more on looking ahead . . .' This seemed to be the kiss of death; that turned out to be the last issue. He handed it over to one Carol Weissbein for a projected issue 11, but this never came out. The last published issue came out just ahead of the first Bob Dylan Convention, which Stibal helped organise and which he attended.

'The impetus was simple: I saw the need for a clearing-house for information and ideas regarding the figure I recognised as the most important recording artist of the 20th century. Since no-one else was doing it, "I knew it was up to me."' The fanzine quickly gained 'a circulation in the low thousands throughout North America, Europe, Australia and Japan after only a few tiny classifieds in Rolling Stone.'

Its editor couldn't sustain it:

> 'Zimmerman Blues ended because it was more or less a one-man operation. While I had people contributing things from all over, there was no-one else around to assist me, and I just didn't have the energy to pull it off myself. The other folks I credited each issue were all over the country, and of course never around to assist in the editing, layout, printing considerations, etc. . . . Besides, by the end I felt I'd started the ball rolling and I figured folks like JOHN BAULDIE would be able to do a vastly better job than I ever had, and sure enough he and others did. I was happy to step aside.'

His first interest in Dylan had been when, as a teenage BEATLES fan, he heard the Concert for Bangla Desh and was surprised to find Dylan's set 'vastly more interesting than anything GEORGE or RINGO did' that first Sunday in August 1971. He says now that in truth, even in 1975, 'through at least the first three issues' of Talkin' Bob Zimmerman Blues, he still 'didn't understand the first thing about the artist's import'.

In the course of editing the fanzine, he suffered a political conversion to what is now the Neo-Con Right, having voted for Gerald Ford in 1976 and being, by 1978, 'a solid conservative' who found Ronald Reagan 'a thoughtful thinker on a wide range of national and international issues'. Stibal was 'a bona fide Reaganite by 1980'.

So now he's a sometimes deliberately obnoxious radio talk-show host, mostly on small stations—he was recently based on the no.2 talk radio station in Albuquerque, New Mexico, the no.71 sized radio market in the US—but he held a slot on the big-league WJR/Detroit from 1993 to 1996 and at present he's back in the big-time on 710 KIRO in Seattle, Washington, 'the most prestigious newstalk radio operation in the Pacific Northwest', heard across a good portion of western Canada, down to Oregon and east to Idaho.

He has changed his name to Bryan Styble—which, as he likes to say on air, 'rhymes with Bible'. He says the surname change was not, 'contrary to a persistent and annoying rumor in the Dylan fan community, to emulate the spelling of Dylan's name; it was because, as a broadcast journalist, I was tired of people familiar with my print work routinely mispronouncing it; the simultaneous first-name adjustment was for symmetry's sake.'

Styble is not always aggressively right-wing on air: he's capable of talking uncontroversially about sports for eight or nine minutes straight without ever stopping and without ever saying anything. But clearly he manages to provoke some listeners. Here's a representative blog posted in August 2005:

> 'His big selling point is "I'll talk to just about anyone about just about anything—from Astronomy to Zoology" . . . and he's obsessed with talking about himself . . . where he stands on the political spectrum (and how "independent" he thinks he is, etc) and moving from random topic to random topic . . . puffing his chest and "propagating conversation at the speed of light" (his god-awful catchphrase). . . . Very sad.'

Perhaps the last testimony to rely on is that of someone with nothing better to do than listen to talk radio in the middle of the night, but it gives a flavour of what seems to have happened to a man who once pioneered Dylan fanzines.

[Bryan Styble: quote re Dylan asking for fanzine name change from issue no.10 itself; all other quotes from e-mails to this writer, 24 Nov & 2 Dec 2005. He can be heard live on www.710kiro.com. Some TBZB detail is online at www.geocities.com/soho/hall/8988. Blogger Willis, http://willisreed.blogspot.com/2005_08_01_willis reed_archive.html, online 31 Oct 2005.]

Sutton, Gregg [1949 -] Gregg William Sutton was born on July 1, 1949 in New York City, where he grew up. A bass player, he formed his first group, the Horizons, in 1963, and joined his first 'bigtime group', KGB, in 1976, before moving into what IRA INGBER calls 'a pop band', with Ingber and Vince Malamed, the Pets, who made one album for Arista. He was also the bass player and the only American on Dylan's 1984 European tour. ('That made me feel proud', he told a Telegraph fanzine subscriber.)

He got the gig through CHARLIE QUINTANA, a friend, who brought him in to rehearse with Dylan before dropping out himself—though Sutton says Dylan was hard to pin down about it right to the last: 'He was very mysterious about it, you know? I sort of had to say, "Well, do I have the gig? I have to make certain arrangements if I'm going to Europe." He said, "Oh well, somebody'll call you later." That kind of thing. The same was true with

IAN McLAGAN. He told Ian McLagan about three days before the tour!'

Sutton says that the final line-up rehearsed for 'maybe five days', but that he'd listened to Dylan's records all his life, but he 'spent a week listening to all kinds of stuff, and playing along with it just to brush up.'

In the end, Gregg Sutton not only had the gig but, bizarrely from the audience point of view, was given a solo slot in the middle of each concert: 'Bob likes to take a break in the middle of the show,' he said by way of explanation later,

> 'so he can recover his voice, and it's like a transition. He would do seven songs with the band and then I'd sing and then he'd come out and do three or four acoustic numbers. So he just wanted to have five minutes to shift gears and everything. So he sort of asked me the day before the first gig, "You can sing, can't you?" So for a while we did "I've Got My Mojo Working", because it was the easiest thing to do without rehearsing! And then after we got a chance to rehearse it became "I've Got to Use My Imagination", which is an old song by Gladys Knight and the Pips [and written by GERRY GOFFIN and BARRY GOLDBERG] . . . so that was fun. It was a real thrill for me to do it. I never sang for 50–80,000 people before, so I got off on it. People usually liked it . . .'

IAN McLAGAN describes the day of the opening gig, and how Dylan swapped jackets with Gregg Sutton:

> '. . . the first night . . . we played Verona, in this huge coliseum. It's bigger than the one in Rome: it's the biggest the Romans ever built. And it poured with rain. And we asked to see Him. We hadn't played, and we asked for a set list, 'cause we were nervous. It was only MICK TAYLOR, Greg[g] Sutton, another guy, and me. A very small band, and we had rehearsed, but you knew Dylan could play any one of a thousand songs. And a set list came back to us from his room, with like five songs here, another three over here, and four over here, and we were like, fuck!, well, I guess this is a set list. So the promoter, Bill Graham, brought him into the dressing room for like a bit of solidarity, and the first thing he says is: "Hey, Ian, what are they wearing?" And I said to him, "Bob, it's raining, so they're wearing raincoats. I dunno, black ones, blue ones, red ones, yellow ones . . .". So then he says: "Hey Ian, I like your shirt . . ." So I took it off and I gave it to him. And he turned to Greg[g] and said, "I like your jacket . . ." And Dylan was wearing a beautiful old Harley jacket that he'd been wearing for weeks while we rehearsed, and he hadn't taken it off. It was really old and beaten up, fabulous! And he took it off and gave it to him and took his jacket. It's just ridiculous—for him he was just making conversation, and we were trying to read in hidden meanings.'

It wasn't all a question of staring at each other from across an abyss of non-communication, at least between Dylan and Sutton, as writer Bill Zehme testifies, discussing the death of Andy Kaufman, the edgy multi-personality conceptual comedian who had starred in the hit TV series 'Taxi', who died of cancer aged 35 on May 16, 1984:

> 'Gregg Sutton, Andy's childhood friend and bandleader, was on the road in Europe with Dylan when he heard Andy had died. . . . he was crushed when he heard the news. He knew it was coming but it still devastated him, as it would, but Dylan was so respectful, apparently, of Sutton's mourning that he would sit with him. They'd ride together to and from gigs and he would talk about Andy with him and how much he dug Andy. Andy's rebellion was not lost on any genius.'

Gregg Sutton's professional connections with Kaufman had been as the comic's bandleader and musical director; he played with him at Carnegie Hall, the Huntington Hartford Theatre and on lots of Kaufman's television work.

After the Dylan tour Sutton joined LONE JUSTICE, the first new member when their line-up shifted; replacing Marvin Etzioni, he arrived too late to be involved in the sessions Dylan dropped in on (see entry on the band) but played bass for them from the time of their second album, Shelter, in 1986, until the group's demise. By 2003 Sutton was writing songs and running his own music publishing company, and recently, perhaps encouraged by the example of his old compadre Ian McLagan, he has published a book of memoirs, Here's Your Hat, What's Your Hurry? which includes chapters on Andy Kaufman and on Bob Dylan.

[Gregg Sutton, Here's Your Hat, What's Your Hurry?, Conroe, TX: Stone River Press, 2006. Sutton 'bigtime' quote and much background detail, e-mail to this writer 22 Feb 2006; other Sutton quotes from 'Brief Encounter: Greg[g] Sutton', an interview by Thomas Lasarzik, Munich, 9 Mar 1987, in The Telegraph no.27, Romford, UK, summer 1987, pp.26–29. Ian McLagan quote, interview by Kent H. Benjamin, 5 Dec 1997 for Pop Culture Press no.44. US, 1998, at www.makingtime.co.uk/rfr/macint2.htm; Bill Zehme, author of Lost in the Funhouse—The Life and Mind of Andy Kaufman, New York: Delacorte Press, nia, quoted from www.randomhouse.com/boldtype/1299/zehme/interview.html, both seen online 18 Feb 2006.]

Svensson, Christer [1946 -] Christer Svensson, born in Lund, Sweden, on February 16, 1946, brought a deep knowledge of the blues to bear on Dylan's work, shared it in correspondence with many others, and drew on it himself in a brief but important early piece, 'Stealin', Stealin'', in the short-lived UK fanzine Endless Road in 1983, having also written a series of three pieces on Dylan's harmonica playing for the same publication. Today, Christer's much-expanded Dylan harp-keys listing is on the huge musicianly website run by EYOLF ØSTREM, www.dylanchords.com.

In the 1980s Svensson had also been an entertaining correspondent to The Telegraph, writing this about Dylan fandom: 'Every now and then something happens which puts the whole business into perspective. When I played the KEITH GREEN album, with Dylan's brief harmonica solo on one track, to a fellow collector, we laughed ourselves silly. Ten dollars for a few seconds' worth of harp playing! We realised we must both be mad! Then he sent away for it too.'

[Christer Svensson: 'Inside Out and Upside Down' (3-part series), Endless Road no.2, Hull, UK, Mar 1982, no.3, Oct 1982 & no.4, Jun 1983; 'Stealin', Stealin'' also Endless Road no.4, Hull, UK Jun 1983; letter to The Telegraph republished in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, London: Futura Paperbacks edn., 1988, p.243.]

Sweden, the King of See Carl XVI Gustav of Sweden.

symbolist poets, French, the See French symbolists poets, the.

Tackett, Fred [1945 -] Frederick Tackett was born in Little Rock, Arkansas, on August 4, 1945, into a family in which, he says, everyone played the trumpet ‘’cept Mom’. He had been writing songs for Little Feat, and playing on their recordings, ever since 1972 and finally became a member of the group in 1987, just in time to play on their album Let It Roll. In 1967 he moved to LA to link up with Jimmy Webb, an old friend of his, and duly became an LA session guitarist, mandolinist and, yes, trumpet player.

He went out on the road with Boz Scaggs to promote the Silk Degrees album (infinitely inferior to, and more popular than, Scaggs’ début album on Atlantic), and spent a year on the road with BOB SEGER. He spent a lot longer than that with Bob Dylan, working on the road and in the studio, starting with the late 1979 first gospel tour: 26 concerts, starting in San Francisco on November 1 and finishing in Tucson, Arizona, on December 5. He didn’t play trumpet or mandolin, but he was the lead guitarist. He also played on the NBC ‘Saturday Night Live’ TV show just ahead of the tour, that October 20 and on the Grammy Awards TV show on February 27, 1980 live in LA and shown live coast-to-coast on CBS-TV—by which time Tackett and the rest of the group had played the first 1980 gospel tour leg (January 11 in Portland, Oregon, through to February 9 in Charleston, West Virginia) and recorded the Saved album at Muscle Shoals in Sheffield, Alabama.

That spring, the next gospel tour began, with Tackett still in place, running from Toronto on April 17 through to Dayton, Ohio, on May 21: another 29 concerts. The Saved album was released that June 20, and three months later, on September 23, Fred Tackett joined Dylan, JENNIFER WARNES and a dog to record an early attempt at ‘Every Grain of Sand’—a track issued ten years later on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3—and a still-uncirculated try at a song called ‘Her Memory’. Immediately after that came rehearsals for the last 1980 tour, the ‘Musical Retrospective’ tour, including a recorded rehearsal that captures several of Dylan’s great unreleased 1980s songs—‘Yonder Comes Sin’ (this cut used as a Special Rider music publishing demo), ‘Caribbean Wind’ and ‘Let’s Keep It Between Us’—as well as further new songs and try-outs of ‘Mr. Tambourine Man’ and ‘Blowin’ in the Wind’. The tour itself, with Tackett now on mandolin as well as lead guitar, began on November 9 with 12 nights in San Francisco followed by a further seven concerts in five cities: Tucson, San Diego, Seattle, and Salem and Portland, Oregon, ending there on December 4.

T

Fred Tackett seems to have missed the first studio sessions for Shot of Love, held in Santa Monica in March 1981 and yielding the recording of ‘Angelina’ released ten years later, but he arrived at the sessions of April 1 & 2, and reappeared on April 28 & 29 (none of these yielded anything that has been released), and then during the first half of May, from which the finished album’s tracks all derive, along with the ‘Let It Be Me’ sung by Dylan and CLYDIE KING and released as a European B-side, and the cut of ‘Groom’s Still Waiting at the Altar’ released as a US B-side and later incorporated into the CD reissue of the album itself. It may be that Dylan was unhappy with Tackett’s guitarwork on some of these tracks: in mid-May David Campbell put guitar overdubs onto ‘Lenny Bruce’ and on May 31 guitarist Andrew Gold put overdubs onto ‘Watered-Down Love’, ‘Property of Jesus’, ‘Shot of Love’ and ‘Every Grain of Sand’.

Fred Tackett played live with Dylan throughout the 1981 tours, all the same: the US warm-up dates in early June, the European dates in June and July, and the fall dates in North America, starting in Milwaukee on October 16 and finishing in Lakeland, Florida, on November 21. That was his last Dylan concert; he’d played a total of 152.

Today he and guitarist-singer Paul Barrere work together as an acoustic duo.

[Fred Tackett, quote on trumpets & Mom from PR blurb for Barrere & Tackett, seen online 11 Nov 2005 at www.skylineonline.com.]

Talkin’ Bob Zimmerman Blues See Styble, Bryan.

‘Tangled Up in Blue’ [1975] This opening song from Blood on the Tracks deals with the way in which many forces—past upon present, public upon privacy, distance upon friendship, disintegration upon love—are further tangled and reprocessed by time. It’s a scintillating account of a career and a love affair and of how they intertwine. It becomes a viable history of 15 years through one man’s eyes, and in its realism and mental alertness it offers a vigorous challenge to all the poses of wasted decay that most ‘intelligent’ rock has been marketing since the fall from grace of 1960s optimism.

As it would need to be, Dylan’s writing here is chiseled by the full concentration of his artistry. He can coin a new mode of expression with an almost in-passing agility—‘Later on when the crowd thinned out / I was about to do the same’—and there is the wit, tossed out as if it were easy, and there too is the bubbling spontaneity that Dylan achieves within the disciplined limits of a strikingly precise verse-structure.

(The deft trick of Dylan's formulation here is reminiscent of something that Colin Wilson, in The Outsider, 1956, picks out of Jean-Paul Sartre's first novel La Nausée [Nausea], 1937, in which the narrator says of a café patron that 'When his place empties, his head empties also.')

Dylan makes the exacting verse structure work for him so well. There is, for instance, a rhyming spill-over towards the end of each verse, like this: 'I was standin' on the side of the road / Rain fallin' on my shoes / Headin' out for the east coast / Lord knows I paid some dues / Getting through / Tangled up in blue.' It is there as that fourth line (rhyming with the second) spills over into the short fifth line (which rhymes with the sixth). As we listen to the song, these short spill-overs become more and more stabbing in their emotional effect as they become at the same time more and more agile and clever as rhymes. As here: 'She studied the lines of my face / I must admit I felt a little uneasy / When she bent down to tie the lace- / -s of my shoe—/ Tangled up in blue'; and finally, triumphantly, here in the last verse: 'But me I'm still on the road / Headin' for another joint / We always did feel the same / We just saw it from a different point / Of view—/ Tangled up in blue.'

Beyond that wonderful use of a formal, limiting shape and structure to yield scintillating leaps of feeling and expression, 'Tangled Up in Blue' contains a whole assortment of verbal spikes and explosions that all operate not as distractions from the main body of feeling in the song but as ways of evoking the emotional complexity and urgency of it all. That Dylan can make time, in the course of what is delivered as a fast, breathless narrative, for flashes like this—'I had a job in the Great North Woods . . . / But I never did like it all that much / And one day the axe just fell'—shows an alertness and mental dexterity that augments the emotional seriousness and depth of the song. And there is an accompanying dexterity of sketching in, quick as a flash, a whole range of universally recognizable moments in fresh, intensely accurate strokes of language, from the evoked dialogue with inbuilt self-mockery here—'She lit a burner on the stove / And offered me a pipe / "I thought you'd never say hello," she said / "You look like the silent type"'—to the very funny sureness of touch in this summary of that common feeling of whatever-happened-to-those people: 'Some are mathematicians / Some are carpenters' wives / Dunno how it all got started / I dunno what they're doin' with their lives', where that last line communicates the inevitable ambiguity of feeling—sadness at time's destruction of friendships and at the same time, truly, an indifference to where or what those people are now.

The song is also highly valued by post-structuralist critics, because, more than any other single Dylan song, it is not a single Dylan song. It is a living demonstration of how unfixed 'the text' is. It occupies a special position among Dylan's many 'nonlinear narratives' (in AIDAN DAY's phrase), firing up postmodern questions about how we see the individual and the self. It doesn't have a fixed or clearly identifiable voice telling a clear sequential story, and so it reflects, Day argues, the non-linear (tangled up) way the human brain is currently thought to perceive and interpret the world in front of it and the past behind it. Day's concern here is for 'lyrics which open out into an exploration of the workings of the psyche as a whole'.

One of the song's indeterminacies is the shifting between 'I', 'he' and 'you'; and Day argues that as the lyric splits its 'I' into an 'I' and a 'he', and splits its 'she' into what may be a series of shes and into 'she' and 'you', this creates an important effect:

> 'Considerable inventive effort on the part of the reader is provoked whether the lyric is taken either as one story or as a series of stories. Co-operation in the making of the story may be demanded of the reader of any narrative. The specially modernist feature of "Tangled Up in Blue" is that the fragmentation of linear structure, together with the indeterminacy generated by that fragmentation about whether we are in the presence of one or more stories, encourages specific awareness of the creative role of the audience in reading or hearing narrative . . . teasing us into generating story, "Tangled Up in Blue" also explores the extent to which the mind is fundamentally disposed to think in terms of story or narrative. The conscious self is inseparable from the stories of its own life that it ceaselessly recites, however silently, to itself. . . . in the same way cultures frame themselves through myths of origin, through histories and through fictions of the future . . . the subject of the lyric is in one sense the inescapability of the narrative impulse itself. But more than this, in its disturbance of narrative order the lyric simultaneously inquires into the possibility of something beyond such order.'

Comparably, the song excites NEIL CORCORAN because it explicitly declares its own open-endedness (making it a self-referring, or self-reflexive, text). He writes that the song 'encodes an account of itself in its own variations; it becomes an allegory of its own procedures. Keeping on keeping on, getting on the train and riding, staying on the road and heading towards the sun become not only the activities recommended by the song, but what the song . . . does; it changes, it adapts, it refuses the consolations of the finished in favour of a poetics of process, of constant renewal, of performance rather than publication. Recommending the provisional as an ethic, it also embodies it as an aesthetic.'

Dylan re-wrote the 'She opened up a book of poems' verse towards the end of his 1978 world tour, changing it to 'She opened up the Bible and started quotin' it to me', so that it became, thereby, one of his first public suggestions of having converted to Christ; then he re-wrote the song wholesale for the 1984 tour of Europe, not merely re-writing lines of lyric but restructuring the whole song (a braggadocio version of the re-write is on the album Real Live); but ever afterwards Dylan reverted to the earlier structure and the original lyric (with minor variations), and devoted himself to making it one of his most over-performed repertoire items.

By the end of 1998 it was his most-performed post-1960s song, and his sixth most-performed number altogether, behind five songs from the previous decade, 'All Along the Watchtower', 'Like a Rolling Stone', 'Maggie's Farm', 'It Ain't Me, Babe' and 'Mr. Tambourine Man'. It far out-stripped renditions of even so over-visited a 1970s song as 'Forever Young'. To that point, Dylan had sung 'Tangled Up in Blue' 634 times in the 23 years of its existence—and, not surprisingly, sung it so unfeelingly so often that it has spoiled, for many admirers of his work, even the early studio versions of what was once a major work of consequence and delight. As the Monthly Film Bulletin comments somewhere in a different context, 'It's not the familiar which breeds contempt but the debasement of the familiar.'

[Aidan Day: Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, 1989. Neil Corcoran, 'Going Barefoot: Thinking About Bob Dylan's Lyrics', The Telegraph no.27, Romford, UK, summer 1987. Bob Dylan: 'Tangled Up in Blue' containing 'She opened up the Bible' first performed Houston, TX, 26 Nov 1978. Performance statistics from Glen Dundas: Tangled Up in Tapes, 4th edn., 1999.]

Tarantula* [1971] Dylan's first published book (not counting songbooks issued by music publishers), this 'novel' was written during the tumult of 1965–66 but unpublished until 1971. In the interim Dylan tended to suggest, when asked, that Tarantula had only ever been cynically thrown together scraps of nonsense. This was untrue, as shown by the careful revisions Dylan made to an earlier manuscript version of his book, Tarantula Meets Rex Paste, which, dated 1965, was never published but was circulated on primitive roneo'd sheets. The finished version was first published by the New York office of Macmillan's, which had long trumpeted the book and pained Dylan in advance by floating absurd PR comparisons between him and James Joyce.

A singular item in, but an honourable part of, Bob Dylan's work, Tarantula combines lengthy prose-poem sections broken up by shorter, more readily comprehensible passages in the form of comic letters written by, and addressed to, different sharply drawn, vividly recognisable kinds of contemporary people: mostly risibly shallow young ones (Dylan has an excellent ear for their voices).

Both parts of the book draw heavily upon the oeuvre of THE BEATS—the 'letters' perhaps especially seeming to echo some of the work of KENNETH PATCHEN and GREGORY CORSO. But the long prose-poem sections are also awash in slick, playful allusions to, and puns upon, a vast range of books, films and other items sucked inside the knowing maw of Anglo-American culture, from the blues to nursery rhymes ('would you like to buy a pail, jack?', 'ring around the rosey', 'the candle-stick maker', 'swap that cow') to Davy Crockett's hat and from T.S. ELIOT to the I Ching. The book is fitfully, exhilaratingly acute about greed, corruption, manipulation, ugliness and threats to the social fabric.

Tarantula has been more than somewhat unattended by critics. Exceptions to this neglect include Elia Katz' interesting 1969 article 'Dylan's unpublished novel' (reprinted as 'Tarantula: A Perspective' in 1972) and Gabrielle Goodchild's unpublished essay 'Tarantula: Tangled Up in a Web', 1979, which was written as background material for ROBERT SHELTON's No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan but published in cut-down form as 'Tarantula: The Web Untangled' in the slim volume Conclusions on the Wall in 1980, long before Shelton's book appeared.

Perhaps appropriately, fragments of some previously unpublished parts of Goodchild's original essay then emerged inside Shelton's book, in which he also ventures the claim that while 'the Left was vexed with Dylan for not having made more overt comments on the Vietnam War, we find a great deal of that war in the book. Goodchild holds it as a surrealist sort of "war" going on "beyond our control and yet poisoning our lives."'

Dylan's novel is also well-attended to, though in note form, in 'Tarantula: Commentary and Textual Allusions', in Bob Dylan's Words, edited by RICHARD DAVID WISSOLIK & SCOTT McGRATH—except that it is blind to the many blues references in the book, and you must put up with this sort of thing: 'complete appreciation of Tarantula and the rest of Dylan's work is not possible without knowledge of the I Ching, Tarot symbolism and Robert Graves' White Goddess'—at which you have to laugh, especially since one of the typically funny fragments inside Tarantula itself is this: 'to my students: I take it for granted that youve all read & understand freud—dostoevsky—st. michael—confucius—coco joe—einstein—melville—porgy snaker—john zulu . . . the exam will be in two weeks—everybody has to bring their own eraser. your professor herold the professor').

This last book includes too Scott McGrath's essay 'Only a Matter of Time 'Til Night Comes Stepping In', 1993, which 'finds' in Tarantula a previously 'unknown poem', titled by McGrath 'To Maria'. That is: 'Seemingly incidental Spanish phrases are peppered throughout Dylan's novel. . . . Put together and translated into English, the individual hidden phrases, all of which appear in chapters with the name "Maria" in the title, form the . . . poem.' This enterprising exercise seems justified by a plausible result.

In 1994 came The Cracked Bells: A Guide to 'Tarantula', by ROBIN WITTING, which attempts an annotating of the text similar to that by Wissolik & McGrath but taking the text section by section (rather than listing text-fragments alphabetically), and, naturally, honing in on different words, phrases and names for elucidation. Self-published from Scunthorpe in South Humberside, UK, the revised edition of 1995 is a large-format book of almost 200 pages.

In 1999 a Swedish edition of Tarantula was published, with an afterword in English as well as Swedish: 'The Art of Reading Tarantula', by one Peter Glas. This schoolmasterly six-page piece never fears to state the obvious and to explain it to the beginner, but in doing so it reminds us usefully that, at base, 'Tarantula is Dylan's most thorough description of chaos. It is the same chaos that he describes in songs like "Subterranean Homesick Blues" . . . but Tarantula is the magnum opus of Dylan's chaos vision.' He goes on to argue that the book is rich, cliché-free, tough-minded and original, and that it is distinguished from the works of Joyce and of the absurdists and Beats by its hopefulness—and that Dylan's vividly rendered chaos, as captured in Tarantula, 'marks the starting point of Dylan's dynamic quest, spanning decades, for . . . structure . . . for truth and meaning in life.'

Most recently, Robin Witting has returned to the Tarantula fray by offering the 80-page book/booklet 'Tarantula': The Falcon's Mouthbook, arguing that Dylan's novel is, from first to last, concerned with the religious and spiritual ramifications of 'oral obsession': from which it follows that Witting too refutes by exegesis any claim that the text of Tarantula was uncalculatingly assembled or thoughtless. More generally, Witting also points up, and protests at, the way that this unique piece of Dylan's work has been neglected. Witting writes: 'Tarantula cannot be ignored forever; all these years on and still hardly anyone seems to have a good word for it . . . I still believe that [it] is a beautiful, dazzling creation; an orphan sonnet disinherited by its author.'

Certainly, granted that Tarantula comes from the very period in Dylan's creative life that most people value the most—the era of Highway 61 Revisited and Blonde on Blonde, the voice of 'She's Your Lover Now'—it's remarkable how much his audience too has neglected this orphan.

[Bob Dylan: Tarantula, New York: Macmillan & London: MacGibbon & Kee, 1971; newest paperback edn., London: Harper Perennial, 2005. Elia Katz: 'Dylan's unpublished novel', Carolina Quarterly no.21, fall 1969, reprinted as 'Tarantula: A Perspective' in Stephen Pickering: Praxis: One, Santa Cruz, CA: No Limit, 1972. Gabrielle Goodchild: 'Tarantula: Tangled Up in a Web', London, unpublished, 1979, published (cut down) as 'Tarantula: The Web Untangled', Conclusions on the Wall, ed. Elizabeth M. Thomson, Prestwich, UK: Thin Man, 1980. Goodchild quotes within Shelton, London: Penguin Books edn., pp.236–38; Shelton quote, ditto p.236. (Shelton mentions too a Stephen Pickering essay, 'The Two Tarantulas: A Textual Comparison', but this writer has been unable to trace it.) Wissolik & McGrath, Bob Dylan's Words, Greensburg, PA: Eadmer Press, 1994. Peter Glas: 'The Art of Reading Tarantula', in Tarantula, Lund, Sweden: Bakhåll, 1999. Robin Witting: The Cracked Bells: A Guide to 'Tarantula', Scunthorpe, UK: Exploding Rooster Books, 1994, revised edn., 1995; 'Tarantula': The Falcon's Mouthbook, ditto, 2005.]

Tarlton, Jimmie [1892 - 1979] See 'Columbus Stockade Blues' [1960].

Taylor, Mick [1949 -] Michael Kevin Taylor was born in Welwyn Garden City, southern England, on January 17, 1949, and grew up in the nearby and equally benighted Hatfield to become, except for a brief patch around 1972, one of the world's most boring lead guitarists. Perhaps it was because THE ROLLING STONES wanted somebody pliant after the nightmare that was Brian Jones left the group in June 1969 that they replaced him with Mick Taylor, who left JOHN MAYALL's Bluesbreakers in order to join. (Jones left with the quaint understatement to the press: 'I no longer see eye to eye with the others over the discs we are cutting', and added that he was to form a new group of his own; on July 3, he was found drowned in Winnie the Pooh's swimming pool.) Taylor stood around not letting the madness and superstardom of the world's greatest rock band get him too excited—though he played on the studio albums Sticky Fingers (for which he woke up, contributing beautiful, resonant, indelible lines to this, their best album), Exile on Main Street, Goats Head Soup and It's Only Rock and Roll—and remained in place until the end of 1974, when he quit. Expecting, like ERIC CLAPTON perhaps, to become a solo star afterwards, Taylor was surprised to find this not happening. His solo albums have been Mick Taylor (1979), the live Stranger in This Town (1990), A Stone's Throw (2000, which includes a version of 'Blind Willie McTell') and 14 Below (2003). He and Carla Olson made a live album together in 1991, Too Hot for Snakes.

In 1983 Taylor was called in to work on Dylan's Infidels album as another guitarist alongside MARK KNOPFLER, and he not only sleepwalked through all the April sessions but in May overdubbed further guitar-work onto several tracks. He is also credited with playing at the Empire Burlesque session, probably in December 1984, that gave us 'Tight Connection to My Heart'.

Earlier that year, just after Dylan had been playing with edgy stripped-down punk group THE PLUGZ, he disappointed everyone by chickening out of taking them on the road for his 1984 European tour but resorting to a safe concoction of mostly music biz veteran players, in the midst of which was Mick Taylor, who, blonde, supercilious, pudgy faced and stolid as blancmange, strolled through the tour's 27 concerts as bored as he deserved to be.

[Mick Taylor: Mick Taylor, CBS 82600, UK, 1979; Stranger in This Town, Maze, nia, 1990; A Stone's Throw, Cannonball, nia, 2000; 14 Below, Pilot PLO0000175, US, 2003. Carla Olson & Mick Taylor: Too Hot for Snakes, Razor & Tie, nia, 1991.]

Tedeschi, David [1962 -] David Tedeschi was born in 1962 in Chicago. He is the film editor whose work resulted in the brilliant 2005 MARTIN SCORSESE film release No Direction Home. Scorsese's input as regards the editing was far less intensive than Tedeschi's, which is why Tedeschi's name is so prominent on the credits. He had worked with Scorsese before, on the 'Feel Like Going Home' episode of the TV series 'The Blues' in 2003.

David Tedeschi has worked as a writer in films as well as an editor; the 1993 film 8-A, directed by Orlando Jiménez Leal, a documentary reconstruction of the 1989 trial and execution of Cuba's General Arnaldo Ochoa Sanchez (one of Castro's original revolutionary heroes), was co-written by Tedeschi, Jose Hugez and the director. Tedeschi also co-wrote the 1999 film My Friend Paul with independent film-maker and director Jonathan Berman. As an editor Tedeschi's credits start with the 1994 Guatemalan film El Silencio de Neto, directed by Luis Argueta, and include the 'TV Nation' television series in 1996. Since No Direction Home he has worked on El Cantante, directed by Leon Ichaso (and co-starring Jennifer Lopez), a drama based on the life Hector Lavoe, who launched the salsa movement in 1975 and brought it to the United States.

Interviewed online by the Washington Post about his work on No Direction Home, he said of it: 'The editing is all intuitive. The editing is emotional.' Asked if he had been a Dylan fan before he worked on the film, and if so how that affected the editing, Tedeschi replied: 'I was a big Bob Dylan fan and I was also a big fan of GINSBERG and KEROUAC. I'm not sure it affected the editing process except that I know we all felt like it was important to do a good job on the film because of how great an artist Bob Dylan is.'

His co-interviewee, the film's producer Susan Lacy, when asked if there were plans for a follow-up documentary, focussing on Dylan's later career, replied: 'We are having preliminary discussions about that.'

[Washington Post interview online 28 Sep 2005, transcript seen online 1 Feb 2006. Main source the IMDb film database & David Tedeschi, e-mails to this writer, 4 & 7 Feb 2006.]

Telegraph, The [fanzine] See Bauldie, John [1981–1996].

telegraphy and the religious imagination On the ponderous, musically monotonous Empire Burlesque track 'Something's Burning, Baby' (1985), a song that on the record and the page seems like Dylan on Mogadon, one of the more mysterious, compelling lines is the penultimate one: 'Ring down when you're ready, baby, I'm waiting for you'.

That 'ring down' implies 'from up above', which is to say from heaven, yet 'baby' is too familiar a form of address to be directed at God, even for Dylan. Is the song addressing someone who has died? Was it a funeral pyre right in front of his eyes?

Yet 'ring down when you're ready, baby, I'm waiting for you' is not a vague image alone in the world of song but one that echoes blues and gospel songs that have gone before it. In context, then, Dylan's line is not strange at all. In 1927, Papa Harvey Hull & Long Cleve Reed recorded 'Hey! Lawdy Mama—The France Blues', which assembled many traditional song-fragments and collided them together, and includes this couplet: 'Hello heaven, daddy want to give you a telephone / So you can talk to your daddy any time when he's gone.' The same year, 1927, also offered the Rev. Sister Mary Nelson's 'The Royal Telephone' (recalled and recorded nearly 40 years later for the Library of Congress by MISSISSIPPI JOHN HURT); in 1929 came Blind Roosevelt Graves' recording of 'Telephone to Glory'. (These telephone-to-heaven images were not restricted to black performance. In the early 1950s HANK SNOW cut the religious song 'I Just Telephone Upstairs'.)

One of the most remarkable uses of this image occurs in a 'Negro Spiritual' text called 'Tone the Bell Easy', which is a version of one of the songs from Bob Dylan's first album, 'In My Time of Dyin'', more usually called 'Jesus Make Up My Dyin' Bed' and associated with CHARLEY PATTON, BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON and many gospel groups. The chorus of the 'Tone the Bell Easy' text runs 'Well well well / Tone the bell easy' (repeated twice) 'Jesus gonna make up my dyin' bed', the second verse brings in Mary and Martha (as 'Ring Them Bells' does, of course) and then, in amongst this timeless scene, verse eight picks up the telephone: 'Ever since me and Jesus been married / We haven't been a minute apart / He put the receiver in my hand / And the Holy Ghost in my heart / Well well well, so I can call up Jesus . . .'

This is all part of what seems a rather naff kind of standard God-bothering rhetoric: part of the familiar recruiting ploy of 'it's-hip-to-be-Christian-cos-we're-jolly-modern'. 'Telephone to Glory', and the still more gruesome 'Ain't Gonna Lay My Receiver Down', are all of a piece with preposterous songs like 'Jesus Is My Air-O-Plane' by Mother McCollum (1930). Yet it isn't only Christians who go in for this sort of thing. In Martyrs Square, Damascus, a black bronze colonnade offers a massive and splendidly pompous commemoration of the opening of the Middle East's first telegraph link: a hotline from Damascus to Medina, home of God's prophet Mohammed. The colonnade rises up 20 feet above its tall plinth, festooned in sculpted wires and loops of sculpted cable, topped by a model of a mosque. There is, then, something about telegraphy that excites the religious imagination east and west alike.

In the end, its plausibility is all in the fine-tuning of words. There's nothing risible about 'People get ready, there's a train a-coming', or 'This Train Is Bound for Glory', or Slow Train Coming, yet a title like 'Life's Railway to Heaven' invites immediate mockery. (This song was recorded in the 1920s by the extraordinarily named black artist Hermes Zimmerman.)

There are, on other subjects, many entertaining titles provided by pre-war gospel songs and records of hot-shot preachers' sermons with accompaniments by their congregations. Among them you'll find 'Christ Was Born on Christmas Morn', 'Hell Is God's Chain Gang', 'Smoking Woman in the Street', 'The Black Camel of Death', 'The Fat Life Will Bring You Down', 'Must I Be Carried to the Sky on Flowered Beds of Ease' and, a favourite from 1931, 'He Came to Town Riding on His Ass'.

[Papa Harvey Hull & Long Cleve Rede: 'Hey! Lawdy Mama—The France Blues', Chicago, c.8 Apr 1927; Really! The Country Blues, Origin Jazz Library OJL-2, NY, c.1961. Rev. Sister Mary M. Nelson: 'The Royal Telephone', Chicago, 25 Feb 1927 (& poss. NY, 21 Apr 1927); CD-reissued Memphis Gospel: Complete Recorded Works (1927–1929), Document DOCD-5072, Vienna, c.1991. Mississippi John Hurt: 'Royal Telephone', Washington, D.C., 23 Jul 1963, unissued. Blind Roosevelt Graves & Brother (Uaroy Graves): 'Telephone to Glory', Richmond, IN, 20 Sep 1929. This song was also cut as 'I'm Going to Telephone to Glory' by, for example, the Heavenly Gospel Singers, Charlotte, NC, 13 Feb 1936. Hank Snow: 'I Just Telephone Upstairs', nia; CD-reissued The Singing Ranger—I'm Movin' On' (4-CD set), Bear Family BCD 15426-DH, Vollersode, Germany, c.1990.

'Tone the Bell Easy' text taken (& de-minstrelised) from H.A. Chambers, ed, The Treasury of Negro Spirituals, London: Blandford Press, 1964.

Mitchell's Christian Singers: 'Ain't Gonna Lay My Receiver Down', NY, 28 Dec 1938. Mother McCollum: 'Jesus Is My Air-O-Plane', Chicago, c.Jun 1930; CD-reissued Guitar Evangelists: Complete Recorded Works (1928–1951), Document DOCD-5101, Vienna, c.1989. Hermes Zimmerman (no relation): 'Life's Railway to Heaven', prob. NY, c.Apr 1926; prob. vinyl unissued.

Cotton Top Mountain Sanctified Singers: 'Christ Was Born on Christmas Morn', Chicago, 29 Aug 1929. Rev. J.M. Gates: 'Smoking Woman in the Street', Atlanta, GA, 23 Aug 1939; Rev. J.M. Milton: 'The Black Camel of Death', Atlanta, 5 Nov 1929. Rev. A.W. Nix: 'The Fat Life Will Bring You Down', Chicago, Jan 1930. Leadbelly: 'Must I Be Carried to the Sky on Flowered Beds of Ease', field-recorded for the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., 23 Aug 1940. Rev. Emmett Dickinson & His Congregation: 'He Came to Town Riding on His Ass', NY, 10 Oct 1931.]

Tench, Benmont [1953 -] Benjamin Montmorency Tench III was born in Gainesville, Florida, on September 7, 1953. Like fellow-Gainesvillean TOM PETTY, he was a member of the band Mudhutch, and was responsible for bringing MIKE CAMPBELL into that precursor outfit to TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS. His keyboard-work has not only been crucial to that mega-platinum rock group but has also contributed to a staggering number of albums by other artists, including work by ELVIS COSTELLO, THE ROLLING STONES, BRIAN WILSON, Crosby, Stills & Nash, the Ramones, ROY ORBISON and Aretha Franklin.

More to the point, he has done session work for Dylan, and like Mike Campbell, his time in the studio with Dylan long preceded the touring with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers. In fact Benmont Tench was the first of the Heartbreakers to do sessions for Dylan, for the album that became Shot of Love. His first seems to have been on April 23, 1981, when on a long Los Angeles session with some of the musicians from Dylan's just-completed gospel tours, Tench was brought in to play keyboards on a number of tracks including three never issued but since circulated, namely 'Magic', 'Don't Ever Take Yourself Away' and 'Mystery Train', plus a number of uncirculated takes of 'Don't Ever Take Yourself Away', 'Trouble', 'Shot of Love', 'Half as Much', 'Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar', 'Dead Man, Dead Man', 'Heart of Mine' and 'You Changed My Life', plus a further take of 'You Changed My Life' which, though omitted from the album as released later that year, was issued a decade later on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3. The following day the same musicians tried 'Magic' and other material again; nothing from this session has emerged.

Benmont Tench was back in the studio on April 27, 1981, and this time Mike Campbell was there too. For details see the entry on the latter. Ditto for the Hollywood sessions of December 1984 at which Dylan attempted 'New Danville Girl' and others. On May 1, 1981, however, Tench alone from among the Heartbreakers was in the studio again with Dylan playing on various uncirculated numbers—'Caribbean Wind', 'Dead Man, Dead Man', 'It's All Dangerous to Me', 'My Oriental Home',

'Ah, Ah, Ah' and 'Don't Let Her Know' (some titles are speculative)—but also on the successful takes of the fine Motownesque 'Watered-Down Love' and the churning 'Property of Jesus' released on the Shot of Love album and on the lovely devotional version of 'Let It Be Me', sung by Dylan and CLYDIE KING and released as a single in Europe. Next day Benmont Tench was also there, this time playing on four successful Shot of Love album tracks, 'Dead Man, Dead Man', 'Lenny Bruce' (on which he plays organ), 'Trouble' and 'In the Summertime'. He is also credited on www.bobdylan.com with having played organ on the album cut of 'Every Grain of Sand'.

Tench was absent from the sessions Campbell and HOWIE EPSTEIN attended in January and February 1985, so that his next work with Dylan was rehearsing for, and then performing at, the Farm Aid Benefit Concert in Champaign, Illinois, that September. After that came the 1986 tour, the 'Band of the Hand' recording session in Australia and the 1987 tour, all accomplished within Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers.

In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan remembers that on the 1986 tour it was Benmont Tench in particular who tried to encourage him to broaden the concert repertoire he had settled on: '[He] . . . would always be asking me, almost pleadingly, about including different numbers in the show. "Chimes of Freedom"—can we try that? Or what about "My Back Pages"? Or "Spanish Harlem Incident"? And I'd always be making some lame excuse.' Tench felt far less jaundiced about it all, saying once: 'He's been great to play with. Great fun as well, mostly because you can never let your mind drift. He'll give the most familiar song an odd twist; a change of rhythm or a peculiar delivery. Playing with Bob Dylan certainly gives you a good kick up the arse.'

The last shared concerts the band and Dylan gave were 16 years after this, at Holmdel, New Jersey, in August 2003; but in Benmont Tench's case, there was one extra conjunction with Dylan, a decade earlier. When Dylan appeared as a guest on the TV Special 'WILLIE NELSON: The Big Six O' recorded in Austin, Texas, on April 28, 1993, after Dylan had performed 'Hard Times' with his own Never-Ending Tour band, he and Nelson together performed the Townes Van Zandt song 'Pancho & Lefty' using Nelson's band of the day—and these musicians included the irrepressible Benmont Tench on keyboards.

[Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, pp.148–49. 'Willie Nelson: The Big Six O: An All-Star Birthday Celebration', Austin, TX, Apr 28, 1993, shown CBS-TV, 22 May 1993; video release Columbia House 11141, Jun 1993. Tench on Dylan quote seen online 25 Oct 2005 at http://frontpage.simnet.is/bobdylan/friends.htm.]

Terry, Sonny [1911 - 1986] Saunders Terrell was born on October 24, 1911 in Greensboro, North Carolina. He went blind in one eye at the age of 5, and in the other at 18. He played harmonica on the streets for money, and met and recorded with BLIND BOY FULLER in 1937. He appeared at JOHN HAMMOND's 1938 Spirituals to Swing Concert at Carnegie Hall, singing and playing harp accompanied by Bull City Red; his solo studio début was the following day, Christmas Eve, in New York, for the Library of Congress, at which he recorded several takes of that harmonica-showcase piece 'Lost John' (which Dylan tried to approximate with 'Long John' on the privately-recorded December 22 1961 performance in Minneapolis). Four days later came a commercial session for Columbia, on which he was billed as Sanders Terry. He met the Tennessee-born guitarist BROWNIE McGHEE in North Carolina in 1939 and off and on they worked together for 40 years thereafter. (For relevant information on the duo and its relevance to Bob Dylan, see the entry on McGhee.)

Terry was the cruder singer of the two but his harp playing was dazzling: always a virtuoso display of explosive effects, surprises and agility. After moving to New York City in the early 1940s and mixing in the same musical and political circles as WOODY GUTHRIE and LEADBELLY, Terry played in the New York production of Finian's Rainbow and, with McGhee, both appeared in Tennessee Williams' Cat on a Hot Tin Roof. The duo split up after years of acrimony (sometimes displayed onstage in the midst of their act), after which Terry's career was the shorter-lived but the more successful. He even collaborated with, and held his own against, Johnny Winter, on the 1981 album Whoopin', on which the two (plus Willie Dixon) went for an ostentatiously more abrasive sound that was, as Tony Russell puts it, 'not like Terry & McGhee but Little Walter & MUDDY WATERS.'

Sonny Terry died in Mineola, New York on March 11, 1986.

[Sonny Terry: 'Mountain Blues' & 'The New John Henry', NY 23 Dec 1938, Spirituals to Swing Concert at Carnegie Hall, Vanguard VRS8524, nia; 'Lost John', NY, 24 Dec 1938. Sonny Terry & Johnny Winter, Whoopin', NY Jul 1981, Albino MA501, nia; CD-reissued Alligator 4734, US, 1990. Bob Dylan: 'Long John', Minneapolis, 22 Dec 1961, unreleased. Tony Russell, The Blues From Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, London: Aurum Press, 1997, p.63.]

Them See Morrison, Van.

'Things Have Changed' [2000] This may be the only popular song that alludes to the work of both Percy Bysshe Shelley and Duane Eddy.

When the lyric refers to walking 'forty miles of bad road', it is yet another ready-made phrase from the pre-Dylan era of popular music. It was the title of one of Duane Eddy's biggest hit singles, so named after Eddy and his producer, Lee Hazlewood, overheard the phrase used in an argument between two Texans while standing in line to see a movie. 'Your girl had a face like forty miles of bad road,' said one. Hazlewood immediately recognised the phrase as a perfect title for one of Eddy's trademark tough but simple instrumentals.

[Duane Eddy title information from undated interview with Eddy by Spencer Leigh in Baby, That Is Rock and Roll: American Pop 1954–1963, p.166–67.]

'This Train (Is Bound for Glory)' The title of WOODY GUTHRIE's autobiography, Bound for Glory, is a quote from the old gospel song that runs 'This train is bound for glory / This train.' The song was a standard performance item for pre-war black gospel quartets, recorded by, among others, the catchily named Florida Normal & Industrial Institute Quartette (as 'Dis Train', NY, early September 1922), Bryants Jubilee Quartet (NY, March 20, 1931, as by the [Famous] Garland Jubilee Singers) and, prominently, by Sister Rosetta Tharpe (originally NY, January 10, 1939), who re-cut it several times post-war. Her 1947 version was a hit on the 'race' charts. Post-Guthrie it has been recorded by everyone from PETER, PAUL & MARY to Bunny Wailer. It is also one of the songs to which Bob Dylan refers so poignantly within his own lyrics on 1997's Time Out of Mind. 'Tryin' to Get to Heaven' incorporates the wistful lines 'Some trains don't pull no gamblers / No midnight ramblers, like they used to do.'

'This Train' became secularised into the Little Walter hit 'My Babe', 'written' by Willie Dixon, and is also the basis for Curtis Mayfield's 'PEOPLE GET READY', which uses the same train image to stand for the coming of the Lord.

[Sister Rosetta Tharpe: 'This Train', NY, 1 Jul 1947, Decca 48043 (78rpm), NY, 1947. Little Walter: 'My Babe', Chicago, 25 Jan 1955, Checker 811, Chicago, 1955.]

'This Wheel's on Fire' [1967] See 'wheels of fire'.

Thomas, Henry [c.1874 - c.1930?] The biography of Henry 'Ragtime Texas' Thomas remains shadowy, though the once-general suggestion that he was born around 1874 seems to have firmed up into a definite date. A birthplace of Big Sandy, East Texas (a small town about 40 miles west of Shreveport, Louisiana), has also been claimed less and less tentatively, and that he was one of nine children and ran away from home to avoid farm-work.

The date 1874 fits well with his 19th century repertoire. He would have been in his early 50s by the time he recorded (which was always in Chicago), and one of his last recordings, 'Railroadin' Some', does offer a travel itinerary that is likely to be based on his own experience; in Dave Oliphant's words it 'includes Texas towns like Rockwall, Greenville (with its infamous sign, "Land of the Blackest Earth and the Whitest People"), Denison, Grand Saline, Silver Lake, Mineola, Tyler . . . Longview, Jefferson, Marshall, Little Sandy, and his birthplace of Big Sandy.'

Tony Russell's finely sculpted paragraph on Henry Thomas in The Blues—From Robert Johnson to Robert Cray, 1997, says that his 'springy guitar-playing, probably inspired by banjo-picking styles, implies that he was used to catering for dancers. Practically uniquely among Southern musicians of his time, he also played the quill, or panpipes, which lent his music a fairy lilt.' Russell adds that 'LEADBELLY's apart, no recordings are more revealing about black recreational music in the late 19th century than the couple of dozen reels, rags, minstrel songs and blues' he left. The musician John Fahey has said in passing that Thomas also 'apparently used to play a lot of kids' birthday parties'.

The crucial 1952 anthology AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC includes two tracks by Henry Thomas—the last track of the whole collection is his 'Fishing Blues' from 1928—but neither of these is 'Honey Just Allow Me One More Chance', which Dylan includes on Freewheelin'—'first heard from a recording by a now-dead Texas blues singer', as Nat Hentoff's 1963 sleevenotes reported.

That Thomas recording, made in Chicago in 1927, may have been heard by Dylan on the original 78 issued by Vocalion but the likelihood is that he heard it on Henry Thomas Sings the Texas Blues, issued by the Origin Jazz Library, for a while the most important of the reissue labels, and active at the beginning of the 1960s. This album was issued in 1961 (in a limited edition of 500 copies). Dylan was performing 'Honey Just Allow Me One More Chance' by April 1962.

Paul Oliver, investigating the origins of both songs in Songsters and Saints, 1984, reports that 'Honey' was field-collected for folk-song collector Dorothy Scarborough by Mrs. Tom Bartlett from Marlin, Texas, that her transcription 'corresponded closely' to the Henry Thomas version, that possibly Mrs. Bartlett got it from Thomas himself, and that it was also recorded by (the far more obscure) Archie Lewis.

Folksong collectors seem to have been onto Henry Thomas for 'Fishing Blues' too. Oliver writes: 'Another Texas collector, the historian Walter Prescott Webb, published a number of song fragments "obtained from a Gatesville negro named 'Rags'." They included a verse of "If You Go Fishing" which was virtually identical to Henry Thomas's "Fishing Blues". Gatesville lies some fifty miles to the west of Marlin and it is tempting to think that "Rags" was none other than "Ragtime Texas"—Henry Thomas.'

(Oliver suggests that Thomas toned down the sexual suggestiveness of the lyric for his recording. HARRY SMITH, commenting on the Henry Thomas song in his sleevenotes to the American Folk Music anthology, cites 'Fishing Blues' by MEMPHIS MIN-NIE as being an allied composition, and notes that 'references to fishing, other than as sexual symbolism, are rare in American folk music'. Dylan introduced his Under the Red Sky song 'Wiggle Wiggle' as a song about fishing at several European concerts in 1991. In Ljubljana, in what was then Yugoslavia, on June 10, he said: 'This song is off my last record. It's all about fish. In a pond.' Next night in Belgrade: 'Here's one of my fishing songs'. And three nights later in Linz, Austria: 'Here's a song about going fishing.')

A neat postscript to the matter of Dylan's knowledge of these songs emerged in 1994, with the first circulation of a fragment of studio session with GEORGE HARRISON from the beginning of May 1970, soon after Dylan has been recording some of Self Portrait. It's interesting because Dylan recalls both songs. A voice that sounds like producer BOB JOHNSTON prompts Dylan, saying he wants to hear 'a song that had "Mama" in it, or something, that you did . . .' and Dylan starts singing, country style, 'I'm a-goin' fishin' all the time . . . I'm a-goin' fishin', you're a-goin' fishin', I'm a-goin' fishin' too'. The tune is so reminiscent of 'Honey' that at this point Johnston says 'No—"one kind of favour I'll ask a-you"!' and Dylan retorts 'Oh, yeah. . . . Same guy!'—and then sings a pleasant country version of 'Honey Just Allow Me One More Chance'.

'Fishing Blues' was revived by the Holy Modal Rounders, Lovin' Spoonful and Taj Mahal. Canned Heat's asthmatic 'Goin' Up the Country' was a clumsy imitation of Thomas' sound.

The place, date and circumstances of Henry Thomas' death are all unknown, though the year 1930 has been suggested. The claim that he was seen still playing on the streets of Tyler, Texas, in the 1950s is also being retailed with increasing confidence, though it seems highly unlikely. Thomas would have been in his late 70s or even older by then.

The CD Henry Thomas: Texas Worried Blues collects all 23 of his recordings, and offers extensive notes by blues expert Stephen Calt. Oliphant quotes blues historian William Barlow's judgement that 'Railroadin' Some' is the most 'vivid and intense recollection of railroading' in all the early blues recorded in the 1920s. Certainly his anxious, warm voice on the incantatory 'Don't Ease Me In', which has one of the world's catchiest melodies, makes this one of history's indispensable records.

[Henry Thomas: 'Honey, Won't You Allow Me Just One More Chance?' Chicago, 7 Oct 1927, Henry Thomas Sings the Texas Blues, Origin Jazz Library OJL-3, NY, 1961; 'Fishing Blues', Chicago, 13 Jun 1928, American Folk Music, Folkways FP 251–253, NY, 1952, CD-reissued Anthology of American Folk Music, Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997 (incl. booklet with John Fahey quote p.11); 'Don't Ease Me In', Chicago, 13 Jun 1928; all on Henry Thomas: Texas Worried Blues, Yazoo 1080–81, US, 1990.

Bob Dylan: 'Honey Just Allow Me One More Chance', NY, Apr 1962 (album version NY, 9 Jul 1962). Archie Lewis: 'Honey, 'Low Me One More Chance', Richmond, IN, 30 Mar 1933. Memphis Minnie: 'Fishin' Blues', NY, 3 Feb 1932. Bob Dylan: 'Fishing Blues' (fragment) and 'Honey Just Allow Me One More Chance', NY, 1–2 May 1970, unreleased; tape circulated 1994.

Dave Oliphant, Handbook of Texas Online, s.v. 'Thomas, Henry (Ragtime Texas)', www.tsha.utexas.edu/handbook/online/articles/TT/fthxc.html, seen online 8 Oct 2005.]

Thompson, Hunter S. [1937 - 2005] Born in Louisville, Kentucky, on July 18, 1937, Hunter Stockton Thompson was the rock'n'roller's Tom Wolfe, the first and best Gonzo Journalist. Beginning as an irreverent and wildly articulate sports journalist after a brief spell in gaol, service in the US Air Force and attendance at Columbia University, he published a de-mythologising book about the Hell's Angels, based on first-hand encounters (in some cases with those to whom he introduced LSD).

In his 30s he began to have his work published in Rolling Stone, and in the course of a long association with that paper, beginning and thriving when it was San Francisco-based and its heart still counter-cultural, he invented and developed the outrageous yet essentially morally outraged alter ego, Raoul Duke. Appointed Rolling Stone's Political Correspondent, he reported the Nixon versus McGovern 1972 election from the heart of the McGovern campaign, and his immensely lengthy pieces thrust himself into the centre of his reportage.

By his style, passion, humour and vividly conveyed sense of horror, he captured and magnified, perhaps even helped to develop, a hip public's sense of rabid disgust at the politics and politicians of Amerika. Watergate was made for him, and he declared that Richard Nixon represented 'that dark, venal and incurably violent side of the American character.' (Actually, he almost had a soft spot for Richard Nixon, though Nixon is unlikely to have discerned inside the coruscating vitriol poured over him by Thompson's prose).

His reports turned into books, as with Fear and Loathing: On the Campaign Trail '72 and later, sometimes collaborating with British cartoonist Ralph Steadman, came books that were mostly collections of articles, letters and essays, among them The Great Shark Hunt, Generation of Swine, Songs of the Doomed, Better Than Sex, The Fear and Loathing Letters, Vol. 1: The Proud Highway and his last work, Hey Rube: Blood Sport, the Bush Doctrine, and the Downward Spiral of Dumbness.

His masterpiece, though, and the work that preceded On the Campaign Trail, was Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, published in book form at the end of 1971, which charmed and captivated a generation right from its combative and seductive opening sentence: 'We were somewhere around Barstow on the edge of the desert when the drugs began to take hold.'

There are striking connections and correspondences between this great early 1970s prose work and the Bob Dylan of 1966—especially the Dylan of 'Stuck Inside of Mobile with the Memphis Blues Again'. See separate entry for these.

Two attempts were made to film the unfilmable: Where the Buffalo Roam in 1980, starring Bill Murray, and the far less wretched Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, 1998, Johnny Depp as the hero narrator. It's often mentioned that he appears in Gary Trudeau's tedious Doonesbury comic strip; more interesting is his being the model for actor/cartoonist Scott Shaw's anthropomorphic dog, Pointer X. Toxin, and for Spider Jerusalem in the comic series 'Transmetropolitan' by Warren Ellis and Darik Robertson.

Hunter Thompson produced little in his later years, and perhaps succumbed more fully to the gun-toting, paranoid drug-soaked nightmares than was useful, even to the man whose motto (the tagline for the film Where the Buffalo Roam) was 'I hate to advocate weird chemicals, alcohol, violence or insanity to anyone, but they've always worked for me.' He accidentally shot his assistant Deborah Fuller while chasing a bear on his property in 2000. In 1998, long reliant on his past work, he even published his (previously unpublished) first novel, The Rum Diary, written almost 40 years earlier in 1959 (also being turned into a film starring Johnny Depp).

He had long been an unreconstructed (and non-counter-cultural) member of the National Rifle Association and using one of his guns on February 20, 2005, he committed suicide at his fortified compound of a home near Aspen, Colorado. He was 67. Exactly six months later, in accordance with his wishes and at a cost of $2.5 million, met by Depp, his ashes were fired into the night sky from a cannon on his farm.

Dylan was rumoured to be going to attend, but didn't (of course). Nonetheless he was present through his work. It's said that after the ceremony's participants played the 1969 Norman Greenbaum anthem 'Spirit in the Sky' very loudly ('When they lay me down to die / Going on up to the spirit in the sky') and listened to Japanese ceremonial drummers and Buddhist readings in Tibetan, the rocket launch and fireworks display was followed by a Dylan recording of 'Mr. Tambourine Man', the song Hunter Thompson had said prompted him to co-dedicate Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas to Bob Dylan.

[Hunter S. Thompson: Hell's Angels: A Strange and Terrible Saga, New York: Ballantine, 1966. Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas began as a sprawling serialisation: 'Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas', by 'Raoul Duke', Rolling Stone nos.95 & 96, San Francisco, 11 & 25 Nov 1971; in book form Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas: A Savage Journey to the Heart of the American Dream, New York: Random House, 1971. Fear and Loathing: On the Campaign Trail '72, San Francisco: Straight Arrow Books, 1973. Gonzo Papers, Vol. 1: The Great Shark Hunt: Strange Tales from a Strange Time, New York: Summit Books, 1979. Gonzo Papers, Vol. 2: Generation of Swine: Tales of Shame and Degradation in the '80s, New York: Summit Books, 1988. Gonzo Papers, Vol. 3: Songs of the Doomed: More Notes on the Death of the American Dream, New York: Summit Books, 1990. Gonzo Papers, Vol. 4: Better Than Sex: Confessions of a Political Junkie, New York: Random House, 1994. The Fear and Loathing Letters, Vol. 1: The Proud Highway: The Saga of a Desperate Southern Gentleman 1955–1967, New York: Random House, 1997. The Rum Diary: The Long Lost Novel (1959), New York: Simon & Schuster, 1999. Films: Where the Buffalo Roam, dir. Art Linson (with tiny appearances from NEIL YOUNG and David Briggs), Universal Pictures, US, 1980; and Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, dir. Terry Gilliam, Fear and Loathing LLC/Rhino Films/Shark Productions/Summit Entertainment/Universal Pictures, 1998.]

Thompson, Richard [1949 -] Richard John Thompson was born in London on April 3, 1949, learnt the guitar and became a co-founder of Fairport Convention, whose members had left school only at the beginning of the magical summer of 1967. They comprised Simon Nicol, Ashley 'Tyger' Hutchings and Thompson, whose day-job was making stained glass windows (thus adding an aura of William Morrisonian arts-and-craftsmanship to his persona); their repertoire was not folk but folk-rock—contemporary West Coast and Dylan-inspired music—and at their first gig, in a church hall in Golders Green, North London, Martin Lamble got up from the audience to ask to be their drummer. They added not just him but vocalist Judy Dyble, a local librarian, went on to play in the city's new underground club scene and, spotted there by Joe Boyd, signed to a record deal and began to make a series of landmark albums and undergo a series of convulsive line-up changes.

Richard Thompson stayed through a number of both, his first composition to be recorded being 'Meet on the Ledge', issued as a single and included on What We Did on Our Holidays. He was therefore part of their important albums Unhalfbricking, Liege and Lief and 1970's Full House. Scattered through these albums were several Dylan songs, chosen in part for their relative obscurity as well as for their intrinsic appeal. Notably they cut Brit versions of 'Percy's Song' and 'I'll Keep It With Mine', and 'Si Tu Dois Partir', a French language version of 'If You Gotta Go, Go Now', which, also issued as a single, gave them a hit.

Thompson left the group at the height of their fame, prompted by Joe Boyd's re-location to the US West Coast, making a shrewd but surprise move into doing the rounds of folk clubs, grounding his improving songwriting in this grittier world without in any way renouncing his interest in rock but rather continuing his insistence that folk and rock went perfectly well together. Not everyone, of course, agreed, and there was a quiet English equivalent of the confrontational drama of Dylan's 'going electric' shortly after midnight on New Year's Eve 1972, when Thompson had temporarily joined the second line-up of the fairly informal grouping the Albion Country Band and they were playing in a London club, the Howff. This electric guitar, bass and drums group was joined on stage by some Morris dancers, a surprising but mutually congenial alliance that anticipated by 30 years the contemporary British folk emphasis on re-exploring folk dance, and so the rehabilitating of that much-maligned and long-scorned figure, the Morris dancer. But, inspired by this, Thompson then cranked up his electric guitar and lit into a bit of CHUCK BERRY—only to find Ashley Hutchings pulling out the plugs in a rage and vanishing into the New Year's night with them.

Thompson went back to playing solo—except that after his début solo album, Henry the Human Fly, he toured and made six albums with his vocalist wife Linda (née Peters), beginning with what many still regard as the best of all Richard Thompson's albums, I Want to See the Bright Lights Tonight, and typifying the way that he can alchemise into a unique whole the disparate elements of narrative coherence, intangible darkness and a guitar built of iron. Energised by the album's success, Thompson returned to the rock circuit. Since the Thompsons' divorce, Richard has continued to write and record, and to build his formidable career and reputation.

This is sufficiently heavyweight that it tends to elbow aside the prolific work that Thompson also achieved as a sideman on other people's albums. In more recent decades this may have been less significant but in the late 1960s and 1970s, he played on many landmark records, among them the Incredible String Band's The Hangman's Beautiful Daughter (1968), Nick Drake's Five Leaves Left (1969), Al Stewart's Love Chronicles (1970) and John Martyn's Solid Air (1972).

Thompson has clearly been influenced by Dylan's work, as he has readily acknowledged, though he has been, for three decades now, so much his own man and artist—so distinctive and authoritative and English a figure, and with his own mix of diffidence and haughty gravitas—that it's unproductive to make comparisons after the early 1970s. And before then, the comparisons can only be invidious. That is, you can pluck 'Dylanesque' lines out of Thompson's earlyish songs, but only to see in them the sort of embarrassing imitations that so many people came up with once upon a time. In Thompson's 'Genesis Hall', on the 1969 Fairport Convention album Unhalfbricking, for example, we find this pallid and portentous 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' imitation shivering in its own embarrassment: 'The gipsy who begs for your presents / He will laugh in your face when you're old'; but it's ill-mannered even to remember such things in the face of the immensely strong body of obdurately individual work carved out since by one of Britain's greatest musical figures.

It's easy to form the impression, indeed, that the matured Richard Thompson finds Dylan far too unskilled a musician to be regarded with much interest or respect: an impression not altogether contradicted by his comments in an interview included in a box set of his own work. 'Dylan', he says carefully, 'was an influence on everyone. It was obvious that some of his music was very traditional in its source, so there is a link there. Fairport recorded a lot of obscure Dylan songs.' The interviewer says: 'You played with him in Seville'—which indeed they did: at the Guitar Legends Festival on October 17, 1991—and Thompson answers, more in guarded self-defence than with any detectable enthusiasm: 'That came about because we were both part of something called The Night of the Guitar. I was asked if I'd play guitar with him. I knew the songs we were going to do though we hadn't really rehearsed. But he was a bit out of tune; his guitar was about a tone flat or something. So I spent the first number retuning.'

[Richard Thompson: Henry the Human Fly, Island ILPS 9197, UK, 1972. Richard & Linda Thompson: I Want to See the Bright Lights Tonight, Island ILPS 9266, 1974. Fairport Convention: Fairport Convention, Polydor 583 035, UK, 1968; 'Meet on the Ledge', Island WIP 6047, UK, 1968; What We Did on Our Holidays, Island ILPS 9092, 1969; 'Si Tu Dois Partir' c/w 'Genesis Hall', Island WIP 6064, 1969; Unhalfbricking, Island ILPS 9102, 1969; Liege and Lief, Island ILPS 9115, 1969; Full House, Island ILPS 9130, 1970. Bob Dylan backed by Thompson: 'Boots of Spanish Leather', 'Across the Borderline' and 'Answer Me (My Love)'; Dylan backed by Thompson & others: 'All Along the Watchtower'; all Seville, 17 Oct 1991.

Richard Thompson quoted from Nigel Schofield's interview inside the Thompson box set. Discographical detail from David Suff's 1997 listing seen online 1 Dec 2005 at www.thebeesknees.com/bk-rt-d1.html. Thompson is also the subject of a detailed biography by Patrick Humphries, Richard Thompson: Strange Affair—the Biography, London: Virgin, 1996.]

Thompson, Toby [1944 -] Toby Thompson was born in Washington, D.C., on September 15, 1944 (but 'conceived in New York City in war time'), the son of a Washington physician and a Manhattan ex-model whose brother, William Nicholls, wrote and produced 'Your Hit Parade', the MTV of its day but aired live from Manhattan, visiting the set for which gave young Toby a whiff of the possibilities of glamour, though not his first. His parents' house was open to many artists and show-biz people. 'As an infant I crawled beneath the piano while Aaron Copland polished his symphonies. . . . Boris Karloff tickled my toes. . . . When I was five, the painter Max Ernst took one of my watercolors, "Girl with Sunburnt Lips", and refused to give it back.'

Thompson is talking here from within the comfortable, sophisticated milieu of an associate professor of English at Penn State University, where he now teaches non-fiction writing, while retaining an apartment in New York City. It is a tone of voice he certainly managed to throw off in 1971 in his invaluable drongo paperback Positively Main Street: An Unorthodox View of Bob Dylan, about visiting Hibbing and interviewing Bob Dylan's relatives and friends.

For most people, it came out of nowhere—a breathless cavalcade of slightly off-kilter but delirious revelation back when most of Dylan's background and family history was an almost total mystery thanks largely to a good ten years' worth of myth-making and bare-faced lying on the part of the artist himself. Thompson's style at the time was a kind of juvenile version of the new journalism: if Tom Wolfe was this school's headmaster and HUNTER S. THOMPSON its boisterous head boy, Toby Thompson was the milk monitor.

In fact, Thompson's material had not come out of nowhere. The material he'd gathered from his first trip up to Hibbing, Minnesota, was published initially as series of articles in the Village Voice, starting in March 1969, and when this was fresh on the newsstands, he made a second trip, on which he collected ECHO HELSTROM from Minneapolis and they drove back up to Hibbing together in his red Volkswagen. En route they pulled over and she showed him Big Sandy Lake, where she and Bob had often parked. They went on up into Hibbing, went to the bar that is now named Zimmy's, heard live music, danced . . .

The book was intrusive, audacious, fumbling and as subtle as a Woodstock Nation burger. Written as if on Kleenex by its author's adenoids, it was endearingly clumsy and gauche and essential reading. Thompson, unprecedentedly, managed to interview not only Echo Helstrom, almost certainly the 'Girl of the North Country', but Dylan's mother and brother, his uncle, his friends . . . and to publish them 15 years before ROBERT SHELTON was ready. Dylan himself read the Village Voice pieces in early 1969 and told Rolling Stone that November: 'That boy—this fellow Toby—has got some lessons to learn.'

Thompson, you would not have guessed from his prose, had actually taken his lessons alongside Al Gore and John Kerry at St. Albans Episcopal school in Washington, D.C., made frequent pilgrimages to the graveside of F. Scott Fitzgerald at Rockville, Maryland, and later gained a BA in English Literature from the University of Delaware and an MA from the University of Virginia—all this before writing Positively Main Street. Since then he's written Saloon (1976) and The 60's Report (1979), and though he's published no further books in the last quarter century he's written for a slew of magazines and journals and is a long-term contributing editor to Big Sky Journal, in Bozeman, Montana.

Today's sophisticat version of Thompson manages to claim both that there was no assumed gulf, and that there was, between the suave man of letters and the Toby T who visits Hibbing and reports back:

> 'I like the book. It's got a smart-alecky tone that fits its time and the age of its author and protagonist, who'd just turned 24. It's also cannier than it seems. It's a meta-book. I'd studied modern literature . . . and was aware of both the post-modern tradition, where experimentation rules, and that of the 19th century Bildungsroman, or novel of initiation—where a young hero set out against impossible odds, acts foolishly or ineptly, but confronts his enemies or the dragon, then returns home sadder, wiser. I'd studied Freud and I'd studied ROBERT GRAVES' complicated poetic theory in The White Goddess. . . . I knew that in literature and psychology, one had to slay one's hero to become the hero. There was an oedipal tinge to this. To win the queen, and sleep with her, one must kill the king.'

Thirty-five years on and he still wants us all to know that he slept with Echo Helstrom.

A harmonica playing friend introduced Thompson to Dylan's music in 1962, he says: a John Kerkam with whom Toby played blues 'at a club called the Zen Den, in Rehoboth Beach, Delaware. He'd hung out in Greenwich Village, had a friend who'd studied guitar with REVEREND GARY DAVIS and was in the know. "You ought to hear this cat, Bob Dylan," Kerkam said. . . . Dylan's first album was out and. . . . I was impressed with the roughness of his blues arrangements. . . . I didn't notice his writing until the second album, Freewheelin'. There it was unavoidable. It's hard now to reconstruct the power those lyrics held.'

Reminded that before Positively Main Street the only Dylan book had been Folk Rock: The Bob Dylan Story by SY & BARBARA RIBAKOVE, which was, in TERRY KELLY's phrase, 'mainly drawn from the cuttings file', Thompson responds: 'There were also DANIEL KRAMER's photography book, and the insights provided by the film Don't Look Back. I'd read Bob's Playboy interview, and Nat Hentoff's early New Yorker profile of him. But there was this gap in Dylanology, to use a term that did not exist. He was in seclusion in Woodstock and writers were intimidated by his disdain for the press. And by his power.'

Toby the dragon-slayer soon sorted that out. He even got Echo's father to be nicer to him than he'd ever been to the original Bob: 'They enjoyed me, particularly the father. "He likes you 'cause you're fair," Echo said. Meaning blond. They held a Sunday cookout for me and I played and sang a lot of Bob's songs. Including "Girl of the North Country". It was confusing for them, I think.' And the more so for Toby, it begins to sound. 'My theatricality and boyish enthusiasm made them feel as if Bob had come home, in some way. To use Graves' terminology, I seemed Bob's "blood brother, his other self, his weird." Everybody's feelings on that were decidedly mixed.' Yes indeed.

[Toby Thompson, Positively Main Street: An Unorthodox View of Bob Dylan, New York: Coward McCann & Geoghegan, 1971; London: New English Library, Jan 1972, reprint Mar 1972; but first trip material (first 13 sections of the book) published as series of articles, Village Voice, starting 20 Mar 1969; Saloon, New York: Viking/Grossman, 1976; The 60's Report, New York: Rawson Wade, 1979. All quotes from interview by Terry Kelly, conducted Jan 2005, published in The Bridge no.21, Tyne & Wear, UK, spring 2005.]

Time Out of Mind* [1997] It seemed astonishing that the general media world took Time Out of Mind to its fickle bosom so fulsomely. The whole public mood of the 1980s and 90s had been smile-smile-smile, never admit to gloom or despondency, never complain, and if you want to get ahead, be remorselessly upbeat! The Tina Turner Syndrome, in fact. In this climate, people were regarded as from the lunatic fringe if they insisted on saying that Bob Dylan was a seminal artist of the times and absolutely invaluable as a bulwark against Shopping Mall culture. Those of 'balanced' views and 'living in the contemporary world' spoke of Dylan with dismissive contempt as 1960s Man, a hopeless old has-been of no relevance whatever and whose talents, it went without saying, had vanished a good 20 years ago.

Then along came Time Out of Mind, the gloomiest, most desolate, least Tina-Turner-Princess-Di-David-Letterman-ELTON-JOHN record in human history . . . and suddenly it was 'Well of course we've known all along that Bob Dylan was a genius and a Great American Institution who could come back at any time with a work that would snuggle straight into that special place in our hearts we've always kept open for him: and here it is!'

It was a pleasure to see Dylan on the front of Newsweek and giving such relaxed, honest and interesting interviews, standing behind this new work with unaccustomed straightforwardness—even with that cover photo by Richard Avedon (whose pictures GREIL MARCUS once called 'the curse of rock') making Dylan look like a hairy LEONARD COHEN—but it was exasperating to be preached at by the Sunday Times in 1997 about how important an artist Dylan is, after exactly that kind of broadsheet had spent the previous two decades deriding him and anyone who had kept faith with him.

It was especially exasperating when this unusually lengthy album first arrived and the decade's most important collection of new Bob Dylan compositions (almost its only one) seemed riddled with lazy writing and lumpen music bordering on the kind of nightclub jazz that, almost four decades earlier, many of us had looked to Bob Dylan to vanquish ('Million Miles', ' 'Til I Fell in Love With You', 'Can't Wait'), plus the kind of rock that wins Grammies but makes you wish he'd stick to ballads ('Cold Irons Bound') and the kind of ballad that makes you wish he wouldn't ('Make You Feel My Love').

The album marked a return to the multi-layered production techniques of DANIEL LANOIS, giving it a cohesive sound (disrupted only by the mediocre rockabilly of 'Dirt Road Blues') which complemented Dylan's dour elegy, epitomised by 'Not Dark Yet'. What made all this compelling was not its sententious claims to shrivelled pessimism but its very human confessional quality and its intimate flashes of humour. The album was also experimental in its then-unprecedented use of lines from other songs, a usage much extended on "Love and Theft", the studio album that followed.

Time Out of Mind brings out more variation in response than almost any other Dylan album. For many, many people, it is one of his great works, and held, for instance, to be far superior to "Love and Theft". For others, anyone who really appreciates Dylan must see that the true assessment is the other way around. What achieves more general agreement is that Time Out of Mind offers no less than four major songs: 'Standing in the Doorway', 'Tryin' to Get to Heaven', 'Not Dark Yet' and the magnificent 'Highlands', an audacious 16½ minutes long and the inspired creative high on which the album ends: a song that is an inventive mix of splendidly off-the-wall talking blues and visionary rhapsody.

[Recorded Miami, 13–27 Jan 1997; released on CD as Columbia CK 68556, 27 or 30 Sep 1997 (UK vinyl version 2-LP set Columbia COL 486936 1, 1998).

Newsweek, NY, 6 Oct 1997; the same issue contained an interview with James Meredith, the first black student at the University of Mississippi, whose riot-causing enrolment in 1962 was the subject of Dylan's early song 'Oxford Town'; 35 years on he was working for Right-Wing Republican Senator Jesse Helms, and a Fellow at the Leadership Institute, Washington, D.C., Sunday Times, London, 28 Sep 1997.]

Times They Are a-Changin', The* [album, 1964] This third album was less of a leap forward, but was again a solo album, this time mainly of stark 'protest' songs, all written by Dylan, though often with adapted folk melodies. Like his second album, it contained songs that have achieved classic status: particularly the title track and 'With God on Our Side'. It also includes the love song 'One Too Many Mornings', a song that should have served notice on Dylan's early cult followers (most of whom were students and liberals who considered themselves radicals, hated pop music and wore Dylan on their sleeves like a political armband) that Dylan was not just going to be a graphic protest-singer. But many seemed not to notice, so that the next album came as a shock to them.

[Recorded NY, 6–7 Aug, 23–24 & 31 Oct 1963; released as LP Columbia CL 2105 (mono) & CS 8905 (stereo), (in UK CBS BPG 62251 mono, and SBPG 62251 stereo), 13 Jan or 10 Feb 1964; CD released Jan 1989.]

'Times They Are a-Changin', The' [song, 1963]
The first time a lot of pop fans noticed Dylan was when the 'The Times They Are a-Changin'' came out as a single in 1964. To pop-trained ears, it was a laughable record. The singer had a voice that made Johnny Duncan and the Blue Grass Boys sound like Mario Lanza—and plainly, he hadn't even the most elementary sense of timing. He brought in the second syllable of that title word 'Changin'' far too soon: at a quite ridiculous point. What was the record company playing at? Just because Bob Dylan was the writer of an interesting song called 'Blowin' in the Wind' didn't mean he could expect to start singing all his other songs himself . . . To others, the striking thing was that here was someone who wasn't just pop-singing, but truly communicating.

But communicating what? 'The Times They Are a-Changin'' was the archetypal protest song. Dylan's aim was to ride upon the unvoiced sentiment of a mass public—to give that inchoate sentiment an anthem and give its clamour an outlet. He succeeded, but the language of the song is nevertheless imprecisely and very generally directed. It offers four extended metaphors, and makes no more than an easy politician's use of any of them. The four are: change as a rising tide; change dependent on the wheel of fate; the Establishment as an edifice; and yesterday and tomorrow as roads to be opted for. People enjoy the song to the extent that they approve of its theory. It has none of the warmth and personal impetus, and its metaphors deploy none of the fresh and vivid detail, that we find in that other Dylan song of the same period and much the same thrust, the lovely 'When the Ship Comes In'—a song so under-attended by its writer.

It's perhaps a surprise, looking back, to see how late on in Dylan's political songwriting 'The Times They Are a-Changin'' occurs. There is no extant recording or performance of it before he offered it as a Witmark music-publishing demo in October 1963, and the earliest attempts in the Columbia studios were on the 23rd and 24th of that month (the latter yielding the version that became the title song of the third album, and the hit single). In other words, 'The Times They Are a-Changin'' came not only long after 'Blowin' in the Wind' but also later than 'A Hard Rain's a-Gonna Fall', 'Oxford Town', 'Masters of War', 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps', 'The Death of Emmett Till', 'Paths of Victory', 'North Country Blues', 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', 'Playboys and Playgirls', 'Talkin' John Birch Paranoid Blues', 'Who Killed Davey Moore?', 'Only a Pawn in Their Game', 'When the Ship Comes In', 'John Brown', 'Only a Hobo', 'With God on Our Side' and more besides.

'The Times They Are a-Changin'' was prophetic of the imminent future—but it has been outdated by the very changes the song itself gleefully threatened. Its message is politically out of date. 'Mothers and fathers throughout the land' are as ready as ever to criticise what they don't understand, though no-one any longer listens; meanwhile people who want change have rightly lost the optimism of expecting senators and congressmen to heed their political calls, and the revolution has been lost.

The Bob Dylan of the late 1970s fully acknowledged that the changing of the times had dated his song about them. When he sang it, for the first time in 13 years, on his 1978 tour, he re-interpreted it as a sad, slow admission of his generation's failure. This version appears on the 'live' album Bob Dylan at Budokan, where there is even the inspired touch of a Duane Eddy guitar-sound to emphasise the song's anachrony. Better still is the acoustic version performed on the 1981 tour, as heard for example on the widely circulated bootleg Hanging in the Balance, which captures the arresting performance Dylan gives in Bad Segeberg, (West) Germany, on July 14. Without altering a word but with a divergent set of chords, Dylan effectively reverses the song's meaning, making it a sad memorial to vanished hopes.

Unfortunately he hasn't left it at that, but has performed it without end in the years since, and though occasional renditions have had their own minor attractions (at Houston in 1981, the mangling of words produced the irrational but splendid 'you'll be drenched like a bone'), the song has essentially become a meaningless Greatest Hit. This process reaches its demeaning nadir on Dylan's MTV Unplugged™, where the audience whoops and hollers its indiscriminate keenness as Dylan sings 'The Times They Are a-Changin'' so badly that, as Andy Gill comments, it's 'as if he's tried to do so many different versions he's simply lost track of how best to sing it, accenting words and phrases almost randomly, as if successive words were set in different typefaces and font sizes,' while those in the crowd 'applaud each successive indignity as a brilliant new interpretation'.

Dropping it would show more integrity. Leasing its use for finance and banking industry TV adverts shows none (see Coopers & Lybrand), and leads to the further indignity of advertising women's underwear. Not for this were the old and inde-cisive to get out of the doorway and unblock the hall for the times to be a-changed.

[Bob Dylan: 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', Witmark demo NY, Oct 1963, issued Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, 1991; version NY, 23 Oct 1963 unissued; version at Houston, TX, 12 Nov 1981. Andy Gill: review of Dylan's MTV Unplugged in Q magazine, no.105, London, Jun 1995.]

Titanic,* the The most immediately vivid of the many evocations of impending catastrophe given in the lyric of the final song on Highway 61 Revisited, 'Desolation Row', is achieved very simply, in the one arresting line 'The Titanic sails at dawn.' Dylan takes the Titanic to represent contemporary America: for RMS Titanic was the ship of the future, the 'proof' of man's civilisation and progress, the unsinkable ship which, on her maiden voyage, sank. And, according to the best stories, when the ship began to sink the passengers refused to believe it was happening. The palm-court orchestra kept playing and the people in the ballroom danced obliviously on. Using the doomed ship's symbolic clout, Dylan explores the different kinds of oblivion and denial in America—the various ways in which the dancing continues.

The facts are slightly different. Sailing from Southampton on April 10, 1912 (not at dawn), bound for New York, the Titanic sank after hitting an iceberg off Newfoundland on the night of 14–15, with the loss of probably 1,513 lives out of 2,207 (exact figures are still disputed). The 'orchestra' was in fact a quintet that played everything from Offenbach to ragtime; as the ship sank, it did not remain below but played up on deck. The last number was almost certainly not 'Nearer My God to Thee', as in myth, but the hymn 'Autumn'. (Third class had to provide their own music, and mustered an Irish piper and a fiddler.)

'God Himself could not sink this ship,' a woman passenger had been told. It took ten seconds' contact with the iceberg to start disproving this claim, but two hours 40 minutes to sink the ship. As Michael Davie notes (in The Titanic: The Full Story of a Tragedy, 1986), the tragedy 'was also man-made, the result of a state of mind—grandiose, avaricious and self-confident'. Tellingly, too, '34 per cent of male first-class passengers [were] saved . . . 8 per cent of second-class . . . 12 per cent in third . . . death and disaster were not such great levellers after all.' On the other hand, 354 crew survived, compared to 351 passengers.

It was not just Dylan who used the ship as a symbol of an America headed for a fall. The Titanic's extra significance is expressed in a number of blues songs exactly because black Americans relished it as a symbol of whitey's come-uppance—and Dylan, knowing this, is able to re-use the Titanic in a later song of his own that is enriched by the resonance of these blues songs that long pre-date his own work: indeed to draw on them so deftly and subtlely that he has no need actually to name the ship at all this second time around. The song is 1981's 'Caribbean Wind' (issued on Biograph, 1985), and some of the auguries of its 'tearin' down of the walls' are alluded to when Dylan sings that outside the narrator's window the 'Street band [is] playing "Nearer My God to Thee".' This line offers not only an allusion to the meaning-loaded event of the sinking of the Titanic, but also to the group of blues songs that arose to celebrate or commemorate it. We see this at once upon encountering one such blues, Hi Henry Brown's 'Titanic Blues', wherein Brown summarises the mythic moment that still lives in the popular imagination: 'Titanic sinking in the deep blue sea / And the band all playing "Nearer My God to Thee".'

Others to record songs about the Titanic include RICHARD RABBIT BROWN, whose 'Sinking of the Titanic' was recorded in a New Orleans garage on the same day as his immortal 'James Alley Blues', and shares with Dylan's 'Caribbean Wind' the citing of the hymn-title within its own lyric. Brown sings: 'The music played as they went down / On that dark blue sea / And you could hear the sound of that familiar hymn / Singin' "Nearer My God to Thee'".

(This myth was still being perpetuated as recently as the 1980s. In The Lion Book of Favourite Hymns, 1980, for instance, Christopher Idle claims as fact that as the Titanic began to tilt, 'Baptist minister John Harper asked the band to play "Nearer, my God, to thee." It was the last hymn in the lives of hundreds of people.')

Delight at the sinking of the Titanic, because it signified the come-uppance of human vanity and of the powerful, was not restricted to black Americans. The Russian symbolist poet Alexander Blok wrote: 'The sinking of the Titanic has made me indescribably happy; there is, after all, an ocean.'

Finally, in one of the lyric variations within the recorded 'live' version of 'Caribbean Wind', the shadowy presence of the Titanic story is reconfirmed by the line 'And like they say, the ship will sail at dawn': with which Dylan brings us full circle. We recognise that not only do 'they say' so but that we've heard Dylan himself say, back on 'Desolation Row', that 'The Titanic sails at dawn.'

[Hi Henry Brown: 'Titanic Blues', NY, 14 Mar 1932, 1st vinyl issue St. Louis Blues, 1929–1935: The Depression, Yazoo L-1030, New York, c.1972; Richard Rabbit Brown: 'Sinking of the Titanic', New Orleans, 11 Mar 1927, Nearer My God to Thee, Roots RL-304, Vienna, 1968, CD-reissued The Greatest Songsters: Complete Recorded Works (1927–1929), Document DOCD-5003, Vienna, 1990. Alexander Blok quoted in Peter Vansittart: Voices 1870–1914, 1984, p.xix. Bob Dylan: 'Caribbean Wind' ('live' version), San Francisco, 12 Nov 1980.]

Tolkien, J.R.R. [1892 - 1973] John Ronald Reuel Tolkien was born in Bloemfontein, South Africa, on January 3, 1892. His Lord of the Rings was first published in three volumes, 1954–55. Longer and more ambitious than The Hobbit, 1937, it is a work of fantasy fiction but grounded in Tolkien's huge knowledge of medieval languages, Anglo-Saxon literature and folklore. Its portrayal of an idealised rural England threatened with destruction by evil forces found favour in the 1960s among those who had grown up threatened by nuclear and environmental disaster. In consequence there was in subsequent years much modish derision (the easy sneer persists that it is hippie twaddle) of this vivid, absorbing work (one of those long books that you wish were longer still), which is of an imaginative quality far beyond the reach of most 'fantasy' novels. More recently, Lord of the Rings has been made into a series of three Hollywood blockbuster movies, and thus into an industry with its own proliferation of merchandising, which only removes us further from the shimmering work itself.

UnDylanesque though Lord of the Rings would seem to be, there are resonances between parts of the Tolkien trilogy and Dylan's remarkable song 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' (see separate entry).

Tolkien spent the last years of his life at Oxford University, where he died on September 2, 1973.

Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers TOM PETTY & the Heartbreakers was formed in the mid-1970s. The group recorded their eponymously titled début album in 1976. It was a slow burner but eventually a hit, helped by 'Breakdown', which became a top 40 hit on its 1977 re-release. The highly successful albums You're Gonna Get It! and Damn the Torpedoes (triple platinum), plus further hit singles, preceded the less commercial Hard Promises and Long After Dark (1982). A long taking stock followed, after which they came back firing on all cylinders with Southern Accents in 1985 (produced by DAVE STEWART), then with Pack Up the Plantation—Live!

In September 1985 they also played six songs behind Bob Dylan at the Farm Aid benefit concert in Champaign, Illinois (augmented by WILLIE NELSON playing guitar on the last three), as a result of which in 1986 Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers partnered Dylan on two separate legs of his True Confessions Tour of New Zealand, Australia, Japan and North America. After rehearsing over 60 songs in California in January, the first leg of the tour, the non-American shows, began in Wellington, New Zealand, on February 5, 1986 (it was the summer down there) and finished on March 10 in Tokyo.

In this phase they played only 19 concerts, distributed through three countries, but they were also filmed for the official concert video Hard to Handle, filmed by GILLIAN ARMSTRONG, and in Sydney they stopped into a recording studio to cut the dreadful song 'Band of the Hand (It's Hell Time Man!)', which Tom Petty produced and which Dylan had written for the soundtrack of the worthless movie of the same name. The song was of interest not in itself—it was a hopelessly crude piece of vigilante bombast—but because, aside from with the even more obscure Dylan work 'Legionnaire's Disease', it is the only mention of the Vietnam War in his entire canon. (In the earlier song, 'Granddad fought in the Revolutionary War, father in the War of 1812 / Uncle fought in Vietnam and then he fought a war all by himself'; in 'Band of the Hand' we have 'For all of my brothers from Vietnam / And my uncles from World War Two . . . / We're gonna do what the law should do.') It was also the first time Dylan had specially written a song for a film in which he played no part himself. The B-side of the single was not by Dylan.

Hard to Handle was filmed at the Sydney, Australia, concerts of February 24 and 25, two thirds of the footage used coming from the earlier night.

In April Petty had to join Dylan for a press conference in LA to promote the forthcoming American leg of the tour, which was preceded by a brief appearance at an Amnesty International benefit concert in the city on June 6, at which Dylan and the band (plus Philip Lyn Jones on congas) performed 'Band of the Hand', the Infidels song 'License to Kill' and the R&B classic 'Shake a Hand'. The second leg proper began at a sports arena in San Diego on June 9, and ran through a total of 41 concerts to finish on August 6 in Paso Robles, California.

The first of these concerts saw the début performance of a song Dylan and Tom Petty had co-written, 'Got My Mind Made Up', which Dylan, Petty and the Heartbreakers had studio-recorded a month earlier for inclusion on Dylan's Knocked Out Loaded album. The final concert, at the Mid-State Fairground, featured the only live attempt Dylan ever made at that album's masterpiece, 'Brownsville Girl'; and even then, he only sang the chorus. Nevertheless a fragment was shown on ABC-TV the next night, the eve of the release of the album. There was another brief TV duty the group performed with Dylan too; at some point that August in San Francisco they were filmed playing the Fred Rose song 'Thank God' for the CHABAD TELETHON shown that September 14.

The punishing thing, for Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers, was that at each of these concerts—a total of 60—they played their own set and then came back on as Dylan's backing band for his set. In effect, then, the band played the equivalent of 120 concerts. And Dylan's sets were long that year: most nights he performed 26 songs, and sometimes nearer 30. Petty himself also shared vocals with Dylan on the regularly performed 'I Forgot More Than You'll Ever Know', 'Blowin' in the Wind' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' (and once, on July 1 in Clarkston, Michigan, JOHNNY CASH's 'I Still Miss Someone').

The significance of the tour for Dylan followers was considerable. First, it was his first tour since 1984, but that had been in Europe; this was his first North American tour for almost five years. It was also his first fully post-evangelical-period tour of the States, and the alliance with—and reliance on—Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers was interesting as to the way this Bob Dylan was defining himself. He was, in OLOF BJORNER's words, 'the rejuvenated legend', placing the emphasis very much on rock 'n'roll, including the rock'n'roll of the 1950s. As with SANTANA in Europe on the 1984 tour, he was trading on the commercial pull of another act; but this time it was an act that could be seen as making some kind of musical sense.

Not everyone liked the group, though Petty's louche sexiness and the group's mix of tight street-cred musicianship with outrageously catchy hit singles like their classics 'American Girl' and 'Refugee' meant that they appealed to plenty, combining the spirit of fey punkery Tom Verlaine's group Television had embodied with something of the magisterial rock'n'roll loyalty exemplified by the ROLLING STONES.

Dylan has always had an uncanny ability physically to resemble the person he's chosen to stand alongside; with Petty, therefore, he came on 'rather punkish, in sleeveless shirts and leather vests, lots of amulets and one eardrop', looking fit and lean, showing off sinewy bare arms and wearing fingerless gloves. Yet the 1986 tour is no Dylan fan's favourite. The music seemed monolithic and belaboured, and the retention of a gospel-style backing group an over-egging of the pudding. Everything sounded the same, all the time: echoey, muffled, overbearing, and Dylan himself nuance-free.

Oddly, because it wasn't done calculatedly on the band's part, their playing always sounded fresher, tighter, more resourceful and original in their own sets than in Dylan's. One or two of the musicians, individually, may have enjoyed the recurrent uncertainty of playing behind him, but as a unit they didn't give him their modernity or flair. Rather, he made them sound rockist and formulaic. There was also the inherent awkwardness that in 1986 Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers were huge; their records were immensely bigger-selling than Dylan's, and it became clear at the concerts that more than half the audiences were really there for the group and not for the 'legend' at all. It seemed to Dylan, as he remembers in Chronicles Volume One, that 'Tom was at the top of his game and I was at the bottom of mine'.

A further song co-written by Dylan and Petty, but with MIKE CAMPBELL too, the inconsequential 'Jammin' Me', was recorded by Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers, included on their April 1987 album release Let Me Up (I've Had Enough); the song made it into the US top 20 when issued as a single.

Clearly Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers hadn't had enough; on September 5, 1987, they were back with Dylan for a so-called European tour, though it actually began in the Middle East, with two dates in Israel (officially Dylan's first performances in the country). These were remarkable for the fact that Dylan included songs from his overtly Christian repertoire at each: 'In the Garden' from Saved (and the less overt 'Dead Man, Dead Man', from Shot of Love) in Tel Aviv and 'Gotta Serve Somebody' and 'Slow Train', both from Slow Train Coming, in Jerusalem. They were more remarkable for the fact that not a single song sung in Tel Aviv on the first night was repeated in Jerusalem on the second. In Chronicles Volume One, after writing about how stuck he felt, how incapable of singing more than about 20 of his songs until he had done a few dates with THE GRATEFUL DEAD that July, Dylan writes that at these opening concerts and the two that followed, in Switzerland and Italy, he 'sang eighty different songs, never repeating one, just to see if I could do it. It seemed easy.' This is only a mild exaggeration; he repeated only two songs out of 44 in the course of the first three concerts, but didn't keep up this extraordinary pace for the fourth; its 15 songs included only four more non-repeats.

The tour moved on to West Germany, East Germany, the Netherlands, Denmark, Finland, Sweden, France, Belgium and England, finishing with three consecutive nights at London's vile Wembley Arena in mid-October: a total of 30 concerts, on which Dylan must have been especially difficult to play for. In contrast to the previous year, he was not now looking fit, but wearing some sort of back brace that made him look stiff and a little hapless. He insisted on the stage remaining almost in darkness for his sets, he was extremely erratic and for many people this tour tested their patience beyond the limit. You could say that after this, people came to see him either because they were ardent aficionados or living-legend shoppers, coming to see him to tick him off their list; but 1987 marked the last year for more than a decade in which people came to see him in droves simply because he was a mainstream rock draw.

It was almost the end, too, of the long collaboration with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers. The group itself became a less active unit subsequently. Their first album since 1987 was 1991's Into the Great Wide Open, produced by JEFF LYNNE, though Petty's own 1989 album Full Moon Fever had included Heartbreakers' input. Two hit singles came from Into the Great Wide Open. Ten years later the group received a Hollywood Walk of Fame star at 7018 Hollywood Boulevard. In March 2002 they were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Such marketing-led fluff, such after-the-event officialising of what ought to be wild and unofficial, wouldn't normally be worth a mention; but on this occasion the induction was MC'd by JAKOB DYLAN.

In 2003, on August 9 & 10, at Holmdel, New Jersey, Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers met up with Jakob's father Bob once again for two shared concerts. At the first, Petty, Mike Campbell and Benmont Tench came on at the end of the Dylan set, and with Petty on shared vocals too, they played on Dylan's encore numbers, 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35' and 'All Along the Watchtower'. On August 10, at the end of the Heartbreakers' set and ahead of his own, Dylan surprised the crowd by appearing for their encore. It wasn't altogether a surprise for longtime Dylan fan and commentator Peter Stone Brown, whose internet-posted review painted this picture:

> 'Okay, so Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers are done . . . and you know something's gonna happen because in the darkness you can see an extra mic has been set up on stage and extra amp which when the lights come up turns out to be an old tan Fender Bassman; and the Heartbreakers file back out and there's this guy in white, white cowboy, white shirt and off-white pants and white snakeskin cowboy boots . . . the white is glistening and this roar erupts from the crowd and whoever he is he's got this thing that's been missing from the stage for the past 90 minutes or so and that thing is presence. So a roadie plugs this guy's Fender Stratocaster into that tan amp and the band starts to play "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" and this cowboy dude, well he don't care if Mike Campbell's on the stage or not, he's gonna play that Strat and take one of his raunchy maybe I'll find maybe I won't solos . . . it was kinda like old times.'

[Bob Dylan (with Tom Petty & the Hearbreakers): Farm Aid: rehearsals, LA, 19 Sep, soundcheck Champaign, IL, 21 Sep & performance 22 Sep 1985; 'Band of the Hand (It's Hell Time Man!)', Sydney, 8–10 Feb 1986, MCA 52811 (12-inch MCA 23633), US, Apr 1986 & on soundtrack album Band of the Hand, MCA 6167, US, May 1986; Band of the Hand, dir. Paul Michael Glaser, film & video release RCA/Columbia Pictures, Apr 1986. Film & video of Hard to Handle, dir. Gillian Armstrong, US, 1986, broadcast HBO, US, 20 Jun 1986; video release CBS/FOX 3502, US, Oct 1986. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, pp.148 & 152. Olof Bjorner quoted from www.bjorner.com/86-1.htm#Intro, seen online 28 Jun 2005; Peter Stone Brown quoted from http://my.execpc.com/~billp61/081003r.html, seen online 6 Nov 2005.]

'Tomorrow Is a Long Time' There is a widely reprinted poem Dylan seems to have come across 'from the fifteenth century', not in this case Italian but English, and anonymous, which has been given the title 'Western Wind' (though in its own day poems weren't titled). Dylan has taken heed of this 'Western Wind' in his early song 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time'. Each of his three verses ends 'Only if she was lyin' by me / Would I lie in my bed once again.' The poem from 500 years earlier, in its entirety, runs like this: 'Western wind, when will thou blow / The small rain down can rain? / Christ, if my love were in my arms / And I in my bed again!'

The poem has been disseminated orally, like a folksong, for most of its history (in fact it's a fine example of the lack of separation between folk and literary culture), but it exists as a manuscript (British Museum MS. Royal Appendix 58) and has been collected repeatedly in 20th century anthologies, including both the Arthur Quiller-Couch Oxford Book of English Verse (1900–1930, 1939 and 1943, in which it has been titled 'The Lover in Winter Plaineth for the Spring') and the Helen Gardner New Oxford Book of English Verse, 1972.

Known Dylan performances and recordings of 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time' are as follows: private recording at the home of DAVE WHITAKER, Minnesota, August 11, 1962 (circulated only in very poor quality); as a Witmark music-publishing demo NY, December 1962; as one of three songs performed on WBAI Radio, NYC (on the Skip Weshner Show 'Wireless Waves') February 1963 and, exquisitely, 'live' at the New York Town Hall Concert, April 12, 1963; this version was released on Greatest Hits Volume II. It was also recorded, again privately at Dave Whitaker's in Minneapolis, on July 17, 1963 (uncirculated).

Dylan rehearsed the song nearly 15 years later, in Santa Monica, CA, January 27 & 30, 1978, and reintroduced it to concerts on the first night of the 1978 world tour, in Tokyo, February 20. He also sang it in Auckland, New Zealand, March 9, but by the time the tour reached Australia (March 12 to April 1) he had dropped it.

He reintroduced the song in concert again another nine years later, in Gothenburg, Sweden, on September 25, 1987, performing it 11 times during his fall tour of Europe that year. He played it just once in the first year of the Never-Ending Tour, 1988 (at Saratoga Springs, June 26), twice in 1989 and half a dozen times in 1990 before dropping it altogether again for another five years straight. One performance in 1997, but six in 1998, seven in 1999 and a positive flurry of 11 in 2000; then three in 2001, five in 2002 and none in the two years that followed. It received one performance—in Boston on April 15—in 2005.

ELVIS PRESLEY recorded 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time' in Nashville in 1966 (the sessions include musicians Floyd Cramer, PETE DRAKE & CHARLIE McCOY). In June 1969 Rolling Stone asked Dylan whether there were any particular artists he liked to do versions of his songs; he replied (and was widely assumed to be joking at the time), 'Yeah, Elvis Presley. I liked Elvis Presley. Elvis Presley recorded a song of mine. That's the one recording I treasure the most . . . it was called "Tomorrow Is a Long Time". I wrote it but never recorded it.'

Asked which Presley album this track was on, Dylan replied, 'Kismet'. This was existentially correct: it was released as a 'bonus track' filling out the 'soundtrack album' for the awful mid-60s film Spinout, in Europe titled California Holiday. 'Kismet' was a song on the soundtrack LP of an even worse mid-60s Presley film, MGM's 1965 Harum Scarum, in Europe titled Harem Holiday.

[Elvis Presley: 'Tomorrow Is a Long Time', Nashville, 25–28 May 1966, Spinout, Victor LPM/LSP-3702, NY (California Holiday, RCA SF 7820, London), 1966. Film Spinout, aka California Holiday, MGM, dir. Norman Taurog, 1966. Elvis Presley: 'Kismet', Nashville, 24–25 Feb 1965, Harum Scarum, RCA Victor LPM/LSP-3468, NY (Harem Holiday, RCA RD/SF 7767, London), 1965.]

Trager, Oliver [1957 -] Oliver Trager was born in 1957. After art school, hitching and riding freight trains (it says here) to Alaska and back, 'seeing the other side of life, seeking the quicksilver in the great American starry dynamo night', 'Tripping the night fantastic of the sidewalks of New York' and graduating from college with a BA in English Literature, Trager worked in publishing for some years and 'eventually scored a job at Facts on File, Inc.' He is also the author of The American Book of the Dead: The Definitive GRATEFUL DEAD Encyclopedia (1997) and of the invaluable Dig Infinity!: The Life and Art of LORD BUCKLEY (2002). In 2004 came Keys to the Rain: The Definitive Bob Dylan Encyclopedia—a title that seems oblique ('keys to the rain'?) and serves to smother the uppity subtitle. The book is, naturally enough, far from definitive: why claim any different? It received very mixed reviews, and here is another, starting with the down wing.

Inevitably there are errors. There may be more in the present work than in Trager's. Facts are sometimes slippery by nature, at other times so small as to make it pedantic to poke at them, and any wide-ranging book will offer as facts generalisations or ellipses that the lifelong specialist in one sub-zone of it will regard as not quite accurate enough. But there's a sliding scale of these things, and works of reference shouldn't slide too far. It may not matter that 'I Can't Get You Off of My Mind' by HANK WILLIAMS was recorded on November 6, 1947, not in December 1948: but ELVIS PRESLEY certainly did not record 'Mystery Train' on Sun in 1953, and errors of that order make the reader distrustful.

The book proceeds song by song, which, while fine it itself, means that without an index it's often hard to locate the information on a particular person, unless you already know which song their details will be lurking within. Each entry is augmented by utterly meaningless, useless lists of who else has covered each song. There is also an absurd amount of reliance, albeit acknowledged, on one book, Dorothy Horstman's Sing Your Heart Out, Country Boy (1975), and a tendency towards some rather obvious—and unacknowledged—paraphrasing. Here is MICHAEL GRAY's Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan, on a 1979 outtake from Slow Train Coming: '. . . the nuggety little "Trouble in Mind", which alone would be sufficient to prove that Christian faith, despite one's fears to the contrary, did not dull Dylan's cutting edge.' And here's Trager on the same song: '. . . this edgy little nugget of evangelical Dylan blues . . . further confirms that the euphoric rush ccompanying Dylan's salvation did not dull his creative flame.'

Some of the omissions seem rather obvious too. There's plenty of material about JOHNNIE & JACK, and an unhurried entry on the "Love and Theft" track 'Tweedle Dee & Tweedle Dum', but no mention that the music on Dylan's recording is very closely based on Johnnie & Jack's 1961 record 'Uncle John's Bongos'.

The book is also scarred by the revolting prose of the 'Introduction: Something Is Happening' (e.g.: 'You stop in the St. James Hotel for a beer to find LENNY BRUCE and Lord Buckley sharing a bill with SKIP JAMES, ROBERT JOHNSON, and Moondog. Outside, the Fortune Telling Lady hands you the Jack of Hearts and points to Desolation Row . . .'), while Trager's comments on Dylan's own songs are more or less completely useless: and always offered as if any old observation will do—as if a bank manager can turn his hand to art criticism just as casually. This is, to adopt Mark Dery's phrase, drive-by cultural criticism.

Sometimes the Intro prose and the comments on Dylan songs are the same. This is the start of the entry on 'Get Your Rocks Off!' (p.204): 'At once menacing and ribald, "Get Your Rocks Off!" as performed by Dylan and THE HAWKS picks up where every old-maid-theme limerick leaves off and takes a stroll down every back lane in Appalachia before stopping for some ale at a burlesque house featuring a Brothers Grimm playlet.'

And yet there's certainly an up wing. There is, to start with, the generous and above all resourceful use of photographs and illustrations, which consistently present the unusual without ever straining for relevance. Now and then, too, an entry on a Dylan-related subject is uncharacteristically lucid and useful: for example on Dylan's book Drawn Blank. Then there is the sheer amount of ground covered, the sheer number of text entries, which even if those on Dylan's own canon were dashed off as speedily as they indicate, still must have involved great labour and result in a considerable achievement, if not of original research then at least of assemblage: particularly since the great value of the book lies not in what is has to say about Dylan or rock music but in its portraits of the whiskery, tragic eccentrics, renegade old rounders, baby-faced boys and implacable peckerwoods who have composed and written the other songs Dylan has brought within his repertoire. Here Trager opens up another window onto what GREIL MARCUS has called 'the old, weird America', 'the invisible republic'. As JOHN

HINCHEY has noted: 'blurbs on the book ignore this element in it—but it's fascinating in itself and it does bear on the artistic and cultural milieu that has fed Dylan's art. . . . to my mind, it's the best thing about this book.'

This is true, and it's enough to make it one of the Dylan books you need.

[Oliver Trager: The American Book of the Dead, Fireside, 1997; Dig Infinity!: The Life and Art of Lord Buckley, New York: Welcome Rain, 2002; Keys to the Rain: The Definitive Bob Dylan Encyclopedia, New York: Billboard, 2004. Quotes in the 1st para are from Trager, 'Examining the Nightingale's Code', The Bridge no.22, Tyne & Wear, UK, summer 2005. John Hinchey, e-mail to this writer, 14 Aug 2005.]

Traum, Happy [1938 -] Harry Peter Traum was born in the Bronx, New York, on May 9, 1938. He became a singer, songwriter, guitarist and banjo player, and met Dylan in 1961, the year the latter arrived in New York.

Traum joined THE NEW WORLD SINGERS (the other members, already forming the group, were GIL TURNER, Bob Cohen and Delores Dixon) after they'd returned from Mississippi with 'new freedom songs' in 1962. These were published in the new street-cred folk magazine Broadside, which Gil Turner co-edited while also working at Gerde's Folk City. In Chronicles Volume One Dylan calls the New World Singers 'a group I was pretty close with' and says that Delores Dixon was the 'sort of part-time girl-friend' with whom he attended the farewell party for CISCO HOUSTON that he describes so vividly in the book's first section. Dixon, he says, 'was from Alabama, an ex-reporter and an ex-dancer.'

Dylan played at the Broadside Show of May 1962, performing 'Ballad of Donald White', 'The Death of Emmett Till' and an early 'Blowin' in the Wind', this last with back-up vocals by Turner, Sis Cunningham and PETE SEEGER. He is supposed to have taken the melody for 'Blowin' in the Wind' from the version of 'No More Auction Block' that he had heard sung by the New World Singers, with lead vocal by Delores Dixon. They, in turn, claimed to be first to record it (though in fact the Chad Mitchell Trio beat them to it).

Happy Traum and Dylan first recorded together on January 24, 1963, almost certainly at the Folkways studio at 147 West 46th Street, New York City. The New World Singers were recording material for Broadside magazine's benefit. When they finished, Dylan recorded 'Masters of War' (it was this new song's first studio outing, and three months to the day before he would cut it at Columbia's studios for The Freewheelin' Bob Dylan). Then, to Traum's surprise, Dylan wanted him to record 'I Will Not Go Down Under the Ground', later re-named 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps'. He'd never encountered the song before, but Dylan had the words written down and they went through it a couple of times and in the end recorded it together, with Traum singing lead and Dylan on harmony vocals and guitar. This first recording partnership was released as a track on the obscure various-artists compilation Broadside Ballads, Vol. 1, that September, with Dylan billed as Blind Boy Grunt.

Dylan allowed the magazine to publish 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps' in its third issue, and it's generally been stated in Dylan annals that this recording was made at Broadside's office: but 'office' was basically a grand term for what was actually a corner of Sis Cunningham's apartment. Traum is certain that this is not where the recording took place: that the venue was the Folkways studio. (Others, though, remember other recordings being made in that 'office' on a tape-recorder there: Josh Dunson describes such a session in Broadside no.20, which ROBERT SHELTON quotes at length in his Dylan biography No Direction Home: a session at which Gil Turner and Dylan both sang onto the tape. So one person's certainty is another person's misremembrance. These things are rarely indisputable facts.)

At any rate, Dylan probably knew from Gil Turner that 'I Will Not Go Down Under the Ground' was a song that would have special resonance for Traum, because while both Turner and Traum had been arrested at a protest at City Hall Park against the mandatory civil defence drills in the City in 1961—you had to go down into the subway when the alarm sirens wailed—Turner had merely been fined but Traum had served a month on a work farm (an unusually close brush with the kind of oppression so much sung about in the revivalist repertoire). From May to June 1961 he was doing the shocking and unpleasant work of disinterring bodies and reburying them in bigger piles at the New York City Workhouse, on Hart Island, off the Bronx, which was the City Cemetery for unclaimed corpses known then and now as 'Potter's Field'. (Though no longer a work-house, the Department of Correction still runs the 101-acre island's cemetery site, and burials are still conducted using prison-inmate labour. Hart Island is closed to the public.)

Around the same time as recording 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps' together there was a longer informal get-together at which Dylan was taped performing 12 songs, backed by Traum and Turner. The date is uncertain but it was in January or February 1963. Again the venue has been the subject of dispute. It has often been claimed that it was recorded in the basement at Gerde's Folk City, but in a 1996 e-mail interview Traum was unapologetically vague about many a detail but quite certain that the venue had been Gil Turner's apartment in the East Village. He reconfirmed this in October 2005.

At any rate, while Dylan performs on all 12 songs, Traum sings back-up vocals on 'Masters of War' and the LEADBELLY song 'Keep Your Hands Off Her', and Turner sings behind Dylan on the last song, the MEMPHIS JUG BAND's 'Stealin', Stealin''. Traum also plays banjo on five songs. The tape of this session was one of the earliest to circulate among collectors, and was known as The Banjo Tape.

Dylan used to turn up at Gerde's Folk City when the New World Singers had week-long stints there, and would sometimes perform with the group during their late sets in those weeks. In late 1963, when the group released its eponymously titled début album (on, weirdly, Atlantic Records) its sleevenotes were specially written by Dylan, who had offered to do them. These notes emerged in his then-familiar Guthriesque prose-poem style, starting with the ingenuous lines 'I aint a record note writer—I never was, never will be an never wanna be / but that's ok tho cause the New World Singers ain't record note writer's subjects', and running through sideswipes at PETER, PAUL & MARY and his own manager, ALBERT GROSSMAN ('they ain't no tin pan alley put together group'), but also reminiscing about his early encounters with Gil Turner, Bob Cohen and Happy Traum, of whom he writes: 'I met "Happy Traum" an' his wife . . . an' I can remember when their baby girl Merry was born an' now she's over a year old an' with one laugh out a beautiful Merry you'd know why Happy wants a new an' better world . . . Happy's got the reason right there in his eyeview . . . closer to it than a lot of us are.'

That New World Singers album included one of the first covers of 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', and this was also issued as a single (coupled with their version of the JOHN HERALD song 'Stewball'). It wasn't a hit, and the group disbanded in 1964.

Though Traum and Dylan didn't record together again until the start of the 1970s, it was in the period from summer 1966 until Dylan's move to the West Coast that they knew each other best. Both were living in Woodstock, New York, with their families, and saw a fair amount of each other. (The Traums spent summer 1966 in nearby Bearsville, got reacquainted with Dylan then and there, spent a second summer there in 1967 and decided to move to Woodstock permanently that fall.)

Between 1967 and 1970 Traum was the editor of Sing Out! magazine (following the resignation of IRWIN SILBER), and at some point in spring 1968, Dylan approached Traum to ask if they would like to run an interview with him. He said he was being hounded by the big papers, the rock papers, and pressed by the record company, but would prefer to give any interview to Sing Out! In June and July 1968, Happy Traum and JOHN COHEN duly conducted the three interviews with Dylan that appeared in the magazine as one feature, 'Conversations with Bob Dylan', that October. Its appearance surprised many Dylan followers, who had never expected to see him again in the pages of this New York folk magazine.

Happy Traum, and his presumably less happy younger brother Artie, signed to Albert Grossman's management company as a guitar duo and issued their début album, Happy & Artie Traum in 1970, followed by Double Back in 1971, Hard Times in the Country in 1975 (with sleevenotes by ALLEN GINSBERG: the same year he wrote some for Dylan's Desire album) and, decades later, The Test of Time in 1994.

Early on in this partnership they were able to access large live audiences by being a support act to THE BAND and other headline acts. Later they were both also in the Woodstock Mountains Revue, which issued the cassette-only release Mud Acres: Music Among Friends in 1972, the album More Music from Mud Acres in 1977, Pretty Lucky in 1978 and finally Back to Mud Acres in 1981.

But whereas Artie had played banjo before taking up acoustic guitar, and had come up first through the True Endeavor Jug Band (which included DANNY KALB, and made the 1963 album The Art of the Jug Band), and then been in a group called Bear (which included STEVE SOLES, and issued the 1968 album Greetings, Children of Paradise: the perfect 1968 title!), Happy had taken other musical trails, all keeping closer to the main highways of folk. These had included going over to Harlem to take guitar lessons from BROWNIE McGHEE from 1958 to 1960 and then, as noted, joining the New World Singers. His subsequent solo albums include Relax Your Mind, which came out in 1975 and featured entirely traditional material except for the title track, a LEADBELLY song, and on which he played 12-string as well as 6-string guitar (but no banjo); American Stranger (1977, and including Dylan's 'Buckets of Rain'), Bright Morning Stars (1979, including Dylan's 'I Shall Be Released' and RICHARD MANUEL) and Friends and Neighbors (1982, and including LARRY CAMPBELL), plus the compilation CD Buckets of Songs.

In 1971 Happy Traum was, with Dylan, among the back-up musicians for Ginsberg when he performed on the PBS-TV show 'Allen Ginsberg & Friends' late that October, and again at the Record Plant in November (this time with Artie too), backing Ginsberg on nine audio tracks.

More significantly, Traum and Dylan had been back together in the studios that September, yielding very relaxed—some would say sloppy—revisits to Dylan's awful early song 'Only a Hobo' (four takes and an incomplete one, all still uncirculated), plus three of the 1967 Basement Tapes songs, 'You Ain't Goin' Nowhere', 'Down in the Flood' and 'I Shall Be Released', with Traum on bass, banjo, second guitar and vocal harmony. These were issued on Bob Dylan's Greatest Hits Vol. II in November 1971, and the sleevenotes say they were recorded that October; the date has been revised by discographers to September 24, 1971.

These days, though Happy Traum still performs, mostly he and his wife run Homespun Tapes, which they founded in 1967: a mail-order company with a catalogue of 400 music-instruction lessons on audio cassette, CD and video, all taught by performing musicians and produced by Happy Traum. Dylan was prescient, then, in his sleeve-note poem, glimpsing that Traum had a home life of value not attained by 'a lot of us': not many folk or rock musicians have been with the same marital partner for over 40 years.

In 2005 Traum also recorded and released a new CD, his first for over 20 years, produced by brother Artie, again featuring Larry Campbell, an old friend of many years' standing, and including Dylan's Nashville Skyline song 'Tonight I'll Be Staying Here with You'. He last met up with Dylan backstage at Madison Square Garden when the Never-Ending Tour came through there (with Larry Campbell in Bob's band at the time) on November 19, 2001.

[Happy Traum: Relax Your Mind, Kicking Mule SNKF 111, US, 1975; American Stranger, Kicking Mule SNKF 142, US, 1977; Bright Morning Stars, Greenhays GR703, US, 1979; Friends and Neighbors, Vest Pocket VP-001, US, 1982; Buckets of Songs, Shanachie nia, US, 1987; Roaring Steam IW01, US, 2005. Happy & Artie Traum: Happy & Artie Traum, Capitol 586, US, 1970; Double Back, Capitol 799, 1971; Hard Times in the Country, Rounder 3007, US, 1975; CD The Test of Time, Roaring Steam 201, US, 1994. The Woodstock Mountains Revue: Mud Acres: Music Among Friends, Rounder 3001 (cassette), US, 1972; More Music from Mud Acres, Rounder 3018, US, 1977; Pretty Lucky, Rounder 3025, 1978; Back to Mud Acres, Rounder 3065, 1981; CD compilation from these 4 is Woodstock Mountains: Music from Mud Acres, Rounder 11520, 1995.

Happy Traum & Bob Dylan: 'I Will Not Go Down Under the Ground', NY, 24 Jan 1963, Broadside Ballads, Vol. 1, Broadside BR 301, NY, Sep 1963, reissued 5-CD box set The Best of Broadside 1962–1988, Smithsonian/Folkways SFW CD 40130, Washington, D.C., 2000. New World Singers (with Dylan liner notes): The New World Singers, Atlantic 8087, NY, 1963; 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right' c/w 'Stewball', NY, 1963, Atlantic 2190, NY, 1963. John Cohen & Happy Traum: 'Conversations with Bob Dylan', Sing Out! no.18, Oct-Nov 1968, New York, pp.6–23, 27. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.64. E-mail interview with Traum by Manfred Helfert, Feb 1996; seen online 21 Oct 2005 at www.bobdylanroots.com/traum.html. Josh Dunson in Broadside no.20, quoted from Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life & Music of Bob Dylan, Penguin edn., pp.139–40. Most information, much of it contradicting assertions within the Smithsonian Folkways online biographies for Traum and the New World Singers, by e-mails & phone call between Traum & this writer 21, 22 & 24 Oct 2005.]

Traveling Wilburys, the [1988 - 1990] A jovial and unexpected grouping of superstars—originally Bob Dylan, GEORGE HARRISON, the rather less super JEFF LYNNE, the great ROY ORBISON and, bringing down the group's average age a little, TOM PETTY—who combined to make a few warm, likeable tracks together, added a few filler tracks and made an album which, to everyone's surprise, went platinum. George created the group by accident, in early April 1988. Over lunch, he happened to ask Lynne if he knew of a studio available quickly for recording a bonus track for a European 12-inch single track to go with his just-completed solo album Cloud Nine; Lynne suggested Dylan's Malibu studio; en route there George retrieved a guitar from Tom Petty, who came along too. Lynne was producing Orbison's Mystery Girl album at the time, and Roy came too. They ended up with the jointly composed 'Handle with Care' (with added drums and guitar from IAN WALLACE and MIKE CAMPBELL), and instead of this turning out to be the bonus track on Harrison's 12-inch singe, it became the first track on Traveling Wilburys Volume 1. The rest of the album was put together in LA that May, at DAVE STEWART's home studio, and released on October 18. Lynne and Harrison, the producers, did some overdubbing later, in England. JIM KELTNER played the drums; RAY COOPER added percussion; Jim Horn played saxophone.

If it came as a relief to everyone involved that they weren't required to deliver anything sensational within the group, it certainly came as a relief to Dylan, who was, at the time, going through a particularly bad patch. The album of his own on which work was just completed when the Wilburys sprang into being, and which would be released two weeks after the Wilburys album was cut, was Down in the Groove. Lumbering along behind, and released in February 1989, was Dylan & the Dead. As Dylan notes in Chronicles Volume One, while complaining of the struggle to make Oh Mercy and the poor sales it would attract: 'Although the record wouldn't put me back on the map in radio land, ironically I had two records in the charts, even one in the top ten, The Traveling Wilburys. The other one was the Dylan & the Dead album.'

If Dylan was free, as Lucky Wilbury, to chip in uncommittedly with minor bits of singing, guitar-work and composing—'Give us some lyrics, you famous lyricist,' George had said on day one—this freedom paid off. He played an easy, warm rhythm guitar throughout; he shared lead vocals on, and co-wrote, 'Handle with Care'; he took lead vocals on, and mostly wrote, 'Dirty World', 'Congratulations' (see separate entry) and 'Tweeter & the Monkey Man'. He lent a hand with the rest—and in doing so helped propel Roy Orbison (Lefty Wilbury) to the Indian summer of success he deserved, not least with the album's one fine Orbisonian vehicle, 'Not Alone Anymore'. In October, in LA, they all made a promo video for 'Handle with Care', and two months later, thanks to the album's success, they needed another, choosing to go with the far less charming 'End of the Line'. It should have been. It already was for Orbison. He died on December 6.

The next single, in June 1990, was the old Cy Coben and Mel Foree song 'Nobody's Child', recorded during the album sessions but as a one-off charity fundraiser for the Romanian Angel Appeal, in which the wives of George and RINGO STARR were involved, to help in some tiny way to relieve the horrendous suffering, physical and mental, of orphans locked inside inhumane institutions in an especially neglected, dictatorship-pillaged corner of eastern Europe. The B-side of the record was by Dave Stewart. It wasn't a great success. 'She's My Baby', the next single, was also the opening track of the follow-up album, wittily titled Traveling Wilburys Volume 3, recorded at Bel Air, California, in April 1990, with overdubs in July, again done in England, and released that October. Jim Keltner again plays drums, Ray Cooper percussion and Jim Horn sax; this time Gary Moore adds guitar. Again, Harrison and Lynne produced.

Dylan—this time Boo Wilbury—is as prominent on 'She's My Baby' and 'Inside Out' as he gets anywhere on this album, but there's nothing here anyone but a completist could need. Outtakes from both albums have circulated, with more Dylan vocals and less clutter, including a mix of 'She's My Baby' on which he takes lead vocal throughout; but these still suggest themselves as items fairly near the bottom of any bootlegs shopping list.

The cliché about the Traveling Wilburys is that it was all such good fun, and so much better than if its members had tried to make an important record; but test this argument by imagining the prospect of six, or nine, or 12 Wilburys albums. OLIVER TRAGER articulates this 'Hey, whatever!' approach very handily: he calls the first album 'a down-to-earth, everyman collection even your stodgy great aunt might find herself tapping her toes to.' That's exactly what's wrong with it. And what kind of yard-stick would Trager's improbable great aunt be? She'd tap her toes to the Archies.

The cheerily inconsequential only gets you so far, and even a second album, especially without Orbison, was pushing things—as their promo videos proved. There are few things more depressing than watching, back to back, the wretched descent of these items from the inoffensive novelty of 'Handle with Care' down past 'End of the Line', 'She's My Baby' and 'Inside Out' (both 1990) to the abject desperation of 'The Wilbury Twist' in early 1991—a desperation confessed by their having paid John Candy to make a cameo appearance. He stands there and twists, under his customary delusion that merely being a fat person makes him funny. You sit there and squirm, wondering what this flaccid, bleary concoction can possibly have to do with a great artist. 'Hey, whatever!' doesn't answer that.

[The Traveling Wilburys: Traveling Wilburys Volume 1, Wilburys Warner Bros. 9 25796, US, 1988; 'Nobody's Child', Warner Bros. 9 26280-2, US, 1990; Traveling Wilburys Volume 3, Wilburys Warner Bros. 9 26324, US, 1990. Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.218. Oliver Trager: Keys to the Rain: The Definitive Bob Dylan Encyclopedia, New York: Billboard, 2004, p.639.]

Travers, Mary [1936 -] See Peter, Paul & Mary.

'Trouble in Mind' [1979] This Dylan song was recorded on the first day of the Slow Train Coming sessions but released only as the B-side of the single of 'Gotta Serve Somebody'. It suggested at once that Christian faith, despite one's fears to the contrary, did not dull Dylan's cutting edge. This is gospel with a real blues slouch to it, and the Dylan burn is here, delivered with as much italicized sarcasm as anything from the mid-60s repertoire: 'Well the deeds that you do don't add up to zero / It's what's inside that counts, ask any war-hero / You think you can hide but you're never alone / Ask Lot what he thought when his wife turned to stone.'

The mention of Lot's wife is a nicely achieved double reference. Primarily, it refers to the story in Genesis in which God says He will spare Lot, his wife and two daughters when He destroys the depraved cities of Sodom and Gomorrah with a hard rain of brimstone and fire: 'And it came to pass, when they [angels] had brought them forth abroad, that he said, Escape for thy life; look not behind thee . . . lest thou be consumed. . . . But his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt' (Genesis 19:17 & 26).

Yet when Dylan remembers Lot and his wife in 'Trouble in Mind', to illustrate the assertion 'You think you can hide but you're never alone', he is also, consciously and with good humour, paralleling Luke, who famously exhorts us, and with memorable brevity (it's one of the Bible's shortest verses) to 'Remember Lot's wife' (Luke 17:32).

'Trouble in Mind' quotes much scripture verbatim too: in calling Satan 'prince of the power of the air', it quotes directly Ephesians 2:2; in singing that Satan will make you 'worship the work of your own hands' Dylan echoes one of God's frequent, basic litanies against idolatry, expressed specifically in parallel in Isaiah 2:8: '. . . they worship the work of their own hands', and in Jeremiah 1:16: 'And I will utter my judgments against them . . . who have . . . worshipped the work of their own hands.'

In listing what else Satan will bring upon you, Dylan also has in mind (from the book of Leviticus) a text he uses with a contrasting calm and compassion in 'I Pity the Poor Immigrant'. In 'Trouble in Mind' Dylan sings that Satan will condemn you to 'serving strangers in a strange and forsaken land'.

Becoming an 'immigrant' like this is one of God's punishments for those who disregard his commandments: '. . . and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass. . . . And your strength shall be spent in vain . . . and ye shall eat, and not be satisfied. . . . And I will scatter you among the heathen. . . . And ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up.'

The phrase 'a stranger in a strange land' itself comes from Exodus 2:22.

(For God's recurrent exhortation to His people to treat such strangers with kindness, see 'Covenant Woman' and 'Pretty Boy Floyd'.)

The final verse of the recording of 'Trouble in Mind' is edited out of the issued single, but its lyric appears in Bob Dylan Lyrics 1962–1985 and Bob Dylan Lyrics 1962–2001. The penultimate verse would have been the better omission, since, unlike the rest, the preaching is not sculpted by poetry and wit, but comes spluttering out in gobs of ugly prose ('They can't relate to the Lord's kingdom, they can't relate to the cross. / They self-inflict punishment on their own broken lives'). This track could usefully have been reissued on 1985's Biograph box set, but wasn't. Dylan has never performed the song in concert.

[Bob Dylan: 'Trouble in Mind', Sheffield, AL, 30 Apr 1979 (+ overdubs 5 & 6 May), c/w 'Gotta Serve Somebody', Columbia 1-11072, NY (CBS S CBS 7828, London), 1979. Quotations from Leviticus: 26:19, 20, 26, 33 & 38.]

Turner, Gil [1933 - 1974] Gilbert Strunk was born in Bridgeport, Connecticut, on May 6, 1933. He majored in Political Science at the University of Bridgeport and later wrote papers on the use of music in treating autism in children and on rheumatoid arthritis, from which he suffered himself. A singer, banjoist and guitarist—indeed a 'player of anything with string on it', as a promo leaflet for him once said—who learnt guitar partly from the REV. GARY DAVIS, he was an early member of Broadside magazine's editorial board (its founding main editors were Agnes 'Sis' Cunningham and Gordon Friesen), helped to organise the initial Broadside album and was responsible for bringing on board artists like MARK SPOELSTRA, Bonnie Dobson, PHIL OCHS and LEN CHANDLER, and young writers like Julius Lester and Josh Dunson as well as Dylan, who was a friend early on in his Greenwich Village days.

ROBERT SHELTON says that Turner was one of those Dylan turned to in particular after SUZE ROTOLO left for Italy, but that they had been good friends since late 1961 and remained so 'for two years'. Shelton portrays Turner as a 'portly, open-faced, wholesome-looking man . . . son of a former opera singer' who had been a Baptist preacher before PETE SEEGER showed him a 'wider pastorate'. He was 'an experienced congregational singing leader' with 'a large, warm baritone'. It was with Shelton and Dylan that Turner would, several times a week, hang out at the White Horse Tavern or elsewhere after Gerde's closed at around midnight. Shelton also recalls that it was to the same comrades that in 1963 Dylan said that if he made any money he'd fly them over to Italy: 'We'll drink red wine, night and day, until we explode', Dylan told Shelton and Turner.

Actively involved in civil rights marches in the South during the early 1960s, a member of SNCC and the War Resisters League, Turner helped to organize the Mississippi Freedom Caravan of Music and the New York Council of Performing Arts. He was, with Bob Cohen, Dolores Dixon and, slightly later, HAPPY TRAUM, a member of the New World Singers. He composed the anthemic 'Carry It On' (which was widely covered: it is, for example, on JUDY COLLINS' Fifth Album from 1965 and is used as the title of a JOAN BAEZ movie); he also wrote 'Benny Kid Paret', a song contemporaneous with Dylan's 'Who Killed Davey Moore?' about another boxer (the world welterweight champion) who died from wounds to the head sustained in a knock-out in the ring in March 1962. (It was ironic that the professional name he had himself chosen had also belonged to a boxer.) It was, too, Turner who discovered and recorded (within the New World Singers) a previously unnoticed WOODY GUTHRIE song, 'Bizzness Ain't Dead'.

At the same time as working at Broadside, Gil Turner was hosting the Monday night hootenannies at Gerde's Folk City when, on April 16, 1962, Dylan, accompanied by DAVID BLUE, brought him a song he'd just written, called 'Blowin' in the Wind'. Turner was thus the first person to sing it in front of an audience. (See separate entry on the song.) That fall, he wrote an article in Sing Out!, 'Bob Dylan—a new voice singing new songs', which was the issue's cover story; the front shows a photo of young Bob drawing on a cigarette and looking Guthriesquely cool. Turner's article begins by quoting lines from Dylan's 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps' and goes on to stress that for him, beyond Dylan's talents as 'a noteworthy folk performer with a bright future', his real significance is as a songwriter. And in the recorded discussion between Dylan, Seeger, Turner and Sis Cunningham at the Broadside show that May, Turner tries to explain one of that songwriting's special strengths—one of its innovations—as he saw it. Speaking of 'The Ballad of Donald White', Turner says: 'I feel about Bob Dylan's songs very often that Bob is actually a kind of folk mind that he represents to all the people around. And all the ideas current are just filtered down and come out in poetry. For example, one song he wrote about the fellow that asked to be put into an institution, what was his name—White?'

Dylan says yes, and that White is dead now, and Turner, addressing Dylan directly now, says: ‘For example, you put in one line, you say the institutions were overcrowded. And I just couldn’t see that appearing in a traditional ballad stanza before you sang it. And it’s actually the first song I could think of, a modern song, that uses the ideas of the 20th century Freudian psychology, the ideas of people being afraid of life, in actually a folk song.’ Seeger interrupts, to say, ‘Instead of talking about it, let’s hear it,’ but Turner finishes his point, saying: ‘Well, I think this particular song is historical in the sense that it’s the first psychological song of the modern generation I’ve heard.’

After Dylan goes ahead and sings ‘The Ballad of Donald White’ he sings ‘The Death of Emmett Till’ and then Turner, along with Seeger and Cunningham, add back-up vocals as Dylan performs ‘Blowin’ in the Wind’. In January or February 1963, Dylan and Turner got together again, along with Happy Traum, to record what became known as The Banjo Tape. (See Traum, Happy; Turner gets several further mentions in this entry.)

Turner moved to California, probably in 1965 (the year his daughter was born in New York), appeared in the National Shakespeare Festival in San Diego in 1966, toured with the company, and worked with many different musicians in this period, including the great ragtime pianist and guitarist Hoyle Osborne. He was scheduled to play Lee Hays in a film biography of WOODY GUTHRIE, and told Kate Wolf (a bit of a feminist icon and a much-loved West Coast folkie, whom Turner had met through friends in Big Sur in 1970) that Will Geer wanted to write him into The Waltons as a singing mountain man. Turner, Wolf and Lionel Kilberg sang and played a concert together, and an album Kilberg and Wolf were recording was subsequently dedicated to Turner. A live version of Turner’s ‘Carry It On’ by Wolf was released in 1996 on a posthumous album (Wolf died in 1986). As Kilberg tells it, in his execrably punctuated sleevenotes to the earlier album:

> ‘At Kirby Cove . . . I met that jovial mountain of song Gil (Jellyroll) Turner, whom I hadn’t seen in 10 years and after a half hour of lying, swearing and making music, he signed me for two appearances with him. The group “Gil (Jellyroll) Turner and the Donut Holes.” I, as you have probably guessed was one of the holes. Two others were Don Coffin and Kate Wolf.’

As this implies, by now Turner had become strikingly overweight; he was also an alcoholic. In the middle of playing on a Shel Silverstein album in 1971 he had to quit session-work after contracting infectious hepatitis. That fall he moved from Marin County to San Francisco to be nearer comprehensive medical facilities. Faith Petric, Godmother of the San Francisco folk scene, remembers that he was living in a room on the ’Frisco waterfront with a small part-dachshund dog that he’d probably rescued when it was dumped off a boat from Australia. When Turner was hospitalized, Petric took in Willie the dog, thinking it would be a short-term visitor; but Turner never came out of hospital, and on September 23, 1974, he died. He was 41. Willie the dog lived on with Faith Petric for 17 more years.

[Gil Turner: ‘Bob Dylan—a new voice singing new songs’, Sing Out!, NY, Oct–Nov 1962; remarks at Broadside show, NY, May 1962, quoted from transcription seen online 19 Aug 2005 at www.edlis.org/twice/threads/donald_white.html. Lionel Kilberg & Kate Wolf with Don Coffin: We Walked By the Water: Sociologically Singing Vol. 6, Shoestryng Records, 1973. Other information from Folk Music: More Than a Song, Kristin Baggelaar & Donald Milton, New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1976; from Faith Petric, e-mail to this writer 26 Oct 2005 & from her newsletter the folknik vol.10, no.6, Nov–Dec 1974, pp.3&5.]

Twitty, Conway [1933 - 1993] Conway Twitty, born Harold Lloyd Jenkins in Friars Point, Mississippi, on September 1, 1933, began as an ELVIS wannabe—sounding like the Elvis of the Sun years—and must have been very badly managed, because after the move into the mainstream and after his first hit, the darkly magnificent million-seller ‘It’s Only Make-Believe’, a no.1 hit in the US and UK on which he managed to sound both tormented and magisterial, he went into a rapid decline in popularity until his resuscitation in the US country market of the 1970s. Yet he cut many fine rock records and ballads, among them the masterly ‘I Hope I Think I Wish’. This, released in 1963, was a clever pop lyric with an innovative use of sub-text, vividly evoking lovelorn gloom and wishful thinking, and it was given perfect performance by Twitty. The arrangement featured a distinctive piano part on very high notes which prefigures that on Dylan’s 1989 Oh Mercy recording ‘What Good Am I?’.

Conway Twitty died from an abdominal aneurysm en route to Nashville from a concert in Branson, Missouri, on June 5, 1993.

[Conway Twitty: ‘It’s Only Make-Believe’, Nashville, TN, 7 May 1958, MGM E/SE 4217, Hollywood (MGM 992, London), 1958; ‘I Hope I Think I Wish’, Nashville, 11 Oct 1962, MGM SE 4709 (MGM 1187, London), 1963. Both Twitty tracks are on the 8-LP box set Conway Twitty—The Rock’N’Roll Years (1956–1963), Bear Family BFX 15174 (9), Vollersode, Germany, 1985.]

‘Two Soldiers’ [1993] See American Civil War in World Gone Wrong, the.

U2 Inexplicably successful Irish rock group formed in 1980, fronted by one of the world's most self-important and vain celebrities, Bono (rhymes with con-oh, rather than with oh-no).

By the time Dylan was touring in 1984, more or less anyone could join him on stage, and at the open-air concert at Slane Castle, Ireland, on July 8, 1984, even Bono did, appearing during the encore to offer some shared vocals on 'Blowin' in the Wind', undeterred by not knowing any of the words. (Leslie Dowdell also shared the vocals with Dylan and our friend.) This was the last song on the last night of the 1984 European tour. Thus it finished, you might say if you were very rude, not with a bang but with a wanker.

Dylan met U2's guitarist the Edge at this time too, and the Edge sat in on the interview that Bono conducted with Dylan at Slane published in Hot Press no. 26, Dublin, 1984.

U

On April 20, 1987, Dylan was a guest at a U2 concert in LA, and shared vocals with Bono on 'I Shall Be Released' and 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door', and at some point the following month, for a U2 recording session, went into Sun Studios in Memphis to play harmonica and lend background vocals to 'Love Rescue Me', which he co-wrote; a year later he returned to the studios (this time in Hollywood) to play Hammond organ for U2 on the track 'Hawkmoon 269'. Both were released on their album Rattle and Hum, Island Records 7 91003-1, US, in October 1988.

When you deplore Dylan's increasing recent resort to tacky showbiz tricks of delivery in live performance, one quick listen to U2's live version of 'All Along the Watchtower', from the same album, reminds you that there are all kinds of cheap posturings and vulgarities that are stock in trade to stadium-rock in general and Bono in particular, and to which Dylan has yet to sink.

Dylan also allowed Bono on stage to play guitar and add (if that's the right word) backing vocals at his second 1989 Dublin concert (June 4) for the last two numbers, 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' and 'Maggie's Farm' (you can imagine); almost ten years later Bono bounced back on stage during Dylan's encore in Las Vegas (March 2, 1999), again sharing vocals and playing guitar on 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'.

In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan refers to Bono as a friend and says extravagantly positive things about his soul, knowledge, conversation and presence. He also credits Bono with having been the first to put him together with DANIEL LANOIS.

In fall 2005 Bono contributed a foreword to a UK book published in association with Mojo magazine, Dylan: Visions, Portraits and Back Pages, though by this point he was generally busy on bigger things. By 2005 Bono had gained the ear of world statesmen and European Union leaders, and could be heard pronouncing on every issue of global politics worthy of his attention. Another Irishman with a dodgy voice, he had become, in fact, the charmless man's BOB GELDOF.

[Dylan on Bono in Chronicles Volume One, pp.172–174. Mark Blake, ed., Dylan: Visions, Portraits and Back Pages, London: Dorling Kindersley/ Penguin, 2005.]

'Uncle John's Bongos' [1961] The record Dylan stole to make 'Tweedle Dee and Tweedle Dum' on "Love and Theft". See Johnnie & Jack.

Under the Red Sky* [1990] The first Dylan album after Oh Mercy shows Dylan characteristically retreating from that album's mainstream production values and safe terrain, and refusing to offer a follow-up. Nevertheless his penchant for recently modish producers has him turn this time to DAVID & DON WAS of Was Not Was, who offer a rougher and less unified sound. It's a pity Dylan pads out the album with some sub-standard rockism ('Wiggle Wiggle' and 'Unbelievable') and the ill-fitting, foggy pop of 'Born in Time', because the core of the album is an adventure into the poetic possibilities of nursery rhyme that is alert, fresh and imaginative, and an achievement that has gone largely unrecognised.

The way Bob Dylan ends the album reflects his continued interest in challenging dividing lines between the song and the recording. This was in evidence on Oh Mercy in 'What was it you wanted? / You can tell me, I'm back' when his vocal returned after an instrumental break, followed by the punning 'let's get it back on the track'. It is in evidence here too. A reminder to the listener that it is a recording is built into the whole structuring of Under the Red Sky. The original vinyl Side 2 begins like a live recording: beginning before the song's beginning, by offering on the tape the ground-pawing noises musicians make just before they start to play, but without allowing you to feel certain if you've overheard genuine pawing or not. At the same time this sense of 'liveness' is undermined by the way that it begins with the smearing sound of this pre-song recording actually being switched on: to remind you that your LP, CD or tape is itself a copy of a tape. As that Side 2 begins, so it ends: like a live recording. For emphasis, every track on the album fades out except the last one. (The best thing about 'God Knows' being the way the shape of the song mocks the sermonising inside it, perhaps unintentionally, the singer has to rant more and more to squeeze the lines in as it works itself up like a sermon: and as soon as he starts to rant, they start fading him out. For the listener, it's as if you're slowly but surely closing the door on a Jehovah's Witness.) Only the last song on the album comes to a final end.

It's a challenge, though, a messy business: because while any pointing at form must distance the listener from content, Dylan's drawing attention to this form, this recording, stresses that the track has been done 'live': which is to make it, by rock's conventions, more 'real'. In turn the irony of this is that, unlike Dylan's early records, none of Under the Red Sky was done live: Dylan's vocals not only include drop-ins and overdubs but these are made as onto one big basic overdub: Dylan was still re-writing till the last possible moment, so that his vocals were added at the mixing stage of the album. Dylan challenges every divide here. All the same, the device of coming to a 'live' finish on the last track of an album on which every other song fades out also dramatises the outrageous last-minute call across another such divide that is, in the lyric, the album's final end: 'Cat's in the Well' has been entirely a third-person narrative, yet its last line is 'Goodnight my love, and may the Lord have mercy on us all.'

That 'Goodnight my love' is so personal it leaps out at you, cutting not only clean through the recording but jumping right out through the song itself. It is the most inspired, simple leave-taking on any of the albums of the artist who has always been incomparable at such leave-takings.

Stand-outs: 'Under the Red Sky' and 'Handy Dandy' (see separate entries), and 'Cat's in the Well'. See also nursery rhyme on *Under the Red Sky.

[Recorded LA, 6 Jan & Mar–Apr 1990; released on CD as Columbia CK 46794 (in Europe as CBS 467188 2 & UK vinyl as Columbia 467188 1), 11 Sep 1990.]

'Under the Red Sky' [song, 1990] With great originality the Under the Red Sky album's purposive, dignified and beautifully performed title song pleaches the poetry of nursery rhyme and folklore, fairytale and the Bible into a 'simple', memorable whole:

> 'There was a little boy and there was a little girl / And they lived in an alley under the red sky. . . . / There was an old man and he lived in the moon / One summer's day he came passing by. . . . / Someday little girl everything for you is gonna be new / Someday little girl you'll have a diamond as big as your shoe. / Let the wind blow low, let the wind blow high / One day the little boy and the little girl were both baked in a pie. . . . / This is the key to the kingdom and this is the town / This is the blind horse that leads you around. / Let the bird sing, let the bird fly / One day the man in the moon went home and the river went dry. . . .'

'There was a little this and there was / he had a little that' is a common formula. Nursery rhymes that begin with it include 'There was a little boy and a little girl', 'There was a little girl, and she had a little curl', 'There was a little hare, and he ate his pasture bare', 'There was a little man, and he had a little gun', 'There was a little man, and he wooed a little maid', 'There was a little maid, and she was afraid', plus the comparable 'Shoe a little horse, shoe a little mare', 'There was a crooked man, and he walked a crooked mile', 'There was an old woman who had a little pig', 'There was a king met a king' and 'There was a mad man and he had a mad wife'. The one that resonates most clearly through 'Under the Red Sky' is 'There was a little boy and a little girl', collected in 1810: 'There was a little boy and a little girl / Lived in an alley. / Says the little boy to the little girl / Shall I, oh shall I? / Says the little girl to the little boy / What shall we do? / Says the little boy to the little girl / I will kiss you!'

In the nursery rhyme, there is time enough for playful romance. Not so today, Dylan seems to suggest, living 'Under the Red Sky': the alley is a narrower, darker place, nearer to the oppressive, narrow habitat of the old American underclass widely described in the blues than the airy playground of the children's clapping song 'Here comes Sally down the alley'. In the blues the alley is even more lowdown than the street, with 'doin' the alley boogie' a Lucille 'Shave 'Em Dry' Bogan speciality. She also sings that 'They call me Pig Iron Sally because I live in Slag Iron Alley: / And I'm evil and mean as I can be.' No place for children; yet of course children also play here, and it's an environment in which boys and girls grow up fast, one kind of game quickly becoming another, as in the fluid BLIND WILLIE McTELL song 'Georgia Rag', where 'Down in Atlanta, on Harris Street / That's where the boys and gals do meet / Out in the alley, out in the street / Every little kid that you meet / Buzz all around like a bee / Shake it like a ship on the sea.'

In 'Under the Red Sky' we are never invited to consider questions of romance between the little boy and the little girl: we are concerned with their very survival—and by extension, our own. All through the song survival is in doubt, with Dylan carefully handing us symbols that may or may not bode ill. As we've seen, the alley is of ambiguous import, and as we shall see too, even being baked in a pie may not be fatal.

In Matthew (16:2–4), Christ invokes the dual symbolism of the red sky when he's berating the corrupt sects of his day and telling them that the only 'sign' they can expect is the Resurrection: 'When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather: for the sky is red. And in the morning, It will be foul weather today: for the sky is red and lowring. O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?'

This might be said to be the key text, and a markedly 'Dylanesque' one, that Dylan is seeking to press home on 'Under the Red Sky' the song and Under the Red Sky the album. Christ's speech continues: 'A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas.' (Christ is here responding not to his own followers but to the Pharisees and the Saducees, who try to get him to show them a sign from heaven, to prove himself, as if they're wanting to join him. This speech is his retort.)

Nursery rhyme, being sometimes more rational than we credit, takes the practical experience related here and boils it down to 'Red sky at night, shepherd's delight / Red sky at morning, shepherd's warning.' A peculiarly apt Indian equivalent is reported by Alexander Frater in his book Chasing the Monsoon. He reports that in the era of the British Empire, officials published a collection of almost 2000 peasants' proverbs (about 25 per cent were monsoon proverbs). Frater meets an antiquarian bookseller who knows this rare book and who tells him that 'the one that best sums it up is, "If the sky fails, the earth will surely fail too."' Bob Dylan's sentiments exactly.

Then there's the moon, and the old man in it. Is he a malign visitor, an incidental player, or the keeper of a benevolent eye upon the little boy and the little girl? STEPHEN SCOBIE's argument, in Alias Bob Dylan, that the moon symbolises some kind of evil intent, seems almost wholly unsupported. From earliest times the moon was beneficial: it was what we measured time by (the sanskrit root me-, to measure, is at the back of the word for moon in all the teutonic languages). In classical mythology the moon is several different heroines, all of them romantic: Hecate before she has risen and after setting, Astarte when crescent, Diana or Cynthia, she who 'hunts the clouds', when in the open vault of heaven (alluded to by Dylan in 'Sara': 'Glamorous nymph with an arrow and bow'), Phoebe the sister of the sun and Selene, or Luna, lover of the sleeping Endymion, when seen as moonlight on the fields.

In the villages of West Africa, as Chinua Achebe's pioneering 1958 novel Things Fall Apart reports, instead of the silence imposed by fear on a dark night, 'a moonlight night . . . would be different. The happy voices of children playing in open fields would then be heard.' The moon is regarded positively in the blues world too. 'Don't the moon look pretty' is recurrent, while in Michael Taft's Blues Lyric Poetry there isn't a single instance of the moon auguring bad news or evil in any of the 2,000 blues records transcribed.

In nursery rhyme too, the moon is contemplated with perfect equanimity, the classics of the genre being 'Boys and girls come out to play / The moon doth shine as bright as day' and 'I see the moon and the moon sees me / God bless the moon and God bless me.' Far from being sinister, or even cold, the moon is a companion for the child. Variants include the British 'I see the moon and the moon sees me / God bless the sailors on the sea,' said like a prayer when moonlight shines in through the child's bedroom window, and the American all's-well avowal of 'I see the moon, the moon sees me / The moon sees somebody I want to see.' Bob Dylan throws his own allusion to this into 'Wiggle Wiggle': its opening verse ends with 'Wiggle till the moon sees you.'

The moon is a friend and a familiar. The expression 'to cry for the moon' began as an allusion not to unreasonable ambition or greed but to children wanting the moon as a plaything. The French equivalent translates as 'He wants to take the moon between his teeth.' The moon is also benign in the legend that everything was saved and treasured there that was wasted and squandered on earth: misspent time, broken vows, unanswered prayers, fruitless tears, unfulfilled desires . . .

As for the man in the moon, he may have an ignominious biblical history but today we might consider him more sinned against than sinning. He's discernible when the moon is eight days old: a figure leaning on a fork, on which he carries a bundle of sticks gathered, sacrilegiously, on a sabbath. Some people also discern a small dog at his feet (which is why, in the Prologue to A Midsummer Night's Dream, 'This man, with lantern, dog and bush of thorn, / Presenteth moonshine'). Another tradition says the man is Cain, his dog and bush being respectively the 'foul fiend' and the thorns and briars of the Fall. Later legend claims that he was banished to the moon for trying to stop people attending mass by throwing his sticks across their path.

He comes from the Old Testament book of Numbers (15:32–36): 'And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the sabbath day. And they . . . brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation. And they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done to him. And the Lord said unto Moses, The man shall be surely put to death; all the congregation shall stone him . . .' And they did.

In nursery rhyme, the man in the moon's past is not held against him and at worst he takes on the moon's 'lunatic' influence, becoming an inspired simpleton, as in the English folksong (printed 1660 and reprinted as a broadside soon after) of which the nursery rhyme 'The man in the moon drinks claret' is the first few lines. In other nursery rhymes, when he is not receiving food, as in 'As I Went Up the Apple Tree', in which 'All the apples fell on me / Bake a pudding, bake a pie / Send it up to John MacKay / John MacKay is not in / Send it up to the man in the moon' he is providing it, as in 'There was a man lived in the moon', the chorus of which Dylan comes pretty close to quoting—his

'There was an old man and he lived in the moon . . . / There was an old man and he lived in the moon' being prefigured by its 'There was a man lived in the moon, lived in the moon, lived in the moon / There was a man lived in the moon / And his name was Aiken Drum.'

Here the man in the moon is a figure of bounty, clothed in provisions, satisfying primitive needs: 'he played upon a ladle . . . his hat was made of good cream cheese . . . his coat was made of good roast beef. . . . And his name,' far from being Cain, was the nonsensically jolly 'Aiken Drum'. Most of his clothes get eaten by Willy Wood, who then chokes to death on Drum's haggis breeches. This man in the moon, then, a mugger's victim, is hero not villain of his story.

So might it be with the old man who lives in the moon in Dylan's song. You might conclude, granted that it's when he goes home that the river runs dry, that it's not his visit that parches it—that his 'summer's day' visit has no discernible effect for good or ill: that at worst the man in the moon is being neutral, as in that exquisite blues couplet by Whistlin' Alex Moore, in which 'The wolves howled at midnight, wild ox moaned till day / The man in the moon looked down on us but had nothing to say.'

And yet . . . Dylan makes you work through conflicting implications here. Just as in the Moore verse, you're left feeling that this 'neutrality' means an unwillingness to be helpful or protective. There's a leaving-them-to-their-fate coldness at the end of both songs. Even on his first appearance in 'Under the Red Sky' he comes 'passing by'. If he passes right on by, he doesn't really visit the little girl and the little boy at all. On the other hand the very same phrase might equally well mean that he arrives on the scene, bestows his presence, makes his presence felt, becomes a figure in the action. Isn't it also implied that the man in the moon is the speaker of the soothing and benign lines that follow directly upon his 'passing by'?: 'Someday little girl everything for you is gonna be new / Someday little girl you'll have a diamond as big as your shoe.'

So we are left, as by every other image in the song, with some dynamic tension as to whether the man in the moon is a force for good or ill. This is, of course, the arena in which fairytales take place, since their fundamental message to the child is that good and ill are both within.

Dylan has taken 'Someday little girl you'll have a diamond as big as your shoe' from the nursery rhyme 'Little girl, little girl, where have you been? / Gathering roses to give to the queen. / Little girl, little girl, what gave she you? / She gave me a diamond as big as a shoe', and he strays from the strictly verbatim only in order to improve the slightly vague 'big as a shoe' to the more specific, and so more vivid, 'big as your shoe'.

Next comes 'Let the wind blow low, let the wind blow high'; inevitably this reminds us of lullabies ('When the wind blows, the cradle will rock'), if not also of the nursery rhyme in which when the wind blows the robin must shelter in the barn. But there is also a children's singing game, collected by nursery rhyme authorities Peter & Iona Opie, called 'The Wind Blows High'. Like so many others, it has numerous British and American variants. Each opening couplet is a variant of this one, to which Dylan's song alludes. It was collected in Washington, D.C., in 1886: 'The wind blows low, the wind blows high / The stars are dropping from the sky.' English versions tend to offer a lesser opening line but a lovely second one: 'The wind, the wind, the wind blows high / The rain comes scattering down the sky.' Both these variants fit neatly 'Under the Red Sky' in pointing to the sky as an imminent source of bad tidings.

On the face of it, what happens next is bad news indeed for our protagonists: 'One day the little boy and the little girl were both baked in a pie.' Pies are of course quintessential prized objects in the nursery rhyme world: things to savour and gobble, things to conceal other things, things to threaten to put people in, things to put people in. They occur everywhere: in 'Simple Simon', 'Georgie Porgie', 'Round about, round about, Maggotty pie / My father loves good ale and so do I'; 'Dame Get Up and Bake Your Pies'; 'There was an old woman / Sold puddings and pies'; 'Sing a Song of Sixpence'; 'Punch and Judy / Fought for a pie / Punch gave Judy / A knock in the eye'; 'Little Jack Horner' and many more. The man in the moon's waistcoat is made of piecrust. Yet the same worlds that savour all these pies allow their inhabitants to survive being baked in them. In his pioneering study of fairy tales, The Uses of Enchantment, Bruno Bettelheim writes that 'one of the most widely spread mythical incidents in the world [is] the reappearance of living people out of the monster that has devoured them.' When Christ cites the red sky he proceeds to allude to Jonah's survival in, and escape from, the belly of the whale as a prefiguring of his own Resurrection. In nursery rhyme this is a reassuring sub-text in 'Sing a Song of Sixpence'—the rhyme we all recognise as Dylan's source for the exact phrase 'baked in a pie'—in which 'When the pie was opened / The birds began to sing' (as Dylan has it, 'let the bird sing . . .'), and it is openly the cheery theme of another nursery rhyme, less familiar but also giving us the phrase 'baked in a pie', first published in 1843 (and which Bob Dylan seems to have known in an earlier age, when he borrowed its 'Baby and I' to make his 'Lady and I' in 'Desolation Row'): 'Baby and I / Were baked in a pie / The gravy was wonderful hot / We had nothing to pay / To the baker that day / And so we crept out of the pot.' One way and another, then, you can find implicit reason to hope that in 'Under the Red Sky' the hero and heroine do not perish when baked.

With or without them, the song continues, extending its extraordinary tapestry of nursery rhyme, fairytale and biblical threads: 'This is the key to the kingdom / And this is the town / This is the blind horse / That leads you around . . .' It is just 14 verses after his red sky speech, in the same chapter of Matthew, that Christ tells Peter he is the rock upon which 'I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven'—bestowing not the means of entering but the power to admit or not admit others. Simultaneously the keys are the true knowledge of the doctrine of the kingdom of heaven. (The word 'church' here means assembly or congregation; it does not mean an institution. This text, including the passage that follows it immediately, is understood very differently by Protestants and Catholics.) The words that follow directly on from 'the keys of the kingdom of heaven' are 'and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven' (repeated in 18:18, and, in different words, in John 20:23), part of the meaning of which refers back to the belief held by the Jews that every thing that was done on earth according to the order of God was at the same time done in heaven. In Adam Clarke's Commentary on the Bible he says that for instance 'when the priest, on the day of atonement, offered the two goats upon earth, the same were offered in heaven. As one goat therefore is permitted to escape on earth, one is permitted to escape in heaven.' This compares nicely with the pagan belief, mentioned above, that every thing wasted on earth is saved and cherished on the moon.

The phrase 'key to the kingdom' occurs first in Dylan's work on the unreleased Basement Tapes song 'Sign on the Cross': 'Well, it's that old sign on the cross / Well, it's that old key to the kingdom, / Well, it's that old sign on the cross . . . / That worries me'; and as the context here makes unsurprising, 'Key to the Kingdom' is an old gospel song. It has a plain-speaking chorus that makes it clear that to be given the key to the kingdom is no small thing—and is just the sort of special power which protects many a fairytale hero/ine: 'I got the key to the kingdom / And my enemies can't do me no harm.' (It was recorded in 1929, for example, by both Bessie Johnson & Her Sanctified Singers and by Washington Phillips.)

However, the phrase is the title-line of a palindromic nursery rhyme too: 'This is the key of the kingdom: / In that kingdom there is a city. / In that city there is a town. / In that town there is a street. / In that street there is a lane. / In that lane there is a yard. / In that yard there is a house. / In that house there is a room. / In that room there is a bed. / On that bed there is a basket. / In that basket there are some flowers. / Flowers in the basket. / Basket in the bed. / Bed in the room. / Room in the house. / House in the yard. / Yard in the lane. / Lane in the street. / Street in the town. / Town in the city. / City in the kingdom. / Of the kingdom this is the key.' (The item around which pivots this jingle with two faces, the basket of flowers, is one that Dylan uses in 'Handy Dandy', in which the line 'he got a stick in his hand and a pocket full of money' is balanced in the last verse by 'he got a basket of flowers and a bag full of sorrow'.)

As Dylan uses the nursery rhyme's 'This is the key of the kingdom' for the second bridge of 'Under the Red Sky', he makes it sound like a song to accompany a winding-through-the-streets game (a 'Chains and Captives' game, to use the 19th century classification), like 'Thread the Needle', 'How Many Miles to Babylon?', 'The Big Ship Sails' and 'Oranges and Lemons': 'This is the key to the kingdom / And this is the town / This is the blind horse / That leads you around.'

It is easy to hear these lines that way, since they end by nominating (almost self-reflexively) something that 'leads you around', but by this point we've already picked up some sense of a game being chanted, thanks to its back-echoes of old familiars like the finger-rhyme 'Here's the church and here's the steeple / Open the doors and here's all the people'.

Like all the rest, the blind horse is, as it were, a symbol that looks both ways. The blind leading the blind is Not Good; why should the blind leading the baked be any better? On the other hand the blind horse suggests itself as Falada, a sort of equine fairy godmother, the benign guardian to the little girl in the fairytale 'The Goose Girl'. Falada may be a 'blind' horse (in fact decapitated rather than blinded) but it holds the key to the regaining of her rightful kingdom, and guides the little girl towards it not by explicit instruction but by the enigmatic hints of a repeated spoken rhyme, to prompt the heroine towards worthier, more mature action. Here is a rare and relishable instance of fairytale and adult folksong coming together: for the rhyme spoken by the horse in the story is echoed by the words of the folksong 'Pretty Peggy-O' (as sung by Bob Dylan, for instance at London Hammersmith on February 3, 1990): 'If this your mother knew / Her heart would break in two.'

In the fairytale the repeated rhyme eventually nudges the Goose Girl, who is really a dispossessed princess, into breaking out of the Goose Girl rôle in which a servant's duplicity has trapped her. Let the bird sing, let the bird fly. There is, moreover, a nursery rhyme dealing with a directly comparable theme: the eventual compunction not to stay safely in a rôle someone else has assigned you but to break out to chase fulfilment, and possible danger, in a wider world. And it is a nursery rhyme in which a blind horse is the agent for the plunge into the unknown. We all know its beginning; it is ‘My mother said I never should / Play with the gypsies in the wood.’ It ends like this: ‘The wood was dark, the grass was green / Up comes Sally with a tambourine / . . . I went to the river, no ship to get across / I paid ten shillings for an old blind horse / I up on his back and off in a crack / Sally tell my mother I shall never come back.’ Like ‘the key to the kingdom’, then, the blind horse can be a means to salvation, making Dylan’s stanza, against all initial expectation, positive from start to finish.

This theme, that breaking free of one’s inner constraints is an imperative, tallies with something Dylan has said about the song, according to the Under the Red Sky album’s co-producer, DON WAS, who claimed: ‘It’s actually about people who got trapped in his hometown. I think it’s about Hibbing and about people who never left. . . . He said, “It’s about my hometown.”’

It is almost unprecedented for Dylan to let out this kind of explanation as to what a song is ‘about’. This doesn’t mean he didn’t say it, any more than it means he’s right, or that he’d have offered the same ‘explanation’ 24 hours later: but it sits well enough alongside the song.

There is even a precedent for this sort of scenario in nursery rhyme. Instead of it being the little girl and little boy trapped in the alley under the red sky who eventually get baked in a pie (fatally or not), there is ‘A little cock sparrow’, who only avoids ending up in a pie by fleeing: ‘A little cock sparrow sat on a tree / Looking as happy as happy can be / Till a boy came by with his bow and arrow / Says he, “I will shoot the little cock sparrow / His body will make me a nice little stew / His giblets will make me a little pie too.” / Says the cock sparrow, “I’ll be shot if I stay” / So he clapped his wings and flew away.’

Let the bird sing, let the bird fly.

[Lucille Bogan (as Bessie Jackson): ‘Down in Boogie Alley’, NY, 1 Aug 1934 & ‘Pig Iron Sally’, NY, 31 Jul 1934, both on Lucille Bogan & Walter Roland (1930–1935), Roots RL-317, Vienna, 1968. Blind Willie McTell, ‘Georgia Rag’, Atlanta, 31 Oct 1931, Blind Willie McTell: The Early Years (1927–1933), Yazoo L-1005, NY, 1968. Whistlin’ Alex Moore: ‘West Texas Woman’, Dallas, 5 Dec 1929; I’m Wild About My Lovin’, 1928–1930, Historical HLP-32, Jersey City, NJ, 1969. Bessie Johnson & Her Sanctified Singers: ‘Key to the Kingdom’, Atlanta, 21 Mar 1929, CD-reissued Memphis Gospel, Document DOCD-5072, Vienna, 1991. Washington Phillips: ‘I’ve Got the Key to the Kingdom’, Dallas, 2 Dec 1929, CD-reissued Storefront & Streetcorner Gospel (1927–1929), Document DOCD-5054, Vienna, nia.

Alexander Frater, Chasing the Monsoon, London: Penguin, 1991. Stephen Scobie, Alias Bob Dylan, Red Deer, Alberta: Red Deer College Press, 1991. Chinua Achebe, Things Fall Apart, Oxford: Heinemann African Writers Series, 3rd UK edn., 1986. Michael Taft, Blues Lyric Poetry: An Anthology, New York: Garland, 1983; republished as Talkin’ to Myself: Blues Lyrics, 1921–1942, New York: Routledge, 2005. Iona & Peter Opie: for details of their work & sources, see endnotes to nursery rhyme, Dylan’s use of, an introduction. Bruno Bettelheim, The Uses of Enchantment, London: Thames & Hudson, 1976. Adam Clarke, Commentary on the Bible, London: Thomas Tegg, 7 vols., 1844 (not the 1st edn.). Don Was quote, LA, 15 Oct 1990, The Telegraph no.37, UK, winter 1990.]

Updike, John [1932 -] Eminent American writer, born March 18, 1932, Shillington, PA; he reviewed concerts in Ipswich, Massachussetts, 1961–1965. Of a JOAN BAEZ concert of 1964, he wrote: ‘[in] the unkindest cut of all, Miss Baez yielded the stage, with a delight all too evident, to a young man, Bob Dylan, in tattered jeans and a black jacket, three months on the far side of a haircut, whose voice you could scour a skillet with. Miss Baez, this admirer was pained to observe, visibly lit up with love-light when he came onto the stage, and even tried to force her way, in duet, through some of the impenetrable lyrics that Dylan composes as abundantly as poison ivy puts forth leaves.’ This (in contrast to Dylan’s impenetrable lyrics) was the consummate word-craft of America’s great novelist, short-story writer and poet, a Pulitzer prize-winner with a reputation as ‘a keen observer of modern American life’ in fiction ‘assured, urbane and ironic’ and ‘as versatile as it is prolific.’ Before Baez started having Dylan perform at her concerts (after his success at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL of 1963) she had given a similar guest-slot to FLATT & SCRUGGS and to the GREENBRIAR BOYS. How were their haircuts, John?

[Updike quoted from the anthology of his concert reviews Concerts at Castle Hill, 1993. Quotes re his literary reputation are from Ian Ousby’s excellent Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, 1993 (corrected reprint 1995).]

'Vacillation' Poem by W.B. Yeats (1865–1939) that may have given Dylan a phrase he uses on the 1964 song 'Chimes of Freedom', from Another Side of Bob Dylan, and may have given him rather more.

Dylan speaks in the mid-1960s about behaviour in the face of the certainty of death. In the course of a remarkable interview with Horace Judson, from Time magazine, given at the Royal Albert Hall, London, May 9, 1965, Dylan, wired up with youth's impatience (at least), and moving among lumpen dullards like some beautiful alien from superior space, can say to the 40-something reporter:

'I'm saying that you're going to die, and you're gonna go off the earth, you're gonna be dead. Man, it could be, you know, twenty years, it could be tomorrow, any time. So am I. I mean, we're just gonna be gone. The world's going to go on without us. All right now. You do your job in the face of that and how seriously you take yourself, you decide for yourself.' This is captured in the film Don't Look Back, and transcribed in the book of the film, D.A. PENNEBAKER's Bob Dylan / Don't Look Back, 1968. (Here the Time reporter is not identified, but he is named as Horace Judson in Peter Marshall's 'Hotel Blues', in the fanzine The Telegraph no.54, Richmond, Surrey, spring 1996.)

V

Although Dylan sounded prepared for death earlier than this (e.g. back on 1962's 'Let Me Die in My Footsteps'), perhaps it was reading Yeats in 1964 that gave him the conviction he expresses in that interview. Dylan's 'starry-eyed and laughing' echoes Yeats' 'open eyed and laughing'—the one describing the stance of youth, the other the resolve of middle age. Yeats' line is from 'Vacillation':

> 'No longer in Lethean foliage caught / Begin the preparation for your death / And from the fortieth winter by that thought / Test every work of intellect or faith, / And everything that your own hands have wrought, / And call those works extravagance of breath / That are not suited for such men as come / Proud, open eyed and laughing to the tomb.'

The precociously wise young Dylan of 1964–65 seems to have taken this teaching to heart. Perhaps 'Vacillation' both fired up this resolve to do what you do in the knowledge that you're going to die and gave him the phrase he revises in 'Chimes of Freedom'.

[W.B. Yeats: 'Vacillation' taken from The New Natural Death Handbook, ed. Albery, UK: Elliot & Elliot, 1997, p.11.]

Valens, Ritchie [1941 - 1959] Ritchie Valens was born the same month as Bob Dylan (on May 13, 1941, in LA) but died before Dylan ever made a record. Ritchie too formed a rock'n'roll band in high school (the Silhouettes, at San Fernando High), and was heavily influenced by LITTLE RICHARD. Signed to Bob Keene's Del-Fi label, his first hit was his own song 'Come on Let's Go'—which, defying all the rules of the known universe, was inferior to the British cover version by Tommy Steele. But the big Valens hit was the double-sided 'Donna' c/w 'La Bamba'. The latter has proved one of those immortal classics capable of being a hit time and again. No-one tried to cover this track when it was new, and no-one has since succeeded in covering it with half the appeal and energy of the original. Valens also had time to appear in one film: the Alan Freed let's-hold-a-talent-contest! movie Go Johnny Go, in which he performs his Little Richard-inspired 'Ooh My Head'.

Valens died, along with the Big Bopper, in the single-engine plane crash that killed BUDDY HOLLY in the early hours of February 3, 1959, en route to North Dakota in the snow. Holly's lead guitarist Tommy Allsup should have been on the plane, and Valens on the bus, but as Allsup recalls: 'I was the one who chartered the plane, but I flipped a coin with Ritchie Valens—he kept bugging me all night that he'd never flown in a little plane. He won the toss.'

Dylan saw them perform at the Duluth Armory just three nights before the crash. In 1987, Dylan was filmed driving near Malibu, CA, paying tribute to Ritchie Valens; a one-minute-long piece of footage of this was used within the promotional trailer for the film La Bamba, a Valens biopic.

[Ritchie Valens: 'Come on Let's Go', Del-Fi 4106, US (Pye International 7N 25000, London), 1958; 'Donna' c/w 'La Bamba', Del-Fi 4110, 1958 (London American HL 8803, 1959; all released (with more than enough other Valens tracks for anyone, and including 'Ooh My Head') on the CD Ritchie Valens / Ritchie, Ace CDCHD 953, London, 1990. Go Johnny Go, dir. Paul Landres, Hal Roach Studios Inc. / Valiant, US, 1959. Bob Dylan: spoken comments on Valens, spring-summer 1987, nr. Malibu; released in trailer for La Bamba, dir. & written Louis Valdez, Columbia Pictures / New Visions, US, 1987.]

Van Ronk, Dave [1936 - 2002] David Ritz Van Ronk was born in Brooklyn, New York, on June 30, 1936, grew up partly in Queens, attended Richmond Hill High School, sang in a barbershop quartet at 13, dropped out of high school at 15, joined the Merchant Marines, learnt the ukelele, loved jazz, moved to Greenwich Village and became a professional musician in 1956. He discovered prewar blues via 'a chance encounter with a recording of "Stackolee" made by Furry Lewis', as Van

Ronk said himself: 'Taking it to be a form of Jazz, in which I was primarily interested, I made some further investigations and discovered a whole field of music. . . . and so, having only such singers as Furry Lewis, King Solomon Hill and LEADBELLY for models, when I tried to sing these songs I naturally imitated what I heard and, if I couldn't understand a word here or there, I just slurred right along with the singer. At that time, nobody listened to me anyway.'

They soon did. He became a Washington Square regular and an established figure in the Village, recording, performing and keeping an open house several years before the young Bob Dylan came to town, slept on Dave's couch, got Dave's future wife Terri Thal to be his first manager, learnt some of Dave's repertoire, stole some of Dave's repertoire and generally looked up to him as the singer who 'reigned supreme'. Except of course financially. He was almost always on small, worthy record labels. Hence his famous wry remark: 'Other entertainers record for money; I record for Prestige.'

This is his friend Elijah Wald's summary: 'Dave Van Ronk was a founding father of the 1960s folk and blues revivals, but he was far more than that. For one thing, he was a marvelous raconteur, one of the funniest and most quotable figures on the Village scene. . . . Dave honed his tales along with his music, while holding court in cafes, bars, and from his apartment on Sheridan Square. As a musician, mentor, and barroom philosopher, his influence was so great that the block he lived on was recently renamed Dave Van Ronk Street. This is an honor that would have made him particularly happy, because much as he loved music, he loved the Village almost as deeply. From the time he moved there in the early 1950s until his death . . . he never considered living anywhere else.'

(He lived on MacDougal in the late 1950s, moved to 15th for a while after getting together with Terri, then ran back to the Village, specifically to Waverly Place, holding court there through the 1960s; he moved to Sheridan Place when he broke up with Terri, and lived there for the rest of his life. The 'Dylan' apartment was the one on Waverly Place.)

Van Ronk more or less invented the milieu of the young white city folk-blues, and though he wrote little material of his own, the entire East Coast singer-songwriter oeuvre would have been different without him. He set very high standards of guitar playing, not least in demonstrating what richness of instrumentation could be achieved on the lone guitar. His own guitar mentor had been REV. GARY DAVIS but Van Ronk made what he learnt his own, bringing a more modern consciousness to finger-picking without any loss of complexity or imaginative dexterity.

When people write, as they often do, of what tender guitar-work he puts alongside his 'rough voice', they are half right: they're right about the guitar. But the voice is not merely 'rough'—often there's nothing rough about it at all. To listen to Van Ronk is to hear is one of the most resourceful, subtle, alive voices ever put on record. Hear his early cover of Dylan's 'He Was a Friend of Mine'—here is a great artist, communicating as directly as Dylan himself, his tone a unique mix of keening and shimmer. It's only very rarely indeed that someone cuts through as strongly and exhilaratingly as he can. DANNY KALB wrote that 'Dave Van Ronk's sound was unafraid, funky and a joyous challenge. . . . The challenge was, I think, to go for it all the way, and don't look back.' Tom Waits said: 'In the engine room of the NY Folk Scene shoveling coal into the furnace, one Big Man rules. Dog faced roustabout songster. Bluesman, Dave Van Ronk. Long may he howl.'

Kalb's 'unafraid, funky . . . joyous' describes the voice far better than Waits' 'howl'; but Waits' affectionate portrait suggests the large man's energy and impact around town while also putting his finger on one of the reasons why Bob Dylan 'made it' in a way that Van Ronk never could. Look at photos of the two of them together in the early 60s and, a decade on, at the Friends of Chile Benefit Concert. Dylan is the lithe, sexy, charismatic one; Van Ronk is the awkward, fat-faced one with sweaty armpits and a beer gut. But if he didn't have the right image for national celebrity, nor the songwriting ability, nor the killer instinct, no matter: he had everything else. He was an unforgettable live performer, a stratospherically gifted guitarist, an all-time great singer, a shrewd observer of other people (including of Dylan), a generous host whose place was where everyone came for all-night poker games, abrasive talk and good cheer, and with all this, he was also a figure of gravitas—a great man. In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan's vivid, detailed portrait of Greenwich Village when it was new to him contains no other portrait half as long, half as warm, half as fulsome or half as respectful as of Dave Van Ronk.

Van Ronk was always shrewd and honest about Dylan. They fell out in a major way just once, and he said so: 'We had a terrible falling out about "House of the Rising Sun". He was always a sponge, picking up whatever was around him, and he copped my arrangement of the song. Before going into the studio he asked, "Hey Dave, mind if I record your version of Rising Sun?" I said, "Well, Bobby, I'm going into the studio soon and I'd like to record it." And later he asked me again and I told him I wanted to record it myself, and he said, "Oops, I already recorded it myself and I can't do anything about it because Columbia wants it." For a period of about two months, we didn't speak to each other. He never apologized, and I give him credit for it.'

Van Ronk was just as transparent about the younger musician's stories and myth-making (or lies, as some call it), again stepping back and seeing it in the round, and speaking for others as if all were as generous-minded: 'We accepted him not because of the things he had said he'd done but because we respected him as a performer. The attitude of the community was that it was all right, it was cool. He gets on stage and delivers, and that's fine. His pose didn't bother us. Nobody was turned off by it. Whatever he said offstage, onstage he told the truth as best he knew it.'

Van Ronk's perspective was wide enough, too, that he could see sides of Dylan beyond the folkclubs. This, for instance, is accurate and at the same time very much his own judgement, independently arrived at: 'Bobby is very much a product of the Beat Generation. Dylan really does belong in a rack with KEROUAC. You are not going to see any more like him. Bobby came into Beat poetry just at the very tail end. He towers above all of them, except perhaps GINSBERG. But Bob was a latecomer and will have no successors, just as his namesake had no successors.' Every bit of that is extremely shrewd, and there are few who have dared venture, in plain terms like that, that Dylan 'towers above' all those revered BEATS.

There is precious little recorded evidence of Van Ronk and Dylan together, and what there is, as it happens, is pitifully unrepresentative of how they might have performed on the same stage. There's an amateur recording of a short Dylan set made at the Gaslight on September 6, 1961, when Dylan sings 'Man on the Street', 'He Was a Friend of Mine', 'Talking Bear Mountain Picnic Massacre Blues', 'Song to Woody' and 'Pretty Polly', after which Dave Van Ronk joins him and they share vocals on that arch GUTHRIE children's song 'Car, Car'. If only they had shared out 'He Was a Friend of Mine' instead! And apart from Van Ronk's voice lost in the general drunken haze of an ensemble 'Blowin' in the Wind' at that Friends of Chile Benefit Concert at the Felt Forum, New York City, on May 9, 1974, that's all there is! The only time they appeared on the same record—and then not on the same track—was that 1965 Elektra compilation LP The Blues Project, on which Dylan plays piano behind GEOFF MULDAUR on 'Downtown Blues' (billed as Bob Landy) and Dave Van Ronk performs 'Bad Dream Blues' on one side and opens the other with 'Don't You Leave Me Here'.

Fortunately, though, we do at least have not only Dylan's 'cover' of Van Ronk's 'House of the Rising Sun': we also have several tremendous Van Ronk covers of Dylan songs, including a lively version of 'If I Had to Do It All Over' (as he calls it), recorded with the Red Onion Jazz Band in 1962 and released on a 1964 single as well as the album In the Tradition, that very early 'He Was a Friend of Mine' (first on the 1963 album Dave Van Ronk Folksinger) through a 1979 'Song to Woody' on Somebody Else, Not Me, a 1994 'Subterranean Homesick Blues' on To All My Friends in Far-Flung Places, and a touching, almost consciously farewell-bidding solo version of 'Buckets of Rain', recorded at what turned out to be Van Ronk's last concert, in October 2001, and released on a posthumous album, the crummily titled . . . and the tin pan bended and the story ended. . . .

In the filmed interview with Van Ronk given to JEFF ROSEN of Dylan's office for the archives, and made available for use in SCORSESE's No Direction Home, the big bear-like figure, the Mayor of MacDougal Street, has become the mellow, shy, silver-stubbled, bronchitic, self-deprecating man with a laugh that makes the viewer laugh, a vulnerability that is touching (again, a strong contrast to that most steely interviewee, Dylan himself) and a generosity of spirit, a fondness for Dylan and an appreciation of his contribution to a whole musical community—all of which makes him one of the film's most fragile yet valuable contributors: still, after all these years, giving out and being real.

'Even now,' wrote Danny Kalb, 'I can almost hear him laughing freely and deeply, unfortunately still smoking those damn cigarettes, even as we, his friends left behind, weep and celebrate him at the same time.'

His many recordings cover a long, long period and vary enormously. If a 'best' has to be specified, then it is probably the work of the early 1960s that captures it most powerfully: yet whatever you pick out you'll find yourself more than amply rewarded.

Dave Van Ronk died of complications arising from his cancer, in hospital in New York City, on February 10, 2002.

[Dave Van Ronk: 'If I Had to Do It All Over' (with the Red Onion Jazz Band), Prestige PR 45-288, US, 1964 & on In the Tradition, Prestige 14001, US, 1964; Dave Van Ronk Folksinger, Prestige 14012, 1963 (CD-reissued Fantasy CD 24710, US, nia); Somebody Else, Not Me, Philo PH 1065, US, 1980 (carelessly CD-reissued as Someone Else, Not Me, Rounder CD PHIL 1065, US, 1990); To All My Friends in Far-Flung Places (2-CD set), Gazell GPCD 2011/12, US, 1994; . . . and the tin pan bended and the story ended . . . , Adelphi, MD, 22 Oct 2001, Smithsonian Folkways SFW40156, Washington, D.C., 2004.

Van Ronk quotes from various unfootnoted sources. 'Dave Remembered', Danny Kalb, 2002, online 14 Sep 2005 at http://members.aol.com/silvastr/danny/danny.htm. Elijah Wald (to whom thanks for some information) quoted from the website page promoting Van Ronk's memoir, edited with Wald & completed by him after Van Ronk's death, The Mayor of MacDougal Street, a Memoir, New York: Da Capo, 2005; quote seen online 14 Sep 2005 at http://elijahwald.com/vanronk.html#whiff.]

Van Zandt, Steve [1950 -] Steven Lento was born in Boston on November 22, 1950 and grew up to be a lean-machine guitarist, mandolin player and extravagant showman in BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN's E Street Band, though he quit acrimoniously in 1982, returning fleetingly in 1995 and more permanently in 1999. He has also been the Miami Steve (aka Little Steven) songwriting, producing and arranging, most notably for Southside Johnny & the Asbury Dukes, which he co-founded in 1974 but also working with Dion, Gary Bonds, Ronnie Spector and others; disparate further projects have included five solo albums, part-time fronting of the group the Disciples of Soul, the hosting of the syndicated radio series 'Little Steven's Underground Garage' and, since 1999, acting impressively (despite a risible hairpiece) in the TV series 'THE SOPRANOS' as mobster and strip-club owner Silvio Dante.

In 1985 he created both the Solidarity Foundation, to support the sovereignty and protection of indigenous peoples, and Artists United Against Apartheid, to lead a campaigning boycott against the white-supremacist South African régime's most lavish and brazen tourist entertainment resort, Sun City. For this he pulled in 49 recording-artist collaborators to help create the echo-soaked, heavily rhymic semi-rap single release 'Sun City', recorded that summer in Hollywood, which was an effective publicity success. The participants, who pledged never to play the resort themselves, included Springsteen, Run DMC and Bob Dylan—who contributes shared vocals, dubbed over the basic music track, and was probably very grateful to be offered a chance to be seen on the side of the angels as regards Africa within weeks of his very unpopular remarks at LIVE AID that July 13.

By this point, Dylan and Van Zandt had already worked together. That February 19 (1985) Little Steven had dropped into the New York studios where Dylan was recording tracks for Empire Burlesque and played guitar on at least one attempt at 'Never Gonna Be the Same Again' (still uncirculated) and a number of attempts at 'When the Night Comes Falling from the Sky', one of which became the version subsequently released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991.

Fourteen years on from that session, and at a Never-Ending Tour concert in Zurich on April 25, 1999, Steve Van Zandt (and NILS LOFGREN) came on stage for the last encore number of Dylan's set, playing guitar on the old Buddy Holly number 'Not Fade Away'.

That same year, Van Zandt released his fifth solo album, Born Again Savage, and a Greatest Hits collection, the former on his own label, Renegade Nation. He remains a bandana-wearing, biceps-flexing, Right On activist musician.

[Steve Van Zandt, Bob Dylan & others: 'Sun City', Artists United Against Apartheid, Manhattan ST 53019, US & UK, 1985.]

Vaughan, Jimmie [1951 -] Jimmie Vaughan was born in Dallas, Texas, on March 21, 1951. A blues guitarist and singer, he is the older brother of the late STEVIE RAY VAUGHAN. Jimmie's playing was much influenced by the three blues guitar Kings (Albert, B.B. but especially Freddie, whom he knew). He learnt guitar at 13, started his first band at 15, and at age 16 opened for JIMI HENDRIX at a live show in Dallas.

Like his younger brother, Vaughan moved to Austin in the early 1970s and in 1974 he and Californian vocalist & harmonica player Kim Wilson formed the Fabulous Thunderbirds, whose early albums (1979–83) are considered significant. Dropped from their record deal because of disappointing sales, they soldiered on but made themselves 'more commercial', got a new deal and made less interesting new albums. Vaughan quit the band in 1989, and early the following year recorded the album Family Style with brother Stevie, which was released after the latter's death in a 1990 helicopter crash. His first solo album, Strange Pleasures, came out in 1994 and contained a memorial to his brother, 'Six Strings Down'.

In 2004, Jimmie Vaughan headlined a benefit concert for the Libertarian Party's presidential candidate, Michael Badnarik, in Austin and performed at a 'Red, Rock and Blues' concert at the party's national convention in Atlanta.

Both brothers played on Dylan's 1990 album Under the Red Sky. Both featured on '10,000 Men', 'God Knows' and 'Cat's in the Well', with Jimmie playing lead on the lattermost; he alone also played on 'Handy Dandy'. And then on October 25, 1991, when the Never-Ending Tour came through Austin, Texas, Jimmie came on stage and played on 'Maggie's Farm'.

[Jimmie Vaughan: Strange Pleasure, Sony 57202, US, 1994.]

Vaughan, Stevie Ray [1954 - 1990] Stevie Ray Vaughan was born in Dallas, Texas, on October 3, 1954, learnt guitar after growing to love his older brother JIMMIE's blues-based record collection, dropped out of high school in 1972 and moved to Austin, where there was a vast student population and a burgeoning live music scene. He became a defining figure in 1980s Texas rock'n'roll (a kind of benign redneck R&B). A master of the Fender Stratocaster, with a unique tone and technique, he led the group Double Trouble. You might blame Stevie Ray Vaughan for the irritating riff on the only weak track on "Love and Theft", 'Honest with Me'.

Prior to Double Trouble Vaughan had played with local Austin groups the Nightcrawlers and Paul Ray &the Cobras. In 1976, Vaughan formed his own band, the Triple Threat Revue, first renamed Triple Threat and then, when the vocalist quit in 1981, Double Trouble (though actually this remained a trio). In 1982 they played the Montreux Festival, Switzerland, where David Bowie asked Vaughan to play on what became his Let's Dance album. This led to other stints as a sideman with the ROLLING STONES and Jackson Browne.

Double Trouble's 1983 début album Texas Flood was a critical success and sold half a million; they followed it with the far greater commercial successes of Couldn't Stand the Weather (1984) and Soul to Soul (1985). These records were on Epic, but another album, Blues Explosion, on Atlantic, won a Grammy as Best Traditional Blues Record of the Year in 1984.

In 1986, after collapsing on stage in Germany, he checked into an Atlanta rehabilitation clinic. Two years later he seemed to be fully functioning again, performing an unplugged set on MTV and in 1989 touring with Jeff Beck and releasing the fifth Double Trouble album, In Step, which also gave him a no.1 radio hit, 'Crossfire'.

In 1990 Vaughan recorded Family Style, an album made with brother Jimmie, co-headlined another tour, this time with Joe Cocker, and embarked on a headlining Double Trouble tour. That April 30 he laid down some guitar overdubs on tracks for Dylan's Under the Red Sky album that Dylan had recorded that January 6th. He played on 'Cat's in the Well' and '10,000 Men', and played lead guitar on 'God Knows'.

Stevie Ray Vaughan died in a helicopter crash near East Troy, Wisconsin, on August 27, 1990 (having just performed as a guest at an ERIC CLAPTON concert in Alpine Valley). Bob Dylan first responded with appropriate restraint: 'He was a sweet guy. Something else was coming through him besides his guitar playing and singing.' Later, unfortunately, before a concert in Merrillville, Indiana, he added the vacuously inaccurate: 'It's almost like having to play the night that Kennedy died. He'll probably be revered as much as and in the same way as HANK WILLIAMS'. More sweetly, he dedicated a performance of 'Moon River' to Vaughan that night.

Posthumous record releases are plentiful. One of the earliest was that recorded with brother Jimmie that same year; Family Style was released as by 'the Vaughan Brothers'. There is now a ludicrous statue of Stevie Ray at Riverside Drive and South 1st Street in Austin.

[Double Trouble: Texas Flood, Epic FET/EK 38734, US, 1983; Blues Explosion, Atlantic 7 80149-1, US, 1984; Couldn't Stand the Weather, Epic FET/EK 39304, US, 1984; Soul to Soul, Epic FET/EK 40036, US, 1985; Live Alive!, Epic, EGK/EGT 40511, US, 1986; In Step, Epic OET/EK 45024, US, 1989. The Vaughan Brothers: Family Style, Epic ZT/ZK 46225, US, 1990.]

Vee, Bobby [1943 -] Robert Thomas Velline was born in Fargo, North Dakota, on April 30, 1943, and grew up via rockabilly to be a teenage pop star. By the time Bob Dylan was 'making it' in 1963, Vee, two years younger, was already struggling to hold onto pop stardom.

Dylan played piano in Bobby Vee's band for a very brief period in 1959. Vee has told the story many times, as here: 'After we recorded "Suzie Baby", we started getting out and we were a rhythm band with guitar, bass and drums. My brother Bill played lead guitar and I played rhythm guitar and we would switch round from time to time. We were looking for a piano player . . . as we had seen JERRY LEE LEWIS as the opening act on a country show and he just tore it up. . . . Bill was in a record shop called Sam's Record Land in Fargo and this guy approached him and introduced himself as Elston Gunn [but see the entry pseudonyms used by Dylan] and said that he had got off the road with CONWAY TWITTY as his piano player. Bill was blown away. He took him to the radio station where there was a piano and he rocked out pretty good in the key of C and we thought we would give him a try. He hadn't played with Conway Twitty. Conway Twitty had been in the area and Dylan had seen him in Duluth a couple of nights earlier and then he came down to Fargo and was working as a busboy at the Red Apple Café. It was not meant to be, he didn't have a piano and we didn't have enough money to buy him one. He stuck around a couple of days and then he headed off to Minneapolis and then went to Greenwich Village where he became Bob Dylan. He came through my hometown about five years ago and I saw him then. I was amazed at how much he remembered as that was such a small slice of his life. He even remembered where my dad worked.'

Dylan's comments on Vee in Chronicles Volume One add little to this account, but he recalls that he used the great pseudonym Elston Gunn at the time, says that he and this 'old friend and fellow performer . . . had a lot in common, even though our paths would take such different directions', and acknowledges that 'he was a great rockabilly singer' before he 'crossed over' to become a pop star. But though Dylan recalls that they saw each other when Bob was singing in folk clubs and Vee was 'on the top of the heap' at the Paramount in Brooklyn with an array of other stars, he gives no account of the more recent visit that so impressed Vee.

[Bobby Vee quoted from undated interview by Spencer Leigh in Baby, That Is Rock and Roll: American Pop 1954–1963, p.137. Bob Dylan: Chronicles Volume One, pp.78–80.]

Verlaine, Paul [1844 - 1896] Paul Verlaine, born in Metz, France, on March 30, 1844, became a critic as well as a poet, but his lasting importance lies in his poetry. One of the French symbolists, his stylistic innovations gave his nation's poetry a new musicality, prefiguring free verse and other characteristics of modernity. In 1867 he published Les Amies, a collection of poems promptly banned in France. Verlaine's poetry plus a wild life entwined with a questing after salvation provided a 19th century model for the 20th century avant garde and THE BEATS.

Verlaine met the 16-year-old ARTHUR RIMBAUD in 1871, and drama followed. As Evan Goodwin summarises it:

> 'Verlaine and Rimbaud became extremely close very quickly . . . and it was not long before the two men began a homosexual relationship that soon became known to the public. Two months after the birth of Paul's son in October, Verlaine and Rimbaud ran off to Brussels together. The two men spent the better part of the next two years traveling around northern France and Belgium. The relationship between the two unstable poets was extremely stormy; they fought and broke up often. Eventually, they wound up in London where they found plenty of bohemian amusements and a group of admirers who helped Verlaine publish Romance Without Words in 1874, a daring collection of poems composed during his travels with Rimbaud. However, before the book was published, Verlaine shot and lightly wounded Rimbaud during a heated argument, an event that ended their relationship and started Verlaine on the road to faith. Verlaine spent two years in a Belgian prison for the shooting. After he received news that his wife had filed for divorce, Verlaine underwent a religious crisis and converted to Catholicism.'

This makes still more interesting than it might otherwise be the reference to the two poets in Dylan's Blood on the Tracks song 'You're Gonna Make Me Lonesome When You Go': 'Relationships have all been bad / Mine have been like Verlaine's and Rimbaud.'

Paul Verlaine died in Paris on January 8, 1896. He was 51.

(See also French symbolist poets, the.)

[Selected poems / Paul Verlaine, translated with introduction & notes by Martin Sorrell, Oxford: OUP, 1999. Evan Goodwin, 'Little Blue Light—Paul Verlaine', seen online 10 Sep 2005 at www.littlebluelight.com/lblphp/intro.php?ikey=29.]

Vesely, Rainer [1956 -] See Parking Meter.

Victoria's Secret See co-option of real music by advertising, the.

Villon, Francois [1431 - c.1465?] France's first great poet became popular in the 19th century and again in the 20th, not least when EZRA POUND translated some of his work. His 'Petit Testament', 1456, was followed by his 'Grand Testament', 1461, which includes his best-known work, 'Ballade des dames du temps jadis' ('Ballad of the Ladies of Former Times'), containing the line 'Mais où sont les nièges d'antan?'—'But where are the snows of yesteryear?'—which Dylan consciously echoes in 11 Outlined Epitaphs, beginning a section with 'ah where are those forces of yesteryear?' In a later section he writes: 'with the sounds of Francois Villon / echoin' through my mad streets / as I stumble . . .'

Vincent, Gene [1935 - 1971] Vincent Eugene Craddock was born in Norfolk, Virginia, on February 11, 1935 and died from a bleeding ulcer in Newhall, California, on October 12, 1971, aged 36. He was in a motorcycle crash in July 1955, the year before his first and greatest hit, 'Be-Bop-a-Lula', and his left leg was permanently damaged. On stage he made much of this, limping around melodramatically in black leather. No wonder Ian Dury found him appealing. He also survived the car crash that killed Eddie Cochran in England in 1960, and lived there for many of his sunset years. He had a lovely voice but his career was all downhill.

Vincent, like Eddie Cochran, JERRY LEE LEWIS and BUDDY HOLLY, enjoyed short-lived popularity in the USA but great career longevity in Britain (including posthumously in all cases except that of Lewis, who both survived and had some success in the USA as a country singer from the 1970s onwards).

In 1987 Dylan recorded two takes of Vincent's 'Important Words' during the Down in the Groove sessions, though they remained unreleased; and in 1992 when he recorded an exquisitely sung version of the old Jo Stafford hit 'You Belong to Me' (1952) for the soundtrack of Oliver Stone's film Natural Born Killers, Dylan's version was in clear remembrance of, though didn't copy, the version Gene Vincent includes on his best-known album, Gene Vincent Rocks! & the Blue Caps Roll. This LP also included a Vincent version of 'Frankie and Johnny', a traditional song that Dylan recorded for Good as I Been to You as 'Frankie and Albert' at the same sessions that yielded 'You Belong to Me'.

[Gene Vincent: 'Important Words', Nashville, 18 Oct 1956, Capitol 3617, LA (Capitol CL 14693, London), 1957; 'You Belong to Me', Hollywood, prob. 5 Dec 1957, and 'Frankie and Johnny', 9 Dec 1957, both on Gene Vincent Rocks! & the Blue Caps Roll, Capitol T970, LA & London, 1958. ('You Belong to Me' was also a US top 20 hit in 1962 by the Duprees, nia, Coed 569, NY, 1962.)

Bob Dylan: 'Important Words', LA, Apr 1987; 'You Belong to Me', Malibu, CA, Jul–Aug 1992 (at the Good as I Been to You sessions), issued on Natural Born Killers, UNV Interscope ITSC-92460, USA, 1994.]

Vineyard Christian Fellowship, the The Vineyard Christian Fellowship of Churches was the outfit that formalised Dylan's conversion to Christianity, receiving him into its congregation and providing his Bible-study classes.

It was formed as an offshoot from the Calvary Chapel, started in Costa Mesa, California, by one Chuck Smith in 1965; this offshoot, a Bible study group led by Kenn (sic) and Joanie Gulliksen, began in West LA in 1974. Its early members were mainly ex-hippie 1960s Californian types, many of them musicians, and meetings were held at the home of the founder of a 'Christian rock' band, Lovesong.

Offering an alternative to normal structures of worship and denominational liturgy, the group expanded rapidly, splitting from the Calvary Chapel because of the latter's opposition to its emphasis on spontaneous healing through faith, trances and other informal demonstrations of supposed possession by the Holy Spirit. Early members included Debbie Boone, Bernie Leadon and KEITH GREEN. As fellow-member Dave Whiting-Smith comments: 'The Vineyard was, back then, a very music-oriented church. It was chock full of talented people, many of whom had record contracts.'

Despite vicious disputes within the organisation, as one pastor denounced another, the Vineyard movement spread all over California and beyond. It now claims to run 600 churches in the US and a similar number abroad.

See also 'Born Again' period, the.

[Dave Whiting-Smith: 'Bob Dylan and the Vineyard Christian Fellowship: A View From the Inside', Isis no.121, Bedworth, UK, Jun–Jul 2005, pp.26–27.]

vipers See 'Don't Fall Apart on Me Tonight'.

Vites, Paolo [1962 -] Paolo Vites was born in Lavanga, Italy, on June 27, 1962. He was first interested by Dylan's work when he heard the Desire album in 1976, at the age of 14. A rock journalist, he now works for the Italian monthly rock magazine JAM and has published slim volumes on the Clash, PATTI SMITH, SPRINGSTEEN, Jim Morrison and others, and in October 2005 published Le canzoni di Cat Stevens.

He founded and published an Italian Dylan fanzine, Rolling Thunder, from spring 1990 to fall 1992, contributed interviews with RAMBLIN' JACK ELLIOTT and others to US fanzine ON THE TRACKS and now contributes to the Italian Dylan website 'Maggie's Farm' (www.maggiesfarm.it). His first Dylan book was Bob Dylan—Stories from a Never-Ending Concert, looking at the first six years of the Never-Ending Tour. His more recent book, with a foreword by ELLIOTT MURPHY, is Bob Dylan 1962–2002: 40 anni di canzoni (40 Years of Song), an album-by-album commentary.

[Paolo Vites: Bob Dylan—Stories from a Never-Ending Concert, Italy: Penguin, 1994; Bob Dylan 1962–2002: 40 anni di canzoni, Italy: Editori Riuniti, 2002.]

Von Schmidt, Eric [1931 -] Eric Von Schmidt was born in Bridgeport, Connecticut, on May 28, 1931. He grew up listening to late-night radio and watching his father, Harold Von Schmidt, painting pictures of the old American West, most lucratively for the Saturday Evening Post. Thus he imbibed both music and art, and learnt the 6-string guitar in the 1940s. A big LEADBELLY fan when he first heard him on radio in 1948, he nevertheless stuck to the 6-string guitar himself when he began performing. He served in the US Army from 1952 to 1954, read Huxley's The Doors of Perception, started eating peyote mushrooms and left the army to paint. He studied art in Florence and then in Florida, where he taught at the Sarasota School of Art but in 1957 moved to Cambridge, Massachusetts, where he became prominent in the city's folk scene, centered upon Club 47, befriended RICHARD FARIÑA and in 1961 recorded an album with Folkways artist Rolf Cahn. His paintings now extended to album covers and concert posters.

He was there in Cambridge, therefore, in the June of that same year when Bob Dylan first encountered him, slept on his couch, heard him perform and filched several song arrangements from him. One of these was 'He Was a Friend of Mine', and another was 'Baby Let Me Follow You Down'. When Dylan recorded the latter that November for his début album, Bob Dylan, he delivered, with his ever-immaculate timing, a spoken intro over his guitar-work, admitting his debt and giving Von Schmidt a name-check: 'I first heard this from, uh, Ric Von Schmidt,' he said: 'I met him one day in the green pastures of, uh, Harvard University'—and then lit into the song, delivering it so beautifully that he made it his own. (See separate entry on the song's provenance.)

Eric von Schmidt responded after an almost 35-year delay, recording the variant 'Baby, Let Me Lay It on You' in a version that included the line 'Now Bobby Dylan, he put me in a song'.

The two first came together as performers in London in January 1963, when Dylan contributed backing vocals and harmonica to several tracks on the sessions for the album Dick Fariña and Eric Von Schmidt, which was released, in the UK only, in May 1963, with Dylan billed as Blind Boy Grunt. (The story of Von Schmidt and Fariña's time in Britain that year, with and without Dylan, is told in some detail in DAVID HAJDU's Positively 4th Street: a book in which there is much additional material on Von Schmidt and his rôle in the Cambridge folk scene—and for which Von Schmidt was an interviewee.) Later in 1963 Von Schmidt released his well-known album The Folk Blues of Eric Von Schmidt, which became more well-known after Dylan included its front cover among the records scattered around the room on his front cover for the album Bringing It All Back Home. In a later, further self-reflexive gesture, the cover Dylan chose for his Nashville Skyline album catches him in a pose that is itself a visual echo of the Von Schmidt cover.

In 1964 came Eric Sings von Schmidt (with GEOFF MULDAUR and creepy Mel Lyman). Though he appeared at the 1965 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, Eric didn't issue another album until his foray into psychedelia in 1969, Who Knocked the Brains Out of the Sky?, for which Dylan contributed sub-hokum liner notes in the declamatory style you might associate with MUHAMMAD ALI or LITTLE RICHARD. (These included—and there was plenty more of the same—'He can separate the men from the boys and the note from the noise. The bridle from the saddle and the cow from the cattle. He can play the tune of the moon. The why of the sky and the commotion of the ocean.' It certainly managed to avoid saying anything in particular, which for Who Knocked the Brains Out of the Sky? was probably best.)

Back in the pre-psychedelic 60s (peyote mushrooms notwithstanding) however, Von Schmidt had also contributed to that various-artists album The Blues Project, on which Dylan had played piano on one Geoff Muldaur track. Eric had played piano alongside Dylan on that track, and had one further track on the LP himself, 'Blow Whistle Blow', the second track on Side 1; he also painted the front cover. A month or two after these sessions, Dylan had visited Von Schmidt at the home he had retained in Sarasota, Florida, and one day in early May 1964 the two of them home-taped themselves on a total of 20 songs and song fragments.

As well as playing guitars, they shared vocals on two improvised songs, one 'Black Betty' and three attempts at 'Stoned on the Mountain'. Dylan took the lead vocal on 'Come All Ye Fair and Tender Ladies', 'Money Honey', 'More and More', 'Mr. Tambourine Man' (probably the earliest extant recording), 'Susie Q', 'I Want to Hold Your Hand' (oh yes) and 'Walkin' Down the Line'. Dylan also took lead vocal and played harmonica on two tries at 'Long Johnny CooCoo'; he played harmonica behind Von Schmidt on a further blues improvisation, a further instrumental and a revisit to 'Glory, Glory'; and he played harmonica and sang backing vocals on their final number, Von Schmidt's best-known composition, 'Joshua Gone Barbados'. This tape has never circulated, but 'Joshua Gone Barbados', quite new at the time, was on Eric's latest album (Eric Sings von Schmidt) and quickly became a widely covered song. Dylan himself attempted the song on the Basement Tapes sessions in 1967 (circulated but officially unreleased) but it remained unreleased. But the lyric includes, after the title phrase, the line 'staying in a big hotel', which Dylan liked enough to use verbatim after his title phrase at the beginning of 'Went to See the Gypsy' on the 1970 album New Morning.

Von Schmidt never gave up painting, and in more recent years has come to regard it as his prime purpose in the world, despite making further albums with the participation of many well-known musicians, including GARTH HUDSON. In 1979, with Jim Rooney, he published the book Baby, Let Me Follow You Down: The Illustrated Story of the Cambridge Folk Years. In the 1980s Von Schmidt returned from Provo, Utah, where he liked to paint, to his parents' home in Westport, Connecticut, and in December 1985 participated in the 25th Anniversary Reunion Concert of Club 47 performers (along with BAEZ, MIMI FARIÑA, Richie Havens and many others) at Boston Symphony Hall. In more recent times, Eric Von Schmidt has been fighting throat cancer, and though he is reported to have recovered, his days as a singer are over. He remains committed to painting, and has launched a website devoted to his own and his late father's art.

[Eric Von Schmidt: The Folk Blues of Eric Von Schmidt, Prestige/Folklore 14005, US, 1963; Eric Sings von Schmidt, Prestige 7384, 1964; Who Knocked the Brains Out of the Sky?, Smash SRS 67124, US, 1969; 'Baby, Let Me Lay It on You', nia, Baby, Let Me Lay It on You, Gazell GPCD2013, US, 1995. Dick Fariña, Eric Von Schmidt & Blind Boy Grunt: 'Glory, Glory', 'Xmas Island', 'Cocaine', London, 15 Jan 1963, Dick Fariña and Eric Von Schmidt, Folklore F-LEUT-7, UK, 1964; 'Overseas Stomp' (several takes), London, 15 Jan 1963, unreleased (the LP version excludes Dylan). 'Blow Whistle Blow', NY, early 1964, The Blues Project, Elektra EKL-7264, 1964. Eric Von Schmidt & Jim Rooney, Baby, Let Me Follow You Down: The Illustrated Story of the Cambridge Folk Years, New York: Anchor Books, 1979; 2nd edn., Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994. The Eric & Harold Von Schmidt website: www.vonsworks.com.

David Hajdu, Positively 4th Street: The Lives and Times of Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Mimi Baez Fariña and Richard Fariña, New York: Farar, Straus & Giroux, 2001. Thanks too to the unreliable, interesting profile of Von Schmidt by John Kruth, seen online 4 Sep 2005 at www.richardandmimi.com/eric-linernotes.html.]

Wallace, Ian [1946 -] Ian Wallace was born in Bury, Lancashire, north-west England, on September 26, 1946, learnt to play drums as a child and in 1963, aged 16, had a school-friends band called the Jaguars before joining his first pro outfit, the Warriors, whose vocalist was the future co-founder of Yes, Jon Anderson. The Warriors lasted right up to the end of 1967: longer than any line-up Wallace has been in since. A few months in Copenhagen and couple of years backing other people on tours was followed by involvement in the complicated last days of the Bonzo Dog Doo-Dah Band and its leader Vivian Stanshall (who announced the Bonzos' breakup at a gig in London in January 1970) and then in the World, which was dominated by ex-Bonzo Neil Innes. The World made one album, Lucky Planet, but split up before its release. The band had lasted six months.

In spring 1971 Ian Wallace joined the almost equally volatile but rather more successful King Crimson, a defiantly jazz avant-garde unit of Real Musicians—and for most people, this is what Ian Wallace's work is all about: his era and his genre. On the group's extensive touring, Wallace's drumming was subjected to experimental processing with synthesisers, devised by lyricist and pioneering computer boffin Pete Sinfield. Off stage, internecine warfare was the norm, and less than a year after joining, Wallace was one of several who quit together to play with British R&B grandad Alexis Korner instead. He stayed with Korner for four albums, then worked with Steve Marriott's All Stars and Alvin Lee and emigrated to the US in 1976—in good time to be taken on by Bob Dylan to play on the 1978 World Tour. He played all that year's 114 concerts, and on the album recorded in Santa Monica that April, Street Legal.

After 1978 he was not retained for the work of the Born Again period, but worked instead with his old mate Jon Anderson, Jackson Browne, Don Henley, David Lindley, Graham Nash, Stevie Nicks, ROY ORBISON, Bonnie Raitt and RON WOOD. He was almost brought back into the Dylan orb by being called in to play on THE TRAVELING WILBURYS' first track, 'Handle with Care':

> 'JEFF LYNNE called me one morning to ask if I was available to do a session. Seems that he, TOM PETTY, Roy Orbison and GEORGE HARRISON were all hanging out at Bob Dylan's house in Point Dume and had written a song. . . . It had a drum machine on it but it needed spicing up with some drum fills and could I go over that afternoon to Quincy Jones' studio to play said fills. Of course I said yes and did that exact thing, playing tom fills. . . . MIKE CAMPBELL was also there adding guitar parts. The only person that wasn't there was Dylan.'

Wallace adds: 'I never did get paid for that session. At least, in cash. But I had spent part of my honeymoon at George's place in Maui and I do have a Traveling Wilburys platinum album on my studio wall, so I think that's payment enough!'

Then he joined Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band at the beginning of 1991—at, that is, one of its lowest points—playing his first gig that January 28 in Zurich, taking in the two dreadful gigs in Glasgow and the eight London concerts (of which only one was really any good), and finishing on March 2 in Mexico City; resuming on April 19 in New Orleans and running through till May 12 in Amherst, Massachusetts; resuming again on June 6 in Rome and including, after a short break in late July to early August, the South American concerts from August 8 in Buenos Aires through to August 21 in Rio de Janeiro—and then playing the far, far better autumn 1991 dates, from Corpus Christi, Texas, on October 24 through to Charlottesville, Virginia, on November 20: a tour leg that included that golden period that gave us concerts like Ames, Iowa; Madison, Wisconsin; South Bend, Indiana and Louisville, Kentucky (November 2, 5, 6 & 8), on which Wallace's drumming had a wonderfully rolling propulsion that liberated and transformed performances of 'Watching the River Flow', 'Shelter from the Storm', 'Early Morning Rain' and 'Gotta Serve Somebody'.

Wallace remained with the band for 1992. There was an unusually long first leg, from March 18 in Perth, Australia, through to May 23 in Las Vegas—and though Wallace remained in place, a second drummer, CHARLIE QUINTANA, was added as from April 27. Several further legs followed, and in early September Quintana went, but WINSTON WATSON was brought in to replace him, so there was still a second drummer alongside Wallace. This meant that he was able to miss, for some reason, the Binghampton, New York, date on October 12. The year's last date was November 15 in West Palm Beach, Florida. It was Ian Wallace's last date too. Add together his stint in 1978 and his two years in the Never-Ending Tour band, and his Dylan concerts total is 307.

He thought there were going to be more. He was all ready for the first leg of 1993: his drums had been shipped and he was to fly to Dublin two days later when Dylan's office phoned him and told him plans had changed. As he told HOWARD SOUNES: 'I don't hold any grudges . . . [but] the way that it was done was a little upsetting. . . . I think I'm the only person he's fired twice.'

[The World: Lucky Planet, Liberty LBG 83419, UK, Nov 1970. Wallace quotes re the Wilburys seen online 18

Feb 2006 at http://dmme.net/interviews/wallace.html; final quote from Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, ms p.478.]

Wallflowers, the See Dylan, Jakob.

Warhol, Andy [1928 - 1987] Andrew Warhola was born to blue-collar Slovak immigrant parents in Pittsburgh on August 6, 1928. After an early career in commercial illustration in New York City he became the best-publicised innovator in the pop art movement, mostly with quintessentially 1960s silk-screening and, in partnership with others, made a large number of 'underground' movies of deliberate technical amateurishness and interminable length (starting with the silent, black and white, 321-minute Sleep in 1963). He was also the 'designer' and producer of some of the Velvet Underground's début album in 1967 (TOM WILSON also worked on it) and might be considered, with the 1973 launch of his journal Interview, the inventor of the celeb magazine.

Warhol's career was dedicated to a nihilism that was timely and useful as a deflator of old pomposities that had lingered into the post-war world. He also coined a number of sayings, pre-eminently 'In the future everyone will be famous for 15 minutes': it is one of the things for which he remains famous.

One of those who became briefly famous on his slender coat-tails was Valerie Solanas of the one-woman SCUM (Society for Cutting Up Men), who shot Warhol on June 3, 1968, putting him in hospital for two months and herself in prison for three years.

For his main connections to Bob Dylan see the entry Sedgwick, Edie; but in the mid-1960s, when both men were so iconic and cool that it was painful to see them together, Dylan was briefly one of the subjects of Warhol's movie camera. He sits there in the Warhol Factory trying to be as immobile as the Empire State building (for, it is said, 15 minutes). A little of this footage is used in SCORSESE's No Direction Home and Warhol gets a 'special thanks' in the credits.

Their less mesmerising but more comic connection is that in payment, Warhol gave Dylan a painting—one of his ELVIS series (based on a publicity still from the decent 1960 Presley film Flaming Star)—and Dylan swapped it for a sofa belonging to his manager ALBERT GROSSMAN.

Andy Warhol died of complications following gallbladder surgery in a New York hospital in the early morning of February 22, 1987, aged 58. Valerie Solanas but barely outlived him; she died of pneumonia in 1988.

Warnes, Jennifer [1947 -] Singer, songwriter and keyboards player Jennifer Jean Warnes was born in Seattle on March 3, 1947; her father turned down a recording deal for her when she was seven years old. Aged nine, and in the swaddling band of the American flag, she sang 'The Star Spangled Banner' at the Shrine Auditorium in LA above the noise of 300 ensemble accordions. Rejecting opera for folk music, and trying to make it under the name Jennifer Warren, she made her eclectic first album, I Can Remember Everything, in 1968, followed up by 1969's See Me, Feel Me, Touch Me, Heal Me (an off-puttingly clamorous title, perhaps; its contents included 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues'). In 1970 she fell in with LEONARD COHEN, with whom, down the years, she would record guest vocals (and sing back-up) on a series of Cohen studio albums after touring Europe with him and featuring on his Live Songs album of 1973.

She was still calling herself Jennifer Warren when in 1972 she released Jennifer, the only album of her own between meeting Cohen in 1970 and her breakthrough seven years later with the album Jennifer Warnes and the hit single 'Right Time of the Night'. Her 1979 album Shot Through the Heart included a decent cover of Dylan's New Morning song 'Sign on the Window'. Her career highlights include 'It Goes Like It Goes' for the film Norma Rae (1980), duetting with Joe Cocker on the 1982 no.1 hit single 'Up Where We Belong' (written for An Officer and a Gentleman), and duetting with ex-Righteous Brother Bill Medley on another no.1 hit single, '(I've Had) The Time of My Life' in 1987. That January she also released her album Famous Blue Raincoat: Songs of Leonard Cohen and, from it, a single of 'Bird on the Wire'. She has also sung on recordings by HARRY BELAFONTE, Jackson Browne, Sam & Dave, James Taylor, Tina Turner, Bobby Womack, WARREN ZEVON and others; her own records have become few and far between; her last solo album—itself the first for nine years—was The Well, in 2001.

Twenty-one years earlier, she and Bob Dylan and FRED TACKETT and a dog had got together in Bob's garage studio in Santa Monica and recorded the early, try-out version of 'Every Grain of Sand'. It wasn't a happy conjunction, artistically, and Jennifer Warnes ended up barely there at all in the mix, but it was released in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3. She was better off with Leonard. (See 'Every Grain of Sand', non-Blake elements for details.)

[Jennifer Warnes: I Can Remember Everything, Parrot PAS 71020, US, 1968; See Me, Feel Me, Touch Me, Heal Me, Parrot PAS 71034, 1969; Jennifer, Reprise 2065, US, 1972; Jennifer Warnes, Arista 4062, US, 1977; Shot Through the Heart, Arista 4127, 1979; Famous Blue Raincoat: Songs of Leonard Cohen, Cypress 661-111, US, 1987; The Hunter, Private Music 82089, US, 1992; The Well, Music Force SD8960, US, 2001. Bob Dylan, Jennifer Warnes, Fred Tackett & dog: 'Every Grain of Sand', Santa Monica, 23 Sep 1980.]

Was, David [1952 -] David Weiss was born in Detroit on October 26, 1952, the son of Soupy

Sales' sidekick Shoutin' Shorty Hogan, and grew up to be a jazz critic for the L.A. Herald-Examiner as well as a songwriter, musician and, with his childhood friend DON WAS—with whom he'd had a dalliance in the White Panther Party and attended the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor—co-founded the wacky but modish pop group Was (Not Was), a sort of 1980s American 10cc meets the Pet Shop Boys but with an increasing fixation for lounge music. Featuring vocalists Sir Harry Bowen and Sweet Pea Atkinson, ex-MC5 guitarist Wayne Kramer, Don on bass and David on keyboards, they began making what became a small number of eclectic smarty-pants albums, starting with the electronic disco of Was (Not Was) in 1981. David must have had problems in the taste department; not only was he fixated on golf but he even gave that life-long enemy of rock'n'roll Mel Tormé a good review for an early 1980s concert performance. The punishment for the latter was Tormé singing on a silly Was (Not Was) song called 'Zaz Turned Blue' on the second Was (Not Was) album, Born to Laugh at Tornadoes. He and his pianist recorded a version that gave it, said Was, 'something of the wry poignancy of "Send in the Clowns".' Yes, it was as bad as that.

David Was was also a multi-instrumentalist himself; that album featured him on lead and background vocals, flute, trumpet, Korg organ, vibes and harmonica. Their record label Geffen refused to issue their third album, Lost in Prehistoric Detroit but after changing labels came What's Up Dog? in 1988, in the midst of a torrent of 12-inch singles, CD-singles and re-mixes, often with titles sometimes rather more interesting than the music—though not in the case of their top dance hits 'Tell Me That I'm Dreaming', 'Spy in the House of Love' and 'Walk the Dinosaur'. The 1990 album Are You Okay? and a hit revival of the Temptations' song 'Papa Was a Rolling Stone' followed.

In 1990 David and Don Was also co-produced Dylan's album Under the Red Sky. They began at Oceanway Studios in Hollywood on January 6, and that month recorded '10,000 Men', 'God Knows', 'Handy Dandy' and 'Cat's in the Well'. Overdubs were done in May, including some vocals by David—and by Sir Harry Bowens and Sweat Pea Atkinson—but at the January session(s) Dylan played piano, JIMMY VAUGHAN played guitar, Kenny Aronoff played drums and Don Was played bass. Further sessions in March–April completed the basic tracks.

In some quarters the Was production was much criticised for being so unlike that by DANIEL LANOIS on the previous Dylan album, Oh Mercy. In other quarters, this was what made people grateful.

David split off from the rather more successful Don after recording the unreleased album Boo in 1992 and touring Europe supporting Dire Straits. He worked on a number of film projects (after appearing as the keyboard player of the Gourmet Club Party Band in Freshman in 1990; Don appeared as a guitarist), including writing lyrics for the unremarkable Lenny Henry TV film In Dreams (1992), being the music supervisor on An American Werewolf in Paris (aka An American Werewolf II; 1997), The X-Files movie (1998) and The Big Tease (1999) and writing—as did Don—music for the TV series 'The Education of Max Bickford' (2001), which starred the splendid Richard Dreyfuss, and 'That Was Then', a comedy ABC cancelled after one series (2002).

In 2004 David and Don got back together to work towards a possible new CD and, reuniting with many Was (Not Was) members, they toured into 2005.

[Was (Not Was): Was (Not Was), Island ILPS 9666, US, 1981; Born to Laugh at Tornadoes, Geffen LP 24251, US, 1983; What's Up Dog?, Capitol, nia, 1988. Tormé data from www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=5062814; some further background info from www.andwedanced.com/artists/wnw.htm, both online 19 Feb 2006.]

Was, Don [1952 -] Don Fagenson was born in Detroit on September 13, 1952 and by junior high school was friends with the future DAVID WAS, his partner-to-be in the group Was (Not Was). They stayed in tandem right through to their attendance at the University of Michigan but Don dropped out after a year and when David went off to LA to write jazz reviews, Don stayed in Detroit taking whatever bass guitar gigs he could find until at the end of the 1970s, tiring of insolvency, he told his old friend that unless they got back together and made it in the music biz, he was going to go into the crime biz instead. Was (Not Was) was the result.

In the wake of the group's popularity, Don became, in the second half of the 1980s, an increasingly successful producer of other people's records. In 1989 Don produced both Bonnie Raitt's 'comeback album' and the B-52s' second mainstream breakthrough album Cosmic Thing, co-produced with Nile Rodgers (the group's 1980 album Wild Planet had also made the top 20 in the US and UK, but Cosmic Thing made both top 10s), and in 1993 he was among the many who produced ELTON JOHN's album Duets. Don Was also co-produced—and continues to co-produce—albums by THE ROLLING STONES: he and 'the Glimmer Twins' co-produced Voodoo Lounge (1994), the live album Stripped (1995), Bridges to Babylon (1997), the newer material on the greatest hits collection Forty Licks (2002), Live Licks (2004) and A Bigger Bang (2005). In 1995 Don Was directed that wonderful, touching TV film about BRIAN WILSON's struggle to return from the abyss, Brian Wilson: I Just Wasn't Made for These Times.

In 1990, however, and in tandem with David Was, Don produced Bob Dylan's album Under the Red Sky. He was impressed (even if the public wasn't), perhaps especially by Dylan's detailed and wide grip on the nuts and bolts of music history. Interviewed in LA that fall, he reported: '. . . he's a great authority on older rock'n'roll and blues forms. You can't stump him on a record—the most obscure Sun sides, the most obscure rockabilly stuff, the most obscure blues, he can sit down and play them and sing them for you. He really knows his stuff.' It was also Don Was who said of the album's title track: 'It's actually about people who got trapped in his hometown. I think it's about Hibbing and about people who never left. . . . He said, "It's about my hometown."'

Such an indiscretion might have been expected to spell the end of their association, but in fact a few years further down the road Don Was and Dylan re-connected. First, on January 13, 1993 they found themselves together in CBS' Nashville studios when Dylan and WILLIE NELSON shared vocals on a performance of their joint composition 'Heartland' for the TV programme 'A Country Music Celebration', shown that February 6. Don Was played bass (and JIM KELTNER drums) behind them. On April 28, at the KRLU-TV studios in Austin, Texas, it was much the same situation. It was for the TV special 'Willie Nelson: The Big Six-O' and after Dylan sang 'Hard Times' backed by his own band, he and Willie sang 'Pancho & Lefty' together, backed by a unit that included Don Was on bass (and included BENMONT TENCH on keyboards). Finally, when Dylan and TRISHA YEARWOOD tried to sing 'Tomorrow Night' together on 'Rhythm, Country & Blues: The Concert' in LA on March 23, 1994, there were the old Was (Not Was) vocalists Sir Harry Bowen and Sweet Pea Atkinson on backing vocals, and there was Don again on bass.

Don Was has returned to Motor City in a better money-earning capacity than when he still lived there. Beginning in 2004, he's been working on TV ads and campaigns for Lincoln and Mercury cars. When asked by The Wall Street Journal about the notion of rock stars selling out by either making music for TV commercials or appearing in them, such as Bob Dylan did in that 2004 Victoria's Secret commercial (see co-option of real music by advertising, the), Was said: 'The first thing I thought was "Love Sick" is one of the greatest songs ever recorded. It won a Grammy. They don't play it on the radio, but if Victoria's Secret has the good taste to want to associate their thing with that song, I think, "Good for him." Now, in the end, I'm trying to put myself in Bob's head—did you see the girl in that ad? If you get to spend two days on the set with her, and they pay you, you basically have landed on the dream scenario of rock and roll.'

Was not was that shallow or what?

[Don Was, quotes re Dylan: interview by Reid Kopel, LA, 15 Oct 1990, The Telegraph no.37, UK, winter 1990. Brian Wilson: I Just Wasn't Made for These Times, dir. Don Was; Cro Magnon/Palomar, US, 1995. Was (Not Was) data: see the David Was entry. Wall Street Journal, nia, quoted in mph magazine, undated but seen online 20 Feb 2006 at http://mph-online.com/web/pr translated/00502.]

Watson, Doc [1923 -] Arthel Lane Watson was born in Stoney Fork Township, near Deep Gap, North Carolina, on March 3, 1923. He could play the guitar by 16, but was married with two children by the time landed a gig playing electric lead guitar in a country and western swing band led by Jack Williams. Doc was then 'discovered' by RALPH RINZLER in North Carolina when Rinzler arrived there in 1960 to record CLARENCE ASHLEY. The following year Doc, Ashley and others (Fred Price, Clint Howard and Gaither Carlton) travelled to New York to perform a concert sponsored by Friends of Old Time Music. Watson made his first solo appearance, at Gerde's Folk City in Greenwich Village—playing to a very different crowd from those around Deep Gap, North Carolina—in 1962.

As well as proving an exceptional flat-pick guitarist, with an especially clear, crisp tone and an instinct for felicitous understatement, he became, despite a limited range of expression as a vocalist, a significant conduit of repertoire for the Folk Revivalists when Dylan was in amongst them.

'Alberta', which Dylan sings twice on his 1970 double-LP Self Portrait, is a song associated with Doc Watson. He also recorded one of the 'Unfortunate Rake' cycle of songs, calling his variant 'St. James Hospital'; he learnt it from ALAN LOMAX, who'd picked it up from James 'Iron Head' Baker (and Watson does give Baker the composer credit). The chapter 'Bob Dylan, BLIND WILLIE McTELL and "Blind Willie McTell"' in MICHAEL GRAY's Song & Dance Man III: The Art of Bob Dylan traces the ways that 'The Unfortunate Rake' and its variants become transmuted into McTell's 'The Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues' and eventually into Dylan's 'Blind Willie McTell' too, and it's reasonable to assume that one of the versions of the 'Rake' cycle Dylan knew was Doc Watson's. It re-appears on The Essential Doc Watson Vol. 1, first issued in 1973, which also contains a dreadful, cutesy version of 'Froggie Went a-Courtin'' and an excellent version—a remake: he had first recorded it for Folkways—of the early Frank Hutchison song 'The Train That Carried My Girl from Town' (in Hutchison's title he called her 'the girl', not 'my girl'), which Watson made into a standard repertoire item. In the 1960s he also recorded one of the many versions of 'Sitting on Top of the World', which, like his 'St. James Hospital' was on his 1964 album Doc Watson.

And so was 'The Lone Pilgrim', the song with which Dylan takes his leave of this World Gone Wrong in 1993: and doing so with a performance of spectral calm, and one that, aptly, requires you to put your ear close in order to hear a lyric that presents itself as from the death-bed and beyond. Dylan specifies in his liner notes to the album that this song was taken 'from an old Doc Watson record'. (But see separate entry on the song.)

Doc Watson's son Merle, who had started playing back-up guitar behind his father at the Berkeley Festival of 1964, died in a tractor accident on October 23, 1985. Merle keeps on keeping on. No-one has had a deeper influence on the way the acoustic flat top guitar has come to be played as a lead instrument in folk, traditional and bluegrass music.

[Doc Watson: 'Alberta', nia, Southbound, Vanguard VSD-79213, US (Fontana RFL 6074, UK), 1966, CD-reissued Vanguard VMD 79213-2, US, 1988 (UK 1995); 'Froggie Went a-Courtin" & 'The Train That Carried My Girl to Town', all nia, reissed The Essential Doc Watson Vol. 1, Vanguard 5308, US, CD-reissued Vanguard VMCD 7308, US, 1987; 'Sitting on Top of the World', NY, 25/26 Nov 1963 & 'St. James Hospital', nia, Doc Watson, Vanguard VRS-9152 (mono) & VSD-79152, US, 1964; 1st version of 'The Train That Carried My Girl to Town', nia, The Doc Watson Family, Folkways FA2366, NY, 1963.]

Watson, Winston A. [1961 -] Young, gifted and black Winston Augustus Watson was born in Columbus, Ohio, on September 16, 1961; his father is of African/Scots and Native American origin, and his mother is Dutch Indonesian. The first music he loved was country—'country '55 to '77'—and he knows 'more about Lynyrd Skynyrd than LL Cool J.'

He grew up in Tuscon, Arizona, to be a drummer and percussionist, starting to play in bars and clubs at age 17 and eventually joining the city's cult band Giant Sand. He first played on their 1985 album Valley of Rain and then on 1986's Ballad of a Thin Line Man and thus appears briefly on their later compilation album, 1989's Giant Sandwich. He has also played on solo albums by Giant Sand's Howe Gelb (Hisser and Confluence), on the 1990 Was (Not Was) album What's Up, Dog? [sic], on WARREN ZEVON's Life'll Kill Ya and for Robyn Hitchcock, Stevie Salas and others. He is not to be confused (as per the 'Bob Dylan's Who's Who' website and Itsuko Nishimura in Japan) with the older and more heavy-set Winston Watson from the Jamaican Trenchtown reggae band the Meditations, formed in the early 1970s.

Our Winston became a member of Dylan's Never-Ending Tour band in September 1992, débuting in Kansas City, Missouri, on the 6th, under a peculiar but effective arrangement under which for the first few concerts the serving drummer, IAN WALLACE, remained in place and Winston replaced temporary second drummer CHARLIE QUINTANA. Winston recalls that 'Chalo [Charlie] told me to fly out while Dylan was carrying two drummers. I arrived, Chalo left and the next day I played my first show with the man. 80,000 people, no rehearsal, no meeting, nothing!'

These two-drummers-at-once performances were terrific, but didn't last. The last one was on September 13, in Lafayette, Louisiana, after which there was a short break and when the tour resumed on October 9 in Pittsburgh, Winston Watson was, for the first time, the band's sole drummer.

He was popular at once. As Dylan-watcher John Howells noted, 'The late '92 shows were truly incredible, mostly thanks to the new drummer Winston Watson.' He was a joy to see, especially in the early period. His drumming was energetic and wholehearted without any undue obtruding; and his enthusiasm was a delight. He didn't know that you're supposed to keep your head down, so time and again when Dylan turned towards him to call a halt to whatever number they were on, Watson would grin at him in undisguised pleasure simply at being there playing. To start with, Dylan seemed as charmed as the audience. As Winston says, 'He thought I had something at the right time: that's why I was lucky enough to be there for as long as I was'; and for a long time it was an oddly pleasing sight to see this shining high-energy youth and the gnarled old master interacting. He was doomed.

This was, Winston is certain, at least in part thanks to VAN MORRISON, who told Dylan he thought his drummer 'couldn't play. Van hated me, my playing, my clothes, even my hair! He said so at dinner one night in Molde, Norway.' This would have been when they played the Molde Jazz Festival on July 19, 1996 or the following evening (a night off). Winston's last concert with the band was in Atlanta, Georgia, that August 4—though he was also in the studio in January 1997 in Miami to play on the recording of 'Dirt Road Blues' for the Time Out of Mind album.

Because of the period he was in the tour band, we also find him on the New York Supper Club appearances in November 1993 (two song-performances from which are included on the 1995 Highway 61 Interactive CD Rom), at 'WOODSTOCK II' in August 1994, on the wretched MTV Unplugged™ album and video recorded that November and released in 1995 and on the November 1995 'FRANK SINATRA 80th Birthday' concert, in Sinatra's presence, at which Dylan performed 'Restless Farewell'.

In retrospect, Watson has, understandably, mixed feelings: 'To this day I love Van's music: the man is another story. I was crushed. I had to face a festival crowd the next day after having my ego snapped in two. Everything I did afterward failed to connect. I knew that I had stayed in Mississippi a day too long. There was nothing left and Bob knew it. They were already looking [for a new drummer]. In Atlanta, at the Olympics, I resigned to Jeff Kramer, Bob's manager. I told Jeff that I was just taking the man's money at that point. They told me there was work in the fall, and I said I'd go if he couldn't find someone else. The day before I was supposed to leave, they hired DAVID KEMPER. The first show of the tour was in my home town of Tucson. I got my gear from the venue and sent my friends to the show. I couldn't bring myself to go. But Bob's gift keeps giving. He brought me closer to music than anyone, and he took a chance on me. And it changed my existence. It follows me to this day.'

Since leaving Dylan's band, he has been a member of the Arizona band the Low Watts (an offshoot of the Gin Blossoms) and from September 1998 toured with Alice Cooper. In a way, this too brought him full circle: in the early 1980s, in his youth, he had played in a ('kind of Psychedelic Furs sounding') Phoenix-based band called Gentlemen After Dark. They released a 4-track EP, Gentlemen After Dark. Alice Cooper co-produced it.

[Gentlemen After Dark: Gentlemen After Dark, nia, US, c.1983. Giant Sand: Valley of Rain, New Rose ROSE84, France & Enigma 72050, US, 1985; Ballad of a Thin Line Man, Zippo ZONG 013, UK, 1986; Giant Sandwich, What Goes On GOES ON 33, UK & Homestead HMS 134-2, US, 1989. John Howells quote online 1 Jun 2005 at www.punkhart.com/dylan/reviews/tours.html. Alice Cooper & Gentlemen After Dark source: www.alicecoopertrivia.pwp.blueyonder.co.uk/musicians/m-winstonwatso.php, seen online 19 Nov 2005. Biographical detail, quotes and stories behind his time with Dylan, Winston Watson's e-mails to this writer, 11 Dec 2005.]

Weberman, A. J. [1945 -] Alan Jules Weberman, born in Brooklyn, New York on April 26, 1945, called himself the world's only living Dylanologist, and gave up college to be so. He was sitting there in college and suddenly it came to him. 'Well fuck this shit, man,' he claims to have said to himself. 'Interpreting Dylan is a hundred times more interesting than going to school so I dropped out of school and became a Dylanologist full time. . . . I really pushed my brain and I began to get some insight into Dylan' [source untraced]. Weberman played detective. He sniffed through files, kept an ear to the ground for useful rumours and combed Dylan's output for coded messages. Example: when Dylan uses the word 'lady' he means 'oligarchy'. So pushing our brains and letting insight dawn, we have 'Lay, Oligarchy, Lay', 'Sad-Eyed Oligarchy of the Lowlands' and so on.

Weberman's fame rested on his much-mooted but never-seen Dylan Concordance, his founding of the Dylan Liberation Front (he held a street-party outside Dylan's Greenwich Village home at 94 MacDougal Street on Dylan's 30th birthday), his taped phone-conversations with Dylan ('Dylan Meets Weberman', East Village Other, New York, January 19, 1971), his claim to have been beaten up in the street by Dylan, and his raids on Dylan's garbage can.

This last—thinking to investigate the artist's dustbin—was Weberman's real contribution: an innovation he called garbology. Psychically suited to the times we live in, it has been widely taken up by others, though Weberman's term has been ignored and he has rarely been credited as the innovator of this intrusive but resourceful investigative method. Weberman's book My Life in Garbology, 1980, devotes its main chapter to Dylan and his dustbins, and today he presides rather menacingly over the websites www.dylanology.com and www.ajweberman.com. He has also investigated and written about the Kennedy assassination.

The taped phone conversations with Dylan are now CD-released ('licensed personally by AJ', it says on the blurb!) on Bob Dylan: The Classic Interview Vol 2 The Weberman Tapes, Chrome Dreams/Isis CIS2005, UK, 2004, and include 'an introductory note' by Weberman. The best thing that came out of these ludicrous exchanges was surely the joking lines Dylan made up to tease Weberman with (and he succeeded: Weberman took them seriously and was therefore exasperated more than somewhat by their inadequacy as political commentary). These were: 'Down in Progresso / A bracero / Lived in a sombrero / Full of espresso.'

An affectionate account by JOHN BAULDIE of 'A Meeting with Weberman, Summer of '82', is in All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, ed. Michael Gray & John Bauldie, 1987. Weberman finally published a version of his 'Dylan concordance' as the Dylan to English Dictionary in late 2005.

See also Dylan interpreters.

[A.J. Weberman: Dylan to English Dictionary, North Charleston, SC: BookSurge Publishing, 2005.]

Weir, Bob [1947 -] Bob Weir was a member of the Warlocks, which became THE GRATEFUL DEAD; he was its first rhythm guitarist (often described as an idiosyncratic one) as well as one of its singers (sometimes described as a fine one). He was born Robert Hall Weir on October 16, 1947 in San Francisco and grew up in the suburb of Atherton. Because of his undiagnosed dyslexia, his school years were troublesome and he spent part of his adolescence away from home at a school in Colorado, where he first met John Perry Barlow, who would become, like ROBERT HUNTER, a regular lyricist for the Grateful Dead. Weir began playing guitar at age 13, after first trying the piano and trumpet.

As was normal for members of the Dead, Weir also pursued a solo career (albums like Ace and Heaven Help the Fool) and played in 'sidebands' Kingfish, and Bobby and he and the bassist Rob Wasserman formed a duo, though this soon became RatDog. (In 2003 Wasserman quit RatDog but retained a duo partnership with Weir outside it. In the group he was replaced by Robin Sylvester, known for a long, close association with saxophonist STEVE DOUGLAS, which is how Sylvester got to record with Bob Dylan, among others—though just after he joined RatDog it came to a long halt because Bob Weir was suffering from exhaustion.)

RatDog has always included Grateful Dead and Dylan numbers in its repertoire, as illustrated on its 2001 album Live at Roseland. On April 1, 2005, to take a recent example, the band played two sets that opened with a medley of the Champs' 'Tequila', Dylan's 'Silvio' and James Crawford Jr.'s 'Iko Iko'. Later they played, as the Dead often have, both 'Sugaree' and Dylan's 'When I Paint My Masterpiece'.

Dylan's direct musical collaborations with Weir, courtesy of the Grateful Dead (Weir and Bob sometimes shared on stage vocals), are detailed in the entry on the band.

[RatDog: Live at Roseland, Portland, OR, 25 & 26 Apr 2001, nia. 2005 concert repertoire details seen online 22 Aug 2005 at www.musicbox-online.com/rd04-05.html.]

Weissberg, Eric [1939 -] Eric Weissberg was born in New York City on August 16, 1939. With BOB YELLIN and JOHN HERALD, he had been, on violin, a founding member of THE GREENBRIAR BOYS in 1958. Herald, Marshall Brickman and Weissberg had met at the University of Wisconsin (though Weissberg also studied at the Juilliard School of Music). They'd started playing bluegrass together, and this had turned into the group. It was Eric's mother who had thought up their name. Though he had defected to the Tarriers in 1959 (originally as their bass player), he had sufficient loyalty to his group to feel outraged when ROBERT SHELTON wrote his subsequently famous, and admirably percipient, review of the group's support act, Bob Dylan, published in The New York Times on September 29, 1961. Some people, as Shelton wrote later, were pleased for Bob; others were not: 'VAN RONK, cool but gulping hard, told me I had done "a very, very fine thing." Pat CLANCY and his brother Tom said, "Bobby has a lot of talent. He deserves to go places." IZZY YOUNG said he had discovered Dylan months earlier than anyone. And much of the Village music coterie reacted with jealousy, contempt, and ridicule. Eric Weissberg, and Marshall Brickman, two of the ablest instrumentalists about, told me I needed a hearing aid.'

Weissberg was in the line-up of the Tarriers that made the well-received Atlantic album Tell the World About This (which included versions of 'John Hardy', 'Little Maggie' and 'Dark as the Dungeon'), but disbanded the group in April 1964 so as to spend an obligatory six months in the National Guard. They re-formed afterwards and in summer 1965 toured Eastern Europe with JUDY COLLINS. But in 1967, while Bob Dylan was making the Basement Tapes, Weissberg was the soloist at the world première of Earl Robinson's Concerto for Five-string Banjo, with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seven years later, Weissberg was a session guitarist on the first day in the studio for Dylan's masterpiece Blood on the Tracks. It was the only day he participated; he was only there because he was recording an advertising jingle in an adjacent studio and bumped into Phil Ramone, who was Dylan's engineer on the album, who asked him if he could help bring some musicians along.

Weissberg brought in bass player Tony Brown (aka Tony Braun), drummer RICHARD CROOKS, Charlie Brown III and Barry Kornfeld on guitars. Only that day's 'Meet Me in the Morning' survived though to the album—and even then, overdubs later in the month by BUDDY CAGE on steel guitar pushed Weissberg's contribution further back in the mix. However, Weissberg also plays on the cut of 'If You See Her, Say Hello', and may play on that of 'Tangled Up in Blue', released many years later on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3. When Blood on the Tracks came out, Eric Weissberg & Deliverance received a non-specific credit.

That band name derives from the one moment when Weissberg, an outstanding banjo player, had stepped from the relative shadows of folk revival groups and session-work and enjoyed a little fame and success. This had come in 1972 when he and Steve Mandel provided the memorable bluegrass instrumental track 'Duelling Banjos' for a scene of heightened drama within the powerful backwoods rape and survivalism movie Deliverance, directed by the Briton John Boorman but starring Jon Voight, Burt Reynolds, Ned Beatty and Ronny Cox. The Cox character, Atlanta suburbanite Drew, starts playing chords on his guitar. A twisted young albino hillbilly with learning difficulties (Billy Redden) appears on the porch and plays answering lines on the banjo. Their culture clash is acted out in the music.

As this suggests, it was not duelling banjos but a guitar-banjo duel; and in truth the tune was an arrangement by Weissberg and Mandel of 'Feudin' Banjos', composed by Arthur 'Guitar Boogie' Smith in the 1950s (whose over-echoed and meretricious recording did pitch banjo against banjo: 4-string against 5-string, in fact). The spirit and milieu of the Weissberg and Mandel was more that of FLATT & SCRUGGS but it had an extra energetic bite, and the way that it was used as a pivot within the film lifted it out of its genre rut, bringing, in effect, bluegrass music to a new audience. The soundtrack album became a hit, and 'Duelling Banjos', credited to Deliverance Soundtrack/Eric Weissberg & Steve Mandel, became a top 20 hit in the UK and a no.1 hit in the US in early 1973.

Weissberg has now played on over 8,000 other sessions, if you include jingles (which he certainly does). For many years he did no live performing but returned to it latterly, solo and with the New Blue Velvet Band ('The Blue Velvet Band' was a song written and recorded by HANK SNOW, after which was named a folk band of the late 1960s that made one album, Sweet Moments with the Blue Velvet Band, in 1969). Since 2001 Eric Weissberg has toured widely as Art Garfunkel's lead guitarist.

[Eric Weissberg & Steve Mandel: 'Duelling Banjos', nia, in Deliverance, dir. John Boorman; Elmer Productions/Warner Bros, US, 1972; "Duelling Banjos": From the Original Deliverance Soundtrack, CD-reissued Warner Bros/WEA 2683, US, 1990. The Tarriers: Tell the World About This, Atlantic 8042/SD-8042, US, 1960. The Blue Velvet Band: Sweet Moments with the Blue Velvet Band, Warner Bros W 1802, US, 1969. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., p.112.]

Wenner, Jann and unloading heads Jann Wenner, born in New York on January 7, 1946, worked in news media including NBC News and Ramparts magazine before stepping out into the counter-culture. He has published and edited the American pop music bi-weekly magazine Rolling Stone since co-founding it with RALPH J. GLEASON as a San Francisco-based 'underground music paper' in 1967: the year of going to San Francisco with some flowers in your hair. In this spirit he was also a co-author of the book Got a Revolution!: The Turbulent Flight of Jefferson Airplane by Paul Kantner and Jeff Tamarkin, though Wenner disliked the amateurish, sloppy look of the underground press and made Rolling Stone look far neater and more professionally designed. In 1971 Wenner turned his magazine interviews with John Lennon into the book Lennon Remembers, and the following year co-authored Garcia: A Signpost to New Space with Jerry Garcia and Charles A. Reich.

In Rolling Stone's 1969 interview with Dylan, published that November, editor-interviewer Jann Wenner uses the phrase 'unload my head' and Dylan, who had used that phrase in 1965 on Highway 61 Revisited (in 'From a Buick 6'), remarks on how good it sounds and says he'll have to write a song with that phrase in it. This interview is greatly entertaining, with Dylan impersonating the amiable, unassuming, rather slow, solid citizen and prefacing his comments with 'Boy . . .' and 'My gosh . . .' and 'Well, Jann, I'll tell ya . . .'

After the present writer's Song & Dance Man: The Art of Bob Dylan came out in the USA in 1973, it was pleasing to learn that only when Jann Wenner saw the book's comments about this interview of four years beforehand did he realise Dylan had been 'putting him on'. Rolling Stone co-founder, the late RALPH J. GLEASON, wrote: 'I told Wenner at the time that Dylan was putting him on. . . . But it wasn't until you pointed out that bit about unloading his head and Dylan's reply that he ought to use that in a song, that Wenner caught on.'

Gleason added delightful background information on Wenner and the workings of Rolling Stone at that time: 'Wenner . . . said he had to have the book's editor at arm's length to him. I never found out why, since he does not read books.' And: 'In order to understand Wenner's attitude towards Dylan, you first have to know that Wenner never saw him in the 12 or more concerts he gave in the San Francisco-Berkeley area over a three year period. Never once! . . . Wenner did not cop to any of this until after we got Rolling Stone started. . . . Wenner['s] aim in those days was less to take over American publishing than to meet THE BEATLES . . .'

As it happened it was the second time this author had displeased Wenner. The first had been with a report that the short-lived Rolling Stone London office commissioned on the second Isle of Wight Music Festival, at which Dylan appeared, in August 1969. Wenner disliked this report so much that he didn't run it in the US edition, preferring the magazine to appear to have forgotten the entire event. '"Wenner," recalls [London advertising manager Alan] Marcuson, "was fuming at the bit."' Wenner hated the London office anyway, and the last proper British issue was October 18, 1969; when Wenner's interview with Dylan appeared a month later, London retained only an 'Acting Manager' (Jon Ratner), though copies sold in Britain were still printed in England.

In the US the magazine continued to flourish, moving to New York City (HQ of the 'real' American publishing industry) in the mid-1970s, multiplying its revenue with advertisements for mainstream items pitched at its baby-boomer readership and replacing its early hippie idealism with an enthusiastic endorsement of 'the American way of life', treating music as just so much corporately produced consumer product—which had, of course, always been the perspective of the music industry—and sliding its pitch towards a younger and younger audience. Paintings featured in Rolling Stone: The Illustrated Portraits (Chronicle Books, 2000) are now part of 'the Jann Wenner art collection'.

Wenner also publishes Us, a celebrity magazine, Men's Journal and Outside. In 2005, he was inducted into his spiritual home, the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame in its 'Lifetime Achievement' category. His finest achievement, though this wasn't mentioned, might be said to have been using his position to secure a first US solo recording deal for Boz Scaggs (with Atlantic Records), who gave them one of the greatest début albums in rock history, 1968's Boz Scaggs.

[Paul Kantner, Jeff Tamarkin & Jann Wenner, Got a Revolution!: The Turbulent Flight of Jefferson Airplane, US: Atria Books, nia. John Lennon & Jann Wenner, Lennon Remembers, 1971; expanded edn., New York: Verso Books, 2000. Jerry Garcia, Charles A. Reich & Jann Wenner, Garcia: A Signpost to New Space, nia, 1972; republished New York: Da Capo, 2003. Bob Dylan interview, Rolling Stone no. 47, San Francisco, 29 Nov 1969; collected in Craig MacGregor, Bob Dylan: A Retrospective, 1972, reprinted as Bob Dylan, The Early Years: A Retrospective, 1990. Ralph J. Gleason: letter to this writer, Berkeley, CA, 14 Mar 1974. Michael Gray: 'That Million Dollar Serenade', Rolling Stone no. 42,

London edn., 20 Sep 1969. Alan Marcuson quote and information: Nigel Fountain, Underground: The London Alternative Press 1966–74, 1988. Rolling Stone: The Illustrated Portraits, San Francisco: Chronicle Books, 2000.]

Wexler, Jerry [1917 -] Jerome Wexler was born in Brooklyn, New York, on January 10, 1917, and was already into black music when he left high school at 15. He hung out in Harlem and 52nd Street clubs, studied in New York, served in the US Army and then majored in industrial journalism at Kansas State University, discovering much music in Kansas City. He is credited with having invented the term 'rhythm & blues', to replace the term 'race records', which was becoming a little difficult by the 1950s. He was a Billboard journalist at the time. He joined Atlantic in 1953 as a senior partner, promotion man and A&R man. The artists whose records he signed or produced in his time with the label are legion and include RAY CHARLES, Wilson Pickett, Aretha Franklin, the Coasters, the Drifters, Bobby Darin and LaVern Baker, and Wexler stuck with it all the way through to the overblown 1970s, when the label celebrated its 25th birthday with an enormous rack-jobbers' April in Paris (1973), at which the 'new product' played was almost entirely white. Wexler quit in 1975, but set up 'Atlantic South' in Miami, where he continued as a producer.

In December 1995 the Blues Foundation honoured him with its first Lifetime Achievement Award, and the Jerry Wexler Collection, 1967–2004, is now Collection Number 20393 within the Manuscripts Department at the Library of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He wasn't always so respectable. As AL ARONOWITZ remembered fondly, he 'learned every trick in the book just as well as the next music business crook and he takes no prisoners. He knows how to shave points off a beginner artist's royalties and he knows when to steal a piece of the songwriter's end. . . . [Yet] has emerged as a recording industry holy man, with a discography of hits big enough to keep the world listening for eons.' In 1993 (with David Ritz) he wrote his autobiography: Rhythm and the Blues: A Life in American Music (Knopf, 1993).

Along the way, he also produced Dusty Springfield, Dr. John, WILLIE NELSON, Dire Straits and Etta James, and he encountered Bob Dylan first in October 1972 in New York City, when he produced the DOUG SAHM album Doug Sahm & Band, on which Wexler proved himself commendably flexible, willing to go with the amiably shambolic spirit of the gathering rather than play the imperious star producer. It was Wexler who'd brought Sahm to Atlantic, rescuing him from years in the doldrums. (Tracks left off the album at the time have been issued on the CD version of 1992, and still more on The Genuine Texas Groover in 2003.) In August 1973, Dylan and Wexler actually co-produced an album: the début LP by BARRY GOLDBERG, at the Muscle Shoals Studio in Sheffield, Alabama.

Primarily, however, Wexler and regular co-producer BARRY BECKETT were called in by Dylan in 1979—and called back to Muscle Shoals—for his first Born Again album, Slow Train Coming (though they 'prepped it' in California first). Dylan knew that if the album was to work at all, it had to sound great, which meant that it had to be a tremendous production, and that the job had to go to someone with scorching R&B credentials. Jerry Wexler had 'em. It didn't help, however, to save Saved, the follow-up album also co-produced by Wexler and Beckett, again recorded in Sheffield, Alabama, in February 1980. This latter production was a less successful collaboration: Wexler wanted more precision; Dylan wanted it raw. Nor was Wexler impressed with the Born Again message. As he told CLINTON HEYLIN: 'I liked the irony of Bob coming to me, the Wandering Jew, to get the Jesus feel. . . . I had no idea he was on this born-again Christian trip until he started to evangelize me. I said, "Bob, you're dealing with a sixty-two-year-old confirmed Jewish atheist. I'm hopeless. Let's just make an album."'

[Jerry Wexler (with David Ritz), Rhythm and the Blues: A Life in American Music, New York: Knopf, 1993. Al Aronowitz quote 'Honoring Jerry Wexler', May 1996, seen online 12 Sep 2005 at www.bigmagic.com/pages/blackj/column9.htm. Clinton Heylin, Behind the Shades Revisited, London: Penguin, 2003, p.502.]

'What Can I Do for You?' [1980] An audacious instance of Dylan's using his old secular skills in a new devotional context is offered by 'What Can I Do for You?', on the Saved album. This not only gives us, out of nowhere, the most eerie, magnificent harmonica-work Dylan has done since the stoned, majestic concerts of 1966 but also applies all Dylan's enviable seductive gifts. The same knowingly disarming tone of voice that yielded 'Lay Lady Lay' back in 1969 is turned on here to disarm Jesus. Listen to the voice that sings these lines: 'I know all about poison, I know all about fiery darts / I don't care how rough the road is, show me where it starts.'

This audacity of delivery, the seductive intimacy of the voice as it handles these sumptuous, tactile syllables, is matched by the intimately personal, conversational nature of Dylan's highly attentive, judicious lyric, where every small word is carefully chosen and the whole adds up to a most beautiful act of articulate devotional humility. Within the lyric too we're offered a rich, seamlessly woven array of scriptural threads.

The central question asked in the song's title echoes the only question contained in the brief but lovely, devotional Psalm 116: 'What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?' (Psalms 116:12). Dylan's song retains some of the tone and import of this Passover Psalm while taking nothing else specifically from it. While Dylan might be said to echo its 'thou hast loosed my bonds' (in verse 16) in his '[You] Pulled me out of bondage', in fact his phrase more closely duplicates one found recurrently all through the Bible, being 'sold into bondage' and then brought 'out from bondage' being not only the core of the story of Exodus but by extension one of the central metaphors of Judaeo-Christian belief. Thus we can recognise Psalm 116 as providing here inspiration rather than further text.

Those 'fiery darts', meanwhile, are taken from Ephesians 6:11–16, in which Paul exhorts us: 'Put on the whole armour of God. . . . Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked.'

'What Can I Do for You?' also offers, full of impact and panache, the line 'Soon as a man is born you know the sparks begin to fly.' This is a fine example of one of Dylan's greatest strengths: his capacity for modernising and colloquialising an archaic and formal line or phrase from biblical text: for rescuing and re-charging it. Dylan does this all through his work, sometimes at the most unexpected yet felicitous moments, often playfully.

For instance: in 'Joey', from the 1976 album Desire, Dylan's movie-like funeral scene has people weeping, immediately followed by Joey Gallo's old mafiosi friend Frankie muttering 'He ain't dead, he's just asleep', which is plausibly colloquial yet an exact re-statement of Christ's words at the death-bed of a young girl he then brings back to life: 'He said unto them, Give place: for the maid is not dead but sleepeth' (from Matthew 9:24). And: 'Why make ye this ado, and weep? the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth' (from Mark 5:39). And: 'Weep not; she is not dead, but sleepeth' (from Luke 8:52).

This updating and re-charging, with a surge which both brings out the essentials of the old and adds new layers of meaning, is especially powerful and generous on the 'Born Again' albums, since they offer such a concentration of biblical text and allusion.

Here in 'What Can I Do for You?' Dylan gives this intelligent creative treatment to the words of Job 5:7: 'Yet man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward.' His re-write, 'Soon as a man is born you know the sparks begin to fly', gives it a sparky, edgy, threatening contemporaneity (which is the essence of contemporaneity), implying trouble without needing to keep the word 'trouble' in the line.

CHRISTOPHER RICKS noted this back in 1981, saying in a radio interview broadcast on Dylan's 40th birthday that he loved 'the adaptation of biblical quotations and allusions so that they become at once entirely modern and straightforward and simple while nevertheless having a lot of ancient feeling in them. Now that feeling that sparks can't but fly up into the sky, and that's like our trouble . . . [he] turns that into a modern world of aggression and punch-up . . .'

The corollary Dylan argues for in his next line—that 'He gets wise in his own eyes'—takes its scriptural cue from the Old Testament book of (Solomon's) Proverbs: 'Be not wise in thine own eyes' (3:7), reiterated by the prophet Isaiah: 'Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight!' (Isaiah 5:21). Again Dylan's re-processing involves a telling shift. As Ricks said in the same interview, 'to "get wise" is different. . . . [Again it's] . . . that rather ugly, threatening American idiom: "Don't you get wise with me." It's not the same as being wise . . . the lyrics are full of these very beautiful turns with old sayings.' (Ricks gives the song further exemplary, alert attention to detail, in his essay 'What He Can Do for You'.)

A nice irony, as regards the trouble and the sparks, is that both arise only in the King James Bible's translation—a case, as Jorge Luis Borges said of others' endeavours, where 'The original is unfaithful to the translation'. In the Greek and the Hebrew, 'trouble' is probably 'labour', and 'the sparks fly upward' is given as 'the sons of the coal lift up their flight' or 'dart upward', or in the Hebrew as 'the sons of the burning coal lift up to fly.' In the magnificent translation in Miles Coverdale's Cologne Bible of 1535, and for the Great Bible of 1539, edited by Coverdale (c.1488–1569), Job's words are different again: 'It is man that is borne unto mysery, like as the byrde for to fle.' This in turn rubs up against a well-known verse of The Book of Common Prayer (Coverdale once more), from the service for the burial of the dead: 'Man that is born of woman hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery.' If this plays subliminally behind Dylan's lines, it helps along his message: he not busy being re-born is busy dying.

Another whisper of inspiration lurks behind 'What Can I Do for You?' too. The fifth and final verse of Christina Rossetti's lyric for the Christmas carol 'In the Bleak Mid-Winter' may have provided the prompt for the distinctively intimate, nuzzling series of questions Dylan assembles in this song. The Rossetti verse is intrinsically less intimate, because it speaks of God in the third person rather than the second, and of that manifestation of God that was the baby Jesus, but it journeys ever nearer to intimacy as it proceeds, and it proceeds by means of posited questions, intoned in crucial humility, just as the Dylan song does: 'What can I give him, poor as I am? / If I were a shepherd I would bring a lamb; / If I were a wise man I would do my part; / Yet what I can I give him—give my heart.' Dylan's song, in parallel, ends by imploring: 'Whatever pleases You, tell it to my heart. / . . . What can I do for You?'

Dylan débuted 'What Can I Do for You?' in concert on the opening night of the first gospel tour, in November 1979, long before he recorded it, and he retained it in his repertoire all through that tour and the next (January–February 1980), recorded it in Sheffield, Alabama, on February 12, played it again every night on the third and final all-gospel tour (April–May 1980) and then performed it at a further ten of the 19 concerts on the semi-gospel fall tour at the end of that year. He revisited the song 12 more times in 1981 but has never played it since.

[Christopher Ricks: radio interview, Cambridge, UK, Apr 1981, in '1961 Revisited: Bob Dylan's Back Pages', BBC Radio Wales, Cardiff, 1981, broadcast 24 May 1981; 'What He Can Do for You', Telegraph no.22, Bury, UK, winter 1985, collected in Michael Gray & John Bauldie, eds., All Across the Telegraph: A Bob Dylan Handbook, 1987.

Christina Rossetti (1830–94): 'Christmas Carol', aka 'In the Bleak Mid-Winter', first published in book form in the first collected edition of her work, Goblin Market, The Prince's Progress and Other Poems, 1875.]

'Whatcha Gonna Do?' [1962] Dylan cut three versions of 'Whatcha Gonna Do?' (all unreleased): two at the Freewheelin' Bob Dylan sessions in New York City on November 14 & December 6, 1962 and another as a songwriter's demo for Witmark in August 1963. This last is the version published in the official Dylan lyrics collections. The song was copyrighted in 1963 and 1966 as by Bob Dylan.

Yet 'Whatcha Gonna Do?' rests heavily on an old black church song, variously titled, and recorded for instance in the 1930s as 'When Death Comes Creeping in Your Room' by the Golden Eagle Gospel Singers, Chicago, May 11, 1937. Dylan did little more than tweak one or two lines for the lyric he publishes as his own.

The line 'When death comes slippin' in your room' also occurs in the chorus of the otherwise dissimilar gospel song 'You're Gonna Need Somebody on Your Bond', recorded twice by the great BLIND WILLIE JOHNSON ('You'll Need Somebody on Your Bond', New Orleans, December 11, 1929, and the last side he ever recorded, the superior 'You're Gonna Need Somebody on Your Bond', Atlanta, April 20, 1930) and subsequently a standard repertoire item (often performed by BIG JOE WILLIAMS as 'You're Gonna Need King Jesus' and by SONNY TERRY & BROWNIE McGHEE as 'I've Been 'Buked and I've Been Scorned') and which moved across into the Folk Revivalist repertoire, not least because the superior take by Johnson was one of the tracks on The Country Blues, the 1959 compilation LP by Sam Charters that was the most important & influential early vinyl issue of old blues after HARRY SMITH's anthology of 1952, AMERICAN FOLK MUSIC, a set of three double-LPs.

[Blind Willie Johnson: 'You'll Need Somebody on Your Bond' & 'You're Gonna Need Somebody on Your Bond'; both reissued on 2-CD set The Complete Blind Willie Johnson, Columbia Legacy Roots N' Blues Series 472190 2, NY, 1993. Various Artists: The Country Blues, RBF RF-1, NY, 1959. Various Artists: American Folk Music, set of 3 double-LPs (Vol.1: Ballads; Vol.2: Social Music; Vol.3: Songs), Folkways FP251–253, NY, 1952; CD-reissued as Anthology of American Folk Music (6-CD box set) with copious notes by many hands and a CD-ROM of extras, Smithsonian Folkways SRW 40090, Washington, D.C., 1997.]

'wheels of fire' Eleven years after the major Basement Tapes song 'This Wheel's on Fire' (1967) comes Street Legal, on which, in the opening song, the wonderful 'Changing of the Guards', Dylan sings: 'Peace will come / With tranquility and splendor on the wheels of fire'. These images correspond to the Old Testament prophet Daniel's vision of the Day of Judgment:

'I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head was like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire' (Daniel 7:9). Soon afterwards: '. . . behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, all nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed' (Daniel 7:13–14).

'When He Returns' [1979] This is the final track on Slow Train Coming, the first of Dylan's 'Born Again' albums, and one of the strongest of the period. Not an especially attractive place to be, nevertheless the world of this song is fiercely, abrasively impassioned and Dylan gives it a tour de force, self-flagellant performance, demanding to know: 'How long can I listen to the lies of prejudice? / How long can I stay drunk on fear out in the wilderness?'

There's a vengeful tone here that sits ill with its declaimed obeisance to the will of Christ: a tone that suggests that there'll be a great deal of slaughter and pain when things come right in the end—when '. . . like a thief in the night / He'll replace wrong with right / When He returns.'

The analogy is of, course, Christ's own idea. According to Matthew 24:42–44, Christ tells the disciples: 'Watch therefore: for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh.' (The same speech is reported also in Luke 12:39–40.) This message is later relayed in two further passages. In Paul's First Epistle to the Thessalonians, he writes: 'For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night' (I Thessalonians 5:2); and in the Second Epistle of Peter the Apostle, he too writes: 'But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night' (from II Peter 3:10).

The pleasingly quirky oxymoron of 'day' and 'night' here naturally so worries the writers of the Good News Bible that they abolish it, so reducing the resonant poetry of 'like a thief in the night' to the dully unmemorable 'like a thief.' Bob Dylan, in creditable contrast, not only uses the whole line but, in making it 'Like a thief in the night / He'll replace wrong with right', offers a matching oxymoron, emphasising the odd ostensible contradiction at the heart of Christ's analogy, while accurately summarising the import of His message.

'When He Returns' enfolds an extravagance of further scriptural reference. Verse 1 alludes (by 'the iron rod') both to God's giving His rod to Moses—the rod by means of which Moses eventually effects the Israelites' escape from 'the iron hand' of the Egyptians—and to Isaiah's prophecy of Christ's coming, in which 'there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots: And the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him . . . the spirit of the knowledge and the fear of the Lord . . . with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked' (Isaiah 11:1–2 & 4; and there is the tone of vengeful relish Dylan imports from the Old Testament into his own song).

Aptly, Dylan's opening couplet matches 'the iron rod' with 'a mighty God'—aptly because this latter is not the anonymous phrase we might assume but is also drawn from, and so alludes to, a passage of Isaiah, the nearby 9:6, which again envisages Christ's coming: 'For unto us a child is born . . . and his name shall be called. . . . The mighty God . . .'

Dylan's next line, 'For all those who have eyes and all those who have ears', uses a particular piece of rhetoric deployed time and again in the New Testament and founded upon a text from the Old Testament book of Ezekiel (12:1–2): 'The word of the Lord also came unto me, saying, Son of man, thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear, and hear not . . .'

('When He Returns' is not, of course, Dylan's first use of this: it's there as rhetoric in 'Blowin' in the Wind': 'Yes 'n' how many ears must one man have . . . ?'; 'Yes 'n' how many times must a man turn his head / Pretending he just doesn't see?')

In the New Testament we find the founding passage of Ezekiel cited by Christ Himself in Matthew 13:43 ('. . . Who hath ears to hear, let him hear') and repeatedly by Christ and others in Mark and Revelation: 'And he said unto them, He that hath ears to hear, let him hear' (Mark 4:9); 'If any man have ears to hear, let him hear' (Mark 4:23); 'If any man have ears to hear, let him hear' (Mark 7:16); 'Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? . . .' (Mark 8:18); and 'He that hath an ear, let him hear . . .' (Revelation 2:7, 11 & 29; 3:6, 13 & 22).

And all that's just in the first verse of 'When He Returns'! The second begins from the text of Matthew 7:14: 'Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.' Dylan echoes delicately the rhythms and the half-rhyming repetitions of this line with his own 'Truth is an arrow, and the gate is narrow, that it passes through'.

Indeed he uses this pattern for most lines in his song, including each verse's opening line: all three incorporate internally rhyming or half-rhyming pairings: 'The iron hand, it ain't no match, for the iron rod'; 'Truth is an arrow, and the gate is narrow, that it passes through'; 'Surrender your crown, on this blood-stained ground, take off your mask.' And this last, the opening line of Dylan's third and final verse, builds its balancing half-rhymes, whether by accident or design, from the balancing bookends of the Bible: 'Surrender your crown' cites Revelation (4:10), while 'this blood-stained ground' cites Genesis (also 4:10). The former describes the end days: 'The four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne . . .'; the passage from Genesis is in the account of the first murder after the Fall, when Cain has slain Abel and God asks: 'What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground.' (Dylan uses this again in the fascinating unissued 1980 song 'Yonder Comes Sin'.)

Finally, Dylan's 'He knows your needs even before you ask' is taken from the Sermon on the Mount: '. . . your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him' (from Matthew 6:8, immediately before the passage we call 'The Lord's Prayer').

It's admirable that 'When He Returns' shoulders so much biblical text without ever groaning under its weight or losing its own strong identity.

When Dylan came to the gospel tours of 1979–80, 'When He Returns' was a highlight of his performances, as he pushed his voice to experimental levels of expressive pain and ardour. Tapes of these performances are not the sort you can play to those who are less than keen on Dylan in the first place; but in concerts on which he was ablaze with the freshness of his evangelical fervour, 'When He Returns' was always a most powerful vehicle for it.

On the first tour of the period, from November 1 to December 9, 1979, Dylan sang 'When He Returns' early on in every concert, and kept it in the same slot for the second tour, from January 11 to February 9, 1980. For the third tour, from April 17 to May 21, 1980, its appearances began and ended on the fourth and final night in Toronto, on April 20: a night on which Dylan was especially fired up and turned in an almost embarrassingly extreme, thrilling rendition. (This has been issued on the Highway 61 Interactive CD-ROM of 1995.)

Unexpectedly, on November 4, 1981, he played it for the only time since then, towards the end of a concert in Cincinnati, Ohio, during which he told the audience: 'I don't think I sang one song in tune all night.' But tunefulness had never been the point of 'When He Returns'.

Postscript: in 2006 came a DVD version of the Various Artists compilation album Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan, though it was not quite a full duplication; it excludes MAVIS STAPLES' & Bob's 'Gonna Change My Way of Thinking' (see separate entry) but does include the first official release of the film footage of Dylan performing that burning 'When He Returns' from the Toronto concert of April 20, 1980.

[Various Artists: Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan, DVD, dir. Michael B. Borofsky; Burning Rose Video / Image Entertainment ID2894RBDVD, US, 2006 (officially dated 2005).]

'When the Ship Comes In' [1964] Recorded first as a Witmark music-publishing demo in New York City in August 1963 (a version released for the first time 28 years later on Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3), the song was recorded again that October 23. This is the version on the third Dylan album, The Times They Are a-Changin'. Three days later he performed it at his first Carnegie Hall concert. After a 22-year gap it resurfaced (and sank) at Live Aid, Philadelphia, July 13, 1985.

'When the Ship Comes In' draws just as firmly on the idea of the hard struggle of good-hearted men to overcome adversity as anything in traditional folk song; yet here Dylan's intelligence and artistry uses the strengths of this theme in the utterly different context of a moral struggle, and does it without faltering. It is a much-underrated song.

'When the Ship Comes In' prophesies a socio-political ideal future as strongly as does 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', and offers us Dylan singing of the coming change in terms of an arriving ship—which might seem as unsurprising as the use of roads, tides and so on in that other anthem. Yet unlike 'The Times They Are a-Changin'', 'When the Ship Comes In' has not been outdated by events. It survives because it is wisely unspecific—not out of vagueness, nor from an attempt to provide a common-to-everyone account. Necessarily and rightly, its references to coming changes are figurative to the point of allegory because the important thing is (by contrast) the personal responses of the writer towards the anticipated future. The details, figurative, metaphorical, allegorical and symbolic as they are, define and illustrate these responses. Where 'The Times They Are a-Changin'' gives us no sense of proximity to any individual's sensibility, 'When the Ship Comes In' plainly offers a sincere vision. It puts us in contact with a real and fine sensibility. It doesn't lean on mass sentiment at any point; mass sentiment can, if it likes, lean on it.

Part of its appeal comes from its anthemic tune and Dylan's impassioned yet light-footed performance. These two elements combine, and combine with the words, to sustain a maximum effect and energy (as, for instance, when we come to that simple word 'shout' in the last verse: the voice does indeed break into a shout, a celebratory exclamation, and hits the word as the tune hits the highest note in the verse).

It is partly the language of the Bible that propels this ship. Here is Matthew Chapter 24, verse 29, in which Christ says he is quoting the prophet Daniel's prophecy of the last days (though in fact these words don't occur in Daniel): 'Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken'. This last sounds like a line of the song. (This part of the biblical text precedes a passage Dylan alludes to over 25 years later in 'Ring Them Bells': Matthew 24:31.)

Even as words on the page, though, the song has a charm very much its own—like a glimpse into a world both real and unreal: morally mature (if severe) yet child-like in conception. The internal rhyming is so effective, driving the vision along in the rhythm of the oncoming ship as it meets, again and again, relentlessly, the swell of the sea: 'And the song, will, lift, as the main, sail, shifts / And the boat, drifts . . .' and this internal rhyming collaborates perfectly with the alliterative effects (as well, of course, as with the tune): 'Then the sands will roll out a carpet of gold / For your weary toes to be a-touchin'. . .' The child-like allegory comes over as a quite unexceptionable moral cleanliness—a convincing wisdom. This not only redresses anger; it yields a positive and spirited apprehension of the new age's possibilities: 'Oh the fishes will laugh as they swim out of the path / And the seagulls, they'll be smiling . . . / And the sun will respect every face on the deck'.

Political yearnings do not sweep aside more ordinary joys: to talk of having sand between your toes, to feel glad of the imagined sympathy of fishes and to call up, in the midst of a mood of general anticipation, such a particular image as that of a smiling seagull face—this is to encompass a wise and salutary statement of hope. It accords with this achievement, this sustained control, that Dylan avoids painting 'the foes' as demons or fools. They are big enough to hold on to a certain dignity where the allegory goes biblical; yet, beyond this, the apparently child-like vision applies to them too, humanising them even as it condemns: 'Oh the foes will rise with the sleep still in their eyes / And they'll jerk from their beds and think they re dreamin' / But they'll pinch themselves and squeal and they'll know that its for real / The hour when the ship comes in.'

It was unfortunate that this deft, bright song of fresh and optimistic youth, so long ignored in Dylan's 'live' repertoire, was finally re-stumbled upon by the 1985 Bob Dylan and his rock-star friends KEITH RICHARDS and RON WOOD at Live Aid, doused in the embarrassingly undeft, tired inebriation of the world-weary middle-aged.

Re the smiling seagulls: see also 'Royal Canal, the'.

'Which Side Are You On?' The lines in 'Desolation Row' which immediately follow 'The Titanic sails at dawn' are 'Everybody is shouting / "Which Side Are You On?".' It is a question Bob Dylan has usually resisted on principle ('Lies that life is black and white . . .', as he protests in 'My Back Pages'), though he swaps sides and asks much the same question in the Born Again period ('You either got faith or you got unbelief / And there ain't no neutral ground').

'Which Side Are You On?' was an intensely political song composed by Florence Reece (then aged 12), the daughter of Kentucky miner. (The tune, as ALAN LOMAX explains it, was a variant on the English 'Jack Munroe', the title phrase replacing 'lay the lily-o'). It later became a national union song and favourite in the repertoire of THE FREEDOM SINGERS in the civil rights struggle. It is cited also in Martin B. Duberman's political play In White America (1964). Dylan, interviewed in 1966 ('The Playboy Interview: Bob Dylan: A Candid Conversation with the Iconoclastic Idol of the Folk-Rock Set', Playboy, Chicago, March 1966), made his attitude clear: 'Songs like "Which Side Are You On?" and "I Love You Porgy", they're not folk music songs: they're political songs. They're already dead.'

Whitaker, Dave [1937 -] 'Dave Whittaker [sic], one of the Svengali-type BEATS on the scene happened to have WOODY's autobiography, Bound for Glory, and he lent it to me,' Dylan confirms in Chronicles Volume One. He also says that it was Whitaker who told him that Guthrie was still alive but 'in ill health somewhere in the East'.

Dave Whitaker was one of Dylan's earliest Dinkytown friends, and one of the most vociferously Bohemian in lifestyle and politics. He and his wife Gretel (now GRETEL PELTO), used to meet up with Dylan at the Ten O'Clock Scholar every day through the first three months of 1960. They shared an enthusiasm for traditional music and new music but Whitaker was mostly a mentor when it came to contemporary literature (and would have mentored Dylan about politics too, had Dylan not turned a deaf ear). And according to photographer LARRY KEENAN, it was Dave who first 'turned Dylan on to pot'. Whitaker remembers that the apartment he and Gretel shared in a house on 14th Avenue and 10th Street, right across the street from Dave (aka TONY) GLOVER, was a gathering place for all-night music playing and pot smoking, and that it was here that Glover made his recordings of Dylan—recordings made in 1961, 1962 and even 1963.

David Allen Whitaker was born on November 12, 1937 in Cleveland, Ohio, but his parents came from Minnesota and they moved back to Minneapolis when Dave was very young. He went to the same high school as BONNIE BEECHER and others. But in the February 26, 1957 issue of The Nation, Whitaker read an article by Kenneth Rexroth about the Beat scene in San Francisco, and promptly dropped out to join it.

He met KEROUAC, GINSBERG and others, and 'was in seventh heaven'. Later he went to Europe and Israel, stopping off in London in 1959 ('during the skiffle days') on his way back home. From London he went to New York City, found Greenwich Village and met DAVE VAN RONK, and then returned to Minneapolis.

This, then, was the Dave Whitaker Dylan met in Dinkytown: someone who had already been to these places, met these people, paid some dues. And Whitaker was 22 when Dylan was 18: it was a significant difference in age and experience. So when the Dylan of Chronicles says that Whitaker was 'one of the Svengali-type Beats on the scene' who 'happened to have Woody's autobiography', that's a little on the begrudging side and underplays his old friend's qualifications.

By 1966, when ROBERT SHELTON interviewed him, Dave had split up from Gretel and was back in San Francisco, a 'dropout living hand to mouth. A gentle, somewhat defeated man in his late twenties' who 'seemed prematurely old.' He'd moved back there in 1963 or 1964, and didn't feel 'somewhat defeated'.

He remained in San Francisco, trying to make a living as a poet and being an activist. In the 1970s he started hosting a radio show on KPOO-FM, a black station with a Black Panthers history, and they started calling him Diamond Dave, a name he's still known by all over the city. He became part of 'the Rainbow Family' and lived out the communal dream, having little money but needing little too. He used to talk to Dylan on the phone from time to time, and at the beginning of the 1980s, his oldest son, now known as Ubi Dube, asked Dave to ask Bob if he could send him a guitar. A very fine Stratocaster duly arrived, stickered with quotations from the Bible.

The last time Whitaker and Dylan met was around 1991, somewhere out in Wisconsin. The Rainbow Family bus Dave was traveling in pulled up behind the far shinier Dylan tour bus by the side of the Mississippi River, and when Whitaker identified himself, the circle of security opened up and he, Dylan and LARRY KEGAN spent a couple of hours talking.

In 1999 Whitaker gave this poem to the San Francisco Coalition on Homelessness: 'take what you need / give what you can / where you can / when you can / however you can / in other words / lend a hand / And what happens then? / strangers become friends / friends become family / family becomes community / and community on the move / that's the movement / . . . we were brought together / for a reason / and that reason is / that we complement one another / like / yin and yang / left and right / up and down / man and woman / ROCK AND ROLL.'

Today Dave Whitaker still lives in Haight Ashbury, and has a radio series you can hear via www.indybay.org. He's involved with the 'Reclaim the Commons' movement, the 'Food Not Bombs' campaign and much else. In September 2005 he and the Rainbow Family were down in Waveland, Mississippi, opening the 'New Waveland Café' to help give out food to victims of Hurricane Katrina.

When you look at how Whitaker lives, freely and gregariously, and at how Dylan lives, super-rich but isolated, not even talking to his own musicians, who can say that Dave Whitaker hasn't chosen the healthier path? At any rate, he remains an activist, a defiant but mellow old bohemian, and proud of it.

[Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, pp.245–46. Larry Keenan statement on his website at www.emptymirrorbooks.com/keenan/m1996-4.html. Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., p.72. Diamond Dave Whitaker: 'take what you need', Coalition for Homelessness, San Francisco, 1999, seen online 3 Oct 2005 at http://aspin.asu.edu/hpn/archives/Dec99/0057.html. Other Whitaker quotes and most information above from phone-call from San Francisco to this writer 4 Oct 2005.]

White, Bukka [1909 - 1977] Booker T. Washington White was born in Houston, Mississippi, on November 12, 1909, but moved down into the Delta as a child. His railroad-worker father taught him guitar and the music he produced was what he heard all around him. He played local gigs but also worked as a field-hand (most unusually for a musician) before moving around and settling in Memphis, where again he combined jobs, working partly as a musician, partly as a pro baseball player and partly as a fighter.

His first session was in 1930, in Memphis, when as Washington White he cut 14 titles for Victor on one May day, though ten remained unissued and have never been found. The other four sides became one blues record ('The New 'Frisco Train' c/w 'The Panama Limited') and one gospel record ('I Am in the Heavenly Way' c/w 'Promise True and Grand'). It's very possible that MEMPHIS MINNIE is the background voice on the gospel sides.

White didn't get back into a studio for over seven years, and then was able to cut only two numbers, 'Pinebluff Arkansas' and 'Shake 'Em on Down' (one of his best-known tracks), issued on Vocalion as by Bukka White. These sides were recorded in Chicago where White was hiding out, having jumped bail after being arrested for shooting a man in a fight in the South. He was soon captured and sent to the notorious hard-labour camp of Parchman Farm, which proved another recording opportunity, since naturally he was soon field-recorded by ALAN LOMAX. The two sides cut here (at Camp No.10, State Penitentiary, Parchman, Mississippi) were his first solo recordings.

Freed in 1940, Bukka White returned to Chicago and on two March days that year made the 12 tracks for which he is most valued, and which best display his beguiling mix of artistic precision and emotional ferocity, of dark pain and dexterous playing. (It helps too that the recordings are technically so fine: they glisten with acoustic clarity.) Accompanied this time by Washboard Sam on, er, washboard, Bukka White begins as he means to go on, with 'Black Train Blues', a smouldering prototype for ELVIS train songs, and on the second day nailing an old gospel song into his own distinctive 'Fixin' to Die Blues'.

This is the one that SAMUEL CHARTERS picks up on and includes on his ground-breaking compilation The Country Blues in 1959—the most important album since HARRY SMITH's 1952 anthology. This is therefore the song the young Bob Dylan picks up on and pulls into his repertoire at least as early as his Carnegie Chapter Hall concert of November 4, 1961—and which, three weeks later, he records for his début album. He is recorded playing it again at the home of the MacKenzies early that December, and again the following month for the CYNTHIA GOODING radio show 'Folksinger's Choice', broadcast in March 1963, the month the album came out. That seems to have been the end of the line for Dylan's 'Fixin' to Die'.

Bukka White, meanwhile, had settled back in Memphis at some point in the 1940s, his sumptuous old Delta blues too unfashionable for Chicago; but Memphis too proved hard to survive in and though he played sometimes with the veteran FRANK STOKES, he mainly reverted to labouring work. But Sam Charters had prompted a spate of 're-discoveries', and in 1963 White became one of them, 'found' and recorded by enthusiasts. Given a record deal, White worked the campus and folk club circuits, played the 1966 NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL, toured Europe and made further albums.

Though on the whole the later work is less economical, includes long and diffuse narratives and lacks the torrential fluidity of his earlier playing and the intensity of commitment, nonetheless he had by no means lost all his powers, and it's almost a fairy-tale ending that his Biograph album Big Daddy, recorded in 1973, is considered by some to be at least on a par with his best earlier work.

Bukka White died of cancer in Memphis on February 26, 1977.

[Bukka White: 'The New 'Frisco Train' c/w 'The Panama Limited' (as by Washington White & Napoleon Hairiston) & 'I Am in the Heavenly Way' c/w 'Promise True and Grand' (as by Washington White), Memphis, TN, 26 May 1930; 'Pinebluff Arkansas' c/w 'Shake 'Em on Down', Chicago, 2 Sep 1937; 'Sic n'Em Dogs On' & 'Po Boy' (as by Washington Barrelhouse White), Parchman, MS, 23 May 1939, recorded/released wrong speed; 'Fixin' to Die Blues', Chicago, 8 Mar 1940, The Country Blues, RBF RF-1, NY, 1959; 'Black Train Blues', Chicago, 7 Mar 40, Mississippi Blues Vol. 1, Roots RL-302, Vienna, 1968, CD-reissued Parchman Farm Blues, Blues Collection CD 23 (magazine + CD), London, 1994; Big Daddy, Biograph BLP-12049, US, 1973.]

Whitman, Walt [1819 - 1892] See poetry, American, pre-20th century.

Wilentz, Sean [1951 -] Robert Sean Wilentz was born on February 20, 1951 in New York City, where his family ran the 8th Street Bookstore, above which, in his uncle's apartment, in December 1963, AL ARONOWITZ introduced Bob Dylan to ALLEN GINSBERG (who, just back from India, was staying there temporarily). Sean's father, Elias Wilentz, edited The Beat Scene, one of the earliest anthologies of BEAT poetry, and was a friend of IZZY YOUNG, in and around whose Folklore Center on MacDougal Street Wilentz says he has 'dim boyhood memories of Bob Dylan'. He first saw Dylan live when, aged 13, he attended 1964's Hallowe'en concert at New York's Philharmonic Hall: a concert he duly writes about most eloquently in an essay commissioned for the liner notes for the concert's official release as a 2-CD set, the Bootleg Series Vol. 6: Bob Dylan Live 1964.

An historian and writer, Wilentz received his PhD in history from Yale in 1980 after BAs from Columbia University and Balliol College, Oxford. He teaches history at Princeton University now (he's Dayton-Stockton professor of history and director of the program in American studies), and is the author of, among other books, Chants Democratic (1984 and 2004), a study of the emergence of the working class in New York City, and The Rise of American Democracy: Jefferson to Lincoln (2005). His latest book is Andrew Jackson (2006).

In 2004 he co-edited, with GREIL MARCUS, The Rose and the Briar, a collection of historical essays and artistic creations inspired by American ballads—with a parallel CD that includes Bob Dylan's 'Lily, Rosemary and the Jack of Hearts' from the Blood on the Tracks album.

In his spare time Sean Wilentz also writes for, among others, the New York Times, Los Angeles Times, the New York Review of Books, the London Review of Books and New Republic. On www.bobdylan.com he is described as the website's 'historian-in-residence'. In the section titled 'Etc.' you'll find Wilentz's long article 'The Roving Gambler at Scenic Newport', described as 'Some notes on Bob Dylan, the 2002 Newport Folk Festival, and the modern folk process', and the first piece he wrote for the site, 'American Recordings: On "Love and Theft" and the Minstrel Boy'. Explaining how this came about, he wrote (in the Chronicle of Higher Education):

'. . . I published a few articles about Dylan and his work. Somebody, possibly from the old days, must have noticed, because in 2001 a phone call came from out of the blue asking if I would like to write something about a forthcoming album, called "Love and Theft", for the official Dylan Web site. I agreed, with the provision that if I didn't like the album I wouldn't do it. Fortunately I loved what I heard, the people who had contacted me liked what they read, and it was the beginning of a beautiful set of friendships . . .' This essay was reprinted in slightly longer form in 'Do You Mr. Jones?': Bob Dylan with the Poets and the Professors, edited by NEIL CORCORAN, 2002.

More recently Wilentz wrote those sleevenotes for the official release, four decades on, of the concert he had seen as a 13-year-old and then, in summer 2005, the notes to the Starbucks album Bob Dylan Live at the Gaslight, 1962.

[Sean Wilentz, Chants Democratic: New York City & the Rise of the American Working Class. 1788–1850, New York: Oxford University Press, 1984 & 2004; The Rise of American Democracy: Jefferson to Lincoln, New York: W.W. Norton, 2005; Andrew Jackson, New York: Time Books/Henry Holt, 2006. Greil Marcus & Sean Wilentz, eds., The Rose & the Briar: Death, Love and Liberty in the American Ballad, New York: W.W. Norton, 2004; CD of same name, Columbia/Legacy CK 92866, Sep 2004; 'Writing for Bob Dylan', Chronicle of Higher Education, 3 Mar 2005. Elias Wilentz, ed., The Beat Scene, New York: Corinth, 1960.]

Williams, Big Joe [1903 - 1982] Big Joe Williams, not to be confused with Joe Williams, singer with the Count Basie Band in the 1950s, was born in Crawford, Mississippi, on October 16, 1903 but began traveling beyond Mississippi in his youth, playing guitar and singing in lumber camps, and settled to an unsettled life—the classic roaming blues musician. He first recorded in 1935, gaining what was, in the Depression, an unusual ten-year contract with Bluebird.

Linda Dahl, author of Stormy Weather, 1984, a book of profiles of women (mostly jazz) singers, claims that Mary Williams Johnson, not husband Big Joe, wrote his classic 'Baby Please Don't Go', but Dahl's source is almost certainly careless assumption from the sleevenotes of a series of LPs on the Rosetta label, which were, like Dahl, trying to raise the profile of women's contributions to music. This admirable aim is not served by dodgy assertions. (At another point the same Mary Williams was the wife of LONNIE JOHNSON. No claim seems to have been made for her as the composer of his material.)

In any case, 'Baby Please Don't Go' is strongly based on the older common-stock number known as 'Don't You Leave Me Here', which was at least 30 years old by the time Big Joe recorded 'Baby Please Don't Go'. It was recorded in its traditional form by Papa Harvey Hull & Long Cleve Rede, as by Sunny Boy and His Pals, in Chicago, on about April 8, 1927 (the same session that yielded the wonderful 'Hey! Lawdy Mama—The France Blues', which became one of the treasures of the blues revival era, covered, for instance, by MARK SPOELSTRA on that compilation album The Blues Project in 1964.)

Either way, 'Baby Please Don't Go' was a big hit for Williams, and he had a lesser success with a 1941 version of 'Crawlin' King Snake'. Well-known for his unique 9-string guitar and his erratic delivery, he performed with many of the greats of his day and, unlike so many, continued as a working musician all the way through till the blues revival movement occurred. He didn't need to be 'rediscovered': he was already around.

When Dylan paid his return visit to Minnesota in December 1961, and was recorded in a Minneapolis apartment, one of his best song-performances was of 'Baby Please Don't Go.' (Dylan has rarely performed this song since those early days; its most recent rendition was when Dylan came on stage and performed it during the encore of a TOM PETTY set in Holmdel, New Jersey, on August 10, 2003.)

At some point, Dylan sought Williams out and played with him. According to Blues Revue magazine, the Chicago-based Delmark Records founder Bob Koester (pronounced Chester) got Williams booked into Gerde's Folk City in fall 1961, and over a two-week period Dylan sat in with him: and before the end of the run, they were being billed as Big Bill and Little Joe. But according to ROBERT SHELTON's Dylan biography No Direction Home, 1986, it was in early 1962 that Mike Porco was considering booking Williams, and Dylan pressed him on it, saying 'He's the greatest old bluesman. You gotta put him in here.' Shelton says that he was given a three-week booking that February and that Dylan showed up each night and jammed with him on stage several times. This would seem the more likely version, especially since the album Big Joe Williams at Folk City was recorded there on February 26, according to its own sleevenotes.

(Extra confusion is added by the Koester camp by his claim that Dylan first showed up at a Big Joe gig in Chicago back in 1957 and befriended him then; Williams makes it worse by claiming that he first met Dylan in the 1940s, when 'he was very very young, probably no more than six.' Dylan himself compounds the confusion by writing, as an aside in Chronicles—and it is the book's only mention of Williams—that 'I'd played with Big Joe Williams when I was just a kid.')

At any rate, soon after the Gerde's Folk City booking, in March 1962, Big Joe was in Brooklyn recording for VICTORIA SPIVEY's small label Spivey Records when Dylan asked her if she could use a little white boy on one of her records. She put him back with the almost 60-year-old Williams (not an easy man to play with), and the result was a tremendous version of 'Sittin' on Top of the World' on which Dylan, aged 20, plays very convincing blues harmonica and is also allowed to sing back-up vocals on the title line—and indeed more than back-up, since twice in the course of the performance Big Joe is generous enough to keep silent and let Dylan sing the line alone.

Since Williams was trying to sound still in his prime, and Dylan was trying to sound as ancient as the hills, it's a comical moot point here as to who sounds the older of the two. Dylan also plays harp behind Williams on a less striking 'Wichita', and on a formless jam later titled 'Big Joe, Dylan and Victoria' and behind Spivey's vocals and piano on 'It's Dangerous'.

In 1980 MIKE BLOOMFIELD published a short memoir, Me and Big Joe, which not only portrayed the difficulties of their relationship very honestly but also, in Peter Narváez' phrase, illustrated 'the cross-cultural triumph of the blues tradition'. Bloomfield wrote: 'Joe's world wasn't my world, but his music was. It was my life; it would be my life. So playing on was all I could do, and I did it the best that I was able. And the music I played, I knew where it came from; and there was not any way I'd forget.'

As it turned out, Mike Bloomfield died before his mentor, in February 1981. Big Joe Williams died in Macon, Georgia, on December 17, 1982.

[Big Joe Williams: 'Baby Please Don't Go', Chicago, 31 Oct 1935; Big Joe Williams: 'Crawlin' King Snake', Chicago, 27 Mar 1941, 1st vinyl-issued Big Joe Williams: Crawlin' King Snake, RCA International INT-1087, London, 1970; Big Joe Williams at Folk City, 26 Feb 1962, Bluesville BVLP 1067, US, 1962. Papa Harvey Hull & Long Cleve Rede, c.8 Apr 1927, 1st vinyl-issued Really! The Country Blues, Origin Jazz Library OJL-2, NY, c.1961. Sunny Boy and His Pals: 'Don't You Leave Me Here', Chicago, c.8 Apr 1927. Big Joe Williams & Bob Dylan: NY, 2 Mar 1962, 'Sittin' on Top of the World' & 'Wichita', Three Kings & A Queen, Spivey LP 1004, NY, 1964; Big Joe Williams, Victoria Spivey & Bob Dylan, NY, 2 Mar 1962, 'Big Joe, Dylan & Victoria' and Victoria Spivey & Bob Dylan, ditto, 'It's Dangerous', Three Kings & A Queen Vol. 2, Spivey LP 1014, NY, 1972. Bob Dylan: 'Baby Please Don't Go', Minneapolis, MN, 22 Dec 1961.

Bob Dylan Chronicles quote, p.182. 'Big Joe Williams: Memory of the Road', Blues Revue, Mar–Apr 1995, no further details given, précis seen online 5 Oct 2005 at www.expectingrain.com/dok/who/w/williams bigjoe.html. Shelton ditto. Peter Narváez: 'Living Blues Journal: The Paradoxical Aesthetics of the Blues Revival', collected in Transforming Tradition: Folk Music Revivals Examined, ed. Neil V. Rosenberg, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993. Mike Bloomfield, with S. Summerfield: Me and Big Joe, San Francisco: Re/Search Productions, 1980.]

Williams, William Carlos [1883 - 1963] William Carlos Williams was born in Rutherford, near Paterson, New Jersey, on September 17, 1883. There are figures who need a mention in that they have, as it were, significantly influenced those who influenced Dylan—and Williams is one of them. Himself influenced by POUND, RIMBAUD, BAUDELAIRE, WHITMAN and the D.H. Lawrence of Studies in Classic American Literature, he prefigures THE BEATS in his openness to mundane, traditionally 'unpoetic' language and in his metric inventiveness. His impact, though, was long delayed: he was first published in 1909 and his ironically titled The Great American Novel saw him reach artistic maturity by 1923 but it was post-war publication of Paterson Book I, 1946, Collected Later Poems, 1950 and Collected Earlier Poems, 1951 which thrust him into prominence. Paterson (Books II–V appeared in 1948, 1949, 1951 and 1958) is his masterpiece, a huge scrutiny of Paterson, New Jersey: the town in which, as it happens, ALLEN GINSBERG grew up and of which Dylan gives us a swift nocturnal portrait in his 1970s song 'Hurricane', on Desire.

There is at least one clear, significant instance of how Williams' work reached down through Ginsberg and became part of what Dylan absorbed. 'I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness' is the most frequently quoted line (it is the main part of the opening line) from Ginsberg's Howl—but this leaps out from William Carlos Williams' earlier work: 'the pure products of America go crazy'.

(Williams' novel The Greater Trumps, 1932, inspired T.S. ELIOT—a point first made by Helen Gardner in her pioneering critical book The Composition of 'Four Quartets', 1978: namely that Eliot's image of the dance around the 'still point' in 'Burnt Norton', 1935, was suggested by his reading Williams's novel, in which 'in a magical model of the universe the figures of the Tarot pack dance around the Fool at the still centre.' This is relayed by AIDAN DAY—author of that last quotation—in his book Jokerman: Reading the Lyrics of Bob Dylan, 1989.)

William Carlos Williams died after a prolonged series of strokes at his home, back in Rutherford, New Jersey, on March 4, 1963.

[William Carlos Williams' 'the pure products of America go crazy', exact source unspecified, quoted from epigraph used in The Secret Goldfish by David Means, London: 4th Estate, 2005.]

Williams, Hank [1923 - 1953] Born in Mount Olive West, Alabama, on September 17, 1923, Hiram King Williams conquered the handicaps of spina bifida, poverty and an Alabama upbringing to become, defiantly, 'the first superstar of country music', a prolific composer of direct and heartfelt songs, mostly of unrequited love, a singer of unmistakeable emotional penetration, a big seller with a string of huge hits, and a modern, self-destructive, punk personality. At age 29, at some point after midnight on New Year's Day 1953, chronically addicted to alcohol and pills, he slipped from sleep into death in the back seat of his Cadillac en route to another show. Next day, Marvin Rainwater rushed into the studio to make a tribute record.

Hank Williams has been a specific influence on Dylan, though a broad and founding one rather than one relied upon particularly for Dylan's 1968–70 country music. As Dylan himself said all along: 'An' my first idol was Hank Williams / For he sang about the railroad lines / An' the iron bars an' rattlin' wheels / Left no doubt that they were real' (from the wonderful JOAN BAEZ in Concert, Part 2 sleevenote poem, 1964).

Dylan has recorded and/or performed at least eleven Hank Williams songs, widely distributed through the decades of his career, as follows: 'Hey Good Lookin'', live in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, October 26, 1990. 'House of Gold', live in Madrid, June 15, 1989 and Athens, the 28th. '(I Heard That) Lonesome Whistle', at the home of Eve & Mac MacKenzie, NY, December 23, 1961; for WBAI Radio, NY, recorded on about January 13, 1962 and probably broadcast that March 11; at the Freewheelin' Bob Dylan sessions in NY, April 24–25, 1962; live at Toad's Place, New Haven, Connecticut, January 12, 1990 and live at Penn State University two days later. 'Lost Highway' and 'I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry' backstage in London, May 3–4, 1965 (a fragment is included in the film Don't Look Back, auteured by D.A. PENNEBAKER, 1967). 'Kaw Liga', NY, October 28, 1975 for the soundtrack to the film Renaldo & Clara (an extract is used), 1978. 'Lost on the River', Malibu, probably March 1984, during rehearsals for his defiantly splendid 'Late Night with David Letterman' NBC-TV appearance that month (though he didn't, in the event, perform this song). 'Weary Blues From Waitin'', live at Lakeland, Florida, April 18, 1976. 'You Win Again', during the Basement Tapes sessions at West Saugerties, June–August 1967; in a drunken private jam with Etta James & her band at Providence, Rhode Island, July 9–10, 1986; taking lead vocal during a set by the Dead in Columbus, Ohio, on August 3, 2003; with WILLIE NELSON in a surprise appearance at a Nelson concert in LA on May 4, 2004; at the Bonnaroo Music Festival in Manchester, Tennessee, that June 11; and again with Willie Nelson (but this time during Dylan's set) in concert at Forth Worth, TX, July 4, 2005. 'Your Cheatin' Heart', live during his guest performance at a LEVON HELM & RICK DANKO club gig in NYC on February 16, 1983. 'Honky Tonk Blues' in six concerts in February 1999, beginning in Tallahassee on the 1st of the month. His most recent Williams rendition, the recording of 'I Can't Get You Off of My Mind' for Timeless, a 2001 various-artists tribute album to the composer, is as disappointingly mannered as the early-1960s versions of '(I Heard That) Lonesome Whistle' were direct and heartfelt.

Probably most of these songs were known to Dylan from the Hank Williams 78rpm records he had back in his boyhood home in Hibbing, MN, which are referred to several times, though not itemised, in ROBERT SHELTON's biography No Direction Home. In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan specifies 'Baby, We're Really in Love', 'Honky Tonkin'' and 'Lost Highway' as being among them.

But in any case Dylan will also have known many of Williams' songs via the work of JERRY LEE LEWIS, who habitually put country songs on the B-sides of his late-1950s-to-early-60s rock'n'roll A-sides for the Sun label, and performed them, often to taunt his rocker fans, at concerts. Dylan will have heard Jerry Lee break into extraordinary lyrical piano-work on beautifully poised performances of Hank Williams songs like 'You Win Again', 'Cold Cold Heart', 'Your Cheatin' Heart' and 'I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry'.

Dylan has always utilised other song titles within his own work, and two neat examples occur from with Hank Williams' canon. His country gospel warhorse of a song 'Mansion on the Hill' trots across the landscape of the 1980s Dylan song 'Sweetheart Like You', and it's odds on that Dylan knew quite well when he wrote 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' in the 1960s that there is a Williams song called 'Howlin' at the Moon'. Such cases crop up with differing degrees of obviousness, of course, and when they're not obvious, you're left to wonder not so much whether they are intended but rather, whether they are intended to be recognised. There is at least a fascination, an opening up of playful ironic possibilities, to hearing the end of the third verse like this: 'And she steals your voice / And leaves you "Howlin' at the Moon".'

In Chronicles Volume One Dylan stresses Williams' influence upon him: 'Even at a young age,' he writes, 'I identified fully with him. . . . In time, I became aware that in Hank's recorded songs were the archetype rules of poetic songwriting. . . . You can learn a lot about the structure of songwriting by listening to his records, and I listened to them a lot and had them internalized.'

Influence works in many ways. Elsewhere it's noted how struck Dylan was by the particular mode of address e.e. cummings used in his poem 'Buffalo Bill's': 'and what i want to know is / how do you like your blueeyed boy / Mister Death'—struck by its directness—and in the light of this, it's noticeable that two of Dylan's earliest songs, though three years apart and very different in style, share another particular mode of address: 'Hey, so-and-so . . .' The songs are 'Little Richard', aka 'Hey Little Richard' (a very early extant item on tape by Bob Dylan, recorded in Hibbing in 1958), and 'Song to Woody', from the first album, which begins its second verse 'Hey, hey, Woody Guthrie . . .' and its third verse 'Hey, Woody Guthrie . . .' Isn't it quite likely that Dylan was first struck by this mode of address in song when he heard it on Hank Williams' 'Hey, Good Lookin''?

[Hank Williams: 'Hey, Good Lookin'', Nashville, TN, 16 Mar 1951, MGM 11000, 1951; 'A House of Gold', nia, 1948–49, MGM 11707, 1954; '(I Heard That) Lonesome Whistle', Nashville, 25 Jul 1951, MGM 11054, 1951; 'Lost Highway', Nashville, 1 Mar 1949, MGM 10506, 1949; 'I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry', Cincinnati, OH, 30 Aug 1949, MGM 10560, 1949; 'Lost on the River', Cincinnati, 22 Dec 1948, MGM 10434, c.1949; 'Weary Blues from Waitin'', nia, 1948–49, MGM 11574, 1953; 'You Win Again', Nashville, 11 Jul 1952, MGM 11318, 1952; 'Your Cheatin' Heart' c/w 'Kaw-Liga', Nashville, 23 Sep 1952, MGM 11416, 1952; 'Honky Tonk Blues', Nashville, 11 Dec 1951, MGM 11160, 1952; 'Howlin' at the Moon', Nashville, 16 Mar 1951, MGM 10961, 1951 and on Honky Tonkin', MGM E242 (10″ LP), 1954; 'Mansion on the Hill', nia, MGM 10328, 1948; 'I Can't Get You Off of My Mind', Nashville, 6 Nov 1947, MGM 10328, 1948.

Bob Dylan: Joan Baez in Concert, Part 2 sleevenote poem, Vanguard VRS-9113, NY, 1964; 'I Can't Get You Off of My Mind', NY, 17 Dec 2000, Timeless: Hank Wailliams Tribute, Lost Highway 088 170 239-2/170 239-2, 2001; 'Hey Little Richard', Hibbing, MN, 1958, unreleased. Dylan quotes from Chronicles Volume One pp.95–96.

Jerry Lee Lewis: 'You Win Again', Memphis, TN, 5 Sep 1957 (B-side of 'Great Balls of Fire'), Sun 281, Memphis, 1957; 'Cold Cold Heart', Memphis, 9 Feb 1961, Sun 364, Memphis (London-American HLS 9414, London), 1961; 'Your Cheatin' Heart', Hamburg, Germany, 5 Apr 1964, Live at the Star Club, Hamburg, Philips 842 945, Germany (BL 7646, London), 1964; 'I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry', nia, Sings the Country Music Hall of Fame Hits Vol. 1, Smash SRS 67117, NYC 1969.

e.e. cummings: 'Buffalo Bill's', 1920, included in Complete Poems, 1913–1962, 1973.]

Williams, Paul [1948 -] Paul Williams was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on May 19, 1948. He founded a sci-fi fanzine, Within, in 1962, and at the start of 1966 the music magazine Crawdaddy, which pioneered 'serious' rock criticism. In early 1967 he co-organised the first New York City 'be in' and 18 months later quit Crawdaddy to move to a 'cabin in the woods' in Mendocino, CA. His first book, Outlaw Blues, was published March 1969, two months later he sang with JOHN, Yoko & the Plastic Ono Band on 'Give Peace a Chance' and the following year moved briefly to a 'wilderness commune' at Galley Bay, BC, Canada. His output, on sci-fi, music and more, continued to be prolific. His 'practical philosophy' book Das Energi was published 1973.

In the last months of 1979, responding to Dylan's Born Again conversion, Williams swiftly wrote and self-published the 128-page book Dylan—What Happened?, followed quickly by the 12-page booklet 'What Happened? One Year Later'.

In 1986 he began writing what became a significant series of books on Dylan the performer, which have made his one of the most prominent names among Dylan writers. The series was published as Performing Artist: The Music of Bob Dylan, Volume One, 1960–1973 in May 1990, followed by Bob Dylan: Performing Artist, The Middle Years, 1972–1986 (1992), Bob Dylan: Mind Out of Time, Performing Artist Volume 3, 1987–2000 (2004) and Bob Dylan: Volume 4 (The Genius of a Performing Artist, 2003–1990 and back again), forthcoming. The third of these was self-published by means of Williams obtaining donations from prospective readers (Subscribers paid $60, Sponsors $100 or more, Patrons $200 or more, and Benefactors $5,000 or more; their names appear 'in a Roll of Honor at the back of the book') and the fourth is to be achieved by the same means.

In the middle of the Performing Artist series, in 1996, Williams self-published Watching the River Flow: Observations on Bob Dylan's Art-in-Progress, 1966–1995, a collection of articles, from a review of Blonde on Blonde to some notes on Dylan's 1995 touring. He has also self-published books on Neil Young and Brian Wilson, namely Heart of Gold, Neil Young: Love to Burn, and Brian Wilson & the Beach Boys, How Deep Is the Ocean?, in 1983 he launched and edited the Philip K. Dick Society Newsletter and in 1993 he revived Crawdaddy as a quarterly.

For many Dylan aficionados, Williams' eternally boyish style is hopelessly gushing and somewhat Californian (as suggested, perhaps, by a relatively moderate sentence on his website after he's thanked his different grades of donor: 'This community is truly as wonderful as the genius of a performing artist whose work brings us together'), while the unbounded enthusiasm of his descriptions of Dylan on stage often assumes he is privy to, and must explain for us, Dylan's thoughts and feelings as he stands there. On the other hand, for a wide range of readers, other Dylan writers and hip celebrities, Williams is the best possible explicator of the performing side of Dylan's art, and writes with a breadth of knowledge matched by percipience as well as passion.

[Paul Williams, Performing Artist: The Music of Bob Dylan, Volume One, 1960–1973, Novato, CA: Underwood-Miller, 1990. Bob Dylan: Performing Artist, The Middle Years, 1972–1986, Novato, CA: Underwood-Miller, 1992. Watching the River Flow: Observations on Bob Dylan's Art-in-Progress, 1966–1995, Encinitas, CA: Entwhistle Books, 1996. Bob Dylan: Mind Out of Time, Performing Artist Volume 3, 1987–2000, Encinitas, CA: Entwhistle Books, 2004, and Bob Dylan: Volume 4 (The Genius of a Performing Artist, 2003–1990 and back again), forthcoming. All Williams' work has also been published in foreign editions. His website is www.paulwilliams.com.]

Williamson, Nigel [1954 -] Nigel Williamson was born in Saltburn, on the north-east coast of England on July 4, 1954. He first heard Dylan at age 11 ('Like a Rolling Stone') and later stole the first eight albums from a record shop in Kent. His earliest published Dylan articles were pieces of journalism in The Times and Uncut in the 1990s, and in 2003 he edited the fine one-shot magazine Uncut Legends: Bob Dylan. His well-received book The Rough Guide to Bob Dylan was published in 2004, with a revised and expanded edition in 2006. Though the first edition has many inconsequential errors of fact (BLIND WILLIE McTELL's 'Statesboro Blues' was 1928, not 1929; ALBERT GROSSMAN's wife's name is Sally, not Sarah), lacks any documenting of its sources (for its many quotations and for the less well-known facts it asserts) and is vague on recording-session detail, it's nonetheless a most attractive little volume, packed with far more information than you'd imagine it could hold, and its whole organisational scheme, with sections on the life, the albums, stories behind '50 Great Dylan Songs', 'New Bobs', fanzines and more, are clearly the work of a real fan with a judicious eye. It's a far, far better guide to its subject than the Rough Guide to Paris.

In his non-Dylan life Nigel Williamson has been a researcher for the great campaigning socialist politician Tony Benn, editor of Tribune, a diary editor and political correspondent for The Times, and has also written Journey Through the Past: The Stories Behind the Songs of Neil Young.

[Nigel Williamson, ed., Uncut Legends: Bob Dylan Vol.1, no.1, IPC Media, London, 2003; The Rough Guide to Bob Dylan, London: Rough Guides, 2004 & 2006; Journey Through the Past: The Stories Behind the Songs of Neil Young, London: Backbeat Books, 2002.]

Williamson, Sonny Boy II [1899 - 1965] Alec Ford Miller was probably born on December 5, 1899, and at Glendora, Mississippi; by the 1920s he was known as Rice Miller, Little Boy Blue, Willie Williams, Willie Williamson and Willie Miller, and was working his way around the Mississippi Delta as a singer and harmonica player. By the end of the 1930s, or soon afterwards, he was an act on the 'King Biscuit Flour Time' radio show on KFFA in Helena, Arkansas, and was calling himself Sonny Boy Williamson, either to honour or cash in on the confusion with (or both) the singer and harmonica wizard now known as Sonny Boy Williamson I, who had found success in Chicago in the mid 1930s and made his first recordings in 1937 (including 'Good Morning Schoolgirl', the classic that would later pass into the repertoire of every British beat group and be sold back to the US during the British Invasion).

Confusingly perhaps, Sonny Boy Williamson II was about 15 years older than Williamson I, but he found fame much later on and didn't make his first recordings till 1951—by which time Williamson I had been murdered, like Leon Trotsky, with an ice pick. The surviving Williamson II cut his first sides for Lillian McMurry's Trumpet label in Jackson, Mississippi: sides that included his widely known 'Crazy About You Baby' and 'Stop Crying', and showed his harmonica-work already at its exquisitely expressive peak. As well it might have been, granted that he was already in his 50s when making his studio début. He may have started late, but he got there: he became a towering, ever-influential figure in the world of the blues.

Williamson moved to Detroit and then Chicago in 1954 and the following year started recording for Checker, the sister label to Chess Records. His first session, in August 1955, yielded 'Don't Start Me to Talkin'', which typified his endearing blend of loud but super-casual Chicago blues, bluff vocal charm, vaguely menacing lyrics and superb harmonica work. At the same session he cut 'You Killing Me (On My Feet)', on which the harmonica solo is so physically direct yet of such delicate finesse that it could explain the soul of the blues and R&B to Jane Austen.

In Europe, which he visited for the first time in 1963 as part of the touring American Folk Blues Festival, he lingered in England and recorded with the Yardbirds, whose teenage guitarist was ERIC CLAPTON, and with THE ANIMALS.

Bob Dylan, as well as inevitably being influenced in general by the impact of Sonny Boy Williamson upon the whole timbre of the post-war blues, has cherry-picked small particulars from within it. His Street Legal song 'Baby Stop Crying'—a UK top 10 hit in 1978—may owe something to ROBERT JOHNSON's 'Stop Breakin' Down Blues', with its repeated imprecation 'Stop breakin' down, please, stop breakin' down', but it draws at least as directly from Williamson's 'Stop Crying', which presses the more exactly similar plea: 'baby please, please stop crying'. Dylan also takes the striking title of one of Williamson's best-known harmonica showcase songs, 'Nine Below Zero' and embeds it into the lyric of his 1965 song 'Outlaw Blues', which is part of, as its title says, Bringing It All Back Home.

In 1981, when Dylan is emerging from the evangelising burn of the Born Again period, his terrific song 'The Groom's Still Waiting at the Altar' uses the melody of Sonny Boy's 'Don't Start Me to Talking', and three years later, when he goes on the 'Late Night with David Letterman' TV show for the first time, backed by THE PLUGZ, supposedly to promote his new album Infidels, the first number he pulls out, right there live on high profile national television, is not a track from the album at all, nor even one of the songs warmed up with at the NBC studio rehearsal, but 'Don't Start Me to Talking' itself—from Sonny Boy Williamson's 1955 Chicago début session.

Sonny Boy Williamson II died of a heart attack asleep in a boarding house back in Helena, Arkansas, on May 25, 1965.

[Sonny Boy Williamson: 'Stop Crying', Jackson, MS, 4 Jan 1951 & 10 Jul 1951, both unissued, then 5 Aug 1951, issued as 78rpm single Trumpet 140, US, c.1951, vinyl-issued on The Original Sonny Boy Williamson, Blues Classics BC-9, Berkeley, CA, c.1967, re-recorded for Chess as 'Stop Cryin'', Chicago, 30 Apr 1964, This Is My Story, Chess 2CH-50027 (2 LPs), US, 1972; 'You Killing Me (On My Feet)', Chicago, 12 Aug 1955, Sonny Boy Williamson—One Way Out, Chess CHV 417, US, 1975; 'Don't Start Me to Talkin'' & 'All My Love in Vain', Chicago, 12 Aug 1955, both on 78rpm single Checker 824, US, 1955 & on Sonny Boy Williamson Sings Down and Out Blues, Checker LP 1437, US, 1960.]

Willis, Chuck [1928 - 1958] Harold Willis was born in Atlanta on the last day of January 1928. Singing professionally first with Red McAllister's band, he was signed to OKeh, Columbia's 'race' label, in 1951, and signed to management by Atlanta's R&B big-shot DJ Zenas Sears (on WAOK). A fine songwriter as well as a robust singer, and with a penchant for wearing a sort of 1,001 Nights turban on his head, pinned at the front with what would now be called bling, he had a series of R&B-chart top ten hits between 1952 and '54—'My Story', 'Going to the River' (a remake of the early FATS DOMINO classic), 'Don't Deceive Me' and 'I Feel So Bad'—before signing to Atlantic in 1956 and finding far greater success there, crossing him over into rock'n'roll stardom with 'It's Too Late', 'Whatcha Gonna Do When Your Baby Leaves You', 'CC Rider', 'Betty and Dupree' and the great double-sider '(I Don't Want to) Hang Up My Rock and Roll Shoes' and 'What Am I Living For?' Several of these became much-covered classics, remain in the memory and still get revived from time to time. Among others, ELVIS PRESLEY, on fine, torrid form, covered 'I Feel So Bad': and paid Willis the compliment of coming much nearer to a copy than was usual with his revisits to black hit songs; JERRY LEE LEWIS covered 'Hang Up My Rock and Roll Shoes'; Percy Sledge and CONWAY TWITTY covered 'What Am I Living For?'; and those who covered 'It's Too Late' included BUDDY HOLLY, ROY ORBISON, Otis Redding, JOHN HAMMOND Jr. and Derek & the Dominoes.

Willis stayed in Atlanta, a big name in a comparatively small city, often hanging around the Central Record Shop on Decatur Street, near the infamous 81 Theatre where LITTLE RICHARD and others got their break (and which comes into the BLIND WILLIE McTELL story too), and drinking far too much cheap wine in the basement of the shop. At the age of 30, Chuck Willis did have to hang up his rock'n'roll shoes: he died in Atlanta's Grady Hospital, after collapsing with a stomach ulcer, on April 10, 1958.

Bob Dylan made an attempt at Willis' 'It's Too Late' in the studios on May 6, 1986 at Topanga Park, California, during a session for Knocked Out Loaded—the same session that provided the album track 'Precious Memories'. Five years later, on August 10, 1991, he performed the same Chuck Willis song in concert, in Buenos Aires, Argentina, and at the 'Absolutely Unofficial Blue Jeans Bash (for Arkansas)' on January 17, 1993, Dylan played guitar behind the Cate Brothers as they performed '(I Don't Want to) Hang Up My Rock and Roll Shoes'. And finally—so far—he returned to 'It's Too Late' at two 1995 concerts: Fort Lauderdale on September 23 and Las Vegas on November 11. In Chronicles Volume One, Dylan includes Chuck Willis among 'the greats'.

[Chuck Willis: the OKeh hit sides CD-reissued on Chuck Willis: Let's Jump Tonight, Jump-O-Rama Jump 1021, US, 1993; all 51 OKeh sides CD-issued on Chuck Willis Wails the Blues, Sundazed nia, 2003; 'It's Too Late' c/w 'Kansas City Woman', Atlantic 1098, US, 1956; 'Juanita' c/w 'Whatcha Gonna Do When Your Baby Leaves You', Atlantic 1112, 1957; 'C.C. Rider' c/w 'Ease the Pain', Atlantic 1130, 1957; 'Betty and Dupree' c/w 'My Crying Eyes', Atlantic 1168, US, 1958; 'What Am I Living For' / '(I Don't Want to) Hang Up My Rock and Roll Shoes', Atlantic 1179, 1958; all CD-reissued.

Bob Dylan, Chronicles Volume One, 2004, p.187. Sources: discographical detail from Pete Hoppula's Roy Gaines listing at the excellent www.wangdangdula.com, seen online 20 Feb 2006; The Encyclopaedia of Rock Vol.1: The Age of Rock'n'Roll, eds. Phil Hardy & Dave Laing, London: Aquarius Books, 1976, p.84 and Jan Cox, friend of Willis, e-mail to this writer, Dec 2004.]

Wilmer, Val [1941 -] Valerie Sybil Wilmer was born in Harrogate, Yorkshire, on the day Pearl Harbor was bombed—December 7, 1941— but her family returned to living in London as soon as World War II was over.

Wilmer is a photographer and writer particularly interested in jazz and black music, and is the author of the autobiography Mama Said There'd Be Days Like This, an invaluable social document not least for its first-hand reportage of the visits to Britain by American and Caribbean jazz and blues musicians in the 1950s and 1960s, when her mother took in paying guests. Her other books include Jazz People, The Face of Black Music, As Serious as Your Life: John Coltrane and Beyond and (with Paul Trynka) Portrait of the Blues.

Best known for her photographs of musicians, Wilmer's pioneering exhibition Jazz Seen: The Face of Black Music was held at London's Victoria and Albert Museum back in 1973. A Wilmer photograph of Dusty Springfield, taken in 1964, is owned by the National Portrait Gallery, she has exhibited internationally and has work in the Musée d'Arte Moderne in Paris. She serves on the advisory panel of the New Grove Dictionary of Jazz and is an authority on the work of Ken Snakehips Johnson.

She photographed Louis Armstrong when she was still at school in 1956, was soon making superior informal portraits ('Mum takes tea with HERBIE LOVELLE', 1959, and 'JESSE FULLER cooks breakfast', 1960), and began taking photographs at Ronnie Scott's Jazz Club in Soho, London, in 1960, while also contributing jazz reviews to Melody Maker and jazz journals. She photographed a number of rock stars in the 1960s, including Screaming Jay Hawkins, GEORGE HARRISON and JIMI HENDRIX.

When Bob Dylan telerecorded his last-ever solo concert, namely 12 songs performed specially for BBC Television in London on June 1, 1965—just two weeks before he began recording the Highway 61 Revisited album—Val Wilmer was the photographer asked to shoot stills for the occasion. And since the BBC saw fit to dump their telerecording of the concert, Wilmer's photographs are, visually, all that remain.

[Val Wilmer, Mama Said There'd Be Days Like This: My Life in the Jazz World, London: Women's Press, 1989 & 1991; Jazz People, New York: Da Capo, 1977 (1st pub'd 1970). As Serious as Your Life: John Coltrane and Beyond, London: Serpent's Tail, 1999; The Face of Black Music, New York: Da Capo, 1976. Paul Trynka & Valerie Wilmer: Portrait of the Blues, London: Hamlyn, 1996.]

Wilson, Brian [1942 -] Brian Wilson, born in Los Angeles on June 20, 1942, became the founder of the Beach Boys, and one of four figures in popular music customarily called a genius. (The others are RAY CHARLES, PHIL SPECTOR and Bob Dylan.) Brian was the oldest of three brothers, the children of Audree and Murray Wilson, the latter a failed songwriter. They grew up in Hawthorne, a Los Angeles suburb, rubbing along with cousin Mike Love and friend Al Jardine. Brian and Dennis were often beaten for tiny transgressions, the worst being to better Murray Wilson. Enraged, he would pluck out his glass eye at the table, ordering his sons to stare into its socket.

This dysfunctional family bequeathed Brian a fundamental insecurity and incapacitating self-doubt that led to a life-long struggle, involving many lost years and intimacies, between floundering in sloughs of American despond and a rarefied level of creative expression and musicality. The Beach Boys' inception had to happen behind the parental back. When Mr. and Mrs. Wilson took a Mexican holiday in September 1961, the five teenagers rented instruments and started the group in their living-room.

They performed as the Pendletons (a surfers' shirt-brand), Carl & the Passions and Kenny & the Cadets before seizing on the Beach Boys, a name débuted at the RITCHIE VALENS Memorial Concert at Long Beach on New Year's Eve 1961.

Father Murray took the song 'Surfin" (written by Brian and Mike Love) to his music-publisher, who recorded it, issued it on local labels and saw it touch the US Hot 100. In early 1962 Murray took 'Surfin' Safari' to Capitol and the record went top 20. The follow-up, 'Ten Little Indians', flopped but 'Surfin' USA' was a top 3 smash in summer 1963.

Surf Music was not their invention: Dick Dale ('King of the Surf Guitar') had ridden the wave of guitar-instrumental records that were a major hit genre of the era, devising a guitar sound that supposedly simulated the feel of bestriding a surfboard. Nor did the Beach Boys pioneer 'their' vocal sound. They stood in a tradition of close-harmony groups and were influenced by its modernisation on Jan & Dean's 1959 'Baby Talk', which launched a California falsetto style embracing doo-wop nonsense syllables. But because Dennis Wilson was obsessed with surfing, the Beach Boys were first with songs that named and celebrated it, making it a universal metaphor for being young while giving them ownership of a particular Americana, as evocative as THE BAND's backwoods Civil War dreamscapes at the other end of the 1960s. 'When you're talking states of mind,' wrote Bill Holdship, 'Brian Wilson invented California'.

For some time Brian Wilson thrived and grew artistically in this land of surf and honey. 'Surfer Girl' confirmed his talent for luxuriant harmonies above which his yearning falsetto steered a wistful course. These years gave us 'Fun Fun Fun' and the no.1s 'I Get Around' and 'Help Me Rhonda', the exquisite 'Don't Worry Baby', 'In My Room' and more. Terrific hit singles also included 'When I Grow Up', 'Sloop John B.', 'Barbara Ann' and 'God Only Knows'. Who'd have thought Charles Atlas could receive so sumptuously cool a makeover? (No wonder Dylan gave him a namecheck on 'She's Your Lover Now'.)

Brian Wilson and Mike Love wrote most of the early lyrics, and Bruce Johnson, who also contributed songs, joined in 1965. But Brian's music and input distinguished the group, and his Spector-influenced production was crucial to their increasingly complex recordings, hailed as 'the perfect blend of teen consciousness and musical innovation.' Bob Dylan said of Wilson in 1997, 'That ear! Jesus, he's got to will that to the Smithsonian.' He must have meant his right ear, for Brian is deaf in his left.

Wilson's first crack-up began on a tour of Texas, starting a long slide into stupor and derangement. Wilson quit stage performances in late 1964, though he hung around on the road with the others till 1967. In the studio his admiration for Phil Spector turned into obsessive one-sided rivalry. Bruce Johnston complained, 'He used to play "Be My Baby" to us over and over and we're going "Hey, Brian, we heard it already, so what?" Spector should have been bowing down in front of Brian, not the other way around.'

At home Wilson grew 'very paranoid,' said Marilyn, the wife who had to swap from student at his feet to grown-up taking care of him, and of business, surrounded by axe-grinding brothers, cousins and hangers-on, while Brian asked for drugs and the house filled with people to supply them.

What was remarkable was that he did so much in these years, rather than that he managed so little later. So strong was his work and its popularity that THE BEATLES' 1964 conquest of America hardly touched the Beach Boys at the time. Their 1965 LPs Beach Boys Today! and Summer Days (And Summer Nights!!) fired on all their distinctive cylinders, and Wilson triumphed creatively with the seminal Pet Sounds (cut 1965, issued 1966) and the single 'Good Vibrations' a massive hit (not least a UK no.1) in summer 1966 (part-written by Mike Love, who went uncredited, creating a resentment that would smoulder for decades and end in court).

Things collapsed suddenly. Pet Sounds was upstaged by Sgt. Pepper's and a comparative flop in the US. Brian forced the others into many months of studio-work on Smile, an album that was to outshine the Beatles and the Beach Boys' own past, but which Brian then abandoned. Ironically, while few could have been ingesting more LSD than Wilson, the West Coast 'psychedelic revolution' now made the Beach Boys passé. The ghost of Smile, issued as Smiley Smile, further damaged their reputation. It was the last Beach Boys album Brian Wilson would produce until 1976.

The group continued, and still had hits, survived an unsuccessful college tour with the Maharishi and abandoned short, hit-based sets for Progressive Rock. At home, meanwhile, Brian Wilson's renewed breakdown, in 1967, left him swallowing drugs and junk-food, hearing lost chords and growing obese, stranded at the grand piano inside a box of sand that was intended to inspire but attracted more dog-mess than muse. His daughter Carnie was born in 1968, and Wendy in 1969, into a family as dysfunctional as the previous generation's. As Marilyn struggled to cope, Murray Wilson sold his son's songwriting catalogue for a mere $700,000. (In the 1990s Wilson won it back, plus $10 million in recompense.)

In 1976, Marilyn brought in controversial therapist Dr. Eugene Landy, whose intensive '24-hour therapy' rescued Wilson from himself but not from Dr. Landy. First results were positive. Wilson shook off the torpor of his drugs habits and proved capable of work, giving interviews, performing on 'Saturday Night Live' and producing the albums

15 Big Ones and Beach Boys Love You, both huge American hits.

He relapsed. Marilyn and the children left in 1979 and the other Beach Boys, who had fired the overbearing Landy, whom they saw as a rival, were driven to recall him in 1980. More lost years of mayhem and madness followed, as brothers and cousins sued over business betrayals, Landy kept Wilson in sinister thrall and Marilyn divorced him. The Beach Boys stumbled on, but their 1980s were awful too, and in 1983, Dennis drowned while drunk.

In 1987, Brian re-emerged quietly on the WOODY GUTHRIE-LEADBELLY tribute album A Vision Shared with an affectionate, witty Black Pop 'Goodnight Irene'; but when he finally made a solo album, in 1988, five of its mediocre songs were co-written by 'executive producer' Landy. 1991's crassly titled Sweet Insanity, also co-produced by Landy, was refused release by the record company, though most people prefer it.

By the mid-1990s, a more precarious but plausible rehabilitation seemed in place. Dr. Landy had been banned by law from any contact with Wilson, who was trying to build a relationship with his daughters and resumed work with the Beach Boys after regaining his song publishing and an amicable settlement of the Mike Love court case. Then came 'I Just Wasn't Made for These Times', a brilliant, affecting TV documentary portrait of Wilson the musician and his struggle against his own mental instability, filmed by musician-producer DON WAS.

Was explained: 'People have heard the phrase "Brian Wilson is a genius" for years. I wanted someone who's not a musician to walk away with some understanding of why. Everything regarding his personal life in the movie relates to the music. Everyone has some sort of emotional stake in Brian's music. This is the important thing, not the sordid details and the gossip.'

The film succeeded so well, capturing so intimately Wilson's extraordinary talent and tragedy, that it stands now as a part of his legacy as valuable as anything from his golden past. Since this return to the heights, Wilson's resumption of touring has been a remarkable, sustained achievement, as he has gone around with a large set of accompanying musicians, recreating note for note entire studio albums live: something that in theory seems pointless and far less exciting than the spontaneity of free musical interaction, yet which has proved thrilling to huge crowds; and not merely thrilling but very moving too, just to witness so fragile a figure pulling off such triumphs with such sustained musicianship and such command of himself and his master works.

His connections with Bob Dylan have been brief but the more recent of the two proved interesting. First, on January 20, 1988, at the thrash for the Rock'n'Roll Hall of Fame's third annual round of inductions, Dylan played guitar behind a number of people (safely surrounded by hordes of other musicians), and this included playing behind Brian and Carl Wilson and Mike Love on a performance of 'Barbara Ann'. Three years later, in a Los Angeles studio, Dylan dropped in on one of Wilson's sessions for the doomed (unreleased) Sweet Insanity album; Bob shared the vocals with him on Brian's pastiche song 'Spirit of Rock'n' Roll'. Wilson commented afterwards: 'Now he is crazy. He couldn't even find the microphone!'

[Brian Wilson (with Bob Dylan): 'The Spirit of Rock'n' Roll': LA, early 1991; unreleased. Bill Holdship: 'Lost in Music: Brian Wilson', Mojo, London, Aug 1995.]

Wilson, Tom [1931 - 1978] Thomas Blanchard Wilson Jr. was born on March 25, 1931 in Waco, Texas, where he attended the A.J. Moore High School—'the first school in Waco designed to educate the Negro youth', as its Historical Marker now notes. Founded in 1881, its third Principal was Tom Wilson's grandfather, Prof. B.T. Wilson; its fourth was Tom's father, who took over in 1934. The school's inspiration was Booker T. Washington and his maxim 'Take what you have and make what you want'; the school's motto was 'A better Moore High through better behavior'; and though its list of what it aimed to instil in its pupils included 'To refrain from excessive theatre going', in general Tom Wilson became an exemplar of the school's positive stance, however old-fashioned and ameliorative it seems today.

Wilson, tall, dark and handsome and an affable young man with a throaty Texan drawl, became a Republican and, as 1970s friend Coral Browning said bluntly: 'Tom felt let down by blacks. He felt that after the civil rights successes of the 50s and 60s, blacks should stop complaining and get on with it. He felt they caused many of their own problems by carrying such large chips on their shoulders.'

Wilson thus occupies an interesting position in the history of those decades from the voteless 1930s to the civil rights struggle and beyond: the son and grandson of educated middle-class blacks inside the segregated school system of the South, he gained a place at Harvard, becoming President of the Young Republican Club and graduating cum laude in 1954. On the other hand he also helped run the Harvard New Jazz Society, got involved with radio station WHRB, moved to New York, founded the jazz record label Transition in 1955, produced radio programmes as from 1958, became jazz A&R director for Savoy, then worked for United Artists and Audio Fidelity before being hired as a staff producer for Columbia in 1963—the first black producer in the history of the company—by which time he was also executive assistant to the New York State Commission for Human Rights.

Not only did he become Bob Dylan's producer from Freewheelin' to Highway 61 Revisited—which is to say, the producer of many of Dylan's 'protest' anthems, the work that saw him go electric and of 'Like a Rolling Stone'—but then when he moved over to MGM he signed FRANK ZAPPA's Mothers of Invention and put his own career on the line to let them make an extravagant double-LP as their début release, throughout which they were articulating the kind of anarchic bohemian 'filth' that was anathema to Wilson himself (though in truth, of course, Zappa himself was an obsessively hard-working disciplinarian, very anti drugs and alcoholic excess). Zappa said years later: 'Tom Wilson was a great guy. He had vision, you know? And he really stood by us . . .'

While producing the second Mothers album, Absolutely Free, Wilson was also supervising the Velvet Underground's début album The Velvet Underground and Nico. Wilson was, too, the hands-on producer of its track 'Sunday Morning', and (albeit against the band's wishes) edited and remixed the album's other most important tracks: 'Heroin', 'Venus in Furs', 'All Tomorrow's Parties' and the especially brilliant 'I'm Waiting for the Man'.

Sometimes his interventionism paid off and sometimes it didn't. It paid off on The Velvet Underground and Nico; it paid off when after producing the acoustic SIMON & Garfunkel début album Wednesday Morning 3 A.M. he took its track 'The Sound of Silence', added a rhythm section and some electric guitar and then issued it as a single, without consulting them at all, and gave them a no.1 hit.

It didn't work with Bob Dylan when Wilson tried the same thing on him first; nor did it work, in the end, when Wilson tried to make decisions over Dylan's head in Dylan's presence in the studio. To start with, though, they got on fine. Wilson replaced JOHN HAMMOND for the final Freewheelin' Bob Dylan session on April 24, 1963—a year to the day after the first session—because ALBERT GROSSMAN tried playing games about Dylan's Columbia contract and Hammond rightly felt that Dylan himself was not trying to walk out on him or the label, that a producer switch would be diplomatic and maybe that a young black producer would be harder to reject. Even if that were a factor in the mix, it would not have weighed heavily: one thing Hammond, Dylan and Tom Wilson had in common was an absolutely undeflected view that people were individuals, not race representatives. When Dylan 'dropped out of' supporting civil rights and singing 'protest' songs, he always explained this in exactly these terms: that he knew, and wanted to keep on knowing, black people as people, not blacks; and Wilson felt the same. 'He lived his life unapologetically as a human being, not as a black man,' said his friend, the cookie magnate Wally 'Famous' Amos.

That first session yielded 'Girl of the North Country', 'Masters of War', 'Talkin' World War III Blues' and 'Bob Dylan's Dream'—plus the lovely 'Walls of Red Wing', given to Witmark as a music publishing demo, circulated widely many years ago and finally released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991. (Hammond is credited as the producer of this track on the box set liner notes.)

When they worked together on Dylan's third album, The Times They Are a-Changin', beginning on August 6, 1963, Wilson rightly allowed Dylan full control. That first day yielded the great, much-neglected 'North Country Blues' and attempted several other things, among them the stellar 'Seven Curses': another recording that circulated in bootleg form many years ago and saw official release in 1991. The next day's session yielded four album tracks: 'Ballad of Hollis Brown', 'With God on Our Side', 'Only a Pawn in Their Game' and the glorious 'Boots of Spanish Leather'. What a day's work. Further sessions on August 12 and October 23 were separated by momentous events: Dylan's star-making appearance at the NEWPORT FOLK FESTIVAL that August 17, the appearance at the historic March on Washington, D.C., on the 28th, and the less career-important but artistically significant writing of 'Lay Down Your Weary Tune' at JOAN BAEZ's house in California, followed by a performance that no-one appears to have taped of the two of them sharing vocals on a début outing for that song when Dylan made a guest appearance at her Hollywood Bowl concert on October 9.

The August 12 session had yielded various further outtakes for retrospective issue nearly 30 years later—the turgid 'Paths of Victory', the worse 'Only a Hobo' and the magnificent 'Moonshiner' (among the greatest vocal performances in Bob Dylan's entire canon)—but nothing for The Times They Are a-Changin'; but October 24, while adding 'Eternal Circle' and 'Suze (The Cough Song)' to the list of material held back till 1991, also gave them the album title track plus the lovely 'One Too Many Mornings'. A further session on Hallowe'en finished off the album with 'Restless Farewell'. A few days earlier, Wilson had been in charge of the recording of Dylan's concert at Carnegie Hall (October 26, 1963) from which, as from his New York Town Hall concert of April 12, it had been planned to make a live album, Bob Dylan in Concert, which got as far as a tracks selection and a Columbia job number (77110) but never did see release. No producer credit is given on the tracks issued retrospectively.

The fourth album, Another Side of Bob Dylan, was recorded entirely in one day, June 9, 1964, again with Wilson producing. They also came out with a long-since circulated take of 'Denise', the magnificent 'Mama You Been on My Mind' and early attempts at 'Mr. Tambourine Man'. The album was released to a mixed response in August, and on Hallowe'en Wilson supervised another live recording, Dylan's New York Philharmonic Hall concert, which was released 30 years later as the Bootleg Series Vol. 6—Bob Dylan Live 1964.

Things between them changed after that. In December 1964, Wilson got drummer BOBBY GREGG and others to overdub backings onto the Bob Dylan track 'House of the Rising Sun' (released in 1995 on the Highway 61 Interactive CD-ROM, with packaging that implied that the whole recording had been made back in 1961) and onto three tracks from the Freewheelin' sessions, 'Mixed Up Confusion', 'Rocks and Gravel' and 'Corrina Corrina', all of which had to have their original backing tracks removed for the benefit of this futile exercise. In an otherwise entertaining and acute article on its subject, 'The Amazing Tom Wilson', blogger Eric Olsen makes the absurd claim that it was Wilson's electric overdubs on 'House of the Rising Sun' that planted the seed for Dylan's electric flowering ('The folk spell was broken'). Wilson doesn't need his achievements augmented by that sort of claim; it's enough that he was the producer of Bringing It All Back Home—achieved in two days of sessions in mid-January 1965—and of the first sessions for Highway 61 Revisited, that June 15 & 16.

The first of these two days yielded the fast version of 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', one take of which—the wrong take, it might be argued—was released in 1991 on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3, as was the same day's 'Sitting on a Barbed Wire Fence' and a fragment of an early try at 'Like a Rolling Stone'. (Other outtakes of this were issued in 1995 on the Highway 61 Interactive CD-Rom.) Far more importantly, the second day's session produced—and Tom Wilson produced—the classic take of 'Like a Rolling Stone'.

It was Wilson who brought in AL KOOPER, to watch and play a bit of subsidiary guitar. The story of how Kooper switched to organ, Wilson tolerated this, Bob Dylan liked the organ part and got it turned up in the mix and it led to the perfect take of the song—all this is well known: but a key exchange between Wilson and Dylan in the course of all this has usually been played down. When Dylan says 'Turn the organ up' and Wilson replies 'But he's not an organ player' Dylan is often quoted as merely saying, 'I don't care: turn it up'—but in fact what Dylan says is 'Hey, now don't tell me who's an organ player and who's not. Just turn the organ up.' The difference is small but telling; in that Dylan response is contained all his resentment, perhaps going back a considerable time, at what he perceived as Wilson's high-handedness: an attitude on Wilson's part that means he's always going to under-attend the artist's instincts and is likely to fail to catch the moment as it flies.

Fair and reasonable or not, that was the end between them. When the sessions for Highway 61 Revisited resumed on July 29, Wilson had been replaced by BOB JOHNSTON.

Among many other distinctions in a relatively short life, Tom Wilson also produced the Blues Project and 'discovered' and signed Hugh Masekela, went into music publishing and was a founding co-owner of the Record Plant studios in New York. At 47, he died of a heart attack at home in LA on September 6, 1978.

[Main sources: Eric Olsen, 'The Amazing Tom Wilson', posted 23 Oct 2003 on the Blogcritics.Org web page http://blogcritics.org/archives/2003/10/23/154347.php, incl. for the quotes from Coral Browning, Frank Zappa & Wally Amos; Waco City Directory 1934; Social Security Deaths Index; Moore High School data from its alumni reunion web pages seen online 21 Feb 2006 at www.wacoisd.org/ajmoore/alumni/history.htm; other sources include Al Kooper, Backstage Passes & Backstabbing Bastards, New York: Billboard, 1998 and Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, New York: Beech Tree Books/William Morrow, 1986.]

Wissolik, Richard David [1938 -] Richard David Wissolik, who was born May 7, 1938, is the co-editor with SCOTT McGRATH of Bob Dylan's Words—A Critical Dictionary and Commentary, 1994, which is partly a collection of commissioned articles but mostly an extraordinary assemblage of miscellaneous entries about literary allusions, people's names, places and objects in Dylan's work (rather like an encyclopedia, in fact), divided into the general categories 'Dictionary of Archetypes, Motifs and Symbols', 'Dictionary of Proper Names, Terms and Allusions', 'Selected Songs, Poems and Writings: Commentary and Textual Allusions', and 'Tarantula: Commentary and Textual Allusions'. (This last remains one of the few real scrutinies of this neglected—many would say because impenetrable—Dylan work.)

Wissolik had earlier been the General Editor of the slimmer volume Bob Dylan—American Poet and Singer: An Annotated Bibliography and Study Guide of Sources and Background Materials 1961–1991 (plus, its title page added under this fulsome sub-title, 'a Supplemental Checklist of Studies on the 1960s and the Folk Revival').

As might be suspected from all this, Wissolik is an American academic: in fact a Professor of English at St. Vincent College, a Catholic, Benedictine liberal arts and sciences college at Latrobe, Pennsylvania, founded in 1846. He is also Director of its Center for Northern Appalachian Studies. He has been general editor of a number of books on widely differing subjects and has also specialised in scrutiny of the Bayeux Tapestry.

Wissolik's first year of interest in Dylan was 1967, when he returned from five years as Program Director of Catholic Relief Services in Nairobi, Kenya. Bob Dylan—American Poet and Singer was his first published Dylan work. He has been involved with the Colorado outfit Rolling Tomes, which publishes the US fanzine ON THE TRACKS, and uses Dylan's lyrics in his classes on American Literature, Myth and Faces of Battle.

His Bob Dylan's Words—A Critical Dictionary and Commentary was reissued in an electronic edition in 1996 and a second print edition, revised and expanded, came out in 1997. An updated volume combining both his books is due in 2007; the title is yet to be decided but will certainly include the phrase 'Bob Dylan's Words'.

[Richard David Wissolik, gen. ed., Bob Dylan—American Poet and Singer, Greenburg, PA: Eadmer Press, 1992; Wissolik & McGrath, Bob Dylan's Words—A Critical Dictionary and Commentary, Greenburg, PA: Eadmer Press, 1994 & 1997.]

'With God on Our Side', extra verses to See Neville, Aaron.

Withers, Pick [1948 -] David Withers was born on April 4, 1948 in Glasgow, Scotland, and became a pro drummer at the age of 17. He played with a number of people, including Ian Anderson, Dave Edmunds' Rockpile, that other Welsh band the Neutrons (he plays hand drums only, on their 1974 album Black Hole Star) and Scottish singer-songwriter Rab Noakes—with whom he has worked again more recently—and he was in the British 'progressive rock' bands Magna Carta and Spring, calling himself Pique Withers before resigning himself to Pick and joining up with MARK KNOPFLER in Café Racers, which duly became Dire Straits. Withers was their drummer from the group's inception through till 1982, and in the middle of that period worked with Mark Knopfler on Dylan's first Born Again gospel album, Slow Train Coming, recorded between April 30 & May 4, 1979 at the Muscle Shoals studio in Sheffield, Alabama. He is the only drummer on the album—and therefore also on the single 'Trouble in Mind' and the out-take song 'Ye Shall Be Changed', released on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 in 1991—but has not worked with Dylan again since.

[The Neutrons: Black Hole Star, United Artists UAG 29652, UK, 1974. Spring: Spring, nia, UK, 1971.]

Witting, Robin [1953 -] Robin Witting, born in England on October 11, 1953, is author of a short book first called Isaiah on Guitar (1991) and later called Isaiah for Guitar (1998), this second edition revised and expanded, not from London or LA but from Scunthorpe, UK, and self-published. It looks amateurish, is expensive for its size and has no index. Nor does the layout always make clear who or where a quotation is from. He misquotes Dylan lines, he often fails to write in sentences and there's a lack of information just when it's most needed (e.g. re Zen teachings). Yet this is an absorbing, quirky, worthy piece of work that is often acute and extremely readable, his resourceful research is based on what genuinely interests him and his apparent detours—into the work of John Wesley, BUNYAN and Paine—turn out to inform and illuminate. Most of all, Witting maintains his own critical voice.

He has also self-published works on his real specialist subject, Tarantula, the largest being The Cracked Bells: A Guide to 'Tarantula', which in its revised edition of 1995 is a large-format book of almost 200 pages offering a richly researched annotated guide to its text. More recently has come the energetic and often persuasive 80-page 'Tarantula': The Falcon's Mouthbook, arguing that Dylan's novel is, from first to last, concerned with the religious and spiritual ramifications of 'oral obsession' and appetite.

[Robin Witting: Isaiah for Guitar, Scunthorpe, UK: Exploding Rooster Books, 1998; The Cracked Bells: A Guide to 'Tarantula', ditto 1994, revised edn., 1995; The Meaning of an Orange: the Pocket 'Tarantula', ditto 1996; 'Tarantula': The Falcon's Mouthbook, ditto 2005.]

Wonder, Stevie [1950 -] Steveland Morris Judkins was born blind in Saginaw, Michigan, on May 3, 1950, grew up in Detroit, came to fame as Little Steve Wonder at age 13 as a harmonica prodigy on a tremendous hit single, the live and extremely lively 'Fingertips Part 2', on which, inimitably, you can hear one of the musicians shouting 'What key?! what key?!' (the first live recording ever to top the pop charts, it was made at the Chicago Regal Theater in 1963), and duly grew up to be an African American cross-over superstar, with a vast number of hits, though these have veered between the experimental and the saccharine.

Wonder recorded a high-profile version of 'Blowin' in the Wind' in 1966—he was still only 15 years old when he recorded it—and he and Dylan have bumped into each other several times since. In 1982 they both performed, but separately, at the Peace Sunday rally (Dylan duetting with JOAN BAEZ) at the Rose Bowl in Pasadena. Three years later they were contributors to the 'We Are the World' USA for Africa single (for which it's rumoured that Wonder had to cajole Dylan into sounding more Dylanesque on his small contribution), and in 1992 Wonder was a surprise guest among the celebrants at the so-called 30th Anniversary Bob Dylan Concert Celebration at Madison Square Garden, New York. Revisiting 'Blowin' in the Wind', he used his moment in this particular spotlight to give a long piano-led introductory speech about the continued relevance of the song, proving in the middle that he could still play a sublime harmonica but making an embarrassing, doomed attempt at the end to make the audience sing along with him. (This was not a peacenik, activist crowd: it was there to shop for legends and to boo Sinéad O'Connor.) Towards the evening's end, he took his place in the ensemble for 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'.

But nearly seven years before that, at the Martin Luther King Birthday Celebration in Washington, D.C., on January 20, 1986 (though that was not his birthday), the two of them had sung together, on the Wonder song 'The Bells of Freedom': a title close to 'Chimes of Freedom', of course. Then, backed by Wonder and his whole band Wonderlove, Dylan sang a very jaunty re-written 'I Shall Be Released' before Bob, Stevie, PETER, PAUL & MARY all shared vocals on a 'Blowin' in the Wind'. The evening finished with an ensemble performance of 'Happy Birthday', sung simultaneously by people in New York and Atlanta as well as Washington, D.C.

Perhaps more interestingly, they had stood alongside each other to introduce the Grammies at the award ceremony in LA on February 28, 1984—a surprise because Dylan had never gone in for such glitz before, as he acknowledged, disarming any possible criticism when he told an interviewer: 'I know going on the Grammies is not my type of thing, but with Stevie it seemed like an interesting idea. I wasn't doing anything that night. I didn't feel I was making any great statement. For me, it was just going down to the place and changing my clothes.'

[Little Stevie Wonder: 'Fingertips (Part 2)', Chicago 1963, Tamla 54080, US, 1963. Dylan quote re Grammies, interview by Scott Cohen, Spin vol.1, no.8, US, Dec 1985.]

Wood, Ron [1947 -] Ronald David Wood was born in the outer reaches of London (Hillingdon, Middlesex, in fact) on June 1, 1947, began his music career with West London band the Birds, later joined Creation and then, with Rod Stewart, the Jeff Beck Group, in which he was the bass player. Next, again with Stewart, Ron joined that important, very British rock group the Small Faces, the idols of the Mod sub-culture, to which his quintessential cheery-cockney persona seemed ideally suited. Renamed the Faces soon after Wood joined, they disbanded in 1975.

Wood then collaborated with fellow-Face, the late lamented Ronnie Lane, on the 1976 album Mahoney's Last Stand, but was brought into the ROLLING STONES that same year (the year of their Black and Blue album), somehow managing to slide across from mod to rocker with ease. His invitation to join seemed inevitable and overdue.

Contemporaneously, Wood continued his solo career, pursued his interest in painting (which would, had he been a less famous person, have been his hobby) and worked with other artists—not least BO DIDDLEY, Aretha Franklin and ERIC CLAPTON. More to the point here, his collaborations with Bob Dylan have been perhaps surprisingly frequent. The two have bumped into each other professionally in 1976, 1981, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1991, 1996 and 2004.

In 1976 they were both on the sessions for Clapton's No Reason to Cry album; on May 15, 1981, Wood played guitar on the Los Angeles session that yielded 'Heart of Mine' for the Shot of Love album (and was also issued as a single); two years and two days later, Wood was one of those at a Dylan Infidels session in New York (along with Mark Rivera, Robert Funk and Laurence Etkin), playing guitar on an unissued (and uncirculated) attempt at 'Neighborhood Bully'. The following July, in New York again, they met up twice: Wood played guitar alongside the AL GREEN band behind Dylan's recording of 'Honey Wait', and at Dylan's own sessions played guitar alongside Anton Fig on drums and John Paris on bass, on unissued (but circulated) versions of Dylan's 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore' and 'Go 'Way Little Boy', and on the 26th of the month Wood played guitar on both the version of 'Clean-Cut Kid' released on Empire Burlesque in 1985 and on the 'Driftin' Too Far from Shore' that was released, on 1986's Knocked Out Loaded.

Then, yes, in Philadelphia, on July 13, 1985, in front of countless millions of television viewers and a packed crowd in the John F. Kennedy Stadium, having shared with Dylan and KEITH RICHARDS a number of bottles earlier in the day, Ron Wood now shared the humiliation of their LIVE AID appearance, after hosting the rehearsals for this débacle at his New York home a day or two earlier.

From June 15 to 17, 1986, Wood was back live at three consecutive concerts with Dylan and TOM PETTY & THE HEARTBREAKERS, playing guitar for the last nine songs of each concert, and in London that August 28–29, he played bass behind Bob at the recording of the miserably inadequate 'Had a Dream About You Baby', one take of which was issued on Down in the Groove and another on the soundtrack of the film Hearts of Fire (in which he appears as himself).

When the 1987 version of the tour with Tom Petty & the Heartbreakers reached London for four October nights, Ron popped up on the third night, to play guitar on the final encore number, 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35'. Much the same happened in 1991, when Dylan's Never-Ending Tour Band played a series of notably poor concerts at London, Hammersmith, and Wood came along on guitar on the penultimate night, February 16, playing on 'Everything Is Broken', 'Man in the Long Black Coat' and 'Like a Rolling Stone'.

In early 1996, it was Dylan contributing to some of Wood's work. He visited Ron at home at Sandymount, County Kildare, Ireland, and played guitar on two tracks, 'Interfere' and 'King of Kings'. The first of these, which had Dylan playing alongside Wood, IAN McLAGAN and bass player Willie Weeks, was later overdubbed by the legendary Scotty Moore on guitar and D.J. Fontana on drums (plus an Ian Jennings), so it's not certain Dylan's contribution survived; either way it's expensive to find out, since the result was issued only on a 4-track CD sold as part of the limited-edition book Wood on Canvas: Every Picture Tells a Story, published by the upmarket specialist company Genesis Publications in 1998. 'King of Kings', on the other hand, with Dylan also on guitar—and not overdubbed later—appeared as the final track on Wood's solo album Not for Beginners in 2002. It's nothing to rush out and buy: it's a short informal acoustic jam of no particular merit. A few months later, Wood came along again behind Dylan, this time at his London Hyde Park charity concert for the Prince's Trust (Prince Charles, that is: heir to the throne of the United Kingdom)—but this time Wood's contribution included not only guitar on all songs (alongside AL KOOPER on organ) but shared vocals on 'Seven Days', a Dylan song Wood had recorded himself, with odd insipidity, on his Gimme Some Neck album of 1979 and had performed at the 30th Anniversary Celebration Concert in New York in 1992. Since Dylan has rarely performed 'Seven Days' live, you might assume that on this occasion Ron Wood was the prompt for its inclusion, but no: having never played it in concert since 1976, Dylan had suddenly reintroduced it 20 years later, in April 1996, and had sung it 12 times between then and the June charity concert.

After that, there was an eight-year gap before Ron Wood reappeared on stage with Dylan one more time—so far the only time in the 21st century, at the Fleadh (pronounced Flar), again in London and again in a park (Finsbury Park this time), on June 20, 2004. Ron came on and played electric guitar on all 15 numbers.

Meanwhile in 1993 Ron Wood and Rod Stewart reunited on an MTV Unplugged™, giving them a sizeable hit album. Ron also continues to issue solo albums and remains a member of the Rolling Stones—in which capacity he has stood on the same stage as Dylan a further handful of times. His contribution to Dylan's work has never been significant (except negatively, at Live Aid, and that was probably more Keith's fault). But Ron and Bob keep getting together because they like each other. Ron likes Bob because he's Bob—unpredictable and unfathomable; and Bob likes Ron because he's undemanding, easy-going and as fathomable as a duck pond.

[Ron Wood: Gimme Some Neck, CBS 35702, UK, 1979; Not for Beginners, Steamhammer, US, 2002. Ron Wood, Wood on Canvas: Every Picture Tells a Story, Guildford UK: Genesis Publications, 1998.]

'Woodstock II' [1994] In the 25th anniversary year of the iconic Woodstock Festival of 1969, which Bob Dylan famously didn't attend (though THE BAND did), the large but infinitely less important 'Woodstock II' was held at Saugerties, New York (a stone's throw from the immortalised 'Big Pink'), in mid-August 1994. The rest of the event is immaterial; the point is that this time Bob Dylan did perform, with his Never-Ending Tour band of the day—BUCKY BAXTER on pedal steel and electric slide guitar, JOHN JACKSON on lead guitar, the inevitable TONY GARNIER on electric and stand-up bass and WINSTON WATSON on drums and percussion. Not only performed but reached a rare and special plane.

From the opening number, which was 'Jokerman', right through till the end of 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' this was magnificent Dylan, incontestably a set you wouldn't want to be without—and it has an extraordinary highlight in 'Just Like a Woman': a song normally rather the worse for wear in concert. Against all expectation, we get here one of his very most engaged, inspired, gloriously unloosed yet focused vocal performances in many years. And by far his best harp solo—almost *Blonde on Blonde*ish, no less. (Indeed when, before this, did Dylan last play three harmonica solos running, as here on 'Just Like a Woman', 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry' and 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right'?)

The whole performance, with the sound so well-mixed and the band so good that night, argues that the mid-1990s Bob Dylan can stand in the same room with the Dylans of the past. He is alive, alert, fully into his jazz-improvisational vocals and making some wonderful noises: and not imitating himself but singing—phrasing—afresh. Woodstock II is a real performance.

The punkish, grungy music is good, complex, Tom Verlaineish, real: not remotely MTV/AOR, and surprisingly resourceful. How interesting the rendition of 'Masters of War'—so very different from the brave, scrupulous version at Hiroshima earlier the same year, yet so fine, with the double-bass ominous but not overplayed; the splendid bluegrass-folk of 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right'; and yielding so fresh a milieu for 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue' that Dylan rises fully to the occasion, creating a whole that is concentrated and time-stopping—this last for the first time since live 1966—and even, to hone in on a specific detail, devising something special for the repeated sound of the word 'home' in the 'seasick sailors' verse, just as he did so unerringly in 1966.

Here, then, is an example of mid-1990s Bob Dylan offering brave singing, braver harp playing and, yes, love.

[Bob Dylan: 'Jokerman', 'Just Like a Woman', 'All Along the Watchtower', 'It Takes a Lot to Laugh, It Takes a Train to Cry', 'Don't Think Twice, It's All Right', 'Masters of War', 'It's All Over Now, Baby Blue', 'God Knows' (an unhappy lapse here; everyone loses interest, starting with its composer), 'I Shall Be Released', 'Highway 61 Revisited', 'Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35' and 'It Ain't Me Babe', Saugerties, NY, 14 Aug 1994. Televised live on pay-per-view cable. 'Highway 61 Revisited' released on the various artists video Woodstock 94, Polygram Video 800 632 3510-3, US, 1994 & the CD Woodstock 94, A&M 289, US, 1994–95.]

Woodward, Ian [1946 -] Ian Woodward, who was born in Brentford, UK, in 1946, wishes to keep his date of birth a secret and says that the rest of his Dylan-centred career is a matter of public record. Within the Dylan fanzines world, this is true: for several decades he has run The Wicked Messenger, an itemised near-daily log of every Dylan news snippet, rumour and reported sighting that comes to his attention. Once an independent newsletter, later inserted into The Telegraph, it is now published inside Isis.

words and music, the relationship of Dylan has sometimes suggested that words come first and music afterwards, but he has just as often suggested that it happens the other way round or that the two come into his head together. Clearly there have been times when he took a folk melody and put new words to it. Then again, he's often said that with 'Like a Rolling Stone', for example, what he had first was screeds of words that weren't necessarily going to become part of a song at all. And for one example of the third way, see Chronicles Volume One, in which he says of writing 'What Was It You Wanted?': 'I heard the lyric and melody together in my head and it played itself in a minor key. . . . The song almost wrote itself. It just descended upon my head.'

Many people will have experienced the arrival of words and music together, starting perhaps with just a phrase or a line. Mort Shuman, songwriting partner of DOC POMUS, comments interestingly on how the separation of words and music was changed by rock'n'roll: 'It wasn't like the old, more established songwriting teams of the pre-rock'n'roll [era] where you would have "Words by . . ." and "Music by . . ." With a lot of rock'n'roll teams . . . it was "Words and music by . . ." because we didn't know where one process started and the other stopped.'

Dylan has also said contradictory things about the primacy of words over music and vice versa and/or the indissolubility of their importance. In Chronicles Volume One, he comments: '. . . if my songs were just about words, then what was Duane Eddy, the great rock-and-roll guitarist, doing recording an album full of instrumental melodies of my songs? Musicians have always known that my songs were about more than just words, but most people are not musicians.'

A reasonable rejoinder might be that many musicians consider Dylan's music rather less distinctive than his lyrics, that at the same time many musicians never listen to the words when they hear a record, and finally that actually Duane Eddy Does Bob Dylan manages only seven Dylan compositions, adds P.F. Sloan's 'Eve of Destruction' and refers in its sleevenotes to songs 'from the pen of Bob Dylan, the poet laureate of the 1960s', concluding that 'What Bob Dylan is capable of saying with his magical way with words, Duane Eddy is capable of saying instrumentally.'

[Quotes from Chronicles Volume One, p.172 & 119–20. Mort Shuman: undated quote in interview by Spencer Leigh, Baby, That Is Rock and Roll: American Pop, 1954–1963, p.183–84. Duane Eddy: Duane Eddy Does Bob Dylan, Colpix CPL-494 and SCP-494, US, 1965.]

World Gone Wrong* [1993] A follow-up of sorts: the album after Good as I Been to You was another solo acoustic one, though more focused, more clean-cut, less gothic. Again the recordings are self-produced (and it does seem lamentable that when Dylan owns the finest of acoustic guitars, and after 30 years of supposed progress in recording technology, he cannot produce a guitar-sound as clear, vivid, biting, exuberant or controlled as he achieves on his earliest forays into the studio). Again, vocal decline is evident too. Yet this is a fine album, at least as good as its predecessor (most people prefer it), and again asserting with inward intelligence and formidable interpretative skill the richly humane values and poetic power of communally created song, even as he commands this material so trenchantly that it can seem as if he had written it all himself.

With serious-mindedness and a strong sense of mystery, he insists on the continued relevance of these voices from the past, and takes us so deeply among them that he frees us from the tyranny of the present. Both these 1990s solo albums signal Dylan's regaining of the sense that his new recorded work matters: there's no comparison to the hapless flailing around so evident on the albums from Empire Burlesque to Down in the Groove. Even the titles, symptomatically, have regained focus. And with World Gone Wrong we are also offered, for the first time in decades and to our considerable surprise, Bob Dylan liner notes. Stand-out tracks: 'World Gone Wrong', 'Love Henry', 'Ragged & Dirty', 'Delia', 'Two Soldiers', 'Lone Pilgrim'. The next Dylan studio album, Time Out of Mind, would be four years later.

[Probably recorded Malibu, CA, May 1993; released as Columbia CK 57590 (in UK as CD Columbia 474857 2), 26 Oct 1993, and in UK on LP as Columbia 474857 1, Dec 1993.]

Wraith, John & Wyvill, Mike [1949 -] John Wraith was born in Felling, UK, on November 8, 1949 and Michael Wyvill on Tyneside, UK, on September 24, 1949. Both first took an interest in Dylan's work in 1963, contributed to The Telegraph from 1991 and the privately circulated FREEWHEELIN' from 1992; they have jointly published a number of slim listings volumes on Dylan's tours, starting with Still on the Road, 1992, and are both now academics at Sunderland University, UK. They are jointly editors of the handsome-looking fanzine THE BRIDGE.

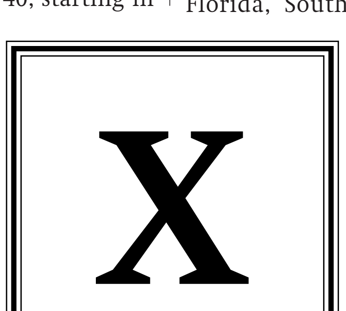
Wyeth, Howie [1944 - 1996] Howard Pyle Wyeth was born in Jersey City, NJ, on April 22, 1944, into a family that was distinguished in the arts, technology and 'society'. His father, Nathaniel Wyeth, was an inventor and a DuPont Corporation Engineering Fellow; his mother was Caroline Pyle of Wilmington, Delaware (where she is unlikely to have known SARA DYLAN's parents, the scrap-dealing Noznliskys). One of Howie's grandparents was the once-famous illustrator N.C. Wyeth; another was Ellen Pyle, illustrator of book jackets and magazine covers, including no less than 40 paintings used on the front of the Saturday Evening Post. In case this weren't enough illustrators in the family, Howie's great-uncle Howard was once known as 'the Dean of American Illustrators', while his uncle was the internationally famous painter Andrew Wyeth.

During his childhood Howie's family moved to Chadd's Ford, Pennsylvania, then Hockessin, Delaware, and then Hamorton, back in Pennsylvania. Howie survived the polio that struck him at age eight. (His older brother Howell died in a car crash, and his only sister, Caroline, died in childhood too.) In the early 1960s he moved to Syracuse, New York, where he formed an R&B band called the Sidewinders (which later became the Jam Factory) but he also studied music at Syracuse University, studied percussion under the Philadelphia Orchestra's Alan Abel and graduated in 1966. Three years later he made New York City his base.

He was a jazz pianist as well as a rock drummer and his studio session-work contributed to albums by Robert Gordon, Kinky Friedman, ROGER McGUINN, Link Wray and Don McLean (not to mention Joey Miserable & the Worms).

Howie Wyeth joined Bob Dylan in the studio on the last two days of July 1975 as drummer on sessions for the Desire album. These two days put him on the album tracks 'One More Cup of Coffee (Valley Below)', 'Black Diamond Bay', 'Mozambique', 'Joey', 'Isis' and 'Sara'. It also put him on 'Rita May' on Masterpieces (1978), 'Abandoned Love' on Biograph (1985) and 'Golden Loom' on the Bootleg Series Vols. 1–3 (1991). It also meant that when Dylan performed on the 'World of JOHN HAMMOND' TV tribute, in Hammond's presence, in Chicago two months after the sessions, Wyeth was drummer on 'Oh Sister', 'Simple Twist of Fate' and 'Hurricane'. And that October 24, it meant that Wyeth went back into the studio to re-record Hurricane with its legally necessary amended lyrics.

Wyeth then joined Dylan on tour, in the line-up known informally as GUAM, on both Rolling Thunder Revues, playing drums and piano (though not at the same time), starting from its launch on October 30, 1975 in Plymouth, Massachusetts, finishing the first tour that December 8 at Madison Square Garden, New York ('The Night of the Hurricane'), playing the second fund-raiser for RUBIN 'HURRICANE' CARTER in Houston on January 25, 1976, starting the second Rolling Thunder Revue in Lakeland, Florida, that April 18 and arriving at the final end on May 25 in Salt Lake City, Utah (by which time he had also been featured on the live recordings and video that made up the Hard Rain album and the semi-aligned 'Hard Rain' TV Special). Wyeth subsequently rehearsed for Dylan's 1978 World Tour but dropped out before it began.



He had, of course, been captured in the footage for Renaldo & Clara shot on the first Rolling Thunder Revue, revealing a soppy grin that often drew people to him, and he was described economically by SAM SHEPARD in his Rolling Thunder Logbook as 'The mellowest fellow I ever laid eyes on. A slouched wool cap that seemed to be growing onto his head. I never saw him without it. . . . Black tennis shoes. Enjoyed playing music like nobody's business.' Shepard said of that music: 'Smooth drums. Holy ancient American piano. . . . Upside-down Chinese splash cymbal.'

As this hints, Wyeth was always drawn to jazz as well as rock, and later in life he decided to turn his attention more fully to the piano, playing in Barbecue Bob & the Spare Ribs and in the Dharma Bums, and leading informal combos that played in New York jazz clubs but roamed in the musical hinterland of early jazz, ragtime and blues, albeit with a touch of zydeco.

He died of heart failure in hospital in Manhattan on the night of March 27, 1996. He was 51. In 2003 came a 2-CD set of his solo piano-playing, Chadds Ford Getaway, its grand piano sound gorgeously recorded and its title returning Wyeth posthumously to the haunts of his grandfather and his childhood.

[Howie Wyeth: Chadds Ford Getaway, nia, Stand Clear Music, US, 2003.]

Wynton Marsalis Septet, the See Marsalis, Wynton.

XM satellite radio series hosted by Dylan On December 12, 2005 it was announced that the subscribers-only satellite radio giant XM had signed up Bob Dylan to host a series of weekly programmes on what it calls its 'deep album rock channel Deep Tracks', XM Channel 40, starting in March 2006, on which he would play records 'hand-selected' (huh?) from his 'personal music collections', interview other artists and read e-mails from fans. The company announcement, headed 'Music Icon Becomes First-Time DJ to Spin Records . . .', quoted Dylan saying in suspiciously plausible PRspeak: 'A lot of my own songs have been played on the radio, but this is the first time I've ever been on the other side of the mic. It'll be as exciting for me as it is for XM.' The date later shifted to May 3, 1 am Eastern time.

XM is a large and burgeoning corporate player in the entertainment industry, with 160 coast-to-coast digital channels, 71 of them specialist music channels, studios in Washington, D.C., New York and Nashville, 'additional offices' in Boca Raton, Florida, Southfield, Michigan, and Yokohama, Japan, and over five million subscribers getting these channels beamed to their cars. The company has 'partnerships' with most leading auto manufacturers. A main attraction for customers is that many channels exclude advertising. The cheapest subscription as of February 2006 is $12.95 per month. XM is a wholly owned subsidiary of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and has traded on the NASDAQ exchange since October 5, 1999.

Y

Yarrow, Pete [1938 -] See Peter, Paul & Mary.

years Dylan didn't tour In the earliest years of his career Dylan wasn't 'touring', though he was playing live, mostly in clubs; but as from 1965 he can be said to have been touring. Since then, he has toured each year except these: 1967–73; 1977; 1982–83; 1985. The Never-Ending Tour began in June 1988 and, whatever names may be given to its constituent portions, is still going on.

Yearwood, Trisha [1964 -] Trisha Yearwood was born in the pretty town of Monticello, Georgia, on September 19, 1964, grew up on her father's farm, attended Belmont University in Nashville, became a country music singer there and scored a no.1 country hit in 1991 with 'She's in Love With the Boy', one of three singles taken from her début album, Trisha Yearwood. It was a great start, and in chart terms she has rarely stumbled since.

Initially a protégé of Garth Brooks, she became engaged to him in May 2005 after two previous failed marriages. Musically, Yearwood cites Linda Ronstadt as her biggest influence, but she's really not that bad. On March 23, 1994 at the partly televised event 'Rhythm, Country & Blues: The Concert' in LA, she and Dylan attempted a duet on the song 'Tomorrow Night' (which he had recorded on his solo acoustic album Good as I Been to You two years earlier). Though Dylan has always enjoyed challenging those with whom he shares a vocal mike, it was generally felt in this instance that it might have worked better had he sung in the same key as Ms. Yearwood.

[Trisha Yearwood: Trisha Yearwood, MCA, US, 1991; Hearts in Armor, MCA, 1992; The Song Remembers When, 1993; Inside Out, MCA, 1994; Thinkin' About You, MCA, 1995; Everybody Knows, MCA 11477, 1996; Songbook, MCA, 1997; Where Your Road Leads, MCA, 1998; Real Live Woman, MCA, 2000; Jasper County, MCA, 2005.]

Yellin, Bob [1936 -] Anton Robert Yellin was born in New York City on June 10, 1936. He was a founder member of THE GREENBRIAR BOYS, to whom Dylan was support act when he was given the key review by ROBERT SHELTON in the New York Times in September 1961.

At some point earlier that year, while Yellin was sharing an apartment at 127 MacDougal Street, he recorded Dylan there on his Magnacorder tape machine. Yellin took the tape, which was of about six songs, to Maynard Solomon at Vanguard Records, feeling that the label really should sign him up. Every few days, Yellin would ask Solomon if he'd listened to the tape yet, and the answer would be no. Eventually Solomon said that he had listened but that he felt 'it's really not for us'. Yellin never retrieved the tape.

Yellin was the Greenbriar Boys' banjoist from its 1958 inception until 1969, when he moved with his family to Israel for what turned out to be 13 years, to live and work on Kibbutz Ein Dor, which is between Afula and Tiberias, below Mount Tabor: a settlement surrounded by Arab and Bedouin villages, with whom it has always been on friendly terms.

On his first night in the country, his 'greeter' told him there was no-one named Robert in the Old Testament so would he choose another name; he chose David (pronounced da-veed), but this got bastardised into the not particularly biblical Dave.

Larry Yudelson's website 'Bob Dylan: Tangled Up in Jews' reported that in the early 1970s Dylan paid a private visit to the kibbutz, as Yellin's guest; that Yellin showed him around and said afterwards: 'He was feeling his Jewish roots and was very pro-Israeli at that point in his life . . . I don't remember the date but I think it was in the early 70's. He came to see me and spent a Shabbat afternoon with me. . . . He was impressed by kibbutz life but was mostly concerned, in general, about security issues in Israel.'

Yellin confirms all this, and pins down the date (thanks to his wife) as Saturday, May 29, 1971, adding that Dylan came down from another kibbutz further north, probably Kibbutz Ein Gev, where he had reportedly given a concert the previous evening. That such a thing happened has never been mentioned within the world of Dylan loggers, and if he had given a concert in the middle of his private visit to the country, without other musicians, this would have been his only solo concert since 1965—an amazing thing to have remained unlogged. Yet Yellin says he only knew Dylan was in the country because he read of the concert in a local news report or heard of it on radio, and this is what prompted him to phone Dylan and invite him to Kibbutz Ein Dor. What is known is that Dylan was already in Israel on May 24, his 30th birthday, and was photographed at the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem with his wife SARA. It's also reported that both visited the Kibbutz Givat Haim, perhaps to investigate the possibility of moving there, though in fact this kibbutz already had an almost 50-year history of schism between the two factions that had been allocated its land, and the bitter politics that kept the two sides divided would have been the last possible milieu to attract Bob Dylan.

When Dylan arrived at Kibbutz Ein Dor to see Yellin, he was accompanied only by a tour guide cum driver. His interest in 'security issues', Yellin recalls, centred particularly on planes. 'He was interested in planes: what aircraft Israel had, that kind of thing.' He has the impression that Dylan's interest in Israel was short-lived. The visit was brief and that was the last time they met. His abiding memories of Dylan are from the early Greenwich Village days, when 'his leg would always be bobbing up and down, and he would always be sitting there writing.'

Yellin came back to the States, and back to being Bob instead of David, in 1982. He took part in the reunion performances of the Greenbriar Boys, and from the stage of the Philadelphia Folk Festival asked if people knew of any bluegrass players in Vermont; the result was meeting up with Mark Greenberg and three others and the formation of Bob Yellin & the Joint Chiefs of Bluegrass, which lasted right through to the mid-1990s.

Now 70, and still living up in 'the boonies' of northern Vermont, Yellin has more or less retired, though he still owns a folk-music store in Burlington, Vermont.

[Larry Yudelson's website is at www.radiohazak.com/Dylan.html. Most information from Bob Yellin, phone call with present writer, 2 Nov 2005.]

Yoakam, Dwight [1956 -] Dwight David Yoakam was born in Pikesville, Kentucky, but grew up in Columbus, Ohio, learning to play the guitar as a child, forming his first band while in high school and growing up to be an eccentric country singer, a quirky, nominally country songwriter and a fine actor, not only in Hollywood but also on stage. He first moved to Nashville in the late 1970s, and released a first EP (yes, an EP!) in 1984, A Town Near Bakersfield, and the début album Guitars, Cadillacs, Etc., Etc. in 1986. He began acting in TV and film at the beginning of the 1990s and made his theatrical début in 1993, in the two-act play Southern Rapture, written by Joseph G. Tidwell III and directed by Peter Fonda—in which he co-starred with SALLY KIRKLAND and Vanessa Marcil ('Brenda Barrett' on, er, 'General Hospital'), and in which one of the other characters is named 'Mr. Zimmerman'.

Yoakam connects with Dylan only briefly. In early 1993 in Los Angeles, Dwight backed Carlene Carter, along with HOWIE EPSTEIN, Joe Romersh and Kevin Welch, while Bob provided backing vocals as she recorded a version of Dylan's Empire Burlesque song 'Trust Yourself', later released on a CD single that accompanied her 1993 album Little Love Letters.

In 1997, Dwight Yoakam contributed the final track, a very choppy, wilfully contrived 'T for Texas', on the compilation album The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers: A Tribute, which Dylan and his office assembled and which was issued on Dylan's fitfully extant label Egyptian Records. And then on September 2, 1999, in the West Palm Beach, Florida, opening concert of Dylan's brief tour that month—squeezed between the June–July tour with PAUL SIMON and the October–November tour with PHIL LESH—Dylan delivered a one-off performance of Yoakam's 'The Heart That You Own'. Yoakam's immaculately sung studio version is on his 1990 album If There Was a Way: a performance that belies his image as 'hardly country at all', or 'cowpunk', and delivers a relaxed but nuanced and attentive vocal with a timbre that reminds you at once of George Jones and a panache with little filigrees that takes you straight back to LEFTY FRIZZELL.

[Dwight Yoakam: 'The Heart That You Own', nia, If There Was a Way, Reprise, US, 1990; 'T for Texas', Burbank, CA, nia, The Songs of Jimmie Rodgers: A Tribute, Egyptian/Columbia 485189 2, US, 1997. Carlene Carter: 'Trust Yourself', Giant 74321 17682, with Little Love Letters, US, 1993.]

Young, Izzy [1928 -] Israel Goodman Young was born in New York City on March 26, 1928. He grew up working in his parents' Brooklyn bakery and first encountered folk music in 1945 when on impulse he joined Margaret Mayo's American Square Dance Group. He attended LEADBELLY's last concert in New York City in 1949, and the concert at his funeral a few months later. He dropped out of Brooklyn College in 1950 and in the mid-1950s met the eminent folklorist Kenneth S. Goldstein, whose encouragement steered him towards folk revival activity, starting by compiling a 15-page listing of rare publications.

He was the founder of the Folklore Center, at 110 MacDougal Street, Greenwich Village, which he opened in March 1957 after cashing in a $1000 insurance policy to pay for the lease. 'I had about $50 in the bank,' he said later, 'and I had a batch of books I put up on the shelves and a few records, and I started doing business from the first minute.' The idea of the place was to supply the would-be folk musician's needs: records, sheet music, second-hand guitars, strings, capos, Sing Out! magazine and more. It was also, perhaps inevitably, a place for like-minded Villagers bump into each other and hang out, especially in a back room 'with a pot-bellied stove, crooked pictures and rickety chairs', as Dylan describes it in Chronicles. 'Some people,' he recalls, 'picked up their mail there.'

Dylan's descriptions of Young and his Folklore Center are, in a book of great vivacity and detail, especially vivid. He begins by hinting at its importance to him, saying that he started avoiding the Café Wha in the afternoons and hanging out at the Center instead. 'The small store was up a flight of stairs and the place had an antique grace. It was like an ancient chapel, like a shoebox sized institution.' The back room with the stove, he says, had 'old patriots and heroes on the wall, pottery with crossed-stitch design, lacquered black candles' and 'was filled with American records and a phonograph. Izzy would let me stay back there and listen to them' and even thumb 'through a lot of his antediluvian folk scrolls. . . . Extinct song folios of every type—sea shanties, Civil War songs, cowboy songs, songs of lament, church house songs, anti-Jim Crow songs, union songs—archaic books of folk tales, Wobbly journals, propaganda pamphlets . . .' (Young gave him pamphlets on Joe Hill to read, after Dylan asked who Hill was.) The Center was 'the citadel of Americana folk music . . . a crossroads junction for all the folk activity you could name and you might at any time see real hard-line folksingers in there. . . . I saw CLARENCE ASHLEY, Gus Cannon, MANCE LIPSCOMB, TOM PALEY, Erik Darling hanging around in the place.' It was here that Dylan first encountered DAVE VAN RONK, stepping in off the snowy street to look at a Gibson guitar.

Young himself was 'an old-line folk enthusiast, very sardonic and wore heavy horn-rimmed glasses, spoke in a thick Brooklyn dialect, wore wool slacks, skinny belt and work boots, tie at a careless slant. His voice . . . always seemed too loud for the little room. Izzy was always a little rattled over something or other. He was sloppily good natured. In reality, a romantic. To him, folk music glittered like a mound of gold.' Not everyone found him so good-natured: he often showed a short temper, occasionally a physically violent one, and could be intractable in nursing small imagined slights.

At some point Young started writing a news-snippets and gossip column for Sing Out!, called 'Frets and Frails', and kept a journal in which, invaluably in retrospect, he logged the comings and goings of his musician-customers—including Bob Dylan.

(Examples: 'September 23, 1961: Met Bob Dylan 3am this morning on the way to a JACK ELLIOTT party at 1 Sheridan Square . . . Terry Thal now a manager. Tom Paxton, Bob Dylan and someone else.' 'January 26, 1962: Passed Dylan on the street, he said to me that he "didn't know why so many things are happening to me." I said that he did.')

JOHN BAULDIE described him as 'a loud, disorganised, big-hearted folk enthusiast' at whose Center Dylan spent a lot of time, 'looking at records, music, trying out instruments, meeting people and, later, writing songs in the back room on Izzy's old typewriter. One of them, the unreleased "Talkin' Folklore Center", was specially composed on March 19, 1962 as a fund-raiser.' The previous October, when Young was interviewing Dylan for his journal, Dylan mentioned another composition, 'California Brown Eyed Baby', which he said he was performing at the time.

Dylan credits Young with fighting city hall to allow music in Washington Square Park, and in general fighting against 'injustice, hunger and homelessness'. More personally, though, he credits Young with having played him particular records as suggested pieces of repertoire for him, and even being so trustworthy that Dylan told him truths about his own family (a rare thing indeed).

It was also Young who, at ALBERT GROSSMAN's prompting, promoted Dylan's first real concert, at the Carnegie Chapter Hall on November 4, 1961—at which Bob performed 21 songs, finishing with the two of his own he would record later that month for his début album, 'Song to Woody' and 'Talkin' New York' . . . to an audience of 52. Young was not a great businessman, as Dylan comments: 'Young was beseiged with bill collectors and dictates from the landlord. People were always chasing him down for money, but it didn't seem to faze him.'

He's likely to have been one of those Dylan hit out against later, in 'Positively 4th Street'. By 1965 Young was highly critical of Dylan's move away from overt political songs, and he wrote a piece in the first issue of the radically underground East Village Other, published that October, after being angered by the absence, at an anti-war rally, of all Albert Grossman's artists. Looking back over Dylan's earlier years he saw them anew: '. . . everyone conveniently forgot that he allowed Columbia Records to delete "John Birch Society Talking Blues" from his second album. This was soon after he swore that Columbia would have its way over his dead body. (I was hoodwinked . . . into arranging an abortive protest march . . . Dylan and management pulled a no-show on our six brave marchers.)' He added that Dylan copyrighted work that 'reflected accurately' that of 'poets from PATCHEN to GINSBERG' and 'no-one complained'; that he went to England, 'picked up marvelous morsels' and then 'left the poets and England behind.' He added: 'There seemed no heights to which Dylan could not attain. He had only to meet the right person. If he could only meet Malraux he could write treatises on civilization'. And so on. Young said in 1992 that he sent this article to Dylan before it was published, and that Dylan 'always said it was the best single article ever written on him'.

In the fullness of time, Young was back on board the Dylan bus, giving a warm and generous interview to JEFF ROSEN for the MARTIN SCORSESE film No Direction Home, in which he appears. One story he tells in the film, however, is untrue. It was not Young but BOB YELLIN of THE GREENBRIAR BOYS who tried to get Maynard Solomon to sign Dylan to Vanguard—he took him a tape—and the remark Young has Solomon making about not signing 'freaks' does not ring true as the speech of the gently spoken, good-humoured Solomon.

When Chronicles appeared, Young was thrilled and gratified by Dylan's detailed, affectionate recall. 'No matter what else Dylan has done his starting point has always been folk music. He never leaves folk music and he never will.' And: 'The book he promised to write, with a chapter on me, in July 1962 has finally come true!'

Young handed over the Folklore Center to Rick Altman in 1973, moved to Sweden and there opened the Folklore Centrum in Stockholm. He and it are still going.

[Bob Dylan: Chronicles, 2004, pp.18–22; Joe Hill pamphlets p.52. Izzy Young background detail in part from Ronnie D. Lankford Jr., All Music Guide, seen online 5 Oct 2005 at www.icebergradio.com/artist/499028/izzy_young.html. Izzy Young journal extracts Judas! no.12, Huntingdon, UK, Jan 2005, p.53; article 'Bob Dylantaunt', East Village Other vol.1, no.1, NY, Oct 1965, republished Judas! no.10, Jul 2004, pp. 87–88; response to Chronicles, written 20 Jun 2005, Judas! no.14, Jul 2005, p.34. John Bauldie, 'Village Walking Tour', online 5 Oct 2005 www.interferenze.com/bcs/villagesights.htm.]

Young, Neil [1945 -] Neil Young was born November 12, 1945 in Toronto, Ontario, his father a sports-writer on the Toronto Sun. He survived many childhood illnesses and his parents' divorce, after which he lived with his mother in Winnipeg, Manitoba, and took up music. His early groups included the Jades, the Esquires, the Classics, Neil Young & the Squires and the Mynah Birds; his later groups have included Buffalo Springfield, the Bluenotes, the Stray Gators, the Ducks, Crazy Horse and CROSBY, Stills, Nash & Young.

There's always an interestingly edgy relationship between Dylan and Neil Young, especially since Young came along just late enough to be formatively influenced by Dylan, yet has grown into a music mountain many people believe to be of near-equal size and significance in the landscape of post-1950s rock. The only two possible other contenders would be JONI MITCHELL and VAN MORRISON. Dylan himself puts Young first when, in a 1991 interview with Paul Zollo for Songtalk magazine, he refers to other singer-songwriters. Young begins almost as a disciple, and ends with a near-matching prophet's gravitas himself. The two have often if fitfully come together, sometimes uneasily.

By 1965, while still in Yorkville, Toronto, Neil Young was playing Dylan songs; he performed 'Just Like Tom Thumb's Blues' at a Killington, Vermont, ski resort that September; and instead of fitting in with Stephen Stills in pop group the Squires, Young decided to become a folk troubadour. 'He wanted to be Bob Dylan and I wanted to be THE BEATLES,' said Stills.

Dylan saw Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young at the Fillmore East in New York in early June 1970 and attended the party at the end of their week's residency there. Young's song 'Last Trip to Tulsa', on his eponymous first album (January 1969), is the first of several Young tracks that either imitate or pay marked tribute to Dylan—these include 'Days That Used to Be' and 'Ragged Glory' (both cf. 'My Back Pages'), 'Sixty to Zero' and 'Ordinary People'—and when Dylan heard 'Heart of Gold' (from Harvest, 1972), he thought it sounded like him. (He also told Young that the same album's 'A Man Needs a Maid' was one of his favourites.) The following year, Dylan was in the audience for a Young set at the opening of the Roxy Theatre in LA; invited backstage to meet Young, Dylan reputedly replied 'No thanks, we've just eaten.'

Young was also impressed with Dylan's approach to live performing in the 1970s, declaring in 1976 that 'Dylan . . . has shown so many of us, especially with the Before the Flood album tour with THE BAND, that a major performer can live with his people'—and, inspired by the early small-hall ethos of the Rolling Thunder Revue, Young promptly organised his own Northern California Coastal Bar Tour (aka the Rolling Zuma Revue). Young fans often suggest, perhaps rightly, that influence moved in the opposite direction when Dylan, untypically, put sleevenotes about each song on his 1985 collection Biograph: they note that Young had done the same on his earlier retrospective collection Decade (1977). Possibly too, Dylan's intimate performances at the Supper Club in New York in 1993 were a belated paralleling of Young's five acoustic nights at the 150-seater Boarding House in San Francisco 15 years earlier.

The two first appeared on stage together at the SNACK Benefit Concert in San Francisco on March 23, 1975. (The acronym covers the revoltingly named Students Need Athletics, Culture and Kicks.) They performed a 35-minute set with backing musos TIM DRUMMOND and Ben Keith plus The Band's RICK DANKO, GARTH HUDSON and LEVON HELM, playing 'Are You Ready for the Country', 'Ain't That a Lot of Love', 'Lookin' for a Love', 'Loving You Is Sweeter Than Ever', 'I Want You', 'The Weight', 'Helpless', 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' and 'Will the Circle Be Unbroken'—yet managed to share vocals only on the last two songs. Officially unreleased, though bootlegged from a radio broadcast, Dylan's vocals are barely audible.

The following year, both took part in The Band's farewell concert at the Winterland, San Francisco (filmed by MARTIN SCORSESE as The Last Waltz). Young, looking magnificently wasted, performed two of his own songs watched from backstage by Dylan, and they joined with others for an encore of 'I Shall Be Released'. Nine years later, both appeared at LIVE AID, again performing together only during the ensemble encore (from which Dylan sloped off early). But it was Young whose phone call persuaded Dylan to take part in Farm Aid, after the latter's ill-judged remarks at Live Aid had galvanised WILLIE NELSON into organising the Farm Aid event. Dylan and Young both performed at this, but met up only privately backstage. Another six years on and Young was one of the best performers at the 30th Anniversary Concert for Dylan at Madison Square Garden, NYC, on October 16, 1992, giving a ferocious, blazing performance of 'All Along the Watchtower', adding backing vocals (with ROGER McGUINN, TOM PETTY, GEORGE HARRISON and ERIC CLAPTON) on Dylan's performance of 'My Back Pages', and contributing to the ensemble rendition of 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door'. (An edited version of this concert was released as The 30th Anniversary Concert Celebration on album and video in 1993.)

By this time, Dylan was some years into the Never-Ending Tour—it began in June 1988—and Neil Young dropped in on this several times over. Indeed Young was in on the start of it, lending Dylan and his band his ranch for pre-tour rehearsals, and then took part in the first, third and fourth concerts, playing electric guitar. It was also Young and his wife Pegi who founded the Bridge School for Handicapped Children near San Francisco, which holds an annual benefit concert, and for which Dylan appeared on December 4 in that first year of the Never-Ending Tour, performing six songs with G.E. SMITH on lead guitar.

In 1993 Young revisited Dylan's tour (October 9, Mountain View, CA), playing guitar on one number, and then one year and 11 days later he and BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN both played guitar behind Dylan on two encore numbers at the Roseland, New York City. In 1996, weirdly, Dylan and his band were second on the bill below Young & Crazy Horse at a July 13 concert in Hamburg; there was no collaboration that night. When Young toured in the summer of 2000, and the support act was the Pretenders, he returned to 'All Along the Watchtower', with Chrissie Hynde on guitar and support vocals, one such performance being included on the live album Road Rock Vol. 1—but then he had also revisited this Dylan song in 1993 when he'd played in concert with Booker T & the MGs. (Dylan had played harmonica on a BOOKER T album track in 1973—an album called Chronicles.)

Perhaps the gentlest, best conjunction comes late on—when Dylan namechecks Young on the Time Out of Mind song 'Highlands' in 1997—'I'm listenin' to Neil Young / I got to turn up the sound / Someone's always yelling / "Turn it down!"'—and then Young namechecks Dylan on the Greendale album's song 'Bandit' (2003), and in such a way that it takes us back to two 1960s Dylan songs ('Talking World War III Blues' as well as 'Like a Rolling Stone')—'No-one can touch you now / But I can touch you now / You're invisible / You got too many secrets / Bob Dylan said that / Somethin' like that.'

There are other, more superficial conjunctions: from 1982–89 Dylan's personal manager was Elliot Roberts, Young's long-time manager; both artists have owned boats in the Caribbean; both have songs entitled 'Hurricane'.

In 2002 Dylan sang Young's early classic 'Old Man' over 30 times in concert, beginning at Sacramento on October 8. Dylan/Young/'Old': we seem to be forever tangled up in both's back pages.

[This entry has been informed by issue no.93 of the Neil Young fanzine Broken Arrow, Falkland, Scotland, edited by Scott Sandie; by the online 'Neil Young Biography: The Godfather of Grunge' by Dave Zimmer (author of 4 Way Street: The Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young Reader) at http://www.thrasherswheat.org/nybiozimmer.htm, 1 Jun 2005; & by the anonymous http://www.angelfire.com/ny4/heartofgold/neilyoungbio.htm online 31 May 2005.]

Young, Terry [19?? -] Terry Young was the keyboards player playing behind Dylan on the fall 1979 gospel tour, the 'Saturday Night Live' TV appearance, both the 1980 gospel tours and the Saved album, recorded in February 1980 in Sheffield, Alabama. On the compilation album Gotta Serve Somebody: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan, 2003, Young was reunited with other members of that Dylan gospel-tour band, including bass player TIM DRUMMOND, guitarist FRED TACKETT and drummer JIM KELTNER, to play on the version of 'Solid Rock' by the Minnesota choir Sounds of Blackness.

Terry Young is a gospel songwriter himself, and penned five of the songs on the former Raelette and session singer Merry Clayton's 1994 album Miracles, for example: namely the title track plus 'He Touched My Life', 'Say Yes to the Spirit', 'What About You?' and 'I Know He'll Be There'. He has also contributed his voice to animation movies like 2003's Brother Bear, The Lion King and, with Mona Lisa Young, to The Lion King II: Simba's Pride. Together the two made the single 'So Good So Right' c/w 'Reflections', and he sings backing vocals on her long-deleted 1983 solo album Knife.

Terry and Mona Lisa Young are now divorced but remain friends.

[Terry Young & Mona Lisa Young: 'So Good So Right' c/w 'Reflections', nia, Encore ENC 100347, US, nia. Various Artists: The Gospel Songs of Bob Dylan, Columbia/Legacy CK 89015, US (Columbia COL 511126 2, UK), 2003.]

Z

Zappa, Frank [1940 - 1993] Frank Vincent Zappa was born in Baltimore on December 21, 1940 and lived in Edgewood, Maryland, before being uprooted to the no-man's-land of the Californian Mojave Desert in 1950. He became a key figure in the culture of the second half of the 1960s, and a composer and musician whose work ranged far wider than 'rock' suggests.

For many, he will remain the man who gave the world the Mothers of Invention, and albums called Lumpy Gravy, Weasels Ripped My Flesh and We're Only in It for the Money (this last a savage parody of THE BEATLES' Sgt. Pepper's artwork). His breakthrough came on the West Coast as a bohemian avant garde was becoming the mass 'hippie' movement, and with splendid early songs like 'Call Any Vegetable', 'Who Needs the Peace Corps?' and 'The Brain Police', Zappa made himself famous with equally savage satirical attacks on both the gullible hippie young and their parents, while appearing in early publicity shots sporting a flowery dress along with a distinctively swarthy moustache and imperial beard, and with his long hair up in bunches.

Having gained an entrée into the world of rock celebrity, however, Zappa put himself at the cutting edge of studio technology and was a pioneer at integrating modern 'classical' music, jazz and rock in complex, witty ways. In the end, he offered 30 years' worth of music across what was an unprecedented, and remains an unrivalled, breadth of musical terrain.

An artist of the most demanding musical sensibility, Zappa never outgrew a taste for smut songs, always missing the critical point by defending them for their 'humour' and 'sexual honesty', while those around him found them wretchedly unfunny and about as sexually honest as Benny Hill. But then he didn't much like people. His 1989 autobiography reported: 'A normal day for me is spent working by myself and not talking to anybody. . . . I have to work the night shift and [my wife] has to work the day shift. . . . Every three or four weeks I'm back on daylight—and I dread it. . . . All those questions Gail was dealing with when I was sleeping on the day shift, now I have to answer—live, in person. I can't edit . . .'

He was specially wary of musicians, rock and classical types equally, though occasionally both met amicably. In 1981, Frank contacted Nicolas Slonimsky, who had conducted the 1933 world première of Edgard Varèse's Ionisation, and soon afterwards the pianist-conductor appeared at a Zappa rock concert. Slonimsky was given earplugs (which he discarded), Zappa introduced him as 'our national treasure', he played electric piano, the band joined in, the audience whooped and Slominsky took a bow. He was 87 years old.

Zappa's life and work always displayed dramatic contradictions. A talented self-publicist with a trademark flair for grotesque-joke titles, he was always committedly serious about his work; a workaholic disciplinarian who despised the use of drink and drugs, he chose for his early image that of laid-back leader of an anarchic drug-fuelled hippie band. A loud champion of 'groupies', he was one of the very few men in rock to stay married (to Gail Sloatman) for over 25 years; an effective political campaigner against the New Right televangelists in Reagan's America, and a vociferous opponent of Tipper Gore's campaign to sticker albums with lyric-content warnings (he would have laughed loud and hollow had he lived to see Tipper's husband Al present himself as the good-guy presidential candidate in the 2000 US election), he never considered himself a liberal or a supporter of the Left. A fine rock guitarist, he was a steadfast enemy of mainstream rock music; a 'classical' composer, he was always quick to bring into his band jazz musicians of promise and talent, including George Duke and Jean-Luc Ponty.

In the end, perhaps, Zappa came to see musicians as purchaseable units, like editing suites or amps: part of the baggage the composer needs to finance and deploy. Or not, in the case of rock musicians. His 1986 release Jazz from Hell was made, one track excepted, entirely on the computer-keyboard instrument the Synclavier: dispensing with musicians yet sounding like lots of them.

The crunch came in 1988, when the rock tour that would be his last collapsed after 81 shows, Zappa sacking most of the musicians because they were all in dispute. As the me-decade ended, Zappa made trips to Russia and (as it was then) Czechoslovakia. He got caught up in 'facilitating American finance' (unsuccessfully) for a Russian horror film, and trying to help sell frozen muffins to the USSR. Zappa said: 'I met all these very interesting people who wanted to do a wide range of business things with people from the West. . . . [I was] kind of like a dating service.'

In 1990, Zappa revisited Prague, President Havel urging him to be a cultural liaison officer for the new régime in its approaches to the West. In 1991 he returned to Czechoslovakia and Hungary to celebrate the departure of their Soviet troops, and at a Prague concert gave his only guitar performance since the rock-tour collapse. In London he told BBC Radio 4 that he was still doing 'a feasibility study' on standing for the US Presidency in '92, by getting US radio listener-response. By the autumn, no decision had been announced, and then his prostate cancer was announced instead.

Despite myriad other activity, including the making and sponsoring of pioneering animation videos, serious composition had long been Zappa's main concern. The vegetable fetishist with the dope-head rock group and the aesthetically challenged publicity (older readers may recall the 'Zappa the Crapper' poster) had become a serious composer, his work performed in concert halls alongside Cage, Stravinsky and other moderns.

In 1983, overseeing a Barbican performance of his orchestral works with the London Symphony Orchestra and the young American conductor Kent Nagano, Zappa was unhappy at the orchestra's apparent drinking in the interval, and said that on the subsequent recording sessions, repairing trumpet-section faults needed 40 edits in seven minutes' music. These are undetectable because, as Nagano conceded, 'Frank was such a superb editor.'

Zappa also worked with Pierre Boulez, but felt that his Ensemble InterContemporain, too, was under-rehearsed, for its 1984 performance of his work in Paris. 'I hated that première,' he wrote. 'Boulez virtually had to drag me onto the stage to take a bow.'

No-one could have been more different in their approach from Bob Dylan. Indeed when Dylan went on tour in 1981, for example, he made his musicians rehearse for five days; when Zappa went on tour in 1988 he made his musicians rehearse ten hours a day, five days a week, for four and a half months. Yet not only had it been Dylan's revolutionising of the possibilities of song that had made it possible for people to make records as different as were the early Mothers of Invention albums, but when Zappa had heard 'Like a Rolling Stone' on radio in 1965 he'd felt like quitting the music business almost before he'd joined it: 'I felt: "If this wins and it does what it's supposed to do, I don't need to do anything else."' It seemed to Zappa that for a six-minute rock song with surreal and political lyrics to win AM airplay and reach the charts was a major breakthrough: that the old, straight pop scene might be destroyed and replaced by socially, politically and musically good rock music. He decided not to quit, partly because AM radio didn't transform itself overnight after all, but mostly because if 'Like a Rolling Stone' signalled the moment when music was going to break boundaries in what it said and how it said it, Zappa too wanted to contribute to that destruction and renewal.

Their careers never coincided directly until 1982. That December, a scruffy-looking figure turned up unannounced at the gate of Zappa's house claiming to be Bob Dylan. Zappa reported to the veteran British music-journalist Karl Dallas: 'I get a lot of weird calls here, and someone suddenly called up saying "This is Bob Dylan. I want to play you my new songs." Now I'd never met him and I don't know his voice but I looked at the video-screen to see who was at the gate, and there, in the freezing cold, was a figure with no coat and an open shirt. I sent someone down to check, to make sure it wasn't a Charles Manson, but it was him.' Dylan was asking if Zappa would be interested in producing his next album. Zappa: 'He played me his eleven new songs and I thought they were good songs. He seemed like a nice guy. Didn't look like it would be too hard to work with him.'

Apart from the general polarities between the two—Zappa's insistence on technical super-proficiency, Dylan's unconcern for it; Zappa's contempt for three-chord songs, Dylan's reliance on them; Zappa's studio perfectionism, Dylan's preference for one-take 'feel'—there was, for Zappa, one specific area of difficulty. At this point, the end of 1982, Frank had a fair head of steam going against the Born Again Christian New Right, as his recent work had stressed; Dylan had only made one album since the evangelising Slow Train Coming and Saved: and even that one subsequent work, 1981's Shot of Love, had certainly not repudiated that evangelising, and had included 'Every Grain of Sand' and 'Property of Jesus'.

Faced, therefore, with Dylan playing him a new collection of songs ('He basically just hummed 'em and played 'em on the piano'), Zappa said afterwards: 'I asked him if it had any Jesus in it. I said: "Do these songs have the Big J in?" and he said no; [but] when I took him upstairs to give him a sandwich, my dog barked at him. I told him to watch out, my dog doesn't like Christians. And he didn't laugh.'

This Zappa-produced Bob Dylan album never happened, unfortunately. Hard as it might have been to envisage, it's possible that the very different strengths of these two major artists might both have flourished within a partnership. Dylan could have done with a perfectionist production, and Zappa could have done with spending some time listening to an artist whose intelligence was so acutely in the service of heartfelt instinct instead of mechanistic boys' toys. As it was, the album Dylan eventually made in part from some of the songs he had played to Zappa, Infidels (1983), was an indifferent and peculiarly anonymous production that left the songs seeming an ill-assorted ragbag rather than a cohesive collection. It was also a collection on which, though he got no explicit namecheck, 'the Big J' was certainly still around. The two artists never came together again.

In 1989, asked to identify his 'primary goal', Zappa answered: 'That's easy. I'm still waiting for an accurate performance!' In the event, he lived to hear something he probably felt came close. Since his illness, Zappa had cancelled many public appearances and new works. His last completed major project was The Yellow Shark, a collection of work commissioned by the Ensemble Modern and premiered at the Frankfurt Music Festival in September 1992. Zappa had planned to conduct part of each evening's performance but in the event could manage the baton only for small portions of the first performance. The work was nevertheless an immediate success, and under Zappa's own supervision yielded a CD recording, released only a month before his death: one last release from one of the major creative figures of modern music.

Frank Zappa died of prostate cancer, incurable because diagnosed too late, at his home in Los Angeles on December 4, 1993. He was 52.

[Frank Zappa & the Mothers of Invention: Lumpy Gravy, Verve V(6)8741, US (Verve SVLP9223, UK), 1968, CD-reissued Ryko RCD40024, US; Weasels Ripped My Flesh, Bizarre RSLP2028, US (Reprise K44019, UK), 1970, CD-reissued Ryko RCD10163 (Zappa CDZAP24); We're Only in It for the Money, Verve V(6)5045, US (Verve SVLP 9199, UK), 1968; Jazz from Hell, Barking Pumpkin ST74205, US (EMI EMC3521, UK), 1st CD version Ryko RCD10030, US (Zappa CDZAP32, UK), 1986; The Yellow Shark, Barking Pumpkin, US (Zappa CDZAP57, UK), 1993. Frank Zappa (with Peter Occhiogrosso), The Real Frank Zappa Book!, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.

Zappa quote from Greil Marcus, The Guardian, London, 13 May 2005, extracted from his Like a Rolling Stone: Bob Dylan at the Crossroads, 2005. Zappa quotes to Karl Dallas from Michael Gray, Mother! The Frank Zappa Story, London: Plexus, 1993, pp.185–86.]

Zevon, Warren [1947 - 2003] Warren William Zevon was born in Chicago on January 24, 1947, the son of a Russian Jewish father and a Celtic Mormon mother. They moved to Arizona and then LA when Warren was a child, and though he dropped out of high school, he learnt classical piano and became acquainted with Stravinsky and the conductor Robert Craft.

His first successes in music were mostly as a songwriter; the Turtles recorded his song 'Like the Seasons' in 1967, and when his début album was released in 1969 (Wanted Dead or Alive) the track 'She Quit Me' was used in the iconic hit film Midnight Cowboy. After the album flopped he served THE EVERLY BROTHERS as pianist-bandleader during their sour last pre-split years and wrote jingles for Boone's Farm wine and Chevrolets (not necessarily combined). He sang in California and Colorado clubs, and moved to Spain to bum around, just as Jackson Browne was pushing Zevon's songs to the music biz. Hence the return to the US, the release of the Browne-produced Warren Zevon (1976), and Excitable Boy (1978) which brought him to public acclaim and success, not least thanks to the top 10 hit 'Werewolves of London'. A spindly blonde figure in a tight t-shirt and grannie glasses, he looked, in these early years, like an air-guitarist who had somehow got hold of a real instrument.

Excitable Boy kicked off his long career as a successful, distinctive lyricist of hedonistic celebration undercut by sharp mockery of that countercultural hedonism and of himself. His titles alone had a beguiling and quirky ring to them, from 'Desperadoes Under the Eaves' and 'Detox Mansion' to 'Lawyers, Guns and Money' and 'Things to Do in Denver When You're Dead' (this last written as part of his music for the 1996 film of the same name). One of his album titles was Sentimental Hygiene.

His songs were covered by many others, and in later life he collaborated with NEIL YOUNG and Bruce Hornsby but also with jazzmen like Chick Corea and with more youthful musicians, not least for an album of (mostly) blues standards made with three quarters of R.E.M. under the group name Hindu Love Gods (Hindu Love Gods, 1990).

It was on Sentimental Hygiene, in 1987, that Warren Zevon and Dylan connected. One of the songs Zevon recorded was 'The Factory'; Dylan was asked to overdub a harmonica part onto the track, which he duly did in an LA studio in February or March 1987. The track, a not especially outstanding example of Zevon's trademark twitchy energy and mordant relish, was included when the album was issued that August.

'Detox Mansion' had been written from personal experience; it came to seem that the same was true for his obsessive songs about death. His 2000 album was titled Life'll Kill Ya. He continued to work and record after being diagnosed with terminal cancer in 2002, and managed to make a final album in this period, The Wind, to which a parade of other stars contributed.

Bob Dylan was not among them, but a rather fine Zevon version of 'Knockin' on Heaven's Door' was one of its tracks, while it was at this point that Dylan introduced several Zevon songs to his set. It was unusual to give another writer's work such prominence within his own repertoire, but at the first concert of the 2002 Never-Ending Tour's last leg, on October 4 in Seattle, Washington, he performed three Zevon songs, the sinuously expansive 'Accidentally Like a Martyr', 'Boom Boom Mancini' and the lovely 'Mutineer'. The next night 'Lawyers, Guns and Money' replaced 'Boom Boom Mancini', which was never repeated, but the others were retained. Altogether between October 4 and November 22, he performed 'Mutineer' 31 times, 'Accidentally Like a Martyr' 22 times and 'Lawyers, Guns and Money' four times. The various-artists posthumous tribute album Enjoy Every Sandwich: The Songs of Warren Zevon, released in 2004, included one of Dylan's rough but ineffably tender live versions of 'Mutineer'—not, as it says on the album insert, 'live in Australia' but from his Red Bluff, California, concert of October 7, 2002. (JAKOB DYLAN's band THE WALLFLOWERS recorded 'Lawyers, Guns and Money' for the same album.)

Warren Zevon once said: 'Bob Dylan is the greatest. He was the greatest influence on every singer/songwriter. On everyone with any job remotely like this. Anyone who denies it is lying. There is only Dylan.'

Zevon's own final album, The Wind, was issued the month before he died, and was widely regarded as a strong addition to his canon. 'If you're lucky,' he once said, 'people like something you do early and something you do just before you drop dead. That's as many pats on the back as you can expect.'He died of mesothelioma, a rare and inoperable cancer in his lungs and liver, in LA on September 7, 2003. He was 56.

[Warren Zevon albums: Wanted Dead or Alive, US, 1969; Warren Zevon, 1976; Excitable Boy, 1978; Bad Luck Streak in Dancing School, 1980; Stand in the Fire, 1981; The Envoy, 1982; A Quiet Normal Life: The Best of Warren Zevon, 1986; Sentimental Hygiene, Virgin America 7-90603-1, 1987 (CD-reissue V21Y-86012-2); Transverse City, 1989; Mr. Bad Example, 1991; Learning to Flinch, 1993; Mutineer, 1995; I'll Sleep When I'm Dead (An Anthology), 1996; Life'll Kill Ya, 2000; My Ride's Here, 2002; Genius: The Best of Warren Zevon (a Rhino anthology), 2002; The Wind, Artemis 51156, 2003. Hindu Love Gods: Hindu Love Gods, Warner Bros. 24406-2, US, 1990. Quote re pats on back, interview in Entertainment Weekly, nia, US, 1993. Various Artists: Enjoy Every Sandwich: The Songs of Warren Zevon, Artemis 51581, 2004. Zevon quote on Dylan online 4 Oct 2005 at http://frontpage.simnet.is/bobdylan/friends.htm.]

Zimmerman Blues* [fanzine] See Styble, Bryan.

Zimmerman, David [1946 -] David Benjamin Zimmerman, Bob Dylan's younger brother, was born in February 1946 in Duluth, Minnesota, two years before the family moved to Hibbing. When David was six and Bob 11, their cousin Harriet Rutstein started to give both boys piano lessons on the Gulbranson upright their parents had bought. Their uncle, Lewis Stone, told Dylan biographer HOWARD SOUNES that David was the better player: 'David . . . was a very, very smart boy [who] took it all in . . . he could play better than Bob. He was very musically inclined.' (Six years later, Les Rutstein became general manager of Hibbing radio station WMFG, and got a very hard time about its 'square' programming from the less musical Bob.)

Sounes tries to make a small mountain out of the fact that as children Bob and David weren't close—that David would be excluded when Bob's friends were around; that they didn't walk around town together—but of course that's how it was: look at the age gap. Who does want their kid sibling around when their friends come over? It would have been weird if they had been close. All the same, David was relied on to take the Polaroid shots of Bob that he started to pose for—practising for stardom—around 1956. And after that stardom had arrived, in the spring of 1964 Bob made a return visit to Hibbing to attend the kid brother's high school graduation. On June 6, 1968, the day after their father died of a heart attack, it was David who collected Bob from the tiny Hibbing-Chisolm Airport and drove him back to a house full of relatives and neighbours. After the funeral, David drove Bob round Hibbing on a rainy afternoon, and thought him 'So calm, so reserved, so clean . . . almost so saintly!' he told ROBERT SHELTON.

A few days before his important Carnegie Hall concert on October 26, 1963, attended by his parents, Dylan had told a Newsweek reporter: 'I don't know my parents. They don't know me. I've lost contact with them . . .' The journalist found him out, and got a quote from David, then 17, as well. 'We were kind of close,' David told Newsweek. 'We're both kind of ambitious. When we set out to do something, we usually get it done,' to which he added this clipped but truthful insight: 'He set out to become what he is.'

TOBY THOMPSON interviewed David Zimmerman around five years later. They met in a bar in Minneapolis one weekend in 1968–69: 'David was short like Bob, but stocky. Close to fat. He wore glasses; and well-tailored sports clothes—stylish—jodhpur boots, mod English jacket, cuffless tapered trousers—the whole trip.' Zimmerman wouldn't say much, reacting with frosty silence to Thompson's prattle, but he couldn't resist rubbishing the motorcycle crash:

'Know how Bob hurt himself on that motorcycle? He was riding around the backyard on the grass and slipped. That's all.' So he didn't really break his neck? 'Sure, if a cracked vertebra is a broken neck.'

Wife Gail was a Catholic, and when David had wanted to marry her, in the spring of 1968 (when he was only 22), this was a big deal in the Zimmerman family, and caused so much agitation to his father, who was unwell, that the wedding was postponed from its planned date of May 30. Abe Zimmerman told Robert Shelton: 'When my boys make mistakes, they make big ones.' On June 5, Abe died. The wedding went ahead later.

David Zimmerman was the culprit who persuaded Dylan that the tapes from the New York Blood on the Tracks sessions of September 1974 weren't good enough, and to take them up to Minnesota where he gathered together a new group of musicians for Bob to rework them with—overseeing all this because at the time he managed some local groups, was au fait with studio availability and so on. In the case of 'Lily, Rosemary and the Jack of Hearts' this brought about an improvement, mostly in Dylan's own re-writing and telling of the tale, but in other cases, especially that of 'Idiot Wind', the change was not for the better.

Nonetheless, David and Bob continue to have business connections: joint ownership of an old theatre in Minneapolis, and even an association in Circuit Films, the distributor of Renaldo & Clara.

On September 25, 2004, Bob returned to Hibbing to attend the funeral of David's mother-in-law, Myrtle Jurenes, spoke for a few minutes to his own English teacher, B.J. Rolfzen, and then left in a pick-up truck, not staying for the lunch laid on for relatives and friends.

David's sons Seth and Luke Zimmerman are both musicians, Seth leading the alt-country outfit Tangletown. Asked in December 2005 about his father's activities these days, Luke replied: 'My dad is retired from the music scene right now.'

[Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin 1987 edn., quote p.61. Toby Thompson, Positively Main Street: An Unorthodox View of Bob Dylan, London: New English Library edn., March 1972 reprint, pp.72–74. Howard Sounes, Down the Highway: A Life of Bob Dylan, New York: Grove Press, 2001, Lewis Stone quote ms p.34, David 1963 quote ms p.178. Paolo Vites, 'Oh no! Not another Zimmerman!: An interview with Luke Zimmerman', Rock 'n'Roll Circus, Italy, 9 Dec 2005, seen online 13 Feb 2006 at www.lukezimmerman.com/press.htm.]

Zimmerman family, the Robert Allen Zimmerman and his younger brother, DAVID ZIMMERMAN, are the children of Abe and Beatty Zimmerman. For Beatty's side of the family, see the Stone/Edelstein family.

Abram H. Zimmerman, Bob's father, was born in America, in Duluth, Minnesota, on October 19, 1911, into a family of four other children. If you believe the 1920 census details, Abe was the first of the family born in the USA: but that would mean that the brother a year or two older than him, Jack/Jake, must have been born quite soon before their mother's arrival, which was definitely in 1910: which in turn is problematic since their father had arrived in 1907. It's more reasonable to believe the 1930 census, which says that Jack/Jake was born in the US a year ahead of Abe.

Abe's father—Bob's paternal grandfather—is Zigman Zimmerman; his Hebrew name is Zisel. 'I don't know how they got a German name,' said Dylan in the 1978 Playboy interview. Zigman was born in the thrusting Russian port of Odessa on Christmas Day 1875, and grew up in an atmosphere of active, vicious anti-Semitism. He seems to have run a shoe-making sweatshop before he fled Tzar Nicholas II's pogroms in 1906. His brother Wolfe not only stayed behind but became a soldier in the Russian army.

Zigman arrived into the US in 1907, through Ellis Island to New York City, like so many others. From there he moved north-west until he arrived in Duluth. He worked as a peddler and sent for his family soon afterwards: by 1910 they had arrived. His wife Anna, formerly Chana Greenstein, born in Odessa on March 16, 1878, had given birth to three children before their emigration: Maurice, aged eight on arrival; Minnie, aged six; and Paul, four. They squeezed into a small apartment at 22½ West 1st Street, where we presume the fourth child, Jake, was born (though the 1930 census says he was born in Wisconsin). Either way, before the next brother, Max, came along in 1914, the Zimmermans had moved to a house: 221 Lake Avenue North, Duluth. It is the only one of the homes Bob Dylan's father lived in as a child and as a young adult that does not still exist.

Zigman was still a peddler when Abe was born, but by 1917, Zigman, now styling himself Zigmond H. Zimmerman, was a 'solicitor' working for the Prudential Life Insurance Co. He had obtained his naturalisation papers in 1916, but when the US entered the Great War in 1918, the Zimmermans were forced to register as aliens. His wife Anna told the registrar she was a dressmaker, and that she spoke 'a little English'. Zigmond could speak it but not read it. By 1920 he was a dry goods salesman; later that decade he opened his shoe store but it failed, and by 1930 he was a salesman in someone else's. All the same, in 1925 they moved again, to a two-storey house at 725 East 3rd Street.

By 1930 the oldest children, Maurice and Minnie had left home, Maurice first working on railway equipment repairs and then as a railway ticket inspector, while Minnie worked as a typist at the Duluth Herald newspaper. Still living at home, 24-year-old Paul had become packer, clerk and then salesman for the Manhattan Woolen Mills. Abe, who by the age of seven had been shining shoes and delivering newspapers, had graduated from the repulsive looking Central High School in 1929, was now 18 and working for the Standard Oil company, first as messenger boy and then as clerk. As Dylan commented in 1978: '. . . my father never had time to go to college.'

When Abe, aged 22, married 18-year-old Beatty, whom he'd met on one of her weekend trips to Duluth, on June 10, 1934 at her parents' house in Hibbing, his older brother Paul was best man. They honeymooned in Chicago and then came back to live in Duluth, with Abe's mother and the three youngest brothers at 402 East 5th Street. Abe's father, Zigman, had moved out and had an apartment in the Kinsley Apartments on West 1st Street. On July 6, 1936, he died of a heart attack in the street on 2nd Avenue West, in a heat wave, at the age of 60.

Abe duly became a senior manager at Standard Oil, and ran the company union; he and Beatty moved house several more times, finally escaping Abe's siblings by moving into the upstairs of a duplex at 519 3rd Avenue East, high up on the hillside overlooking the port and Lake Superior. Their first child, Robert Allen Zimmerman, was born at the nearby St. Mary's Hospital on May 24, 1941, weighing in at 7lb 13oz: 'about as big as a good-sized lake trout,' writes DAVE ENGEL, in his invaluable Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues—Dylan in Minnesota. Robert Allen's Hebrew name is Shabtai Zisel ben Avraham.

In 1947 the family moved to Hibbing, where Abe's brothers Maurice and Paul had set up Micka Electric Co. the year Bob was born. Abe became an appliance salesman. When Bob's little brother David was a bit older, Beatty started working as a clerk at Feldman's clothing shop in the main street, Howard Street.

Abe contracted polio and suffered its debilitating physical consequences all through Bob's childhood. 'My father,' Dylan told the French paper L'Expresse in 1978, 'was a very active man, but he was stricken very early by an attack of polio. The illness put an end to all his dreams, I believe. He could hardly walk . . .' But others reported that he walked with a slight limp, not always noticeable. His mother, Anna, who had also moved to Hibbing, and lived for some years with Bob's Uncle Maurice, moved into a nursing home way down in St. Paul and died there of arteriosclerosis on April 20, 1955. She had outlived her husband by almost 20 years.

Her death certificate, with the information supplied by Uncle Maurice, confirmed that she'd been born in Odessa. Dylan contradicts this, writing in Chronicles Volume One of visiting her when she still lived in Duluth: she 'had only one leg and had been a seamstress. She was a dark lady, smoked a pipe. . . . [Her] voice possessed a haunting accent—face always set in a half-despairing expression. . . . She'd come to America from Odessa. . . . [but] Originally she'd come from Turkey, sailed from Trabzon, a port town, across the Black Sea. . . . Her family was from Kagizman, a town in Turkey near the Armenian border, and the family name had been Kirghiz. My grandfather's parents had also come from that area. . . . My grandmother's ancestors had been from Constantinople.'

Abe Zimmerman had a heart attack in summer 1966. On June 5, 1968, soon after 5 PM, he died of a second heart attack. He was buried in Duluth.

[Main sources: predominantly Dave Engel, Just Like Bob Zimmerman's Blues—Dylan in Minnesota, Rudolph, WI: River City Memoirs—Mesabi, 1977, incl. Abe's 'slight limp' (p.109); plus: Engel, emails to this writer 19 Nov 2005 & 22 Feb 2006; 1920 & 1930 US Censuses, Duluth City; Robert Shelton, No Direction Home: The Life and Music of Bob Dylan, London: Penguin edn., 1987, pp.59–60. Bob Dylan in L'Expresse, Paris, nia, 1978, quoted in Engel; Chronicles Volume One pp.92–93.]

Bob Dylan's parents, Beatty & Abe Zimmerman

Index